The general rule is that the employer is only liable in three cases: 1. Where the act of the contractor is one which if done by the employer would be done at his peril. 2. Where the contractor is employed to execute certain work which the employer is under a statutory duty to perform. 3. Where the work which the contractor is employed to do is unlawful or a public nuisance; Engel v. Eureka Club, 137 N. Y. 100, 32 N. E. 1052, 33 Am. St. Rep. 692. For a general rule of non-liability for acts of independent contractor, see King v. R. Co., 66 N. Y. 181, 23 Am. Rep. 37. In other cases the employer is not liable; Conners v. Hennessey, 112 Mass. 96.

In Covington & C. Bridge Co. v. Steinbrock, 61 Ohio St. 215, 55 N. E. 618, 76 Am. St. Rep. 375, through negligence of an independent contractor employed to tear down a building partly destroyed by fire, the wall fell, damaging plaintiff's building, and the defendant was held liable though he used due care in selecting his contractor. He was held negligent on the broad principle that one cannot escape liability for an injury that might have been anticipated as a probable consequence if reasonable care were omitted. This case is criticised in 14 H. L. R. 62, as partially abrogating the independent contractor rule in Ohio. Some cases establish a rule holding the employer in a contract for labor on a highway as an insurer, owing a duty to the public; Hill v. Tottenham, 106 L. T. R. 127; Penny v. Wimbledon Council [1899] 2 Q. B. 72; Halliday v. Telephone Co. [1899] 2 Q. B. 392; The Snark [1899] P. D. 74. This line of cases is approved by 14 Harv. L. R. 63, as an exception to the general rule, but the writer thinks that the weight of authority in this country is in favor of the independent contractor rule and against the Ohio case.

After acceptance of the contract work, the employer will be liable for an injury caused by a defect in it; Gorham v. Gross, 125 Mass. 232, 28 Am. Rep. 224; Bast v. Leonard, 15 Minn. 304 (Gil. 235); Chartiers Val. Gas Co. v. Lynch, 118 Pa. 362, 12 Atl. 435; Vogel v. New York, 92 N. Y. 10, 44 Am Rep. 349; Fanjoy v. Seales, 29 Cal. 248; Cunningham v. R. Co., 51 Tex. 503, 32 Am. Rep. 632; Kansas Cent. Ry. Co. v. Fitzsimmons, 18 Kan. 34; and, if ratified by him, for the tortious acts of the contractor; Coomes v. Houghton, 102 Mass. 211; Parker v. R. Co., 81 Ga. 387, 8 S. E. 871.

As to the liability of a municipal corporation, it has been held that such a corporation cannot rid itself of responsibility for the acts of an independent contractor; King v. R. Co., 66 N. Y. 181, 23 Am. Rep. 37; as he is acting under the authority of the district or city council, and without such authority, he would be a trespasser on the streets; 74 L. T. Rep. 69; and notwithstanding the nature of the work to be performed, it is the duty of the municipality to see that the streets are in a safe condition for travel; Kemper v. City of Louisville, 14 Bush (Ky.) 87; Mayor, etc., of City of Savannah v. Waldner, 49 Ga. 316; Mayor, etc., of Baltimore v. O'Donnell, 53 Md. 110, 36 Am. Rep. 395; Grant v. City of Brooklyn, 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 381; Schweickhardt v. City of St. Louis, 2 Mo. App. 571; Mayor, etc., of Memphis v. Lasser, 9 Humph. (Tenn.) 760; contra, Painter v. Mayor, etc., 46 Pa. 213; or, as it is held in England, so to construct its sewers as not to injure the gas mains or other underground conveniences, and the municipality was held liable even when there was an independent contractor for the injury caused by an explosion in a private house because of an escape of gas from a main broken by the negligence of the contractor; [1896] 1 Q. B. 335.

And this rule is to be applied even though the contractor has stipulated that he will be responsible for all damages that may be caused in the execution of the work; Inhabitants of Veazie v. R. Co., 49 Me. 119; Smith v. City of St. Joseph, 42 Mo. App. 392; Pettengill v. City of Yonkers, 116 N. Y. 558, 22 N. E. 1095, 15 Am. St. Rep. 442; McAllister v. City of Albany, 18 Or. 426, 23 Pac. 845; contra, Osborn v. Ferry Co., 53 Barb. (N. Y.) 629. It has been held that where there is a statutory requirement that the contract be given to the lowest bidder, the municipality was not liable; James v. City of San Francisco, 6 Cal. 528, 65 Am. Dec. 526.

INDEPENDENT PROMISES. Those made in a contract upon which one party has a right of action against the other for any injury sustained by him by reason of a breach of the covenants or promises in his favor, and where an allegation of non-performance of his covenant by the plaintiff is no defence to such action.

When the performance of one depends or is conditional on the prior performance of the other, the agreements or covenants are said to be dependent. McCrelish v. Churchman, 4 Rawle (Pa.) 26; Tompkins v. Elliot, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 496. Where performance of each is dependent or conditional upon performance of the other, they are mutually dependent.

Where there are promises on both sides in an agreement,—executory considerations,—it always becomes a question whether one party is bound to perform his before the opposite party shall be required to perform those on his side. When the agreements are dependent, neither party is bound actually to perform his part of the agreement to entitle him to an action for a breach by the other; it is enough that he was able to perform his part and offered to do so; Hammond v. Gilmore's Adm'r, 14 Conn. 479; Moore v. Hopkins, 15 La. Ann. 675.

Where the consideration is executory, technically speaking, the promise and not the performance is the consideration, and hence the obligation of one may be independent of the performance of the other. Upon examination and proper construction of mutual promises, it may appear "that the obligation of the one promise is made expressly or impliedly conditional upon the due performance of the other; and then the performance of the promise, constituting the executory consideration, is a condition precedent to the liability to perform the other promise; in the latter case the mutual promises are called dependent, and in the former they are called independent." Leake, Cont. 344.

In Jones v. Barkley, 2 Dougl. 684, Lord Mansfield thus classified mutual promises: "There are three kinds of covenants. 1. Such as are called mutual and independent, where either party may recover damages from the other for the injury he may have received by a breach of the covenants in his favor, and where it is no excuse for the defendant to allege a breach of the covenants on the part of the plaintiff. 2. There are covenants which are conditions and dependent, in which the performance of one depends on the prior performance of another, and, therefore, till this prior condition is performed, the other party is not liable to an action on his covenants. 3. There is also a third sort of covenants, which are mutual conditions to be performed at the same time; and, in these, if one party was ready, and offered, to perform his part, and the other neglected, or refused, to perform his, he who was ready and offered has fulfilled his engagement, and may maintain an action for the default of the other; though it is not certain that either is obliged to do the first act." In this case, it was clearly laid down that the criterion by which it is determined whether promises are dependent or not, is the intention of the parties, and this is to be determined from the whole contract; id.; Adams v. Williams, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 227; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Howard, 13

How. (U. S.) 307, 14 L. Ed. 157; 29 L. J. C. P. 253; or as Lord Kenyon aptly says, "It must depend on the good sense of the case;" 6 Term 570. The rule is stated in Loud v. Water Co., 153 U. S. 564, 576, 14 Sup. Ct. 928, 38 L. Ed. 822. "The question whether covenants are dependent or independent must be determined in each case upon the proper construction to be placed on the language employed by the parties to express their agreement. If the language is clear and unambiguous it must be taken according to its plain meaning as expressive of the intention of the parties, and, under settled principles of judicial decision, should not be controlled by the supposed inconvenience or hardship that may follow such construction. If the parties think proper, they may agree that the right of one to maintain an action against another shall be conditional or dependent upon the plaintiff's performance of covenants entered into on his part. On the other hand, they may agree that the performance by one shall be a condition precedent to the performance by the other. The question in each case is, which intent is disclosed by the language employed in the contract." The intention is to be discovered from the order of time in which the acts are to be done, rather than from the construction of the agreement or the arrangement of the words; Goodwin v. Lynn, 4 Wash. C. C. 714, Fed. Cas. No. 5,553; Speake v. Sheppard, 6 Harr. & J. (Md.) 85. See also Howland v. Leach, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 151; Knight v. Worsted Co., 2 Cush. (Mass.) 287; Leonard v. Dyer, 26 Conn. 176, 68 Am. Dec. 382; Cadwell v. Blake, 6 Gray (Mass.) 407.

It is said that the dependency may be expressed or implied, as the condition is expressed or implied, and that the doctrine of implied dependency was introduced by Lord Mansfield, in Kingston v. Preston, cited in 2 Dougl. 684, before which, if there was no expressed dependency, a breach by one party was no defence to an action by the other and only gave him a cross-action; Harr. Cont. 153.

What is meant by implied dependency may be stated: From the definition of dependency it is clear that the term is used to describe certain conditions which necessarily belong only to bilateral contracts. As these conditions must originate in the intention of contracting parties, if expressed in the contract, they are governed by the law of conditions generally. In the absence of precise expression, the law imputes an intention, which creates an implied condition. The principles which regulate these conditions constitute the law of implied dependency and they are peculiar to the subject; Langd. Sum. Cont. 134.

The question of dependency is so much a matter of intention that there is much truth in the remark "that arbitrary rules are useless"; Harr. Cont. 153. Nevertheless certain rules of construction have been generally agreed upon and applied in the interpretation of contracts, with respect to this subject.

A note to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 319, termed by Pollock (Contracts 386) "the classic on the subject," gives the five rules of Mr. Serjeant Williams which are most referred to (Langd. Sel. Cas. Cont. 641, n. 5). These rules are adopted, in a different order, in Leake, Cont. 345, and substantially the same general principles have been grouped in four rules; 1 Bouv. Inst. 701; Platt, Cov. 80. These classifications are extremely interesting as affording a good illustration of what is practically an early codification of the principles governing an important branch of the law of contract, and, while the first is accessible, their repetition here is proper, as they must necessarily be referred to in connection with the brief statement which present limitations permit, of the rules of construction generally accepted.

The rules of Mr. Serjeant Williams are: 1. If a day be appointed for payment of money or part of it, or for doing any other act, and the day is to happen, or may happen, before the thing which is the consideration of the money or other act is to be performed, an action may be brought for the money, or for not doing such other act before performance; for it appears that the party relied upon his remedy, and did not intend to make the performance a condition precedent; and so it is where no time is fixed for performance of that which is the consideration or the money or other act. 2. But when a day is appointed for the payment of money, etc., and the day is to happen after the thing which is the consideration of the money, etc., is to be performed, no action can be maintained for the money, etc., before performance. 3. Where a covenant goes only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action may be maintained for a breach of the covenant on the part of the defendant without averring performance in the declaration. 4. But where the mutual covenants go to the whole consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, and performance must be averred. 5. Where two acts are to be done at the same time, as, where A covenants to convey an estate to B on such a day, and, in consideration thereof B covenants to A a sum of money on the same day, neither can maintain an action without showing performance of, or an offer to perform, his part, though it is not certain which of them is obliged to do the first act; and this particularly applies to all classes of sale. 1 Wms. Saund. 320 b

The rules referred to as given by Bouvier (Inst 701) are: When the mutual covenants go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other.

Where the act of one party must necessarily precede any act of the other, as where one agrees to manufacture an article from materials to be furnished by the other, or to pay for goods on delivery, or to pay money on demand, the covenants are independent, and one act is a condition precedent to the other.

When mutual covenants go only to a part of the consideration on both sides, and when a breach may be paid for in damages, the defendant has a remedy on his covenant, and is not allowed to plead it as a condition precedent.

When a day is appointed for the payment of money, and the day comes before the thing for which the money is to be paid can be done, then, though the agreement is to pay the money before the doing of the thing, yet an action may be brought for the money before the performance; because the agreement is positive that the money shall be paid on that day, and the presumption is that the party intended to rely on his remedy and not on a previous performance.

Benjamin also lays down five rules based on those of Williams, but not following them in detail. The first combines rules 1 and 2; the second, third, and fourth are rules 3, 4, and 5 respectively; and the fifth is a brief statement, substantially, of the rule of intention of Lord Mansfield in Jones v. Barkley, which it is said "remains unchanged"; Benj. Sales § 561. For these rules of Benjamin see id. § 562.

Dependent promises can only exist as part of the same contract, but more than one contract may be included in one instrument; Harr. Contr. 159; Langd. Sum. Contr. § 115. So, on the other hand, each of two mutual promises may be contained in a separate instrument, each complete in itself and neither making any reference to the other. In such case, it has been said, there is no doubt that each forms a separate unilateral contract; id. § 117.

To be dependent, a simultaneous performance must have been intended; 8 Term 366; Sheeren v. Moses, 84 Ill. 448; Kane v. Hood, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 281; it is not sufficient that the performance of each promise was intended to be within the same period; 11 H. L. Cas. 337. They must be capable of performance at the same time and place, and involve an exchange of rights; Langd. Sum. Cont. § 133; but if a time is fixed for the performance of one, and not the other, they are dependent; id.; 4 H. & N. 500.

All the stipulations of a contract should be considered in determining the question of dependency, which may be general,—as to the whole consideration on each side,—or, it may exist only as to two distinct promises. Thus a contract may be partly bilateral and partly unilateral and as to the former part, the promises may be dependent.

A unilateral contract, from its nature, can contain only independent promises.

The conditions which must exist to render implied dependency possible are thus enumerated: "1st. The subject of implied dependency must be a covenant or a promise, as distinguished from a debt. 2dly. The subject of dependency and the thing upon which it depends must be of the same nature, i. e. they must both be covenants or both be promises. 3dly. The covenants or the promises must be mutual. 4thly. They must each be a part of the same contract; and it does not follow that they are so because they are made at the same time, or are contained in the same instrument. 5thly. If in writing, they must each be contained in the same instrument, or in different instruments which refer to each other. 6thly. The contract which contains the covenants or the promises must be wholly bilateral, or else it must clearly appear that the covenants or promises in question were given and received in payment for each other. 7thly. The performance of each of the covenants or promises must, it seems, be equally certain in legal contemplation;" Langd. Sum. Cont. § 120.

When the mutual contracts go to the whole of the consideration on both sides, they are mutual conditions, the one precedent to the other, but where a covenant goes only to a part of the consideration, it is not a condition precedent, but an action lies for the breach of it; Howland v. Leach, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 151; 1 Wms. Saund. 320 e, rules 3 & 4; 29 L. J. Ex. 73. Professor Langdell goes further and insists that two promises are not mutually dependent unless the performance of one is full payment for the performance of the other; Sum. Contr. §§ 133, 136; but Professor Harriman considers this "theory of equivalency," though "most ingeniously developed," as not "based on satisfactory authority"; Contr. 158. This difference of opinion between these able writers on the subject is itself sufficient to show that the point is not definitely settled. Possibly the lack of precise authority upon this single point of a subject, of which the substantial principles have been settled for more than a century, might be considered as fairly indicating that it is more interesting than material,—rather theoretical than practical. See [1894] App. Cas. 266. It should, perhaps, rather be said that differences of opinion (of which another on a very practical point is noted infra) between these two writers who have, more than any others, philosophically examined the subject, indicate that the generalizations of Mr. Serjeant Saunders, while containing the essential principles, are to be applied only with some modification to modern conditions. It is therefore essential that the student or practitioner in dealing with particular cases should include in his researches both the ancient learning and the modern investigations which have illuminated the topic. To these it is hoped that this title may furnish a reference,—it is manifestly possible to do little more, in the way of critical examination and comparison of cases.

Where a day is appointed for payment of money or doing any act, and such day must or may happen before the thing which is the consideration of the payment or performance of the other act, is to be made or done, the promises are independent; 1 Wms. Saund. 320 b, rule 1; Betts v. Perine, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 219; Seers v. Fowler, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 272; Couch v. Ingersoll, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 300; a distinction has been drawn, however, as to whether the time of the latter payment or performance is fixed entirely by reference to the former, and when it is so, the first is a condition precedent; Northrup v. Northrup, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 296; otherwise, if it is to be determined without reference to the other; 10 A. & E. 50.

It is the second of Serjeant Williams' rules, and the view is supported by Leake (Cont. 346), that if the day appointed is to happen after the act or payment, the promises are dependent; the cases cited being 18 C. B. 673 and 25 L. J. C. P. 254. The view that the last promise to be performed is dependent,—the other not,—is supported by Langdell (Sum. of Contr. § 122), on the authority of Grant v. Johnson, 5 N. Y. 247, which is put directly upon that rule. But Harriman (Contr. 154) dissents from this view and considers the authority relied upon by Langdell as "unsound in its reasoning," and he subjects it to severe criticism, as the result of what he terms the "peculiar and erroneous doctrine" of the New York courts. In this connection it is to be observed also that the rule thus questioned is not included in the fundamental rules of construction set forth in Bouvier's Institutes.

If two acts are to be done at the same time the promises are mutually dependent; 1 Wms. Saund. 320 e, rule 5; 9 Q. B. 164; but each must be capable of performance concurrently, i. e. in a moment of time; the object of both must be an exchange of property or right; and it must be between the immediate parties to the contract and capable of being performed at the same place; Langd. Sum. Cont. § 69; Northrup v. Northrup, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 296.

In case of contracts for payment of purchase money of land by instalments it is said that the promises to pay those instalments which become due before the date set for the delivery of the deed are absolute and independent, and in no way affected by a failure to deliver the deed at the time specified. But where the deed is to be delivered simultaneously with the payment of the last instalment, then on payment of the previous instalments the tender of the deed and the tender of the last instalment become mutual concurrent conditions; Kane v. Hood, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 281; Sheeren v. Moses, 84 Ill. 448.

Where a contract is made for the sale of goods to be delivered in instalments each to be paid for on delivery, it was held that the promises were dependent, and the failure to deliver one instalment as stipulated released the other party from the obligation to accept future deliveries; Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366. In this case the supreme court reviewed the English cases and considered the doctrine of Hoare v. Rennie, 5 H. & N. 19, as better supported by English authority than Simpson v. Crippin, L. R. 8 Q. B. 14, and Brandt v. Lawrence, 1 Q. B. Div. 344; the case relied upon to establish this view was Bowes v. Shand, 2 App. Cas. 455, and it was considered as not contravened by Mersey Co. v. Naylor, 9 App. Cas. 434, which was followed in the House of Lords in [1909] A. C. 118, as was also Freeth v. Burr, L. R. 5 C. P. 213, both said to be on broader lines than Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 319. See, also, Hill v. Blake, 97 N. Y. 216; King Philip Mills v. Slater, 12 R. I. 82, 34 Am. Rep. 603; Shinn v. Bodine, 60 Pa. 182, 100 Am. Dec. 560; contra, Winchester v. INDETERMINATE. That which is uncertain, or not particularly designated; as, if I sell you one hundred bushels of wheat, without stating what wheat. See CONTRACT.

INDIAN. The name of the aboriginal inhabitants of America.

In general, Indians had no political rights in the United States; they could not vote at the general elections for officers, nor hold office. In New York they were considered as citizens, and not as aliens, owing allegiance to the government and entitled to its protection; Jackson v. Goodell, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 188. The Cherokee nation in Georgia was a distinct community; Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 515, 8 L. Ed. 483. See Lee v. Glover, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 189; Danforth v. Wear, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 673, 6 L. Ed. 188; Dana v. Dana, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 181; Jackson v. King, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 506. The title of the Indians to land was that of occupation merely, but could be divested only by purchase or conquest; Gillespie v. Cunningham, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 19; Stockton v. Williams, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 546; Godfrey v. Beardsley, 2 McClean 412, Fed. Cas. No. 5,497; Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 571, 5 L. Ed. 681; 2 Washb. R. P. 521; 3 Kent 378.

By act of March 3, 1871, no Indian nation or tribe within the United States shall be recognized as an independent nation with whom it may contract by treaty, but prior treaties are not to be thereby impaired.

By act of March 3, 1885, any Indian committing certain crimes within any territory, and within or without an Indian reservation, is subject to the laws of the territory, and shall be tried in the same manner and be subject to the same penalties as other persons charged with the same crimes; and if such offence be committed within a reservation in a state, he shall be subject to the same laws, etc., as if it were committed within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. This act was held constitutional in U. S. v. Kagama, 118 U. S. 375, 6 Sup. Ct. 1109, 30 L. Ed. 228. See U. S. v. Thomas, 151 U. S. 577, 14 Sup. Ct. 426, 38 L. Ed. 276; U. S. v. King, 81 Fed. 625. The United States courts have jurisdiction of crimes committed by Indians within a reservation; U. S. v. Celestine, 215 U. S. 278, 30 Sup. Ct. 93, 54 L. Ed. 195.

The crime of murder committed by one

Cherokee Indian upon the person of another within the jurisdiction of the Cherokee nation is not an offence against the United States; Talton v. Mayes, 163 U. S. 376, 16 Sup. Ct. 986, 41 L. Ed. 196.

The indictment, the venue of the trial, and the jury on the prosecution of an Indian for murder committed in a territory are to be according to the territorial laws; In re Gon-shay-ee, 130 U. S. 343, 9 Sup. Ct. 542, 32 L. Ed. 973.

The act of February 8, 1887, provides for the allotment of lands to Indians in severalty. By it Indians receiving allotments thereby have the benefit of, and are subject to, the laws both civil and criminal of the state or territory in which they reside; In re Heff, 197 U. S. 488, 25 Sup. Ct. 506, 49 L. Ed. 848. Every Indian born in the United States to whom an allotment shall have been made by this act, or under any law or treaty, and any Indian born within the United States who has voluntarily taken up his residence therein apart from any Indian tribe and adopted the habits of civilized life, is made a citizen of the United States, without impairing his right to tribal property.

Under the act of April 26, 1906, Indians are not permitted to alienate or encumber allotted lands within twenty-five years. The leasing of their lands, other than homesteads for more than one year, may be made under rules prescribed by the secretary of the interior; in case of the inability of a full-blood Indian owning a homestead to work or farm the same, the secretary may authorize the leasing of it; Tiger v. Investment Co., 221 U. S. 286, 31 Sup. Ct. 578, 55 L. Ed. 738. Authority is given to all persons of lawful age and sound mind to dispose of their property by will, but they may not disinherit parent, spouse or children of full-blood Indian unless with the approval of a judge of a United States court in the territory or by the United States commissioner; id.; though such heirs have been admitted to full citizenship; id.; Cherokee Nation v. Hitchcock, 187 U. S. 294, 23 Sup. Ct. 115, 47 L. Ed. 183; U. S. v. Rickert, 188 U. S. 432, 23 Sup. Ct. 478, 47 L. Ed. 532.

The United States has supervision over the right of full-blood Indians to dispose of their lands by will and to require their conveyances of inherited lands to be approved by a court; Tiger v. Investment Co., 221 U. S. 286, 31 Sup. Ct. 578, 55 L. Ed. 738. Controversies over allotments while the same are held in trust by the United States are not primarily cognizable in any court; McKay v. Kalyton, 204 U. S. 458, 27 Sup. Ct. 346, 51 L. Ed. 566.

Prior to the act of August 15, 1894, the authority to determine the rights of claimants to allotments was vested in the secretary of the interior; Hy-Yu-Tse-Mil-Kin v. Smith, 194 U. S. 408, 24 Sup. Ct. 676, 48 L. Ed. 1039. That act provided that all Indians entitled to allotments may prosecute or defend any action in relation thereto in the circuit court of the United States. The judgment in favor of any claimant to an allotment has the same effect, when properly certified to the secretary of the interior, as if such allotment had been allowed and approved by him; McKay v. Kalyton, 204 U. S. 458, 27 Sup. Ct. 346, 51 L. Ed. 566. This act was amended February 6, 1901, the amendment expressly requiring that in such proceedings the United States should be defendant; McKay v. Kalyton, 204 U. S. 458, 27 Sup. Ct. 346, 51 L. Ed. 566.

An Indian woman who marries a citizen of the United States, voluntarily resides apart from her tribe, and adopts the habits of civilized life, becomes a citizen of the United States and of the state in which she resides; Hatch v. Ferguson, 57 Fed. 959; in a few states, marriages between white persons and Indians are forbidden by statute; Tiff. Pers. & Dom. Rel. 26. See CITIZENS; INDIAN TRIBE.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS ACTS. As early as May 19, 1796, an act was passed by congress, providing an eventual indemnification to citizens of the United States for depredations committed by Indians in taking or destroying their property; 1 St. L. 472. Other acts of a similar character were passed from time to time. By the act of March 3, 1891, congress conferred on the court of claims jurisdiction of claims for property taken and destroyed by Indians.

INDIAN TERRITORY. Formerly one of the territories of the United States. It was bounded on the north by the state of Kansas, on the east by the states of Arkansas and Missouri, on the south by the state of Texas, and on the west and north by the territory of Oklahoma. It comprised the Indian reservations of the Quapaw Agency and of the Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles, the five civilized tribes. See OKLAHOMA.

INDIAN TRIBE. A separate and distinct community or body of the aboriginal Indian race of men found in the United States.

Such a tribe, situated within the boundaries of a state, and exercising the powers of government and sovereignty, under the national government, is deemed politically a state,—that is, a distinct political society, capable of self-government; but it is not deemed a foreign state in the sense of the constitution. It is rather a domestic dependent nation. Such a tribe may properly be deemed in a state of pupilage; and its relation to the United States resembles that of a ward to a guardian; Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 1, 8 L. Ed. 25; Jackson v. Goodell, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 193; 3 Kent 308; Story, Const. § 1096; U. S. v. Kagama, 118 U. S. 384, 6 Sup. Ct. 1109, 30 L. Ed. 228; Wall v. Williamson, 8 Ala. 48.

The obligation of the United States to protect Indians' use of land is of honor, not of law; they are wards and congress can make any change in the disposition of their lands which it deems best; Conley v. Ballinger, 216 U. S. 84, 30 Sup. Ct. 224, 54 L. Ed. 393.

"They were and always have been regarded as having a semi-independent position when they preserved their tribal relations; not as states, not as nations, not as possessed of the full attributes of sovereignty, but as a separate people with the power of regulating their internal and social relations, and thus far not brought under the laws of the Union or of the state within whose limits they resided;" U. S. v. Kagama, 118 U. S. 375, 6 Sup. Ct. 1109, 30 L. Ed. 228. See Lowe v. Kansas, 163 U. S. 84, 16 Sup. Ct. 1031, 41 L. Ed. 78. Their local self-government is subject to the supreme legislative authority of the United States; Cherokee Nation v. R. Co., 135 U. S. 641, 10 Sup. Ct. 965, 34 L. Ed. 295.

The United States has power to pass such laws as may be necessary to their full protection and to punish all offences committed against them or by them within their reservation; U. S. v. Thomas, 151 U. S. 577, 14 Sup. Ct. 426, 38 L. Ed. 276. No state can, either by its constitution or other legislation, withdraw the Indians within its limits from the operation of the laws of congress regulating trade with them; notwithstanding any rights it may confer on them as electors or citizens; U. S. v. Holliday, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 407, 18 L. Ed. 182; The Kansas Indians, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 737, 18 L. Ed. 667; The New York Indians, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 761, 18 L. Ed. 708. See State v. Campbell, 53 Minn. 354, 55 N. W. 553, 21 L. R. A. 169; nor can it authorize leases of Indian lands; Buffalo, R. & P. Ry. Co. v. Lavery, 75 Hun 396, 27 N. Y. Supp. 443.

The Pueblo Indians of New Mexico are not an Indian tribe within the meaning of the acts of congress; U. S. v. Joseph, 94 U. S. 614, 24 L. Ed. 295. The Indians residing in Maine, whose tribal organizations have ceased to exist, are not "Indian tribes," within the treaty-making power of the federal government; State v. Newell, 84 Me. 465, 24 Atl. 943. The policy of congress is to vest in the courts of the Cherokee nation jurisdiction of all controversies between Indians, or in which a member of the nation is the only party; In re Mayfield, 141 U. S. 107, 11 Sup. Ct. 939, 35 L. Ed. 635. See INDIAN.

By act of March 3, 1893, congress inaugurated the policy of terminating the tribal existence and government of the Indians and allotting their lands in severalty. Agreements were negotiated by the Dawes commission with each of the tribes designed to carry out the objects indicated. The agreement with the Seminoles was made in 1897, with the Creeks in 1901 and 1902, with the Choctaws and Chickasaws in 1898 and in 1902, and with the Cherokees in the latter year; Ex parte Webb, 225 U. S. 663, 32 Sup. Ct. 769, 56 L. Ed. 1248.

When Oklahoma was admitted into the Union, Nov. 16, 1907, the then existing tribal governments of the Five Civilized Tribes were continued in full force.

Congress may prohibit the introduction of liquor in to the Indian country; U. S. v. Sutton, 215 U. S. 291, 30 Sup. Ct. 116, 54 L. Ed. 200.

Treaties or agreements of the United States with Indian tribes are to be construed in the sense in which they would naturally be understood by the Indians; Jones v. Meehan, 175 U. S. 1, 20 Sup. Ct. 1, 44 L. Ed. 49.

INDIANA. The name of one of the states of the United States.

This state was admitted into the Union by virtue of a resolution of congress, approved December 11, 1816.

The boundaries of the state are defined, and the state has concurrent jurisdiction with the state of Kentucky on the Ohio river, and with the state of Illinois on the Wabash. As to the soil, the southern boundary of Indiana is low-water mark on the Ohio river.

The first constitution of the state was adopted in the year 1816, and has since been superseded by the present constitution, which was adopted in the year 1851. Amendments were adopted in 1881. In 1907, an amendment gave the general assembly power to prescribe qualifications for admission to practice law.

INDICARE. In the Civil Law. To show or discover. To fix or tell the price of a thing. Calv. Lex.

INDICATIF. An abolished writ by which a prosecution was in some cases removed from a court-christian to the Queen's Bench. Encyc. Lon.

INDICATION. In the Law of Evidence. A sign or token; a fact pointing to some inference or conclusion. Bur. Circ. Ev. 251, 263.

INDICATIVE EVIDENCE. This is not evidence so called, but the mere suggestion of evidence proper, which may possibly be secured if the suggestion is followed up. Brown.

INDICAVIT. A writ or prohibition that lay for a patron of a church where the clergyman presented by him to a benefice is made defendant in an action of tithes commenced in the ecclesiastical court of another clergyman, where the tithes in question extended to the fourth part of the benefice; for in this case the suit belonged to the king's court (i. e. the common law court) by the Stat. Westm. 2, c. 5. Cowell. The person sued might also avail himself of this writ. Toml.

INDICIA (Lat.). Signs; marks. Conjectures which result from circumstances not absolutely certain and necessary, but merely probable, and which may turn out not to be true, though they have the appearance of truth.

The term is much used in the civil law in a sense nearly or entirely synonymous with circumstantial evidence. It denotes facts which give rise to inferences, rather than the inferences themselves. However numerous indicia may be, they only show that a thing may be, not that it has been. An indicium can have effect only when a connection is essentially necessary with the principal. Effects are known by their causes, but only when the effects can arise only from the causes to which they are attributed. When several causes may have produced one and the same effect, it is, therefore, unreasonable to attribute it to any particular one of such causes.

The term is much used in common law of signs or marks of identity: for example, in replevin it is said that property must have indicia, or ear-marks, by which to distinguish it from other property of the same kind. So it is much used in the phrase "indicia of crime," in a sense similar to that of the civil law.

INDICTABLE. Capable of being indicted; liable to be indicted; as, an indictable offender.

That forms a subject or ground of indictment; as, an indictable offence. Encyc. Dict.

INDICTED. Having had an indictment found against him.

INDICTEE. One who is indicted. See INDITEE.

INDICTION. The space of fifteen years. It was used in dating at Rome and in England. The institution of indiction dates from the time of Constantine I., Sept. 1, or, according to some authorities, Sept. 15, 312; but the first instance of the use is mentioned in the Theodosian Code, under the reign of Constantius II. The papal court adopted computation by indictions about 800, the commencement of the first indiction being referred to Jan. 1, 313. The first year was reckoned the first of the first indiction, and so on till the fifteen years afterwards. The sixteenth year was the first year of the second indiction; the thirty-first year was the first year of the third indiction, etc.

INDICTMENT. A written accusation against one or more persons of a crime or misdemeanor, presented to, and preferred upon oath or affirmation by, a grand jury legally convoked. 4 Bla. Com. 299; Co. Litt. 126; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 152.

An accusation at the suit of the crown, found to be true by the oaths of a grand jury (q. v.).

A written accusation of a crime presented upon oath by a grand jury.

The word is said to be derived from the old French word inditer, which signifies to indicate, to show, or point out. Its object is to indicate the offence charged against the accused. Rey, des Inst. l'Angl. tome 2, p. 347.

A presentment and indictment differ; 2 Inst. 739. A presentment is properly that which the grand jurors find and present to the court from their own knowledge or observation. Every indictment which is found by the grand jurors is presented by them to the court; and therefore every indictment is a presentment, but not every presentment is an indictment; Com. v. Keefe, 9 Gray (Mass.) 291; Story, Const. § 1784. An indictment is required under United States laws for capital or otherwise infamous crimes, but an information is authorized in many states; Beavers v. Henkel, 194 U. S. 73, 24 Sup. Ct. 605, 48 L. Ed. 882, where it is said that an indictment is prima facie evidence of probable cause. See the requirements of an indictment in Pettibone v. U. S., 148 U. S. 204, 13 Sup. Ct. 542, 37 L. Ed. 419.

The essential requisites of a valid indictment are,—first, that the indictment be presented to some court having jurisdiction of the offence stated therein; and the indictment must allege specifically that the crime was committed within its jurisdiction; McCoy v. State, 22 Neb. 418, 35 N. W. 202; Orr v. State, 25 Tex. App. 453, 8 S. W. 644; Smith v. State, 25 Tex. App. 454, 8 S. W. 645; State v. Hobbs, 37 W. Va. 812, 17 S. E. 380; second, that it appear to have been found by the grand jury of the proper county or district; third, that the indictment be found a true bill, and signed by the foreman of the grand jury; fourth, that it be framed with sufficient certainty; for this purpose the charge must contain a certain description of the crime or misdemeanor of which the defendant is accused, and a statement of the facts by which it is constituted, so as to identify the accusation; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 167; Stewart v. Com., 4 S. & R. (Pa.) 194; 4 Bla. Com. 301; Brown v. State, 26 Tex. App. 540, 10 S. W. 112; it should set out the material facts charged against the accused; State v. O'Flaherty, 7 Nev. 153; Pettibone v. U. S., 148 U. S. 197, 13 Sup. Ct. 542, 37 L. Ed. 419; the ultimate facts and not the evidence; Brown v. U. S., 143 Fed. 60, 74 C. C. A. 214; but need not specify the statute on which founded; Crabb v. State, 88 Ga. 584, 15 S. E. 455. An indictment may charge a statutory offence in the language of the statute without greater particularity when, by that means, all that is essential to constitute the offence is stated fully and directly, without uncertainty or ambiguity; State v. Light, 17 Or. 358, 21 Pac. 132; State v. Howe, 100 N. C. 449, 5 S. E. 671; State v. Holmes, 40 La.

Ann. 170, 3 South. 564; fifth, the indictment must be in the English language. But if any document in a foreign language, as a libel, be necessarily introduced, it should be set out in the original tongue, and then translated, showing its application; 6 Term 162.

Each count is, as it were, a separate indictment; Selvester v. U. S., 170 U. S. 262, 18 Sup. Ct. 580, 42 L. Ed. 1029. Intent must be averred if a part of the offence; U. S. v. Clark, 125 Fed. 92.

The formal requisites are:

First, the venue, which at common law should always be laid in the county where the offence has been committed, although the charge be in its nature transitory, as a battery; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 25, s. 35. See People v. Scott, 74 Cal. 94, 15 Pac. 384. The venue is stated in the margin thus: "City and county of ———, to wit."

Second, the presentment, which must be in the present tense, and is usually expressed by the following formula: "The grand inquest of the commonwealth of ———, inquiring for the city and county aforesaid, upon their oaths and affirmations present." See, as to the venue, Graham v. State, 1 Ark. 171; Hite v. State, 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 357; Turns v. Com., 6 Metc. (Mass.) 225; People v. Wong Wang, 92 Cal. 277, 28 Pac. 270.

Third, the name and addition of the defendant; but in case an error has been made in this respect, it is cured by the plea of the defendant; Bac. Abr. Misnomer (B), Indictment (G 2); 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 175; 1 Chitty, Pr. 202; Russ. & R. 489. Where the defendant's name is stated differently in different parts of the indictment, it is fatally defective; Kinney v. State, 21 Tex. App. 348, 17 S. W. 423; or where it fails to state his given name, or aver that it is not known, a plea of misnomer in abatement should be sustained; Turner v. People, 40 Ill. App. 17; Pancho v. State, 25 Tex. App. 402, 8 S. W. 476; or where it gives a wrong name; Lewis v. State, 90 Ga. 95, 15 S. E. 697. See IDEM SONANS.

Fourth, the names of third persons, when they must be necessarily mentioned in the indictment, should be stated with certainty to a common intent, so as sufficiently to inform the defendant who are his accusers. When, however, the names of third persons cannot be ascertained, it is sufficient, in some cases, to state "a certain person or persons to the jurors aforesaid unknown." 2 East, Pl. Cr. 651, 781; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 181; 8 C. & P. 773.

Fifth, the time when the offence was committed should, in general, be stated to be on a specific year and day. In some offences, as in perjury, the day must be precisely stated; U. S. v. Bowman, 2 Wash. C. C. 328, Fed. Cas. No. 14,631; but although it is necessary that a day certain should be laid in the indictment, yet, in general, the prosecutor may give evidence of an offence committed on any other day previous to the finding of the indictment; Jacobs v. Com., 5 S. & R. (Pa.) 316. See 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 217, 224; Com. v. Alfred, 4 Dana (Ky.) 496; Vowells v. Com., 84 Ky. 52; Com. v. Le Clair, 147 Mass. 539, 18 N. E. 428; Crass v. State, 30 Tex. App. 480, 17 S. W. 1096; People v. Formosa, 131 N. Y. 478, 30 N. E. 492, 27 Am. St. Rep. 612; Ball v. U. S., 140 U. S. 118, 11 Sup. Ct. 761, 35 L. Ed. 377. It is not material, except where time is of the essence of the offence, to charge in an indictment the true day on which an offence was committed, or to prove the day as charged; State v. Swaim, 97 N. C. 462, 2 S. E. 68. In the absence of a statute abrogating the common-law rule, there is no doubt that an indictment charging the commission of an offence at an impossible date, is fatally defective; as, for instance, charging the commission of the crime on a certain day in the year, 18903, notwithstanding the fact that there was a statutory provision that no indictment should be deemed invalid for stating imperfectly the time when the offence was committed; Terrell v. State, 165 Ind. 443, 75 N. E. 884, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 251, 112 Am. St. Rep. 244, 6 Ann. Cas. 851. As to averments of time and place in an indictment for homicide, see note 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1019.

Sixth, the offence should be properly described. This is done by stating the substantial circumstances necessary to show the nature of the crime, and next, the formal allegations and terms of art required by law. Steph. Cr. Proc. 156. An omission of matter of substance in an indictment is not aided or cured by verdict; U. S. v. Hess, 124 U. S. 483, 8 Sup. Ct. 571, 31 L. Ed. 516. An indictment charging a crime "on or about" a certain date is not defective, these words being surplusage, the real date being that specifically charged; State v. McCarthy, 44 La. Ann. 323, 10 South. 673.

As to the substantial circumstances. The whole of the facts of the case necessary to make it appear judicially to the court that the indictors have gone upon sufficient premises should be set forth; but there should be no unnecessary matter, nor anything which on its face makes the indictment repugnant, inconsistent, or absurd. And if there is no necessary ambiguity, the court is not bound, it has been observed, to create one by reading the indictment in the only way which will make it unintelligible. It is a clear principle that the language of an indictment must be construed by the rules of pleading, and not by the common interpretation of ordinary language; for nothing indeed differs more widely in construction than the same matter when viewed by the rules of pleading and when construed by the language of ordinary life; 16 Q. B. 846; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 183; Bac. Abr. Indictment (G 1); Com. Dig. Indictment (G 3). Averments of matters not material or necessary ingredients in the offence charged may be rejected as surplusage; State v. Kern, 51 N. J. L. 259, 17 Atl. 114. An indictment is not insufficient by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form only, which shall not tend to the prejudice of the defendant; Caha v. U. S., 152 U. S. 211, 14 Sup. Ct. 513, 38 L. Ed. 415. All indictments ought to charge a man with a particular offence, and not with being an offender in general: to this rule there are some exceptions, as indictments against a common barrator, a common scold, and a keeper of a common bawdy-house; such persons may be indicted by these general words; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 230, and the authorities there cited. The offence must not be stated in the disjunctive, so as to leave it uncertain on what it is intended to rely as an accusation: as, that the defendant erected or caused to be erected a nuisance; Com. v. Grey, 2 Gray (Mass.) 501, 61 Am. Dec. 476; 6 D. & R. 143; 2 Rolle, Abr. 31.

There are certain terms of art used, so appropriated by the law to express the precise idea which it entertains of the offence, that no other terms, however synonymous they may seem, are capable of filling the same office: such, for example, as traitorously (q. v.), in treason; feloniously (q. v.), in felony; Kaelin v. Com., 84 Ky. 354, 1 S. W. 594; State v. Bryan, 112 N. C. 848, 16 S. E. 909; State v. Hang Tong, 115 Mo. 389, 22 S. W. 381; burglariously (q. v.), in burglary; maim (q. v.), in mayhem, etc.

Seventh, the conclusion of the indictment should conform to the provision of the constitution of the state on the subject, where there is such provision; as in Pennsylvania; Const. art. 5, s. 11, which provides that all "prosecutions shall be carried on in the name and by the authority of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and conclude against the peace and dignity of the same"; see State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. 654; it is not necessary that each count should so conclude; Stebbins v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 294, 20 S. W. 552. As to the necessity and propriety of having several counts in an indictment, see 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 248; Steph. Cr. Proc. 153; COUNT; as to joinder of several offences in the same indictment, see 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 253; Archb. Cr. Pl. 60; in one count, see 9 L. R. A. 182, note. A count in an indictment may refer to allegations in other counts to avoid repetition; People v. Graves, 5 Park. Cr. R. (N. Y.) 134; People v. Danihy, 63 Hun 579, 18 N. Y. Supp. 467; Blitz v. U. S., 153 U. S. 308, 14 Sup. Ct. 924, 38 L. Ed. 725. Several defendants may, in some cases, be joined in the same indictment; Archb. Cr. Pl. 59; as where one is charged with assault with intent to kill, and another as accessory before the fact; State v. Lang, 65 N. H. 284, 23 Atl. 432; Com. v. Devine, 155 Mass. 224, 29 N. E. 515.

At common law an indictment cannot be amended by the court. It was said by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Wilkes: "Indictments are found upon the oaths of a jury, and ought only to be amended by themselves;" 4 Burr. 2527. The rule has been continuously adhered to; Hawk. P. C. b. 2, c. 25, § 97; Stark. Cr. Pl. 287; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 90; Com. v. Drew, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 279; State v. Sexton, 10 N. C. 184, 14 Am. Dec. 584. "It is a well-settled rule of law that the statute respecting amendments does not extend to indictment;" Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Child, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 200; and "an amendment cannot be allowed even with the consent of the prisoner"; Com. v. Mahar, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 120; People v. Campbell, 4 Park. Cr. R. (N. Y.) 387. The caption, however, may be amended, being, as it is said, no part of the indictment itself; State v. Williams, 2 McCord (S. C.) 301; State v. Society, 42 N. J. L. 504; Allen v. State, 5 Wis. 337.

In England the rule forbidding an amendment of an indictment has been changed by stat. 14 and 15 Vict. c. 100. In this country the subject does not rest on the common law, but there is also to be considered the constitutional guaranty to an accused of a trial, "on a presentment or indictment by a grand jury." It was settled by the United States supreme court that in the federal courts an indictment cannot be amended by the court, both by reason of the common-law rule and the constitutional provision; Ex parte Bain, 121 U. S. 1, 7 Sup. Ct. 781, 30 L. Ed. 849. The question whether the rule could be changed by statute was not actually involved, but it would seem to be settled in the negative by the reasoning of the opinion in that case. The question had been considered in some state courts, and it has been held that without amendment of the state constitution, the legislature may authorize amendment of indictments by the court, not changing the offence; Miller v. State, 53 Miss. 403; in other cases it was held that the legislature might dispense with or regulate matter of form; Brown v. People, 29 Mich. 232; State v. O'Flaherty, 7 Nev. 157; but they could not "dispense with such allegations as are essential to reasonable particularity and certainty in the description of the offence; McLaughin v. State, 45 Ind. 338.

It is said by Bishop that "if a statute should authorize a material amendment to be made in an indictment for an offence which, by the constitution of the state was punishable only by indictment, the statutory direction would be a nullity." Bish. Cr. Proc., 2d ed. § 97; 26 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 446.

An indictment may be quashed at common law for such deficiency in body or caption as will make a judgment given on it against the defendant erroneous, but it is a matter of discretion; Bac. Abr. Indictment, K; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 298; Archb. Cr. Pl. 66.

After verdict in a criminal case, it will be presumed that those facts without proof of which the verdict could not have been found were proved, though they are not distinctly alleged in the indictment; provided it contains terms sufficiently general to comprehend them in reasonable intendment; 2 C. & K. 868; 1 Tayl. Ev. § 73; Steph. Cr. Proc. 171. After verdict, defective averments in the second indictment may be cured by reference to sufficient averments in the first count; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 340. A single good count in an indictment is sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty and judgment thereon; Mead v. State, 53 N. J. L. 601, 23 Atl. 264; Hornsby v. State, 94 Ala. 55, 10 South. 522.

It is not error to join distinct offences in one indictment, in separate counts, against the same person; Ingraham v. U. S., 155 U. S. 434, 15 Sup. Ct. 148, 39 L. Ed. 213.

In an indictment for a statutory offence, while it is doubtless true that it is not always sufficient to use simply the language of the statute in describing the offence, yet, if such language is, according to the natural import of the words, fully descriptive of the offence, then it ordinarily is sufficient; Potter v. U. S., 155 U. S. 438, 15 Sup. Ct. 144, 39 L. Ed. 214. The general rule is that the offence can be described in the words of the statute, and it is for the defendant to show that greater particularity is required by reason of the omission from the statute of some element of the offense; Armour Packing Co. v. U. S., 209 U. S. 84, 28 Sup. Ct. 428, 52 L. Ed. 681.

The fact that a grand jury has ignored an indictment is not a bar to the subsequent finding of a true bill for the same offence; U. S. v. Martin, 50 Fed. 918. The finding of an indictment must appear from the order book of the court in which defendant was indicted; if it does not so appear, a verdict against him will be set aside; Simmons v. Com., 89 Va. 156, 15 S. E. 386; Goodson v. State, 29 Fla. 511, 10 South. 738, 30 Am. St. Rep. 135. The fact that the foreman of the grand jury in signing his name to the indorsement of "a true bill" used his initials instead of his full Christian name, is not ground for quashing the indictment; Zimmerman v. State, 4 Ind. App. 583, 31 N. E. 550; State v. Orrick, 106 Mo. 111, 17 S. W. 176, 329. One cannot be convicted of a higher degree of offence than that charged in the indictment; McCollough v. State, 132 Ind. 427, 31 N. E. 1116; but there may be a conviction of a lesser offence; Brown v. State, 31 Fla. 207, 12 South. 640.

U. S. R. S. § 1235, provides that no indictment shall be deemed insufficient, nor the trial or judgment thereon be affected, by reason of any defect in matter of form only, which shall not tend to the prejudice of the defendant.

See AD TUNC ET IBIDEM; INFAMOUS CRIME; INFORMATION; GRAND JURY; AGAINST THE WILL; RECITAL.

INDICTOR. He who causes another to be indicted. The latter is sometimes called the indictee.

INDIFFERENT. To have no bias or partiality. Mitchell v. Kirtland, 7 Conn. 229. A juror, an arbitrator, and a witness ought to be indifferent; and when they are not so they may be challenged. See Fitch v. Smith, 9 Conn. 42.

INDIGENA, INDIGENÆ. A native; born or bred in the same country or town. Ainsw. A subject born, or naturalized by act of parliament. Opposed to alienigena. Rymer, to. 15, p. 37; Co. Litt. 8 a; U. S. v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S. 662, 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 42 L. Ed. 890.

INDIGENT. One who is destitute of property or means of comfortable sustenance; one who is needy or poor. Juneau County v. Wood County, 109 Wis. 330, 85 N. W. 387.

The term was designated for the benefit of the laboring population which is only self-supporting while employed, and is applied to those who were afforded a temporary support from the county for a special time; People v. Supervisors, 121 N. Y. 345, 24 N. E. 830. See DEPENDENT.

INDIGENT INSANE. Those who have no income over and above what is sufficient to support those who may be legally dependent on them. In re Hybart, 119 N. C. 359, 25 S. E. 963.

INDIRECT EVIDENCE. Evidence which does not prove the fact in question, but one from which it may be presumed.

Inferential evidence as to the truth of a disputed fact, not by testimony of any witness to the fact, but by collateral circumstances ascertained by competent means. 1 Stark. Ev. 15; Wills, Circ. Ev. 24; Best, Ev. 21, § 27, note; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 13.

INDITEE (L. Fr.). In Old English Law. A person indicted. 9 Coke.

INDIVIDUUM (Lat.). In the Civil Law. That cannot be divided. Calv. Lex.

INDIVISIBLE. That cannot be separated.

The effect of the breach of a contract depends in a large degree upon whether it is to be regarded as indivisible or divisible; i. e. whether it forms a whole, the performance of every part of which is a condition precedent to bind the other party or is composed of several independent parts, the performance of any one of which will bind the other party pro tanto. This question is one of construction, and depends on the circumstances of each case; and the only test is whether the whole quantity of the things concerned, or the sum of the acts to be done, is of the essence of the contract. It depends, therefore, in the last resort, simply upon the intention of the parties; Broumel v. Rayner, 68 Md. 47, 11 Atl. 833; Wooten v. Walters, 110 N. C. 251, 14 S. E. 734, 736. See 9 Q. B. D. 648; Gill v. Lumber Co., 151 Pa. 534, 25 Atl. 120; Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366; Barrie v. Earle, 143 Mass. 1, 8 N. E. 639, 58 Am. Rep. 126; King Philip Mills v. Slater, 12 R. I. 82, 34 Am. Rep. 603; Pope v. Porter, 102 N. Y. 366, 7 N. E. 304.

When a consideration is entire and indivisible, and it is against law, the contract is void in toto; Woodruff v. Hinman, 11 Vt. 592, 34 Am. Dec. 712; Frazier v. Thompson, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 235. When the consideration is divisible, and part of it is illegal, the contract is void only pro tanto. In such case, it has been said, the connection between the different contracts is physical, not legal. See, generally, Harr. Contr. 132; Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 220, 17 L. Ed. 530.

To ascertain whether a contract is divisible or indivisible is to ascertain whether it may or may not be enforced in part, or paid in part, without the consent of the other party. See ENTIRETY; INDEPENDENT PROMISES.

INDIVISUM (Lat.). That which two or more persons hold in common without partition; undivided.

INDORSE. To write on the back. Bills of exchange and promissory notes are indorsed by a party's writing his name on the back. See INDORSEMENT. Writs in Massachusetts are indorsed in some cases by a person's writing his name on the back, in which case he becomes liable to pay the costs of the suit.

INDORSEE. The person or party to whom a bill of exchange is indorsed, or transferred by indorsement. See INDORSEMENT.

INDORSEE IN DUE COURSE. An indorsee in due course is one who, in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and for value, before its apparent maturity or presumptive dishonor, and without knowledge of its actual dishonor, acquires a negotiable instrument duly indorsed to him, or indorsed generally, or payable to the bearer.

INDORSEMENT. That which is written on the back of an instrument in writing and which has relation to it.

Writing one's name on the back of a promissory note or other negotiable instrument. Partridge v. Davis, 20 Vt. 499.

Written on the back of an original instrument, or on an "allonge" attached thereto, if there be not sufficient space on the original paper. Fountain v. Bookstaver, 141 Ill. 461, 31 N. E. 17; Crutchfield v. Easton, 13 Ala. 337; Bishop v. Chase, 156 Mo. 158, 56 S. W. 1080, 79 Am. St. Rep. 515. It need not appear that it was physically impossible to indorse on the instrument; it may be on another paper when necessity or convenience requires it; Crosby v. Roub, 16 Wis. 616, 84 Am. Dec. 720.

An indorsement is generally made primarily for the purpose of transferring the rights of the holder of the instrument to some other person. It has, however, various results, such as rendering the indorser liable in certain events; and hence an indorsement is sometimes made merely for the purpose of additional security. This is called an accommodation indorsement when done without consideration.

It was said by Chief Justice Gibson that "the contract of indorsement is not an independent one, but a parasite which, like the chameleon, takes the hue of the thing with which it is connected. Attached to commercial paper, it becomes a commercial contract operating as a contingent guaranty of payment and a transfer of the title where the paper is negotiable; attached to any other chose in action, it becomes an equitable assignment of the beneficial interest without recourse to the assignor"; Patterson v. Poindexter, 6 W. & S. (Pa.) 227, 234, 40 Am. Dec. 554, quoted with approval in National Union Bank v. Shearer, 225 Pa. 470, 480, 74 Atl. 351, 17 Ann. Cas. 664.

A blank indorsement is one in which the name of the indorser only is written upon the instrument. It is commonly made by writing the name of the indorser on the back; Folwell v. Beaver, 13 S. & R. (Pa.) 315; but a writing across the face may answer the same purpose; Folger v. Chase, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 63; 16 East 12. Its effect is to make the instrument thereafter payable to bearer; Byles, Bills *151; Neg. Instr. Act § 131. If an instrument payable to bearer is indorsed specially, it may nevertheless be further negotiated by delivery. id. § 129.

The holder may convert a blank indorsement into a special indorsement by writing over the signature of the indorser in blank any contract consistent with the character of the indorsement. id. § 130.

A conditional indorsement is one made subject to some condition without the performance of which the instrument will not be or remain valid. 4 Taunt. 30. A bill may be indorsed conditionally, so to impose on the drawee who afterwards accepts a liability to pay the bill to the indorsee or his transferees in a particluar event only; Byles, Bills *150. An indorsement on a note, making it payable on a contingency does not affect its negotiability; Tappan v. Ely, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 362.

But the person required to pay the instrument may disregard the condition and make payment to the indorsee or his transferee, whether the condition has been fulfilled or not. Neg. Instr. Act § 136.

An indorsement in full, or a special indorsement, is one in which mention is made of the name of the indorsee. Chitty, Bills 170. The omission of the words "or order" is not material, for the indorsee takes it with all its incidents, including its negotiable quality; Byles, Bills *151. The omission of the words "or order" in a special indorsement will not restrain the negotiability of a bill; 2 Burr. 1216; 1 Stra. 557.

A qualified indorsement is one which restrains or limits, or qualifies, or enlarges the liability of the indorser, in any manner different from what the law generally imports as his true liability, deducible from the nature of the instrument. Chitty, Bills 261; 7 Taunt. 160. The words commonly used are sans recours, without recourse; Upham v. Prince, 12 Mass. 14. An indorsement without recourse, or at the indorsee's "own risk," will not expose the indorser to any liability; Lawrence v. Dobyns, 30 Mo. 196; Cady v. Shepard, 12 Wis. 639; Fitchburg Bank v. Greenwood, 2 Allen (Mass.) 434; Craft v. Fleming, 46 Pa. 140. But such an indorsement warrants the genuineness of all prior signatures; Dumont v. Williamson, 18 Ohio St. 516, 98 Am. Dec. 186; that the indorser has title to the note; Mays v. Callison, 6 Leigh (Va.) 230; that the note is valid between the original parties, and not illegal or without consideration; Blethen v. Lovering, 58 Me. 437; Challiss v. McCrum, 22 Kan. 157, 31 Am. Rep. 181; and that the parties were competent to contract; id. The assignment without recourse leaves the assignor liable as vendor; Bevan v. Fitzsimmons, 40 Ill. App. 108.

It does not render the note non-negotiable; Page v. Ford (Or.) 131 Pac. 1013; Neg. Instr. Act § 135.

A restrictive indorsement is one which restrains the negotiability of the instrument to a particular person or for a particular purpose; Hermann v. Bank, 1 Rob. (La.) 222. Such are "Pay A. B. or order, for my use," or "for my account," or "only." Neg. Instr. Act §§ 132, 133, 134.

By the law merchant, bills and notes payable to order can be transferred only by indorsement; Russell v. Swan, 16 Mass. 314; Humphreyville v. Culver, 73 Ill. 485; Habersham v. Lehman, 63 Ga. 380; Central Trust Co. v. Bank, 101 U. S. 68, 25 L. Ed. 876; Osgood's Adm'rs v. Artt, 17 Fed. 575; Sto. Prom. N. § 120; Hatch v. Barrett, 34 Kan. 223, 8 Pac. 129. Indorsement is not complete before delivery of the note; Dann v. Norris, 24 Conn. 333; Spencer v. Carstarphen, 15 Colo. 445, 24 Pac. 882.

Delivery means transfer of possession, either actual or constructive, from one person to another. Neg. Instr. Act § 124. Hence the word indorsee in a declaration on a bill imports a delivery; Wood's Byles, Bills § 153.

An instrument promising to pay a sum certain with interest, as per annexed coupons, reciting that note and coupons were secured by mortgage, was negotiable; but an indorsement, "for value received, we hereby assign and transfer the within bond, together with all our interest in, and rights under the same, without recourse," was not a commercial indorsement, but a mere assignment passing an equitable interest subject to the defences of the makers, and the negotiability of the instrument was thereby destroyed, and the subsequent indorsement of the transferee did not make him liable for payment in the absence of any independent contract; De Hass v. Roberts, 59 Fed. 853.

When, by such an assignment, the legal title is left in the payee, the equitable interest merely passing to the transferee, it necessarily follows that the negotiable character of the instrument is destroyed; Aniba v. Yeomans, 39 Mich. 171. And a subsequent indorsement by the transferee does not, in the absence of a special contract, render him liable; Dan. Neg. Inst. 666; Gray v. Donahoe, 4 Watts (Pa.) 400; Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Piollet, 126 Pa. 194, 17 Atl. 603, 4 L. R. A. 190, 12 Am. St. Rep. 860. The indorsement of a non-negotiable note without proof of a special contract to become responsible means nothing and creates no liability; Fear v. Dunlap, 1 G. Greene (Ia.) 334; Dan. Neg. Inst. 709. See also Graham v. Wilson, 6 Kan. 489; Story v. Lamb, 52 Mich. 525, 18 N. W. 248; First Nat. Bank of Trenton v. Gay, 71 Mo. 627. The person making such indorsement guaranties the note to be genuine, and that it is what it purports to be; nothing more. He does not guaranty its payment, although he might do this by independent contract expressed in the contract or otherwise; Fear v. Dunlap, 1 G. Greene (Ia.) 334.

The effect of the indorsement of a negotiable promissory note or bill of exchange is to transfer the property in the note to the person mentioned in the indorsement when it is made in full; Brown v. McWhite, 30 S. C. 356, 9 S. E. 277; or, when made in blank, to any person to whose possession it may lawfully come thereafter even by mere delivery, so that the possessor may sue upon it in his own name at law, as well as if he had been named as the payee; Evans v. Gee, 11 Pet. (U. S.) 80, 9 L. Ed. 639; Seabury v. Hungerford, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 80; Everett v. Tidball, 34 Neb. 803, 52 N. W. 816; Howland v. Bates, 1 Misc. 91, 20 N. Y. Supp. 373; Jones v. Shapera, 57 Fed. 457, 6 C. C. A. 423.

Any person who has possession of the instrument is presumed to be the legal bona fide owner for value, until the contrary is shown; Palmer v. Marshall, 60 Ill. 289.

The payee of a note can restrain its negotiability, but a subsequent indorser can revive its negotiable quality; Holmes v. Hooper, 1 Bay (S. C.) 160.

The parties are presumed to stand to each other in the relations in which their names appear. Where the holder has knowledge, the facts may be shown as between him and the other parties; Whitehouse v. Hanson, 42 N. H. 9.

An indorsement on the last day of grace is good; Crosby v. Grant, 36 N. H. 273; contra, Pine v. Smith, 11 Gray (Mass.) 38. An indorsement is presumed to be of the same date as the instrument; Snyder v. Oatman, 16 Ind. 265; Stewart v. Smith, 28 Ill. 397; or at least to have been made before maturity; Blum v. Loggins, 53 Tex. 136; Collins v. Gilbert, 94 U. S. 753, 24 L. Ed. 170.

An indorsement may be made before the bill or note itself, and so render the indorser liable to all subsequent parties; Byles, Bills *167; Durham v. Clogg, 30 Md. 284. A blank indorsement upon a blank piece of paper, with intent to give a person credit, is, in effect, a letter of credit; if a promissory note is afterwards written on the paper, the indorser cannot object; Dougl. 496; Violett v. Patton, 5 Cra. (U. S.) 142, 3 L. Ed. 61; but if the holder had notice of any fraud he cannot fill in the blanks; 3 Q. B. D. 643.

When the indorsement is made before the note becomes due, the indorsee and all subsequent holders are entitled to recover the face of the note against the maker, without any right on his part to offset claims which he may have against the payee; or, as it is frequently stated, the indorsee takes it free of all equities between the antecedent parties of which he had no notice; 8 M. & W. 504; Savings Bank of New Haven v. Bates, 8 Conn. 505; Thompson v. Gibson, 1 Mart. N. S. (La.) 150; Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 1, 10 L. Ed. 865. The indorser of a promissory note before maturity without recourse is responsible thereon if the note is fraudulent, fictitious, or forged; Palmer v. Courtney, 32 Neb. 773, 49 N. W. 754.

An indorsement admits the signatures and capacity of every prior party; Byles, Bills *155.

The blank indorsement of a non-negotiable bill has been held to operate as the drawing of a bill payable to bearer; 33 L. J. Q. B. 209. The indorsement of a non-negotiable note by a payee operates to assign the payee's rights to the indorser, who takes the former's place; Gorman v. Ketchum, 33 Wis. 427.

After a bill is due, the indorsee takes it on the credit of the indorser and subject to all equities; 4 M. & G. 101; as was said by Lord Ellenborough, "it comes disgraced to the indorsee;" 1 Campb. 19. But the maker can only set up such defences as are connected with the note, not those arising out of an independent transaction; Arnot v. Woodburn, 35 Mo. 99; 3 H. & N. 891; such as set-off as against the holder; Way v. Lamb, 15 Ia. 79; 10 Exch. 572. It is otherwise as to a check, which may be transferred by indorsement after it is payable; Byles, Bills *171; but taking a check six days old is a circumstance from which the jury may infer fraud; 9 B. & C. 388. A note payable on demand is not to be taken as overdue without some evidence of demand of payment and refusal; 4 B. & C. 327; although it is several years old and no interest has been paid on it; Byles, Bills *171; a promissory note payable on demand is intended to be a continuing security; 9 M. & W. 15; but it has been held to be overdue and dishonored after a reasonable time; Carll v. Brown, 2 Mich. 401; so after three months; Herrick v. Woolverton, 41 N. Y. 581, 1 Am. Rep. 461; (but see Herrick v. Woolverton, 42 Barb. [N. Y.] 50); after ten months; Morey v. Wakefield, 41 Vt. 24, 98 Am. Dec. 562.

A bill or note cannot be indorsed for part of the amount due the holder, as the law will not permit one cause of action to be cut up into several, and such an indorsement is utterly void as such, but when it has been paid in part, it may be indorsed as to the residue; Frank v. Kaigler, 36 Tex. 305.

Indorsers, also, unless the indorsement be qualified, become liable to pay the amount demanded by the instrument upon the failure of the principal, the maker of a note, or the acceptor of a bill, upon due notification of such failure, to any subsequent indorsee who can legally claim to hold through the particular indorser; Story, Bills § 224.

The indorsement of a draft to a fictitious indorsee is usually treated as making it payable to bearer; see FICTITIOUS PAYEE; Phillips v. Bank, 140 N. Y. 556, 35 N. E. 982, 23 L. R. A. 584, 37 Am. St. Rep. 596; Neg. Instr. Act § 9; but not unless the maker knows the payee to be fictitious and actually intends the paper to be made payable to a fictitious person; Chism v. Bank, 96 Tenn. 641, 36 S. W. 387, 32 L. R. A. 778, 54 Am. St. Rep. 863; Shipman v. Bank, 126 N. Y. 318, 27 N. E. 371, 12 L. R. A. 791, 22 Am. St. Rep. 821; Armstrong v. Bank, 46 Ohio St. 512, 22 N. E. 866, 6 L. R. A. 625, 15 Am. St. Rep. 655; contra, Kohn v. Watkins, 26 Kan. 691, 40 Am. Rep. 336.

In most of the cases a person not a party to the instrument who writes his name on the back of it before delivery is in many states considered an original promisor; Malbon v. Southard, 36 Me. 147; White v. Howland, 9 Mass. 314, 6 Am. Dec. 71; Baker v. Block, 30 Mo. 225; Carr's Ex'x v. Rowland, 14 Tex. 275; Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt. 355, 49 Am. Dec. 786; and in Pennsylvania it was held that such irregular indorser was not liable to the payee; Schafer v. Bank, 59 Pa. 144, 98 Am. Dec. 323. By Neg. Instr. Act § 156, it is provided that: Where a person, not otherwise a party to an instrument, places thereon his signature in blank before delivery, he is liable as indorser in accordance with the following rules: If the instrument is payable to the order of a third person, he is liable to the payee and all subsequent parties; if it is payable to the order of maker or drawer or to bearer, then he is liable to all parties subsequent to the maker or drawer; if he signs for the accommodation of the payee, he is liable to all parties subsequent to the payee.

One who takes a note from its maker or payee is chargeable with knowledge that the indorsement of a third party thereon was for accommodation, and in a case of a corporation, such an act is ultra vires; Brill Co. v. Ry. Co., 189 Mass. 431, 75 N. E. 1090, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 525.

A plaintiff, in suing the first indorsee may omit to state in his declaration all the indorsements but the first indorsement in blank, and aver that the first blank indorser indorsed directly to himself; in such case all the intervening indorsements must be struck out; Byles, Bills *155; Merz v. Kaiser, 20 La. Ann. 377.

An indorsement by an officer of a corporation, where the fact appears on the instrument, dees not render him individually liable; State Nat. Bank v. Singer, 39 La. Ann. 813, 2 South. 599.

An indorsement by one of several executors will not transfer the property; 2 C. & K. 37; Smith v. Whiting, 9 Mass. 334; contra, in case of administrators; Sanders v. Blain's Adm'r; 6 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 446, 22 Am. Dec. 86; and see Wheeler v. Wheeler, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 34. An executor cannot complete his testator's indorsement by delivering the instrument, which has already been signed by the testator; Wood's Byles, Bills 58; 1 Exch. 32.

The holder may at any time strike out any indorsement which is not necessary to his title. The indorser whose indorsement is struck out and all indorsers subsequent to him are thereby relieved from liability on the indorsement; Neg. Instr. Act § 147.

By the general law merchant, the indorser of a negotiable instrument is bound instantly, and may be sued after maturity, upon demand and notice of non-payment. But by the statutes of some of the states the maker must first be sued and his property subjected; Watson v. Hahn, 1 Colo. 385; Mason v. Burton, 54 Ill. 349; Booth v. Storrs, 54 Ill. 472; Harrison v. Pike, 48 Miss. 46.

The effect of acceptance upon a bill is to remove the acceptor to the head of the list as principal, while the drawer takes his place as first indorser.

A course of decisions with respect to restrictive indorsement has given rise to much discussion, resulting in so general a change in clearing-house rules as to amount to a revolution in banking methods.

The litigation arising from the relations between a bank, its depositor, and the indorsee of a check or draft commences with the early English case of Price v. Neal, followed in England and this country, in which it was held by Lord Mansfield that if the drawee pays a bill which he afterwards finds to be forged, he has no recourse against an innocent indorser; 3 Burr. 1354; nor has a bank which paid a forged check; Taunt. 76; Levy v. Bank, 1 Binn. (Pa.) 27. See also Bank of U. S. v. Bank, 10 Wheat. (U. S.) 333, 6 L. Ed. 334; U. S. Nat. Bank v. Bank, 59 Hun 495, 13 N. Y. Supp. 411. The precise principle on which the doctrine of Price v. Neal was founded, has been a subject of varying opinion and the different theories concerning it, as also a voluminous citation of the cases, will be found in an article by Professor J. B. Ames in 4 Harv. L. Rev. 297. An extended review and discussion of the cases will also be found in Keener, Quasi-Cont. 154. While it is true that a bank pays a forged check at its own peril, if the depositor be free from negligence; Shipman v. Bank, 126 N. Y. 319, 27 N. E. 371, 12 L. R. A. 791, 22 Am. St. Rep. 821; it was held that no title passed through a forged indorsement, and hence payment by a bank made on the faith of it may be recovered from an indorsee even if bona fide for value; Canal Bank v. Bank, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 290.

A later decision had a very far-reaching effect with respect to the effect of restrictive indorsements. What has been characterized as "the doctrine, newly announced by the courts," has been thus stated: "Where a draft is indorsed to a bank for collection or for account of the indorser, the form of indorsement carries notice to the bank of payment that the bank to whom the paper is thus indorsed is a mere agent of the indorser to collect, having no proprietary interest in the paper; hence if the paper turns out to be forged (i. e. raised in amount, or payee's indorsement forged), the agent bank's own indorsement is not a guaranty of genuineness, and it is under no liability to repay the amount collected, after it has paid the same over to its principal." 13 Banking L. J. 75.

The first case was National Park Bank v. Bank, 114 N. Y. 28, 20 N. E. 632, 11 Am. St. Rep. 612, and this, it was said at a convention of bankers, "proved a revelation to many of us, and pointed out the great danger which lurked in checks and other paper having restrictive indorsements," and the second case, National City Bank of Brooklyn v. Westcott, 118 N. Y. 468, 23 N. E. 900, 16 Am. St. Rep. 771, was said "to have opened the eyes of banks, heretofore unacquainted with the decision (of the Seaboard Bank Case), to the real status of liability in case of restrictive indorsement;" address of S. G. Nelson, 13 Bkg. L. J. 445. The same doctrine was followed in other cases, so that it is fully established in New York and some other states and in the federal circuit court; Wells, Fargo & Co. v. U. S., 45 Fed. 337; U. S. v. Bank, 70 Fed. 232; Mechanics' Bank v. Packing Co., 70 Mo. 643; Germania Bank of Minneapolis v. Boutell, 60 Minn. 189, 62 N. W. 327, 27 L. R. A. 635, 51 Am. St. Rep. 519; Northwestern Nat. Bank v. Bank, 107 Mo. 402, 17 S. W. 982, 15 L. R. A. 102; and the basic principle of these decisions was already approved by the United States supreme court, which held that "the words 'for collection' evidently had a meaning. That meaning was intended to limit the effect which would have been given to the indorsement without them, and warned the party that, contrary to the purpose of a general or blank indorsement, this was not intended to transfer the ownership of the note or its proceeds." Sweeney v. Easter, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 166, 173, 17 L. Ed. 681; which was followed in a case of indorsement "for collection"; Commercial Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 148 U. S. 50, 13 Sup. Ct. 533, 37 L. Ed. 363; and as to an indorsement "for account," it was said, "It does not purport to transfer the title of the paper, or the ownership of the money when received;" White v. Bank, 102 U. S. 658, 26 L. Ed. 250. In one state the contrary view has been taken and the bank of deposit of a draft with a forged indorsement, although a mere "indorsee for collection," was held liable to refund to its correspondent bank which had paid the money; Rhodes v. Jenkins, 18 Colo. 49, 31 Pac. 491, 36 Am. St. Rep. 263. See Onondaga County Sav. Bank v. U. S., 64 Fed. 703, 12 C. C. A. 407.

The result of the decisions cited was the general adoption of a rule by most of the clearing-house associations, substantially like that of New York, excluding, from the exchanges, paper having a qualified or restricted indorsement, such as "for collection" or "for account of," unless the same was guaranteed. In Chicago such paper was absolutely excluded. The result has been to make the question, what is a restrictive indorsement, one of vital importance and the judicial opinion is not uniform. The following have been held to be restrictive: "for collection;" Sweeny v. Easter, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 166, 173, 17 L. Ed. 681; People's Bank of Baltimore v. Keech, 26 Md. 521, 90 Am. Dec. 118; "for account;" White v. Bank, 102 U. S. 658, 26 L. Ed. 250; "for my use;" Wilson v. Holmes, 5 Mass. 543, 4 Am. Dec. 75; "credit my account;" Lee v. Bank, 1 Bond. 387, Fed. Cas. No. 8,186; "Pay to P. or order only;" Power v. Finnie, 4 Call (Va.) 411; "for deposit;" Beal v. Somerville, 50 Fed. 647, 1 C. C. A. 598, 17 L. R. A. 291 (contra, National Commercial Bank v. Miller, 77 Ala. 168, 54 Am. Rep. 50); "for deposit to the credit of;" Freeman v. Bank, 87 Ga. 45, 13 S. E. 160; contra (by a divided court), Ditch v. Bank, 79 Md. 192, 29 Atl. 72, 138, 23 L. R. A. 164, 47 Am. St. Rep. 375; but while the presumption is that it is restrictive, the bank may show by extrinsic evidence that it was not so, either by reason of a special agreement; Beal v. Somerville, 50 Fed. 647, 1 C. C. A. 598, 17 L. R. A. 291; or because the proceeds were passed to the depositor's credit and subject to check before collection; Fourth Nat. Bank of Cincinnati v. Mayer, 89 Ga. 108, 14 S. E. 891.

Where a bank to which a forged check was sent for collection credited the person sending it with the amount, without actually remitting the money, it could, on discovering the forgery, charge back the amount; Birmingham Nat. Bank v. Bradley, 103 Ala. 109, 15 South. 440, 49 Am. St. Rep. 17. See articles critically reviewing the cases, in the latter of which the conclusion is reached that an indorsement for deposit is restrictive; 13 Banking L. J. 361, 429; and see also Norton, Bills & N. 123; Daniel, Neg. Instr. §§ 636, 637, 698.

The indorsement or assignment of an instrument by a corporation or by an infant passes the property therein, notwithstanding that from want of capacity the corporation or infant may incur no liability thereon. Neg. Instr. Act § 138.

Where the holder of an instrument payable to his order transfers it for value without indorsing it, the transfer vests in the transferee such title as the transferor had therein, and the transferee acquired, in addition, the right to have the indorsement of the transferor. Neg. Instr. Act § 123.

See GUARANTY; BILLS OF EXCHANGE; PROMISSORY NOTES; NEGOTIABILITY.

In Criminal Law. An entry made upon the back of a writ or warrant.

When a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with a crime has been issued by a justice of the peace of one county, which is to be executed in another county, it is necessary, in some states, that it should be indorsed by a justice of the county where it is to be executed: this indorsement is called backing.

INDORSER. The person who makes an indorsement.

By section 154, a person placing his signature upon an instrument otherwise than as maker, drawer or acceptor, is deemed to be an indorser, unless he clearly indicates by appropriate words his intention to be bound in some other capacity. Neg. Instr. Act § 154.

The indorser of a bill of exchange, or other negotiable paper, by his indorsement undertakes to be responsible to the holder for the amount of the bill or note, if the latter shall make a legal demand from the payer, and, in default of payment, give proper notice thereof to the indorser. But the indorser may make his indorsement conditional, which will operate as a transfer of the bill if the condition be performed; or he may make it qualified, so that he shall not be responsible on non-payment by the payer; Chitty, Bills 179, 180.

To make an indorser liable on his indorsement to parties subsequent to his own indorsee, the instrument must be commercial paper; for the indorsement of a bond or single bill will not, per se, create a responsibility; Folwell v. Beaver, 13 S. & R. (Pa.) 311. See Story, Bills 202; Evans v. Gee, 11 Pet. (U. S.) 80, 9 L. Ed. 639.

When there are several indorsers, the first in point of time is generally, but not always, first responsible; there may be circumstances which will cast the responsibility, in the first place, as between them, on a subsequent indorsee; Chalmers v. McMurdo, 5 Munf. (Va.) 252, 7 Am. Dec. 684; Rhinehart v. Schall, 69 Md. 352, 16 Atl. 126; Sweet v. Woodin, 72 Mich. 393, 40 N. W. 471.

The fact that an indorsee, when he puts his name on a draft, did not think it would render him liable as an indorser, will not relieve him; First Nat. Bank v. Crabtree, 86 Ia. 731, 52 N. W. 559. Where the owner and holder of a promissory note after maturity sells and indorses the note, signing his name after that of the original payee, he is an indorser and not a joint maker; Lank v. Morrison, 44 Kan. 594, 24 Pac. 1106.

INDUCEMENT. In Contracts. The benefit which the promisor is to receive from a contract is the inducement for making it.

In Criminal Law. The motive. Confessions are sometimes made by criminals under the influence of promises or threats. When these promises or threats are made by persons in authority, the confessions cannot be received in evidence. See CONFESSION.

In Pleading. The statement of matter which is introductory to the principal subject of the declaration or plea, and which is necessary to explain or elucidate it. Such matter as is not introductory to, or necessary to elucidate the substance or gist of, the declaration, plea, etc., nor collaterally applicable to it, is surplusage.

An inducement is, in general, more a matter of convenience than of necessity, since the same matter may be stated in the body of the declaration; but by its use confusion of statement is avoided; 1 Chitty, Pl. 259.

But in many cases it is necessary to lay a foundation for the action by a statement, by way of inducement, of the extraneous or collateral circumstances which give rise to the plaintiff's claim. For instance, in an action for a nuisance to property in the possession of the plaintiff, the circumstances of his being possessed of the property should be stated as inducement, or by way of introduction to the mention of the nuisance; 1 Chitty, Pl. 292; Steph. Pl. 257.

When a formal traverse is adopted, it should be introduced with an inducement, to show that the matter contained in the traverse is material; 1 Chitty, Pl. 38. See TRAVERSE; INNUENDO; COLLOQUIUM.

In an indictment there is a distinction between the allegation of facts constituting the offence, and those which must be averred by way of inducement. In the former case, the circumstances must be set out with particularity; in the latter, a more general allegation is allowed. An "inducement to an offence does not require so much certainty." Com. Dig. Indictment (G 5). In an indictment for an escape, "debito modo commissus" is enough, without showing by what authority; and even "commissus" is sufficient; 1 Ventr. 170. So, in an indictment for disobedience to an order of justices for payment of a church-rate, an averment, by way of inducement, that a rate was duly made as by law required, and afterwards duly allowed, and that the defendant was by it duly rated, was held sufficient, without setting out the facts which constituted the alleged due rating, etc., although in the statement of the offence itself it would not have been sufficient; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 222.

INDUCIÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. A truce; cessation from hostilities for a time agreed upon. Also, such agreement itself. Calv. Lex. So in international law; Grotius, de Jure Bell. lib. 3, c. 2, § 11; Huber, Jur. Civit. p. 743, § 22.

In Old Practice. A delay or indulgence allowed by law. Calvinus, Lex.; Du Cange; Bract. fol. 352 b; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 5, § 8. See Bell. Dict.; Burton, Law of Scotl. 561. So used in old maritime law; e. g. an induciæ of twenty days after safe arrival of vessels was allowed in case of bottomry bond, to raise the principal and interest; Locceivus, de Jure Marit. lib. 2, c. 6, § 11.

INDUCIÆ LEGALES (Lat.). In Scotch Law. The days between the citation of the defendant and the day of appearance; the days between the teste day and day of return of the writ.

INDUCTIO. In the Civil Law. Obliteration, by drawing the pen or stylus over the writing. Dig. 28, 4; Calv. Lex.

INDUCTION. In Ecclesiastical Law. The giving a clerk, instituted to a benefice, the actual possession of its temporalities, in the nature of livery of seisin. Ayliffe, Parerg. 299.

INDULGENCE. Forbearance (q. v.); delay in enforcing a legal right.

INDULTO. In Spanish Law. The condonation or remission of the punishment imposed on a criminal for his offence. L. 1, t. 32, pt. 7. This power is exclusively vested in the king.

The right of exercising this power has been often contested, chiefly as impolitic for the reason set forth in the following Latin verses:

"Plus sæpe nocet patientia regis
Quam rigor: ille nocet paucis; hæc incitat omnes,
Dum se ferre suos sperant impune reatus."

INDUSTRIAL AND PROVIDENT SOCIETIES. Societies formed in England for carrying on any labor, trade, or handicraft, whether wholesale or retail, including the buying and selling of land, and also (but subject to certain restrictions) the business of banking (I. and P. Soc. Act, 1876, 6). Such a society (which must consist of seven persons at least) when registered under the act becomes a body corporate with limited liability, and with the word "limited" as the last word in its name (id. 7, 11), and is regulated by rules providing for the amount of the shares, the holding of meetings, the mode in which the profits are to be applied, etc.; id. 9.

INDUSTRIAM, PER (Lat.). A qualified property in animals feræ naturæ may be acquired per industriam, i. e. by a man's reclaiming and making them tame by art, industry, and education; or by so confining them within his own immediate power that they cannot escape and use their natural liberty. 2 Steph. Com. 5.

INEBRIATE. See HABITUAL DRUNKARD.

INEBRIETY. See DIPSOMANIA; DRUNKENNESS.

INELIGIBILITY. The incapacity to be lawfully elected; disqualification to hold an office if elected or appointed to it. State v. Murray, 28 Wis. 99, 9 Am. Rep. 489.

This incapacity arises from various causes; and a person may be incapable of being elected to one office who may be elected to another: the incapacity may also be perpetual or temporary.

Among perpetual inabilities may be reckoned, the inability of a citizen born in a foreign country to be elected president of the United States.

Among the temporary inabilities may be mentioned, the holding of an office declared by law to be incompatible with the one sought; the non-payment of the taxes required by law; the want of certain property qualifications required by the constitution; the want of age, or being too old.

As to the effect on an election of the candidate having the highest number of votes being ineligible, see ELECTION. See also ELIGIBILITY.

INE, CODE OF. A code of the West Saxons dating from 688 to 695. Adopted by Alford, probably with alterations. Seebohm, Tribal Customs, 386.

INEVITABLE ACCIDENT. A term used in the civil law, nearly synonymous with fortuitous event. Neal v. Saunderson, 2 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 572, 41 Am. Dec. 609.

Any accident which cannot be foreseen and prevented. Though used as synonymous with act of God (q. v.), it would seem to have a wider meaning, the act of God being any cause which operates without aid or interference from man; 4 Dougl. 287, 290, per Lord Mansfield; McArthur v. Sears, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 198; Fish v. Chapman, 2 Ga. 349, 46 Am. Dec. 393. In Story on Bailments § 489, the two phrases are treated as synonymous, but in a later edition, the editor, Judge Bennett, notes the distinction just mentioned and considers the phrase inevitable accident one of wider significance. See Hays v. Kennedy, 41 Pa. 379, 80 Am. Dec. 627, where this and similar expressions are discussed and distinguished; Webb, Poll. Torts 160.

Inevitable accident is a relative term and must be construed not absolutely but reasonably with regard to the circumstances of each particular case, and where having reference to a marine collision, it may be regarded as an occurrence which the party charged with the collision could not possibly prevent by the exercise of ordinary care, caution, and maritime skill; The Morning Light, 2 Wall. (U. S.) 560, 17 Wall. 862; 2 E. L. & E. 559. With reference to this subject Chief Justice Drake said that inevitable accident occurs only when the disaster happens from natural causes, without negligence or fault on either side; and when both parties have endeavored, by every means in their power, with due care and caution, and with a proper display of nautical skill, to prevent the occurrence of the accident; Sampson v. U. S., 12 Ct. Cl. 491; Union S. S. Co. v. Steamship Co., 24 How. (U. S.) 307, 16 L. Ed. 699.

Where a rat made a hole in a box where water was collected in an upper room, so that the water trickled out and flowed on the plaintiff's goods in a lower room; L. R. 6 Ex. 217; where pipes were laid down with plugs, properly made, to prevent the pipes bursting, and a severe frost prevented the plugs from acting and the pipes burst and flooded the plaintiff's cellar; 11 Ex. 781; where a horse took fright without any default in the driver or any known propensity in the animal, and the plaintiff was injured; 3 Esp. 533; where a horse, travelling on the highway, became suddenly frightened at the smell of blood; Jackson v. Town of Belleview, 30 Wis. 257; where a horse, being suddenly frightened by a passing vehicle, became unmanageable and injured the plaintiff's horse; 1 Bingh. 13; where a mill dam, properly built, was swept away by a freshet of unprecedented violence; Livingston v. Adams, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 175; it was held that no action would lie; otherwise when the falling of the tide caused a vessel to strand, as this could have been foreseen; Bohannan v. Hammond, 42 Cal. 227. A bailee is exempt from liability for loss of the consigned goods arising from inevitable accident; he may, however, enlarge his liability by contract; Sturm v. Boker, 150 U. S. 312, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 37 L. Ed. 1093. See ACT OF GOD.

INFALISTATUS. In Old English Law. Exposed upon the sands, or seashore. A species of punishment mentioned in Hengham. Cowell.

INFAMIA (Lat.). Infamy; ignominy or disgrace.

By infamia juris is meant infamy established by law as the consequence of crime; infamia facti is where the party is supposed to be guilty of such crime, but it had not been judicially proved. Com. v. Green, 17 Mass. 515, 541.

INFAMIS (Lat.). In Roman Law. One who, in consequence of the application of a general rule, and not by virtue of an arbitrary decision of the censors, lost his political rights but preserved his civil rights. Savigny, Droit Rom. § 79.

INFAMOUS CRIME. A crime which works infamy in one who has committed it.

The fifth amendment of the constitution of the United States declares that, with certain exceptions not here material, "no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury." A similar provision is contained in many of the state constitutions, although in some later ones there is a tendency to abridge the common-law strictness of requiring indictment by a grand jury.

It is settled that the provision of the federal constitution above quoted restricts only the United States so that a state may authorize an offence—capital or infamous—to be prosecuted by information; State v. Jackson, 21 La. Ann. 574; this rule of construction has been uniformly applied to the general restrictions contained in the first eight amendments; Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 243, 8 L. Ed. 672; Murphy v. People, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 815; Pom. Const. L. §§ 231–8.

Under the fifth amendment of the United States constitution, a person charged with murder, committed in Oklahoma Territory prior to statehood, must be prosecuted by indictment; Reed v. State, 2 Okl. Cr. App. 589, 103 Pac. 1042; Hayes v. State, 3 Okl. Cr. App. 1, 103 Pac. 1061; but an indictment is not required even in cases of common-law felonies under a state constitutional provision that no one shall be deprived of his liberty except by the laws of the land, and the legislature may authorize prosecutions by an information; State v. Stimpson, 78 Vt. 124, 62 Atl. 14, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1153, 6 Ann. Cas. 639.

It was said by Mr. Justice Miller, "There has been great difficulty in deciding what was meant a hundred years ago by the phrase infamous crime, which is used in this constitutional amendment. That difficulty is not diminished by the fact of the obscurity of the language itself as construed by what is known of the laws and usages of our ancestors at that time, in connection with the fact that both state and federal legislation in regard to crime may have made that infamous since, which would not have been so considered then;" Miller, Const. U. S. 504. The question was not authoritatively decided by the supreme court until 1885, when in Ex parte Wilson the theory that the true test is the nature of the crime, as understood at common law, was distinctly negatived, and it was said by Mr. Justice Gray for the court: "When the accused is in danger of being subjected to an infamous punishment, if convicted, he has the right to insist that he shall not be put upon his trial except on the accusation of a grand jury;" and the fifth amendment, declaring in what cases a grand jury should be necessary, practically affirmed the rule of the common law. This was that informations were not allowed for capital crimes nor for any felony, i. e. an offence which caused a forfeiture; 4 Bla. Com. 94, 95, 310; thus the requirement of an indictment depended upon the consequences of the convict, and it was concluded that the constitutional substitution of the words "a capital or otherwise infamous crime" for capital crimes or felonies, "manifestly had in view that rule of the common law, rather than the rule on the very different question of the competency of witnesses. The leading word capital describing the crime by its punishment only, the associated words or otherwise infamous crime must, by an elementary rule of construction, include crimes subject to any infamous punishment, even if they should be held to include also crimes infamous in their nature, independently of the punishment affixed to them."

Having determined that the character of the punishment was to be the criterion applied in such cases, the court discussed the question what punishment would be considered infamous, and carefully confining the decision to the requirements of the case, continued thus: "Deciding nothing beyond what is required by the facts of the case before us, our judgment is that a crime, punishable by imprisonment for a term of years at hard labor, is an infamous crime, within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment of the constitution." Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 418, 5 Sup. Ct. 935, 29 L. Ed. 89; U. S. v. Petit, 114 U. S. 429 note, 5 Sup. Ct. 1190, 29 L. Ed. 93.

This decision was followed by a number of others which adhered to the same doctrine and decided that imprisonment in a state prison or a penitentiary with or without hard labor was an infamous punishment; Mackin v. U. S., 117 U. S. 348, 6 Sup. Ct. 777, 29 L. Ed. 909; Ex parte Bain, 121 U. S. 1, 7 Sup. Ct. 781, 30 L. Ed. 849; Parkin-

Before this decision there had been a tendency on the part of the courts towards the doctrine that the question of infamy was to be determined by the nature of the crime and not at all by the character of the punishment.

Prior to the independence of the United States there were understood to be two kinds of infamy,—one based upon the opinion of the people respecting the mode of punishment, and the other having relation to the future credibility of the offender; Eden, Penal L. ch. 75. Because the legal bearing of the subject was mainly if not entirely with respect to the settlement of rules determining what crimes would disqualify the perpetrator from testifying. Accordingly the classification of crimes other than treason or felony, which were held to be infamous, were naturally those the commission of which would tend to cast discredit upon the veracity of the criminal,—denominated generally by the term crimen falsi. The manifest purpose of the constitutional provision under consideration was the incorporation into fundamental law of one of the great guarantees of liberty. "A mere reference to the history and adoption of this provision into the federal constitution is sufficient to show that it was not a question of competency or incompetency to testify that the framers of our government were considering, but rather in consequences to the liberty of the individual in securing him against accusation and trial for crimes of great magnitude, without the previous interposition of a grand jury;" Butler v. Wentworth, 84 Me. 25, 24 Atl. 456, 17 L. R. A. 764.

As was said by Shaw, C. J., in an opinion quoted with approval in Ex parte Wilson, supra, "The state prison for any term of time is now by law substituted for all the ignominious punishment formerly in use; and, unless this is infamous, then there is now no infamous punishment other than capital."

It is said in a case subsequent to that in which the supreme court settled the principle, under the laws of the United States, an infamous crime is one for which the statutes authorized the courts to award an infamous punishment. Its character as being infamous does not depend on whether the punishment ultimately awarded is an infamous one, but whether it is in the power of the courts to award an infamous punishment, or whether the accused is in danger of being subjected to an infamous punishment; Ex parte McClusky, 40 Fed. 71; Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 5 Sup. Ct. 935, 29 L. Ed. 89; Butler v. Wentworth, 84 Me. 25, 24 Atl. 456, 17 L. R. A. 764.

The authoritative settlement of this question by the supreme court renders it unnecessary to refer to the earlier decisions of the federal courts, which in some cases supported a different view. Many of them are referred to in the opinion of the supreme court, and the theories on which they are based are expressly disapproved. In some of the state courts the same conclusion was reached; Gudger v. Penland, 108 N. C. 593, 13 S. E. 168, 23 Am. St. Rep. 73; State v. Reeves, 97 Mo. 668, 10 S. W. 841, 10 Am. St. Rep. 349; Butler v. Wentworth, 84 Me. 25, 24 Atl. 456, 17 L. R. A. 764.

It has also been held that a crime to the conviction and punishment of which congress has superadded a disqualification to hold office, is thereby made infamous; U. S. v. Waddell, 112 U. S. 76, 5 Sup. Ct. 35, 28 L. Ed. 673; Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 5 Sup. Ct. 935, 29 L. Ed. 89. The course of decisions cited renders the cases as to particular crimes of little value, but of those held to be infamous under the principle stated are, larceny; U. S. v. Fuller, 3 N. M. (Johns.) 367, 9 Pac. 597; Ex parte McClusky, 40 Fed. 71; assault with intent to kill; Ex parte Brown, 40 Fed. 81; selling liquors without paying a revenue tax; U. S. v. Johannesen, 35 Fed. 411; In re Mills, 135 U. S. 263, 10 Sup. Ct. 762, 34 L. Ed. 107; refusing to register voters; U. S. v. Cobb, 43 Fed. 570; counterfeiting United States securities; Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 5 Sup. Ct. 935, 29 L. Ed. 89; embezzlement and making false entries by an officer of a national bank; U. S. v. De Walt, 128 U. S. 393, 9 Sup. Ct. 111, 32 L. Ed. 485; Ex parte Bain, 121 U. S. 1, 7 Sup. Ct. 781, 30 L. Ed. 849; In re Claasen, 140 U. S. 200, 11 Sup. Ct. 735, 35 L. Ed. 409. When a state authorizes prosecution by information, one accused of grand larceny before its admission as a state cannot be so prosecuted; State v. Kingsly, 10 Mont. 537, 26 Pac. 1066. See INFAMY; INDICTMENT; INFORMATION.

INFAMY. That state which is produced by the conviction of crime and the loss of honor, which renders the infamous person incompetent as a witness, or juror.

The loss of character or position which results from conviction of certain crimes, and which formerly involved disqualification as a witness and juror.

When a man was convicted of an offence inconsistent with the common principles of honesty and humanity, the law considered his oath of no weight, and excluded his testimony as of too doubtful and suspicious a nature to be admitted in a court of justice to deprive another of life, liberty, or property; Bull. N. P. 291; County of Schuylkill v. Copley, 67 Pa. 386, 5 Am. Rep. 441; U. S. v.

Brockius, 3 Wash. C. C. 99, Fed. Cas. No. 14,652.

To affect the credibility of a witness it may be shown that he has been convicted of felony; Clifford v. Fire-Proofing Co., 232 Ill. 150, 83 N. E. 448; but mere rumor of accusation of crime cannot be a basis for his impeachment; Sheppard v. State, 56 Tex. Cr. R. 604, 120 S. W. 446. One convicted of felony but not sentenced is a competent witness, although several days have passed since conviction and no motion for a new trial has been filed; Rice v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 648, 100 S. W. 771.

The statutory abolition of this disqualification, see infra, has rendered the subject obsolete in England; Stark. Ev. (Sharsw. ed.) 118; and equally so in the United States as a question of evidence, but the constitutional guarantee against conviction of an infamous crime, otherwise than by indictment, has to a considerable extent involved the discussion of the common-law definition of such crimes. As to this branch of the subject, see INFAMOUS CRIME.

The crimes which at common law rendered a person incompetent were treason; 5 Mod. 16, 74; felony; Co. Litt. 6; 1 T. Raym. 369; larceny; Taylor v. State, 62 Ala. 164; even petit larceny at common law; 5 Mod. 75; Sylvester v. State, 71 Ala. 17; Burns v. Campbell, id. 271; but not if reduced to a misdemeanor; Barbour v. Com., 80 Va. 287; Welsh v. State, 3 Tex. App. 114; receiving stolen goods; Rohan v. Sawin, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 287; see Clee v. Seaman, 21 Mich. 290; all offences founded in fraud, and which come within the general notion of the crimen falsi of the Roman law; Leach 496; as perjury and forgery; Co. Litt. 6; Fost. 209; Poage v. State, 3 Ohio St. 229; piracy; 2 Rolle, Abr. 886; swindling, cheating; Fost. 209; barratry; 2 Salk. 690; conspiracy; 1 Leach 442; subornation of perjury; 2 G. & B. 145; suppression of testimony by bribery or by a conspiracy to procure the absence of a witness, or other conspiracy to accuse one of a crime and barratry; 1 Leach 442; bribing a witness to absent himself from a trial in order to get rid of his evidence; Fost. 208. From the decisions, Greenleaf deduces the rule "that the crimen falsi of the common law not only involves the charge of falsehood, but also is one which may injuriously affect the administration of justice, by the introduction of falsehood and fraud;" 1 Greenl. Ev. § 373.

But the attempt to procure the absence of a witness, not amounting to a conspiracy; State v. Keyes, 8 Vt. 57, 30 Am. Dec. 450; keeping a gaming house; 1 R. & M. N. P. 270; a bawdy house; Deer v. State, 14 Mo. 348; adultery; Little v. Gibson, 39 N. H. 505; maliciously obstructing railroad cars; Com. v. Dame, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 384; deceits in false weights, etc.; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 373; false pretences; Fisher v. Ins. Co., 33 Fed. 544; Ritter v. Press Co., 68 Mo. 458; embezzlement under some conditions of the law; Schuylkill County v. Copley, 67 Pa. 386, 5 Am. Rep. 441; conspiracy to cheat and defraud creditors; Bickel's Ex'r v. Fasig's Adm'r, 33 Pa. 463; were held not infamous. The test has been said to be "whether or not the crime shows such depravity or such a disposition to pervert public justice in the courts as creates a violent presumption against the truthfulness of the offered witness,—the difficulty being in the application of this test." 1 Bish. New Cr. L. 974. By statute in England and in most of the states, the disqualification of infamy is removed, but a conviction may usually be proved to affect credibility; Com. v. Gorham, 99 Mass. 420; Donohue v. People, 56 N. Y. 208; Curtis v. Cochran, 50 N. H. 242. But the difference in statutory regulations is such as to preclude general statement and to require reference to the local law in particular cases.

In Alabama one convicted of an infamous crime cannot execute the office of executor, administrator, or guardian, and conviction extinguishes all private trusts not susceptible of delegation, and also disqualifies him from holding office or voting; Bibb v. State, 83 Ala. 84, 3 South. 711. Other disabilities have been created by statute in other states. See Barker v. People, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 686, 15 Am. Dec. 322.

As the law was administered prior to the statutory removal of the disability to testify, it was the crime not the punishment which rendered the offender unworthy of belief; 1 Phill. Ev. 25; but that is not now recognized as the true test by which to determine what, in the sense of the American constitutional law, is an infamous crime. See that title.

In order to incapacitate the party the judgment must have been pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction; 2 Stark. 183; 1 Sid. 51. The disqualification came only from the final judgment of the court; Bull. N. P. 392; State v. D'Amery, 48 Me. 327; Blaufus v. People, 69 N. Y. 107, 25 Am. Rep. 148; and not from the crime; State v. Free, 1 McMull. (S. C.) 494; or mere conviction, or the infamous nature of the punishment; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 975. The proof of the crime was by the record of conviction; Com. v. Quin, 5 Gray (Mass.) 478.

It has been held that a conviction of an infamous crime in another country, or another of the United States, does not render the witness incompetent on the ground of infamy; Com. v. Green, 17 Mass. 515; State v. Landrum, 127 Mo. App. 653, 106 S. W. 1111; contra, State v. Candler, 170 N. C. 393; though this doctrine appears to be at variance with the opinions entertained by foreign jurists, who maintain that the state or condition of a person in the place of his domicil accompanies him everywhere; Story, Confl. Laws § 620, and the authorities there cited; Fœlix, Traité de Droit Intern. Privé 31; Merlin, Répert. Loi, 6, n. 6. In some states such a record has the same effect as a domestic one; State v. Foley, 15 Nev. 64, 37 Am. Rep. 458; Chase v. Blodgett, 10 N. H. 22; in some it is admitted only on the question of credibility; Com. v. Knapp, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 496, 20 Am. Dec. 491; and again it has been held that the full faith and credit, required to be given to records of other states, does not extend to enforcing in one state personal disabilities imposed upon a person convicted of crime in another state; Sims v. Sims, 75 N. Y. 466; reversing Sims v. Sims, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 231; and expressly disapproving Chase v. Blodgett, 10 N. H. 24 and State v. Candler, 10 N. C. 393. The question is to be determined by the law of the forum, and therefore the record should set forth a copy of the indictment; 9 Wis. 140. In some states the record is rejected altogether; Campbell v. State, 23 Ala. 44. See State v. Ridgely, 2 Harr. & McH. (Md.) 120, 1 Am. Dec. 372; State v. Harston, 63 N. C. 294.

The competency of such a witness was restored by pardon; U. S. v. Rutherford, 2 Cra. C. C. 528, Fed. Cas. No. 16,210; State v. Blaisdell, 33 N. H. 388; Yarborough v. State, 41 Ala. 405; unless the disability is annexed to the conviction, by statute; Foreman v. Baldwin, 24 Ill. 298; whether granted before sentence; Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 332, 18 L. Ed. 356; or after it has been complied with; Hoffman v. Coster, 2 Whart. (Pa.) 453. See Boyd v. U. S., 142 U. S. 450, 12 Sup. Ct. 292, 35 L. Ed. 1077; Martin v. State, 21 Tex. App. 1, 17 S. W. 430. But the completion of the sentence does not remove the disability; U. S. v. Brown, 4 Cra. C. C. 607, Fed. Cas. No. 14,661; State v. Benoit, 16 La. Ann. 273; contra, State v. Connor, 7 La. Ann. 379. A pardon does remove it even if it contains a clause declaring that it is intended to relieve from imprisonment and not from legal disabilities incident to conviction, such clause being held repugnant; People v. Pease, 3 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 333; but after a pardon the conviction is admissible to affect credibility; Baum v. Clause, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 196; Curtis v. Cochran, 50 N. H. 242.

The judgment for an infamous crime, even for perjury, did not preclude the party from making an affidavit with a view to his own defence; 2 Stra. 1148; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 374. He might, for instance, make an affidavit in relation to the irregularity of a judgment in a cause in which he was a party; for otherwise he would be without a remedy. But the rule was confined to defence; and he could not, at common law, be heard upon oath as complainant; 2 Salk. 461. When the witness became incompetent from infamy of character, the effect was the same as if he were dead; if he had attested any instrument as a witness, previous to his conviction, evidence might be given of his handwriting; 2 Stra. 833; Stark. Ev. pt. 2, § 193, pt. 4, p. 723.

A person infamous cannot be a juror, if indeed the disqualification of infamy does not extend to more crimes in jurors than in witnesses; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 977; 1 Co. Litt. 6 b.

See INFAMOUS CRIME; CRIMEN FALSI.

INFANGTHEF, INFANGENETHEF. The right of the lord of the manor to sit in judgment on the thief caught on his own land.

The jurisdictional powers granted in the charters of the thirteenth century frequently included this right, which extended to the hanging of the thief so caught, and, for this purpose, the manorial gallows was erected on the land of the lord. The privilege of utfangenethef, more rarely given, conferred the right of hanging the thief, wherever caught, if he had upon his person the stolen goods, and if he were prosecuted by the loser of the goods; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 564; Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 11.

INFANS. In the Civil Law. A child under the age of seven years; so called "quasi impos fandi" (as not having the faculty of speech). Cod. Theodos. 8, 18, 8.

INFANT. One who is not of full age. In England and this country one under the age of twenty-one years. Co. Litt. 171. Under the common law full age was attained at twenty-one, and under the civil law at twenty-five; 1 Bla. Com. 463. This period is arbitrary and is fixed by statute. In the United States the common-law period has been generally adopted. In Louisiana and Texas the age of majority was twenty-one years as well under the early Spanish laws as under the common law; Means v. Robinson, 7 Tex. 502.

But he is reputed to be twenty-one years old, or of full age, the first instant of the last day of the twenty-first year next before the anniversary of his birth; because, according to the civil computation of time, which differs from the natural computation, the last day having commenced, it is considered as ended. Savigny, Dr. Rom. § 182; Wells v. Wells, 6 Ind. 447. Accordingly, a man is held entitled to vote on the day before the twenty-first anniversary of his birth; State v. Clarke, 3 Harring. (Del.) 557; Hamlin v. Stevenson, 4 Dana (Ky.) 597. See AGE.

If, for example, a person were born at any hour of the first day of January, 1810 (even a few minutes before twelve o'clock of the night of that day), he would be of full age at the first instant of the thirty-first of December, 1830, although nearly forty-eight hours before he had actually attained the full age of twenty-one years, according to years, days, hours, and minutes, because there is in this case no fraction of a day; 1 Sid. 162; 1 Kebl. 589; 1 Salk. 44, 625; Raym. 1094; 1 Bla. Com. 463, 464;

1 Lilly, Reg. 57; Comyns, Dig. Enfant (A); Savigny, Dr. Rom. §§ 383, 384; 2 Kent 233. See AGE; FRACTION OF A DAY.

A curious case occurred in England of a young lady who was born after the house-clock had struck while the parish clock was striking, and before St. Paul's had begun to strike, twelve, on the night of the fourth and fifth of January, 1805; the question was whether she was born on the fourth or fifth of January. Coventry gives it as his opinion that she was born on the fourth because the house-clock does not regulate anything but domestic affairs, that the parochial clock is much better evidence, and that a metropolitan clock ought to be received with "implicit acquiescence." Coventry, Ev. 132. It is conceived that this can only be prima facie; because if the facts were otherwise, and the parochial and metropolitan clocks should both have been wrong, they would undoubtedly have had no effect in ascertaining the age of the child.

The sex makes no difference at common law; a woman is, therefore, an infant until she has attained the age of twenty-one years; Co. Litt. 161. It is otherwise, however, in some of the United States; Stevenson v. Westfall, 18 Ill. 209; Develin v. Riggsbee, 4 Ind. 464. In Idaho, act 1864, females come of age at the age of eighteen. The same rule exists in Vermont, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Maryland, Missouri, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Oregon, Nevada, and Washington; see 2 Kent 233 note; Stevenson v. Westfall, 18 Ill. 209; Dent v. Cock, 65 Ga. 400; Sparhawk v. Buell's Adm'r, 9 Vt. 41; Cogel v. Raph, 24 Minn. 194; Parker v. Starr, 21 Neb. 680, 33 N. W. 424; Jackson v. Allen, 4 Colo. 263.

Before arriving at full age, an infant may do many acts. A male at fourteen is of discretion, and may consent to marry; and at that age he may disagree to and annul a marriage he may before that time have contracted; he may then choose a guardian, and if his discretion be proved, may, at common law, make a will of his personal estate; he may act as executor at the age of seventeen years; he may incur a liability in equity if he actually represented himself to be of full age and the party dealing with him was misled; Pollock, Contr. 81; he cannot be adjudicated a bankrupt in the absence of an express representation to the creditor that he was of full age; id. 82.

On arriving at full age men are sui juris for all private purposes and also may vote and hold office except in cases especially otherwise provided for by law. See AGE.

A female at seven may be betrothed or given in marriage; at nine she is entitled to dower; at twelve she may consent or disagree to marriage; and, at common law, at seventeen she may act as executrix. At full age they may exercise all rights which belong to their sex. At common law the age of puberty was as above stated, fourteen for males and twelve for females, and this was taken from the civil law; Inst. 1. 22; Bla. Com. 436. While this may have been fixed in the civil law with due regard to natural development in the climate where that law had its origin, the fact that it is not so in countries governed by the common law is recognized by statutes in many states changing the age of consent to marriage.

Considerable changes of the common law have taken place in many of the states. In New York and several other states an infant is now deemed competent to be an executor; in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and other states, if an infant is named as executor in the will, administration with the will annexed will be granted during his minority, unless there shall be another executor who shall except, when the minor on arriving at full age may be admitted as joint executor; Tyler, Inf. & Cov. 133.

As the services of an infant are held in law to belong to his parent, it is the general rule that the infant cannot recover damages for their loss by reason of personal injury during minority; Clark Mile-End Spool Cotton Co. v. Shaffery, 58 N. J. L. 229, 33 Atl. 284; Farrar v. Wheeler, 145 Fed. 482, 75 C. C. A. 386; Comer v. Lumber Co., 59 W. Va. 688, 53 S. E. 906, 8 Ann. Cas. 1105, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 552, and note, where the cases are collected at large. But where a child has been abandoned by his father at the age of nine years, he is emancipated and the father has lost the right to his services and earnings; Swift & Co. v. Johnson, 138 Fed. 867, 71 C. C. A. 619, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1161; hence in a statutory action for a son's death for the sole benefit of the father, he could recover only nominal damages.

As a general rule the law of the domicil of birth determines the age of majority; 2 Kent 233, where are also stated some qualifications of the rule. See DOMICIL.

In general, an infant is not bound by his contracts, unless to supply him necessaries; Bacon, Abr. Infancy, etc. (I 3); 9 Viner, Abr. 391; 1 Comyns, Contr. 150, 151; Penrose v. Curren, 3 Rawle (Pa.) 351, 24 Am. Dec. 356; but see Vasse v. Smith, 6 Cra. (U. S.) 226, 3 L. Ed. 207; Horner v. Thwing, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 492; Vance v. Woid, 1 N. & McC. (S. C.) 197, 9 Am. Dec. 683; or unless, by some legislative provision, he is empowered to enter into a contract; as, with the consent of his parent or guardian, to put himself apprentice, or enlist in the service of the United States; Com. v. Murray, 4 Binn. (Pa.) 487, 5 Am. Dec. 412; McDonald v. Montague, 30 Vt. 357; but a contract of enlistment is not voidable like other contracts of an infant; In re Morrissey, 137 U. S. 157, 11 Sup. Ct. 57, 34 L. Ed. 644. See ENLISTMENT. A dwelling-house is not within the definition of necessaries, so as to render an infant liable on a contract for its erection; Allen v. Lardner, 78 Hun 603, 29 N. Y. Supp. 213.

At common law, contracts for articles other than necessaries made by an infant, after full age might be ratified by him, and would then become in all respects binding. In England Lord Tenterden's Act,

9 Geo. IV. c. 14, § 5, required the ratification to be in writing. But now by the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 62, "All contracts entered into by infants for the repayment of money lent, or to be lent, or for goods supplied, or to be supplied (other than contracts for necessaries), and all accounts stated shall be absolutely void," and "no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any promise made after full age to pay any debt contracted during infancy, or upon any ratification made after full age of any promise or contract made during infancy, whether there shall or shall not be any new consideration for such promise or ratification after full age."

Contracts made with him are merely voidable; Holmes v. Rice, 45 Mich. 142, 7 N. W. 772; and may be enforced or avoided by him on his coming of age; Vaughan v. Parr, 20 Ark. 600; New Hampshire Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Noyes, 32 N. H. 345; Peterson v. Laik, 24 Mo. 541, 69 Am. Dec. 441; Phipps v. Phipps, 39 Kan. 495, 18 Pac. 707; but must be avoided within a reasonable time; Mustard v. Wohlford's Heirs, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 329, 76 Am. Dec. 209; Palmer v. Miller, 25 Barb. (N. Y.) 399; Dolph v. Hand, 156 Pa. 91, 27 Atl. 114, 36 Am. St. Rep. 25. See Mette v. Feltgen, 148 Ill. 357, 36 N. E. 81. But to this general rule there may be an exception in case of contracts for necessaries; because these are for his benefit. See NECESSARIES. Elrod v. Myers, 2 Head (Tenn.) 33; Sinklear v. Emert, 18 Ill. 63; Wilhelm v. Hardman, 13 Md. 140; New Hampshire Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Noyes, 32 N. H. 345; Merriam v. Cunningham, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 40; Sams v. Stockton, 14 B. Monr. (Ky.) 232; but an infant is not liable upon a bill of exchange at the suit of an indorsee of the bill, although it was accepted for the price of necessaries; [1891] 1 Q. B. 413; bills and notes of an infant, whether negotiable or not, are voidable; Fant v. Cathcart, 8 Ala. 725; State v. Plaisted, 43 N. H. 413; Boody v. McKenney, 23 Me. 517. The privilege of avoiding a contract on account of infancy is strictly personal to the infant, and no one can take advantage of it but himself; Voorhees v. Wait, 15 N. J. L. 343; Smith v. Reid, 51 N. C. 494; Campbell v. Wilson, 23 Tex. 252, 76 Am. Dec. 67; Jones v. Butler, 30 Barb. (N. Y.) 641; Alsworth v. Cordtz, 31 Miss. 32; Hooper v. Payne, 94 Ala. 223, 10 South. 431. See Baldwin v. Rosier, 48 Fed. 810. When the contract has been performed, and it is such as he would be compellable by law to perform, it will bind him; Co. Litt. 172 a. And all the acts of an infant which do not touch his interest, but take effect from an authority which he has been trusted to execute, are binding; 3 Burr. 1794; Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 2, § 5, note c. The contracts of an infant, when not intrinsically illegal, are voidable, not void, and may be ratified by him upon arriving at maturity; Kendrick v. Neisz, 17 Colo. 506, 30 Pac. 245; Holmes v. Rice, 45 Mich. 142, 7 N. W. 772; but not during his minority; Lansing v. R. Co., 126 Mich. 663, 86 N. W. 147, 86 Am. St. Rep. 567; contra, Stafford v. Roof, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 626.

He may still avoid the contract even if he has spent the consideration; New York Building Loan Banking Co. v. Fisher, 23 App. Div. 363, 48 N. Y. Supp. 152; Price v. Furman, 27 Vt. 268, 65 Am. Dec. 194; Eureka Co. v. Edwards, 71 Ala. 248, 46 Am. Rep. 314; Walsh v. Young, 110 Mass. 396; contra, Johnson v. Ins. Co., 56 Minn. 365, 57 N. W. 934, 59 N. W. 992, 26 L. R. A. 187, 45 Am. St. Rep. 473; L. R. 24 Q. B. 166; but if he still has the consideration in specie he must return it as a prerequisite to a disaffirmance; Dickerson v. Gordon, 52 Hun 614, 5 N. Y. Supp. 310; Harvey v. Briggs, 68 Miss. 60, 8 South. 274, 10 L. R. A. 62; Craig v. Van Bebber, 100 Mo. 584, 13 S. W. 906, 18 Am. St. Rep. 569; or, if he has received consideration for a release, it may be credited by the jury as against recovery, if he sues before his majority; Worthy v. Oil Mill, 77 S. C. 69, 57 S. E. 634, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 690, 12 Ann. Cas. 688, and note. The other party need not be placed in statu quo; Dube v. Beaudry, 150 Mass. 448, 23 N. E. 222, 6 L. R. A. 146, 15 Am. St. Rep. 228; Morse v. Ely, 154 Mass. 458, 28 N. E. 577, 26 Am. St. Rep. 263; Dawson v. Helmes, 30 Minn. 107, 14 N. W. 462; Whitcomb v. Joslyn, 51 Vt. 79, 31 Am. Rep. 678. An infant has been enjoined from breach of contract; Mutual Milk & Cream Co. v. Prigge, 112 App. Div. 652, 98 N. Y. Supp. 458; [1892] 3 Ch. 502; but these decisions have been criticized as indefensible 20 Harv. L. Rev. 64. The title to chattels purchased by an infant passes to him and his repudiation of the contract does not revest it in the vendor; Lamkin & Foster v. Le Doux, 101 Me. 581, 64 Atl. 1048, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 104, and note.

The contract cannot be avoided by an adult with whom the infant deals; Gates v. Davenport, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 160; Johnson v. Rockwell, 12 Ind. 76; Warwick v. Cooper, 5 Sneed (Tenn.) 659; Monaghan v. Ins. Co., 53 Mich. 238, 18 N. W. 797; Patterson v. Lippincott, 47 N. J. L. 457, 1 Atl. 506, 54 Am. Rep. 178; Towle v. Dresser, 73 Me. 252; or by a third person in a collateral proceeding; Doane v. Covel, 56 Me. 527; Beardsley v. Hotchkiss, 96 N. Y. 201; Winchester v. Thayer, 129 Mass. 129. See Thaw v. Ritchie, 136 U. S. 519, 10 Sup. Ct. 1037, 34 L. Ed. 531.

The doctrine of estoppel is inapplicable to infants; Brown v. McCune, 5 Sand. (N. Y.) 228; Lackman v. Wood, 25 Cal. 147; Sewell v. Sewell, 92 Ky. 500, 18 S. W. 162, 36 Am. St. Rep. 606. Even where an infant fraudulently represented himself as being of full age, he was not estopped from setting up a defence of infancy to a contract entered into under the fraudulent representation; Merriam v. Cunningham, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 40; Burley v. Russell, 10 N. H. 184, 34 Am. Dec. 146; Wieland v. Kobick, 110 Ill. 16, 51 Am.

Rep. 676; Alvey v. Reed, 115 Ind. 148, 17 N. E. 265, 7 Am. St. Rep. 418; Millsaps v. Estes, 137 N. C. 535, 50 S. E. 227, 70 L. R. A. 170, 107 Am. St. Rep. 496; Kirkham v. Wheeler-Osgood Co., 39 Wash. 415, 81 Pac. 869, 4 Ann. Cas. 532; Conrad v. Lane, 26 Minn. 389, 4 N. W. 695, 37 Am. Rep. 412 and note; Alt v. Graff, 65 Minn. 191, 68 N. W. 9; Whitcomb v. Joslyn, 51 Vt. 79, 31 Am. Rep. 678; Carolina Interstate Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Black, 119 N. C. 329, 25 S. E. 975; Tobin v. Spann, 85 Ark. 556, 109 S. W. 534, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 672; Sims v. Everhardt, 102 U. S. 313, 26 L. Ed. 87.

The rule that an infant is not liable in tort for misrepresentation in obtaining a contract which he afterwards repudiates is generally stated to have been laid down in Johnson v. Pye, 1 Sid. 258, 1 Keb. 905, 914, 1 Lev. 169, in only one of which reports is the decision to that effect, and the contrary is stated by high early authorities; Com. Dig. Actions on the case for deceit, A. 10; Bac. Abr. Infancy I. 3. But the doctrine seems to be established in England; 9 Exch. 422 (where Johnson v. Pye was recognized as authority); 1 B. & S. 836; 12 C. B. (N. S.) 272; 18 Ch. D. 109. In this country there was early a disposition to repudiate the rule; Badger v. Phinney, 15 Mass. 359, 8 Am. Dec. 105; Walker v. Davis, 1 Gray (Mass.) 506 (the authority of which cases, however, was not controlling in Slayton v. Barry, 175 Mass. 513, 56 N. E. 574, 49 L. R. A. 560, 78 Am. St. Rep. 510); Fitts v. Hall, 9 N. H. 441, where Parker, C. J., in a much discussed opinion, expressly disregarded Johnson v. Pye, as does Judge Cowen in Wallace v. Morss, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 391, and Judge Daly in Eckstein v. Frank, 1 Daly (N. Y.) 335 (the latter disapproving an intermediate case in Brown v. McClune, 5 Sandf. [N. Y.] 224), followed in Schunemann v. Paradise, 46 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 426; and the infant was held liable for fraud though a contract obtained by him was void; Gaunt v. Taylor, 60 Hun 586, 15 N. Y. Supp. 589. To the same effect are Yeager v. Knight, 60 Miss. 730; Rice v. Boyer, 108 Ind. 472, 9 N. E. 420, 58 Am. Rep. 53; Neff v. Landis, 110 Pa. 204, 1 Atl. 177; Hughes v. Gallans, 10 Phila. 618; New York Bldg. Loan Banking Co. v. Fisher, 20 Misc. 242, 45 N. Y. Supp. 795.

In equity a false representation as to his age estops an infant from pleading his infancy; Charles v. Hastedt, 51 N. J. Eq. 171, 26 Atl. 564; Ferguson v. Bobo, 54 Miss. 121; Commander v. Brazil, 88 Miss. 668, 41 South. 497, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1117; Ingram v. Ison, 80 S. W. 787, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 48; but not the mere failure to tell his age; Baker v. Stone, 136 Mass. 405; Davidson v. Young, 38 Ill. 145. Under the Spanish law, governing contracts made and acts done in Louisiana and Texas before the introduction of the common law, if a minor represented himself to be of age and from his person appeared to be so, any contract with him was valid; Means v. Robinson, 7 Tex. 502, 513; contra, Kilgore v. Jordan, 17 Tex. 341. An infant cannot retain the benefits of his contract, and thus affirm it, after becoming of age, and yet plead infancy to avoid the payment of the purchase money; Henry v. Root, 33 N. Y. 526; Utermehle v. McGreal, 1 App. D. C. 359; but see Morse v. Ely, 154 Mass. 458, 28 N. E. 577, 26 Am. St. Rep. 263; Bloomer v. Nolan, 36 Neb. 51, 53 N. W. 1039, 38 Am. St. Rep. 690.

A conveyance of land by a minor without consideration is void; Robinson v. Coulter, 90 Tenn. 705, 18 S. W. 250, 25 Am. St. Rep. 708. The deed of an infant is held not void but voidable only; Vallandingham v. Johnson, 85 Ky. 288, 3 S. W. 173; and so is a mortgage; Skinner v. Maxwell, 66 N. C. 45; State v. Plaisted, 43 N. H. 413; Monumental Bldg. Ass'n No. 2 v. Herman, 33 Md. 128; but the deed may be ratified after reaching his majority, either expressly or impliedly; Darraugh v. Blackford, 84 Va. 509, 5 S. E. 542; but see Hill v. Nelms, 86 Ala. 442, 5 South. 796; Hoffert v. Miller, 86 Ky. 572, 6 S. W. 447; and not before; Sims v. Everhardt, 102 U. S. 300, 26 L. Ed. 87.

A ward of chancery who married without consent was imprisoned for contempt; [1909] 2 Ch. 260. The filing of a bill against an infant or paying into court funds settled upon an infant constitutes him a ward of chancery; 3 K. & G. 213.

An infant may disaffirm a marriage settlement executed by her, after the disability of infancy and coverture is removed; Smith v. Smith's Ex'r, 107 Va. 112, 57 S. E. 577, 122 Am. St. Rep. 831, 12 Ann. Cas. 857, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1185, where the English and American authorities are collected in the opinion and note.

It is frequently held that an infant is not competent to appoint an agent; Holden v. Curry, 85 Wis. 504, 55 N. W. 965; Ware v. Cartledge, 24 Ala. 622, 60 Am. Dec. 489; Robbins v. Mount, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. 553; Trueblood v. Trueblood, 8 Ind. 195, 65 Am. Dec. 756; Turner v. Bondalier, 31 Mo. App. 582; Burns v. Smith, 29 Ind. App. 181, 64 N. E. 94, 94 Am. St. Rep. 268; Poston v. Williams, 99 Mo. App. 513, 73 S. W. 1099; 16 M. & W. 778; to buy beer for him; State v. Field, 139 Mo. App. 20, 119 S. W. 499; nor can he execute a power of attorney; 2 Edm. Sel. Cas. 132; Glass v. Glass, 76 Ala. 368; Pickler v. State, 18 Ind. 266 (where it is said it would be "probably void"); nor can he legally appoint an attorney to appear for and defend him in an action; Fuller v. Smith, 49 Vt. 253; but on the other hand there are cases which hold that he can create an agency, at least so far that acts done under it are not void but voidable; Coursolle v. Weyerhauser, 69 Minn. 328, 72 N. W. 697; Hardy

v. Waters, 38 Me. 450. An infant may be an agent and his agency may be created by parol; Talbot v. Bowen, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 436, 10 Am. Dec. 747; or a trustee; Des Moines Ins. Co. v. McIntire, 99 Ia. 50, 68 N. W. 565. A service by one as deputy sheriff is good; Irving v. Edrington, 41 La. Ann. 671, 6 South. 177; State v. Toland, 36 S. C. 515, 15 S. E. 599; contra, Gilson v. Kuenert, 15 S. D. 291, 89 N. W. 472; or he may be a notary; U. S. v. Bixby, 9 Fed. 78; or an appraiser; White v. Land Co., 82 S. W. 571, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 775; id., 83 S. W. 628, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 1235; or clerk of a militia company; In re Dewey, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 265; or a deputy clerk to take acknowledgments; Talbott's Devisees v. Hooser, 75 Ky. 408.

The property of an infant is not liable to a mechanic's lien for material purchased by him during infancy; Bloomer v. Nolan, 36 Neb. 51, 53 N. W. 1039, 38 Am. St. Rep. 690. When avoiding an executory contract relating to his personal property, he need not refund the money received, where he has squandered it; Petrie v. Williams, 68 Hun 589, 23 N. Y. Supp. 237.

The protection which the law gives an infant is to operate as a shield to him, to protect him from improvident contracts, but not as a sword to do injury to others; Clark v. Tate, 7 Mont. 171, 14 Pac. 761. An infant is, therefore, responsible for his torts, as for slander, trespass, and the like; Conklin v. Thompson, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 218; Baxter v. Bush, 29 Vt. 465, 70 Am. Dec. 429; Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co. v. Jacobs, 2 Misc. 236, 21 N. Y. Supp. 1006; but he cannot be made responsible in an action ex delicto, where the cause arose on a contract; Penrose v. Curren, 3 Rawle (Pa.) 351, 24 Am. Dec. 356; Andrews v. Woodmansee, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 233; Fitts v. Hall, 9 N. H. 441; Humphrey v. Douglass, 10 Vt. 71, 33 Am. Dec. 177; Wallace v. Morss, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 391; Lowery v. Cate, 108 Tenn. 54, 64 S. W. 1068, 57 L. R. A. 673, 91 Am. St. Rep. 744; 38 Am. L. Rev. 371, where the cases are collected. But see Vasse v. Smith, 6 Cra. (U. S.) 226, 3 L. Ed. 207; Badger v. Phinney, 15 Mass. 359, 8 Am. Dec. 105; Peigne v. Sutcliffe, 4 McCord (S. C.) 387, 17 Am. Dec. 756. It is well settled that an infant bailee of a horse is liable in an action ex delicto for every tortious wilful act causing injury or death to the horse, the same as though he were an adult; Campbell v. Stakes, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 137, 19 Am. Dec. 561; Eaton v. Hill, 50 N. H. 235, 9 Am. Rep. 189; Field, Inf. 32.

With regard to the responsibility of infants for crimes, the rule is that no infant within the age of seven years can be guilty of felony or be punished for any capital offence; for within that age an infant is, by presumption of law, doli incapax and cannot be endowed with any discretion; and against this presumption no averment shall be received. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 25–29. The law assumes that this legal incapacity ceases when the infant attains the age of fourteen years; id.; but subjects this assumption to the effect of proof; State v. Learnard, 41 Vt. 585. Between the age of seven and fourteen years an infant is deemed prima facie to be doli incapax; but in this case the maxim applies, malitia supplet ætatem: malice supplies the want of mature years; 1 Russ. Cri. 2, 3; Godfrey v. State, 31 Ala. 323, 70 Am. Dec. 494; State v. Nickleson, 45 La. Ann. 1172, 14 South. 134; and the question whether such a child is capable of committing an assault with intent to murder, is for the jury; McCormack v. State, 102 Ala. 156, 15 South. 438. See State v. Milholland, 89 Ia. 5, 56 N. W. 403; 1 Bishop, N. Cr. L. § 368. The reports abound with cases where clear evidence of criminal consciousness was shown, and of very marked atrocity, from the age of nine years and upward; 1 Russ. Cr. 2–6; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 25–29. See DISCRETION. See also 36 L. R. A. 196, note, for English and American authorities on criminal capacity of children with respect to different crimes.

The Court of Chancery has a general jurisdiction over the persons and property of infants which is, in this country, usually vested in a court specially designated by statute. This equitable care and oversight is very wide; U. S. v. Morse, 218 U. S. 493, 31 Sup. Ct. 37, 54 L. Ed. 1123, 21 Ann. Cas. 782; and is exercised over them as infants without regard to property, and whether or not they are wards of court; [1892] 2 Ch. 496; and has been exercised in the removal of a guardian appointed by the mother after the father's death, for the welfare of the child; id.; or excluding the father from guardianship, if an improper person; 2 Bligh (N. S.) 124; or removing a guardian however appointed; Cowls v. Cowls, 3 Gilman (Ill.) 435, 44 Am. Dec. 708; Miner v. Miner, 11 Ill. 43; or providing that the child shall be brought up in the father's religion, even if the mother's is different; L. R. 6 Ch. 544; or changing the religion in which he was to be brought up, from that of the father, on the application of the child who was a ward of the court aged thirteen; [1907] 2 Ch. 557, C. A.; the paramount duty of the court being to consult the welfare of the child as above religious distinctions and parental wishes; 8 De G. M. & G. 760, 771; [1893] 1 Ch. 143, 148.

The income of a trust fund for the benefit of an infant may be applied to his maintenance or education with the consent of other interested persons; Pitts v. Trust Co., 21 R. I. 544, 45 Atl. 553, 48 L. R. A. 783, 79 Am. St. Rep. 821; 5 Ves. 195; 11 id. 604; where there is no other provision practicable; 1 Cr. & Ph. 317; and this may be without, or in opposition to, provisions of the will; 1 Madd. 253; 5 Ves. 195.

Infant defendants are not properly before the court when not served with summons, and there is no appointment of a guardian ad litem to represent them; Carrigan v. Drake, 36 S. C. 354, 15 S. E. 339. Where infant defendants have no special or separate defence, no separate answer is necessary, but joinder in the general answer of defendants is sufficient; Western Lumber Co. v. Phillips, 94 Cal. 54, 29 Pac. 328. See GUARDIAN AD LITEM.

Not only does the state exercise oversight and control over the person and property of infants, but the constitutional guarantees of personal liberty, trial by jury and the like, including those secured by the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution are generally held not impaired by statutes providing for investigation or care of infants either as delinquents or in the absence or default of natural guardians. Such decisions have been rendered in cases of the commitment of delinquent children to reformatory institutions; Ex parte Crouse, 4 Whart. (Pa.) 9; Com. v. Fisher, 213 Pa. 48, 62 Atl. 198, 5 Ann. Cas. 92; Reynolds v. Howe, 51 Conn. 472; Rule v. Geddes, 23 App. D. C. 31; Ex parte Ah Peen, 51 Cal. 280; State v. Children's Home Society, 10 N. D. 493, 88 N. W. 273; Wilkison v. Board of Children's Guardians, 158 Ind. 1, 62 N. E. 481; Roth v. House of Refuge, 31 Md. 329; Milwaukee Industrial School v. Supervisors of Milwaukee County, 40 Wis. 328, 22 Am. Rep. 702; but when the commitment is penal in its nature and not merely reformatory or for care, education, etc., it has been held that there must be some sort of trial and conviction; State v. Ray, 63 N. H. 406, 56 Am. Rep. 529; People v. Turner, 55 Ill. 280, 8 Am. Rep. 645 (though a statute providing less summary proceedings was held constitutional; In re Ferrier, 103 Ill. 367, 43 Am. Rep. 10; County of McLean v. Humphreys, 104 Ill. 378).

If a parent or guardian deems the commitment to be an infringement of his rights, he has his remedy by a proper proceeding; In re Sharp, 15 Idaho 120, 96 Pac. 563, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 886, where the general subject is discussed in the opinion and a note classifying the cases.

The commitment of a destitute child to a charitable institution at the public expense is not a criminal proceeding, and on being satisfied that the parents have reformed and become able to care for the child, the power of the chancery court to intervene and restore to them the custody of the child is limited only by the necessities of the case, having due regard to the welfare of the infant; In re Knowack, 158 N. Y. 482, 53 N. E. 676, 44 L. R. A. 699.

And see generally as to the liability of an infant who misrepresents his age, 8 Y. L. J. 235; 16 id. 56, where the cases are collected. See CHILD; AGE; EN VENTRE SA MÈRE; BASTARD; ADOPTION; ELECTION OF RIGHTS AND REMEDIES; RELIGIOUS EDUCATION; DISCRETION.

INFANTICIDE. In Medical Jurisprudence. The murder of a new-born infant. It is thus distinguishable from abortion and fœticide, which are limited to the destruction of the life of the fœtus in utero.

The crime of infanticide can be committed only after the child is wholly born; 5 C. & P. 329; 6 id. 349. But the destruction of a child en ventre sa mère is a high misdemeanor; 1 Bla. Com. 129. See 2 C. & K. 784; 7 C. & P. 850.

This question involves an inquiry, first, into the signs of maturity, the data for which are—the length and weight of the fœtus, the relative position of the centre of its body, the proportional development of its several parts as compared with each other, especially of the head as compared with the rest of the body, the degree of growth of the hair and nails, the condition of the skin, the presence or absence of the membrana pupillaris, and in the male the descent or non-descent of the testicles; Dean, Med. Jur. 140; Tayl. Med. Jur. 534.

Second, was it born alive? The second point presents an inquiry of great interest both to the legal and medical professions and to the community at large. In the absence of all direct proof, what organic facts proclaim the existence of life subsequent to birth? These facts are derived principally from the circulatory and respiratory systems. From the former the proofs are gathered—from the character of the blood, that which is purely fœtal being wholly dark, like venous blood, and forming coagula much less firm and solid than that which has been subjected to the process of respiration. From the condition of the heart and blood-vessels. The circulation anterior and subsequent to birth must necessarily be entirely different. That anterior, by means of the fœtal openings,—the foramen ovale, the ductus arteriosus, and the ductus venosus,—is enabled to perform its circuit without sending the entire mass of the blood to the lungs for the purpose of oxygenation. When the extra-uterine life commences, and the double circulation is established, these openings usually close; so that their closure is considered probable evidence of life subsequent to birth; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 478; Dean, Med. Jur. 142. From the difference in the distribution of the blood in the different organs of the body. The two organs in which this difference is most perceptible are the liver and the lungs,—especially the latter. The circulation of the whole mass of the blood through the lungs distends and fills them with blood, so that their relative weight will be nearly doubled, and any incision into them will be followed by a free effusion.

From the respiratory system proofs of life subsequent to birth are derived. From the thorax: its size, capacity, and arch are increased by respiration. From the lungs: they are increased in size and volume, are projected forward, become rounded and obtuse, of a pinkish-red hue, and their density is inversely as their volume; Dean, Med. Jur. 149 et seq. The fact of the specific gravity of the lungs being diminished in proportion to their diminution in density gives rise to a celebrated test,—the hydrostatic,—the relative weight of the lungs with water; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 459 et seq. The rule is, that lungs which have not respired are specifically heavier than water, and if placed within it will sink to the bottom of the vessel. If they have respired, their increase in volume and decrease in density render them specifically lighter than water, and when placed within it they will float. There are several objections to the sufficiency of this test; for example lungs which have never respired may become so distended with putrefactive gases as to float, and, on the other hand, lungs which have respired may be the seat of congestion or inflammation which would cause them to sink; but it is fairly entitled to its due weight in the settlement of this question; Dean, Med. Jur. 154 et seq. From the state of the diaphragm: prior to respiration it is found high up in the thorax. The act of expanding the lungs enlarges and arches the thorax, and, by necessary consequence, the diaphragm descends.

The fact of life at birth being established, the next inquiry is, how long did the child survive? The proofs here are derived from three sources. The fœtal openings, their partial or complete closure. The more perfect the closure, the longer the time. The series of changes in the umbilical cord. These are—1, the withering of the cord; 2, its desiccation or drying, and, 3, its separation or dropping off,—occurring usually four or five days after birth; 4, cicatrization of the umbilicus,—occurring usually from ten to twelve days after birth. The changes in the skin, in the process of exfoliation of the epidermis, which commences on the abdomen, and extends thence successively to the chest, groin, axillæ, interscapular space, limbs, and, finally, to the hands and feet.

As to the modes by which the life of the child may have been destroyed. The criminal modes most commonly resorted to are—1, suffocation; 2, drowning; 3, cold and exposure; 4, starvation; 5, wounds, fractures, and injuries of various kinds; a mode not unfrequently resorted to is the introduction of sharp-pointed instruments in different parts of the body; also, luxation and fracture of the neck, accomplished by forcibly twisting the head of the child, or pulling it backwards; 6, strangulation; 7, poisoning; 8, intentional neglect to tie the umbilical cord; and, 9, causing the child to inhale air deprived of its oxygen, or gases positively deleterious. All these modes of destroying life, together with the natural or accidental ones, will be found fully discussed by the writers on medical jurisprudence. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 509; Dean, Med. Jur. 179; Ryan, Med. Jur. 137; Dr. Cummins, Proof of Infanticide Considered; Storer & Heard, Criminal Abortion; Brown, Infanticide; Toulmouche, Études sur Infanticide.

INFEOFFMENT. The act or instrument of feoffment. In Scotland it is synonymous with saisine, meaning the instrument of possession: formerly it was synonymous with investiture. Bell, Dict.

INFERENCE. A conclusion drawn by reason from premises established by proof.

A deduction or conclusion from facts or propositions known to be true. Gates v. Hughes, 44 Wis. 336.

When the facts are submitted to the court, the judges draw the inference; when they are to be ascertained by a jury, the jury must do so. The witness is not permitted, as a general rule, to draw an inference and testify that to the court or jury. It is his duty to state the facts simply as they occurred. Inferences differ from presumptions

INFERIOR COURTS. An inferior court is a court of special and limited jurisdiction; it must appear on the face of its proceedings that it has jurisdiction, and that the parties were subjected to its jurisdiction by proper process, or its proceedings will be void. Cooley, Const. Lim. 508. Another distinction between superior and inferior courts is: in the latter case, a want of jurisdiction may be shown even in opposition to the recitals contained in the record; id. 509; citing Sheldon v. Wright, 5 N. Y. 497; Sears v. Terry, 26 Conn. 273; this is the general rule, though there are apparent exceptions of those cases where the jurisdiction may be said to depend upon the existence of a certain state of facts, which must be passed upon by the courts themselves, and in respect to which the decision of the court once rendered, if there was any evidence whatever on which to base it, must be held final and conclusive in all collateral inquiries, notwithstanding it may have erred in its conclusions; Cooley, Const. Lim. 509, citing 1 B. & B. 432; Freem. Judg. § 523; Wanzer v. Howland, 10 Wis. 16.

INFICIATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Denial. Denial of fact alleged by plaintiff,—especially, a denial of debt or deposit. Voc. Jur. Utr.; Calvinus, Lex.

INFIDEL. One who does not believe in the existence of a God who will reward or punish in this world or that which is to come. Willes 550. One who professes no religion that can bind his conscience to speak the truth. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 368. One who does not recognize the inspiration or obligation of the Holy Scriptures, or generally recognized features of the Christian religion. Gibson v. Ins. Co., 37 N. Y. 580.

This term has been very indefinitely applied. Under the name of infidel, Lord Coke comprises Jews and heathens; Co. 2d Inst. 506; Co. 3d Inst. 165; and Hawkins includes among infidels such as do not believe either in the Old or New Testament; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 46, s. 148.

The objection to the competency of witnesses who have no religious belief is removed in England and in most of the United States by statutory enactments; 1 Whart. Ev. § 395.

It has been held that at common law it is only requisite that the witness should believe in the existence of a God who will punish and reward according to desert; 1 Atk. 21; Butts v. Swartwood, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 431; Wakefield v. Ross, 5 Mas. 18, Fed. Cas. No. 17,050; Arnold v. Estate of Arnold, 13 Vt. 362; Blair v. Seaver, 26 Pa. 274; that it is sufficient if the punishment is to be in this world; Shaw v. Moore, 49 N. C. 25; contra, Atwood v. Welton, 7 Conn. 66. And see People v. McGarren, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 460; Cubbison v. McCreary, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 262; Brock v. Milligan, 10 Ohio 121. A witness's belief is to be presumed till the contrary appear; Donnelly v. State, 26 N. J. L. 463; id., 26 N. J. L. 601; and his disbelief must be shown by declarations made previously, and cannot be inquired into by examination of the witness himself; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 370, n.; Scott v. Hooper, 14 Vt. 535.

INFIHT (Sax.). An assault upon an inhabitant of same dwelling. Gloss. Anc. Inst. & Laws of Eng.

INFIRM. Weak, feeble.

When a witness is infirm to an extent likely to destroy his life, or to prevent his attendance at the trial, his testimony de bene esse may be taken at any age. 1 P. Wms. 117. See WITNESS.

INFIRMATIVE. Weakening. Webster, Dict. Tending to weaken or render infirm; disprobabilizing. 3 Benth. Jud. Ev. 13, 14. Exculpatory is used by some authors as synonymous. See Wills, Circ. Ev. 120; Best, Pres. § 217.

INFLUENCE. Most frequently used in connection with "undue," and refers to persuasion, machination, or constraint of will presented or exerted to procure a disposition of property, by gift, conveyance, or will. Anderson, L. Dict.

INFORMALITY. Want of customary or legal form.

INFORMATION. In French Law. The act or instrument which contains the depositions of witnesses against the accused. Pothier, Proc. Civ. sect. 2, art. 5.

In Practice. A complaint or accusation exhibited against a person for some criminal offence. 4 Bla. Com. 308.

An accusation in the nature of an indictment, from which it differs only in being presented by a competent public officer on his oath of office, instead of a grand jury on their oath. 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 141.

It differs in no respect from an indictment in its form and substance, except that it is filed at the mere discretion of the proper law officer of the government, ex officio, without the intervention of a grand jury; 4 Bla. Com. 308. The process has not been formally put in motion by congress for misdemeanors, but is common in civil prosecutions for penalties and forfeitures; 3 Story, Const. 659. The information is usually made upon knowledge given by some other person than the officer called the relator. "It comes from the common law without the aid of statutes; 5 Mod. 459; it is a concurrent remedy with indictment for all misdemeanors except misprision of treason, but not permissible in any felony." Bish. Cr. Pr. § 14; Com. v. Inhabitants of Waterborough, 5 Mass. 257; Com. v. Barrett, 9 Leigh (Va.) 665.

As to the power of a legislature to dispense with indictment, see INFAMOUS CRIME.

A state law which permits the prosecution of felonies by information does not violate the United States Constitution; Bolln v. Nebraska, 176 U. S. 83, 20 Sup. Ct. 287, 44 L. Ed. 382; and a legislature may modify or entirely abolish the constitutional provisions regarding the grand jury; State v. Guglielmo, 46 Or. 250, 79 Pac. 577, 80 Pac. 103, 69 L. R. A. 466, 7 Ann. Cas. 976.

Under United States laws, informations are resorted to for illegal exportation of goods; U. S. v. Mann, 1 Gall. 3, Fed. Cas. No. 15,717; in cases of smuggling; U. S. v. Lyman, 1 Mas. 482, Fed. Cas. No. 15,647; and a libel for seizure is in the nature of an information; Sawyer v. Steele, 3 Wash. C. C. 464, Fed. Cas. No. 12,406; The Samuel, 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 9, 4 L. Ed. 23. The provisions of the United States constitution which provide that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment, etc., of a grand jury, have been held to apply only to the proceedings in the federal courts; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. 88; Noles v. State, 24 Ala. 672; State v. Keyes, 8 Vt. 57, 30 Am. Dec. 450.

An information is sufficiently formal if it follows the words of the statute; The Emily, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 381, 6 L. Ed. 116; Whiting v. State, 14 Conn. 487, 36 Am. Dec. 499; but enough must appear to show whether it is found under the statute or at common law; Knowles v. State, 3 Day (Conn.) 103. It must, however, allege the offence with sufficient fulness and accuracy; Whitney v. State, 10 Ind. 404; and must show all the facts demanding a forfeiture, as in a penal action, when it is to recover a penalty; Com. v. Messenger, 4 Mass. 462; Merriam v. Langdon, 10 Conn. 461.

An information cannot be made on "information and belief" unless the facts are stated showing the source of information and the grounds of belief; People v. Wyatt, 186 N. Y. 383, 79 N. E. 330, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 159, 9 Ann. Cas. 972.

Where it is for a first offence, the fact need not be stated; Kilbourn v. State, 9 Conn. 560; otherwise, where it is for a second or subsequent offence for which an additional penalty is provided; Wilde v. Com., 2 Metc. (Mass.) 408. It need not show that there has been a preliminary examination or a waiver thereof; State v. Geer, 48 Kan. 752, 30 Pac. 236. It cannot be amended by adding charges; Com. v. Rodes, 1 Dana (Ky.) 595; contra, that it can be amended before trial; State v. Rowley, 12 Conn. 101; State v. Weare, 38 N. H. 314; 1 Salk. 471. By the common law a mistake in an information may be amended at any time; State v. White, 64 Vt. 372, 24 Atl. 250. The information charging a statutory offence cannot be amended after verdict so as to include another offence found by the jury; Turner v. Dickerman, 88 Mich. 359, 50 N. W. 310. It must be signed by the officer before filing; State v. Nulf, 15 Kan. 404; but not necessarily in Texas; Rasberry v. State, 1 Tex. App. 664; and must conclude with "against the peace and dignity of the state;" Wood v. State, 27 Tex. App. 538, 11 S. W. 525. In England, a verification was not required; but it is usually otherwise by statute in America; Baramore v. State, 4 Ind. 524; District of Columbia v. Herlihy, 1 McArth. (D. C.) 466.

A part of the defendants may be acquitted and a part convicted; State v. Taylor, 1 Root (Conn.) 226; and a conviction may be of the whole or a part of the offence charged; Hill v. Davis, 4 Mass. 137. In some states it is a proceeding by the state officer, filed at his own discretion; State v. Dover, 9 N. H. 468; Levy v. State, 6 Ind. 281; in others, leave of court may be granted to any relator to use the state officer's name, upon cause shown; Camman v. Min. Co., 12 N. J. L. 84; Respublica v. Griffiths, 2 Dall. (U. S.) 112, 1 L. Ed. 311; Cleary v. Deliesseline, 1 McCord (S. C.) 35; State v. Deliesseline, id. 52. See State v. Terrebone, 45 La. Ann. 25, 12 South. 315. In England, the right to make an information was in the attorney-general, who acted without the interference of the court; 3 Burr. 2089. In former times the officer proceeded upon any application, as of course; 4 Term 285; but by an act passed in 1692, it was provided that leave of court must be first obtained and security entered; see 2 Term 190. It is said to be doubtful whether leave of court is necessary in this country; 1 Bish. Cr. Pr. § 144. A prosecuting officer may, on his own motion, present a bill to the grand jury, without presenting an affidavit charging the offence, if he deems it necessary for the public good; and his action in doing so will be disturbed only in case of abuse of discretion; State v. Bowman, 43 S. C. 108, 20 S. E. 1010. It is sufficient for the district attorney to be present in court when the accused first appears and there to ratify the information filed by his deputy in his absence; State v. Guglielmo, 46 Or. 250, 79 Pac. 577, 80 Pac. 103, 69 L. R. A. 466, 7 Ann. Cas. 976.

See INDICTMENT; GRAND JURY; INFAMOUS CRIME.

INFORMATION AND BELIEF. Said to be the proper words for an averment in a bill in equity; see Elliott & Hatch Book-Typewriter Co. v. Fisher, 109 Fed. 330. See AFFIDAVIT.

INFORMATION IN THE NATURE OF A QUO WARRANTO. A proceeding against the usurper of a franchise or office. See QUO WARRANTO.

INFORMATION OF INTRUSION. A proceeding instituted by the state prosecuting officer against intruders upon the public domain. See Com. v. Andre's Heirs, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 224; Com. v. Hite, 6 Leigh (Va.) 588, 29 Am. Dec. 226.

INFORMATUS NON SUM (Lat. I am not informed). A formal answer made in court or put upon record by an attorney when he has nothing to say in defence of his client. Styles, Reg. 372.

INFORMER. A person who informs or prefers an accusation against another, whom he suspects of the violation of some penal statute.

When the informer is entitled to the penalty or part of the penalty, upon the conviction of an offender, he is or is not at common law a competent witness, according as the statute creating the penalty has or has not made him so; 1 Phill. Ev. 97; Ros. Cr. Ev. 107; Com. v. Frost, 5 Mass. 57; 1 Saund. 262, c. See U. S. v. Murphy, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 213, 10 L. Ed. 937; 4 East 180. The court is not bound to instruct the jury that the testimony of such a witness is to be received with great caution and distrust, since the credibility of witnesses is for the jury, and counsel are permitted to argue the question to them; State v. Hoxsie, 15 R. I. 1, 22 Atl. 1059, 2 Am. St. Rep. 838.

INFORTIATUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The second part of the Digest or Pandects of Justinian. See DIGEST.

This part, which commences with the third title of the twenty-fourth book and ends with the thirty-eighth book, was thus called because it was the middle part, which, it was said, was supported and fortified by the two others. Some have supposed that this name was given to it because it treats of successions, substitutions, and other important matters, and, being more used than the others, produced greater fees to the lawyers.

INFRA (Lat.). Below, under, beneath, underneath. The opposite of supra, above. Thus, we say, primo gradu est—supra, pater, mater, infra, filius, filia: in the first degree of kindred in the ascending line, above is the father and the mother, below, in the descending line, son and daughter. Inst. 3. 6. 1.

In another sense, this word signifies within: as, infra corpus civitatis, within the body of the country; infra præsidia, within the guards. So of time, during: infra furorem, during the madness. This use is not classical. The sole instance of the word in this sense in the Code, infra anni spatium, Code, b. 5, tit. 9, § 2, is corrected to intra anni spatium, in the edition of the Corpus Jur. Civ. of 1833 at Leipsic. The use of infra for intra seems to have sprung up among the barbarians after the fall of the Roman empire.

INFRA ÆTATEM (Lat.). Within or under age.

INFRA ANNUM LUCTUS (Lat.). Within the year of grief or mourning. 1 Bla. Com. 457; Cod. 5. 9. 2. But intra anni spatium is the phrase used in the passage in the Code referred to. See Corp. Jur. Civ. 1833, Leipsic. Intra tempus luctus occurs in Novella 22, c. 40. This year was at first ten months, afterwards twelve. 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 612. See ANNUS LUCTUS.

INFRA BRACHIA (Lat.). Within her arms. Used of a husband de jure as well as de facto. Co. 2d Inst. 317. Also, inter brachia. Bracton, fol. 148 b. It was in this sense that a woman could only have an appeal for murder of her husband inter brachia sua. Woman's Lawyer, pp. 332, 335.

INFRA CORPUS COMITATUS (Lat.). Within the body of the county.

The common-law courts have jurisdiction infra corpus comitatus: the admiralty, on the contrary, has no such jurisdiction, unless, indeed, the tide-water may extend within such county. Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. (U. S.) 441, 451, 12 L. Ed. 226. See ADMIRALTY; FAUCES TERRÆ.

INFRA DIGNITATEM CURIÆ (Lat.). Below the dignity of the court. Example: in equity a demurrer will lie to a bill on the ground of the triviality of the matter in dispute, as being below the dignity of the court. See Smets v. Williams, 4 Paige, Ch. (N. Y.) 364. See MAXIMS (de minimis non curat lex).

INFRA HOSPITIUM (Lat.). Within the inn. When once a traveller's baggage comes infra hospitium, that is, in the care and under the charge of the innkeeper, it is at his risk. See GUEST; INNKEEPER.

INFRA PRÆSIDIA (Lat. within the walls). A term used in relation to prizes, to signify that they have been brought completely in the power of the captors; that is, within the towns, camps, ports, or fleet of the captors. Formerly the rule was, and perhaps still in some countries is, that the act of bringing a prize infra præsidia changed the property; but the rule now established is that there must be a sentence of condemnation to effect this purpose. 1 C. Rob. 134; 1 Kent 104; Chitty, Law of Nat. 98; Abbott, Shipp. 14; Hugo, Droit Romain § 90.

INFRACTION (Lat. infrango, to break in upon). The breach of a law or agreement; the violation of a compact. In the French law this is the generic expression to designate all actions which are punishable by the Code of France.

INFRINGEMENT. A word used to denote the act of trespassing upon the incorporeal right secured by a patent or copyright. Any person who, without legal permission, shall make, use, or sell to another to be used, the thing which is the subject-matter of any existing patent, is guilty of an infringement, for which damages may be recovered at law by an action on the case, or which may be remedied by a bill in equity for an injunction and an account.

The manufacture, sale, or use of an invention protected by letters patent, within the area and time described therein by a person not duly authorized to do so. Rob. Pat. § 890.

Infringement is a mixed question of law and fact; California Artificial Stone Paving Co. v. Molitor, 113 U. S. 609, 5 Sup. Ct. 618, 28 L. Ed. 1106. Whether a device is an infringement is determined by the claims of the patent, and not by the actual invention; Meissner v. Manuf'g Co., 9 Blatchf. 363, 5 Fish. 285, Fed. Cas. No. 9,397. There is no infringement unless the invention can be practised completely by following the specifications. An infringement is a copy made after, and agreeing with, the principle laid down in the patent; and if the patent does not fully describe everything essential to the thing patented, no infringement will take place by the fresh invention of processes which the patentee has not communicated to the public; Page v. Ferry, 1 Fish. 298, Fed. Cas. No. 10,662. Where the same advantages are gained by substantially the same means, there is infringement; Wallicks v. Cantrell, 12 Fed. 790. The test is whether the defendant uses anything which the plaintiff has invented; Crompton v. Knowles, 7 Fed. 199.

However different, apparently, the arrangements and combinations of a machine may be from the machine of the patentee, it may in reality embody his invention, and be as much an infringement as if it were a servile copy of his machine. If the machine complained of involves substantial identity with the one patented, it is an infringement. If the invention of the patentee be a machine, it is infringed by a machine which incorporates, in its structure and operation, the substance of the invention,—that is, an arrangement which performs the same service, or produces the same effect, in the same way, or substantially the same way; Sickels v. Borden, 3 Blatchf. 535, Fed. Cas. No. 12,832. A device may be an infringement though it be itself a new invention; Zeun v. Kaldenberg, 16 Fed. 539. To obtain the same result by the same mode of operation constitutes infringement; Shaver v. Mfg. Co., 30 Fed. 68; and so where there is a mere formal change; Strobridge v. Landers, 11 Fed. 880; or variations in size, form, and degree; Asmus v. Alden, 27 Fed. 684; Lull v. Clark, 13 id. 456.

An invention limited to certain forms is infringed only by the use of those forms; Toepfer v. Goetz, 31 Fed. 913.

Where the same result is accomplished, the same function performed, and the mode of operation is the same, a mere difference in the location of parts will not avoid infringement; 42 O. G. 297.

An improvement may be an infringement; Brainard v. Cramme, 12 Fed. 621. An improvement and its original are separate inventions, and the inventor of one infringes by the use of the other; Royer v. Coupe, 29 Fed. 358; American Bell Telephone Co. v. Dolbear, 15 Fed. 448. It is, however, presumed that use under one patent does not infringe another; Smith v. Woodruff, 1 MacArthur (D. C.) 459; and the grant of a second patent is prima facie evidence that the inventions are different, and that the later patented invention is not an infringement of the former; La Baw v. Hawkins, 1 Bann. & A. 428, Fed. Cas. No. 7,960; American Pin Co. v. Oakville Co., 3 Blatchf. 190, Fed. Cas. No. 313.

To experiment with a patented article for scientific purposes, or for curiosity, or amusement, is said not to constitute infringement; Poppenhusen v. Falke, 4 Blatchf. 493, Fed. Cas. No. 11,279, but this cannot be invariably true. To make and exhibit a device at a fair, but not for use or sale, is not an infringement; Standard Measuring Mach. Co. v. League, 15 Fed. 390; nor is mere exposure for sale; 4 A. & E. 251; nor advertising an invention; 19 O. G. 727; but the latter is strong evidence of infringement; 19 O. G. 727. To make an article for sale abroad is an infringement; Ketchum Harvester Co. v. Harvester Co., 8 Fed. 586.

An infringement may be committed by repairing as well as making the invention, if it involves reconstruction either in whole or in part; Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Preterre, 3 Bann. & A. 471, Fed. Cas. No. 5,596. To make a part with intent to use it, or to sell it to be used, in connection with the other parts of the invention, is infringement; Celluloid Mfg. Co. v. American Zylonite Co., 30 Fed. 437.

One who makes and sells one element of a patented combination with the intention and for the purpose of bringing about its use in such a combination, is guilty of infringement; Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Brass Co., 80 Fed. 712, 26 C. C. A. 107; but not where the article made by the alleged infringer was not separately patented and was of a perishable nature (sheets of toilet paper); id. It has been held that replacing broken or worn-out parts is not necessarily infringement; Shickle, Harrison & Howard Iron Co. v. Car Coupler Co., 77 Fed. 739, 23 C. C. A. 433; Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Specialty Co., 75 Fed. 1009, 22 C. C. A. 1. See Heaton-Peninsular Button-Fastener Co. v. Specialty Co., 77 Fed. 288, 25 C. C. A. 267, 35 L. R. A. 728, citing many cases.

No act of making, use, or sale can be an infringement of a patented invention unless it is performed during the life of the patent; Marsh v. Nichols, Shepard & Co., 128 U. S. 605, 9 Sup. Ct. 168, 32 L. Ed. 538; Rein v. Clayton, 37 Fed. 354, 3 L. R. A. 78; see Kirk v. U. S., 163 U. S. 55, 16 Sup. Ct. 911, 41 L. Ed. 66. An infringement may be committed by the use, after the patent issues, of a device constructed before the creation of the monopoly, notwithstanding the good faith of its purchaser or maker and his belief that it will never be protected by a patent; 3 Rob. Pat. § 907; Lyon v. Donaldson, 34 Fed. 789.

One who buys a patented article of manufacture from one authorized to sell it at the place where it is sold, becomes possessed of an absolute property in it, unrestricted in time or place; Keeler v. Folding Bed Co., 157 U. S. 659, 15 Sup. Ct. 738, 39 L. Ed. 848, whether a patentee may protect himself and his assignees by special contracts brought home to the purchasers was not decided in the case. A licensee of a patent for Michigan sold pipes to be laid in Connecticut, where he had no patent right; it was held that he was not liable for infringement; Hobbie v. Jennison, 149 U. S. 355, 13 Sup. Ct. 879, 37 L. Ed. 766; see Adams v. Burks, 17 Wall. (U. S.) 453, 21 L. Ed. 700.

A re-issue is not infringed by an act committed before the surrender of the original patent; 2 Rob. Pat. § 696. A re-issue with a broader claim is not infringed by the use of devices made before the original patent, though they are covered by the new claim; Ives v. Axle Co., 11 Fed. 510, 20 Blatchf. 333. A device which does not infringe the original cannot infringe the re-issue, if the scope of the original is measured by its description and not by its claims alone; Cammeyer v. Newton, 4 Bann. & A. 159, Fed. Cas. No. 2,344.

A patent for a combination of old elements is not infringed by using less than all the elements, where the two combinations are not the same in operation; Faurot v. Hawes, 3 Fed. 456. A claim for a combination of three elements is not infringed by the use of two only, though the third is useless, for the patentee must stand by his claim; Cooldige v. McCone, 1 Bann. & A. 78, Fed. Cas. No. 3,186. A combination is not infringed where one essential element is omitted and another is substituted accomplishing the same result in a different way; Schmidt v. Freese, 12 Fed. 563.

A patent for a manufacture is infringed in whatever way the article is made; Celluloid Mfg. Co. v. American Zylonite Co., 30 Fed. 437; Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Mfg. Co., 3 Bann. & A. 235, Fed. Cas. No. 721.

Where a product is patented as the result of a certain process it is infringed only when made by that process; Cochrane v. Soda Fabrik, 111 U. S. 293, 4 Sup. Ct. 455, 28 L. Ed. 433.

A patent for a composition of matter is infringed if the new element does the same thing as the one for which it is substituted, though otherwise it is different; Woodward v. Morrison, 5 Fish. 357, Fed. Cas. No. 18,008. A composition of matter is not infringed, if elements are substituted producing different results; Smith v. Murray, 27 Fed. 69.

One is not liable in damages as an infringer if the patentee put his invention on the market not marked patented (with date), unless he had notice of the patent; Dunlap v. Schofield, 152 U. S. 244, 14 Sup. Ct. 576, 38 L. Ed. 426; Coupe v. Royer, 155 U. S. 584, 15 Sup. Ct. 199, 39 L. Ed. 263.

The burden is on the complainant to prove actual or constructive notice; Dunlap v. Schofield, 152 U. S. 244, 14 Sup. Ct. 576, 38 L. Ed. 426.

Speaking in a general sense, it is doubtless true that the test of infringement in respect to the claims of a design-patent is the same as in respect to a patent for an art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter; but it is not essential to the identity of the design that it should be the same to the eye of an expert. If in the eye of an ordinary observer, giving such attention as a purchaser usually gives, two designs are substantially the same; if the resemblance is such as to deceive such an observer and sufficient to induce him to purchase, one supposing it to be the other, the one patented is infringed by the other; Miller v. Smith, 5 Fed. 359; Gorham Mfg. Co. v. White, 14 Wall. (U. S.) 511, 20 L. Ed. 731.

In granting letters patent to authors and inventors for the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries, the United States reserves no right to publish such writings or use such inventions; James v. Campbell, 104 U. S. 356, 26 L. Ed. 786.

The United States is liable, under its contract, for the use of a patented article, but it is not liable in tort; U. S. v. Mfg. Co., 156 U. S. 552, 15 Sup. Ct. 420, 39 L. Ed. 530. While it has no right to use a patented device, yet no suit will lie against it without its consent; Belknap v. Schild, 161 U. S. 10, 16 Sup. Ct. 443, 40 L. Ed. 599; jurisdiction to recover royalties or compensation under a contract is in the court of claims; U. S. v. Palmer, 128 U. S. 262, 9 Sup. Ct. 104, 32 L. Ed. 442. It is doubtful whether a government official who uses an invention solely for the benefit of the government can be sued for infringement, and whether the case is not one solely for the court of claims; James v. Campbell, 104 U. S. 356, 26 L. Ed. 786. Where an officer of the United States uses, in his official capacity, a patented device made and used by the United States, the patentee is not entitled to an injunction, and cannot recover profits, if the only profit is a saving to the United States; but such officers, although acting under its orders, are personally liable to be sued for their own infringement of a patent; Belknap v. Schild, 161 U. S. 10, 16 Sup. Ct. 443, 40 L. Ed. 599; see Kirk v. U. S., 163 U. S. 49, 16 Sup. Ct. 911, 41 L. Ed. 66. A city is liable for an infringement by its officers for its benefit; Munson v. City of New York, 3 Fed. 338, 5 Bann. & A. 486.

The managing officers of corporations have been, in some cases, joined as defendants in cases involving the infringement of patents; Iowa Barb-Steel Wire Co. v. Wire Co., 30 Fed. 123; Nichols v. Pearce, 7 Blatchf. 5, Fed. Cas. No. 10,246; contra, Matthews & Willard Mfg. Co. v. Lamp Co., 73 Fed. 212; but in Glucose Sugar Refining Co. v. Preserving Co., 135 Fed. 540, Adams, D. J., after considering and citing many authorities, concludes that the weight of authority, and especially of the more recent cases, as well as reason, is against the joinder of officers of a corporation in ordinary cases. He admits that there is much contrariety of opinion. This case was followed in American Bank Protection Co. v. Protection Co., 181 Fed. 350, even where the directors had signed indemnity agreements to purchasers of infringing articles. In Whiting Safety Catch Co. v. Wheeled Scraper Co., 148 Fed. 396, the joinder was sustained because the individual defendant owned all the corporate stock, directed its affairs, and conspired with it to commit the infringement.

See PATENTS; COPYRIGHT; TRADE-MARKS; UNITED STATES COURTS.

INFUSION. In Medical Jurisprudence. A pharmaceutical operation, which consists in pouring a hot or cold fluid upon a substance whose medical properties it is desired to extract. The product of this operation. An infusion differs from a decoction in that the latter is produced by boiling the drug.

Although infusion differs from decoction, they are said to be ejusdem generis; and in the case of an indictment which charged the prisoner with giving a decoction, and the evidence was that he had given an infusion, the difference was held to be immaterial; 3 Campb. 74.

INGENIUM (Lat. of middle ages). A net or hook. Du Cange; hence, probably, the meaning given by Spelman of artifice, fraud (engin). A machine, Spelman, Gloss., especially for warlike purposes; also, for navigation of a ship. Du Cange.

INGENUI (Lat.). In Civil Law. Those freemen who were born free. Vicat, Vocab.

They were a class of freemen, distinguished from those who, born slaves, had afterwards legally obtained their freedom: the latter were called, at various periods, sometimes liberti, sometimes libertini. An unjust or illegal servitude did not prevent a man from being ingenuus.

INGRESS, EGRESS, AND REGRESS. These words are frequently used in leases to express the right of the lessee to enter, go from, and return to the lands in question.

INGRESSU (Lat.). An ancient writ of entry, by which the plaintiff or complainant sought an entry into his lands. Abolished in 1833. Tech. Dict.

INGROSSING. The act of copying from a rough draft a writing in order that it may be executed: as ingrossing a deed.

INHABITANT. One who has his domicil in a place; one who has an actual fixed residence in a place. As used in the federal jurisdiction act of 1789, it means citizen. Shaw

v. Mining Co., 145 U. S. 444, 12 Sup. Ct. 935, 36 L. Ed. 768.

A mere intention to remove to a place will not make a man an inhabitant of such place, although, as a sign of such intention, he may have sent his wife and children to reside there; 1 Ashm. 126. Nor will his intention to quit his residence, unless consummated, deprive him of his right as an inhabitant; Barnet's Case, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 153, 1 L. Ed. 77; Lyle v. Foreman, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 480, 1 L. Ed. 232. See 14 Viner, Abr. 420; 6 Ad. & E. 153.

"The words 'inhabitant,' 'citizen,' and 'resident,' as employed in different constitutions to define the qualifications of electors, mean substantially the same thing; and one is an inhabitant, resident, or citizen at the place where he has his domicil or home;" Cooley, Const. Lim. 755; Munroe v. Williams, 37 S. C. 81, 16 S. E. 535, 19 L. R. A. 665. But the terms "resident" and "inhabitant" have also been held not synonymous, the latter implying a more fixed and permanent abode than the former, and importing privileges and duties to which a mere resident would not be subject; Board of Sup'rs of Tazewell County v. Davenport, 40 Ill. 197; Bartlett v. Mayor, etc., 5 Sandf. (N. Y.) 44; Isham v. Gibbons, 1 Bradf. (N. Y.) 69; Lee v. City of Boston, 2 Gray (Mass.) 484; State v. Ross, 23 N. J. L. 517. Where a question was to be submitted to the "inhabitants" of a municipality it has been held to mean legal voters; Walnut v. Wade, 103 U. S. 683, 26 L. Ed. 526. When relating to municipal rights, powers, or duties, the word inhabitant is almost universally used as signifying precisely the same as domiciled; Borland v. City of Boston, 132 Mass. 98, 42 Am. Rep. 424.

Property conveyed to the inhabitants of a town as a body politic and corporate vests in the town as a corporation; Town of Newmarket v. Smart, 45 N. H. 87. See ALIEN; CITIZEN; DOMICIL; NATURALIZATION; HOME.

INHERENT POWER. An authority possessed without its being derived from another. A right, ability, or faculty of doing a thing, without receiving that right, ability, or faculty from another.

INHERITABLE BLOOD. Blood of an ancestor which, while it makes the person in whose veins it flows a relative, will also give him the legal rights of inheritance incident to that relationship. See 2 Bla. Com. 254, 255. Descendants can derive no title through a person whose blood is not inheritable. Such, in England, are persons attainted and aliens. But attainder is not known in this country. See 4 Kent 413, 424; 1 Hill. R. P. 148; 2 id. 190.

INHERITANCE. A perpetuity in lands to a man and his heirs; the right to succeed to the estate of a person who dies intestate. Dig. 50. 16. 24. The term is applied to lands. It includes all the methods by which a child or relation takes property from another at his death, except by devise, and includes as well succession as descent; as applied to personal property, it can mean nothing else than to signify succession; Horner v. Webster, 33 N. J. L. 413.

The property which is inherited is called an inheritance.

The term inheritance includes not only lands and tenements which have been acquired by descent, but every fee-simple or fee-tail which a person has acquired by purchase may be said to be an inheritance, because the purchaser's heirs may inherit it; Littleton § 9. This would now be called an estate of inheritance; 1 Steph. Com. 231. See ESTATES.

In Civil Law. The succession to all the rights of the deceased. It is of two kinds: that which arises by testament, when the testator gives his succession to a particular person; and that which arises by operation of law, which is called succession ab intestat. Heineccius, Lec. El. §§ 484, 485.

INHERITANCE ACT. The English statute of 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 106, regulating the law of inheritance. 2 Chitty, Stat. 575; 2 Bla. Com. 37; 1 Steph. Com. 388.

INHERITANCE TAX. See TAX.

INHIBITION. In Civil Law. A prohibition which the law makes or a judge ordains to an individual. Halifax, Anal. p. 126.

In English Law. The name of a writ which forbids a judge from further proceeding in a cause depending before him: it is in the nature of a prohibition. Termes de la Ley; Fitzh. N. B. 39. Also a writ issuing out of a higher court christian to a lower and inferior, upon an appeal; 2 Burn, Ec. L. 339. In the government of the Protestant Episcopal church, a bishop can inhibit a clergyman of his diocese from performing clerical functions.

INITIAL (from Lat. initium, beginning). Beginning; placed at the beginning. Webster. Thus, the initials of a man's name are the first letters of his name: as, G. W. for George Washington. Initials are no part of a name; Monroe Cattle Co. v. Becker, 147 U. S. 47, 13 Sup. Ct. 217, 37 L. Ed. 72. A middle name or initial is not recognized by law; Milk v. Christie & Todd, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 102; Bratton v. Seymour, 4 Watts (Pa.) 329; Allen v. Taylor, 26 Vt. 599; King v. Hutchins, 28 N. H. 561; McKay v. Speak, 8 Tex. 376; Long v. Campbell, 37 W. Va. 665, 17 S. E. 197; Johnson v. Day, 2 N. Dak. 295, 50 N. W. 701; Hicks v. Riley, 83 Ga. 332, 9 S. E. 771. But see Com. v. Perkins, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 388; but the first initial is, and a variance therein is fatal to an indictment; English v. State, 30 Tex. App. 470, 18 S. W. 94. In an indictment for forgery, an instrument signed "T. Tupper" was averred to have been made with intent to defraud Tristam Tupper, and it was held good; State v. Jones, 1 McMull. (S. C.) 236, 36 Am. Dec. 257. Signing of initials is good signing within the Statute of Frauds; 12 J. B. Moore 219; 2 Mood. & R. 221; Add. Contr. 46, n.; Palmer v. Stephens, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 471. When in a will the legatee is described by the initials of his name only, parol evidence may be given to prove his identity; 3 Ves. 148. The fact that the foreman of the grand jury in signing his name to the indorsement of "a true bill" on the indictment, used only the initials of, instead of his full Christian name, is not ground for quashing the indictment; Zimmerman v. State, 4 Ind. App. 583, 31 N. E. 550. As to the use of an initial in a ballot, see ELECTION. See NAME.

INITIATE. Commenced.

A husband was, in feudal law, said to be tenant by the curtesy initiate when a child who might inherit was born to his wife, because he then first had an inchoate right as tenant by the curtesy, and did homage to the lord as one of the pares curtis; whence curtesy. This right became consummated on the death of the wife before the husband. See 2 Bla. Com. 127; 1 Steph. Com. 247.

INITIATE TENANT BY CURTESY. A husband becomes tenant by curtesy initiate in his wife's estate of inheritance upon the birth of issue capable of inheriting the same. The husband's estate by curtesy is not said to be consummate till the death of the wife. 2 Bla. Com. 127, 128; 1 Steph. Com. 365, 366

INITIATIVE. In French Law. The name given to the important prerogative conferred by the charte constitutionnelle, art. 16, on the king to propose, through his ministers, projects of laws. 1 Toullier, n. 39. See VETO.

INITIATIVE, REFERENDUM, AND RECALL. Initiative is the right of a specified number of the electorate to unite in proposing laws to the legislative body, which, after due consideration, must submit the same to the vote of the people for their approval or disapproval.

Referendum is the referring of legislative acts to the electorate for their final acceptance or rejection.

At the end of 1911, the initiative and referendum were in force in 209 cities in 25 states, and were a part of the fundamental law, for state purposes, in 11 states: Maine, Missouri, South Dakota, Arkansas, Oklahoma, California, Colorado, Arizona, Montana, Oregon, and Washington. In 1912 Idaho, Wyoming, and Nebraska adopted these measures.

Recall is provision for the retirement of an elected officer, by a vote of the electorate. In 1911 the right to recall was provided in Idaho, Montana, North and South Dakota, Washington, Wisconsin, Wyoming, and California. Like provisions were adopted in 1912 in Ohio, Arizona, and Nebraska. In Illinois, certain questions of public policy are submitted to an election. In Iowa, Michigan, and Massachusetts the recall exists in connection with the commission form of city governments. So, also, in Parkersburg, West Virginia. California and Arizona provide for the recall of judges.

An initiative and referendum amendment to the state constitution was held not repugnant to the national constitution guaranteeing to every state a republican form of government; Kadderly v. Portland, 44 Or. 118, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222; nor does that provision of the federal constitution prohibit a direct vote of the voters of a subdivision of a state in strictly local affairs; In re Pfahler, 150 Cal. 71, 88 Pac. 270, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092, 11 Ann. Cas. 911. Whether the initiative and referendum provisions in the constitution of Oregon so alter the form of its government as to make it no longer republican, according to Article IV, § 4 of the United States constitution, is a purely political question as to which the courts have no jurisdiction; Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Oregon, 223 U. S. 118, 32 Sup. Ct. 224, 56 L. Ed. 377, dismissing writ of error to the judgment in 53 Or. 162, 99 Pac. 427; to the same effect, Kiernan v. Portland, 223 U. S. 151, 32 Sup. Ct. 231, 56 L. Ed. 386.

See Referendum in America by Dr. E. P. Oberholtzer.

The report of a special committee of the American Bar Association on the Recall of Judges (Rome G. Brown, Chairman) to the 1913 meeting, contains much information on that subject. The practice was adopted in Oregon in 1908; in California in 1911; in Colorado in 1912 (and also a provision for the recall of judicial decisions as to the constitutionality of statutes and of certain city charters); Arizona in 1912; Nevada in 1912. In Kansas and Minnesota a vote will be taken in 1914. In Arkansas a constitutional amendment was adopted in 1912, but was held to have been improperly submitted. The report gives an extensive bibliography on Judicial Recall.

INJUNCTION. A prohibitory writ, issued by the authority and generally under the seal of a court of equity, to restrain one or more of the defendants or parties or quasi parties to a suit or proceeding in equity, from doing, or from permitting his servants or others who are under his control to do, an act which is deemed to be inequitable so far as regards the rights of some other party or parties to such suit or proceedings in equity. Eden, Inj. c. 1; Kerr, Inj. 9; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. b. 3, c. 2, § 1; Story, Eq. Jur. § 861; Will. Eq. Jur. 341; 2 Green, Ch. 136; 1 Madd. 126.

The writ of injunction may be regarded as the correlation of the writ of mandamus, the one enjoining the performance of an unlawful act, the other requiring the performance of a lawful or neglected act; Beach, Inj. § 9.

Under the present practice in England, injunction is not by writ, but the order of the court has the same effect.

The interdict of the Roman law resembles, in many respects, our injunction. It was used in three distinct but cognate senses. 1. It was applied to signify the edicts made by the prætor, declaratory of his intention to give a remedy in certain cases, chiefly to preserve or to restore possession; this interdict was called edictal: edictale, quod prætorii edictis proponitur, ut sciant omnes ea forma posse implorari. 2. It was used to signify his order or decree, applying the remedy in the given case before him, and was then called decretal: decretale, quod prætor re nata implorantibus decrevit. It is this which bears a strong resemblance to the injunction of a court of equity. 3. It was used, in the last place, to signify the very remedy sought in the suit commenced under the prætor's edict; and thus it became the denomination of the action itself. Livingston on the Batture case; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 865.

Mandatory injunctions command the defendant to do a particular thing. Preventive, commands him to refrain from an act. The former are resorted to rarely and are seldom allowed before a final hearing; Corning v. Nail Factory, 40 N. Y. 191; Audenried v. R. Co., 68 Pa. 370, 8 Am. Rep. 195; 10 Ves. 192: 20 Am. Dec. 389, note; Bailey v. Schnitzius, 45 N. J. Eq. 178, 13 Atl. 247, 16 Atl. 680. They are not granted except to prevent a failure of justice and then only when the right is clearly established; Buettgenbach v. Gerbig, 2 Neb. (unof.) 889, 90 N. W. 654; Budd v. Camden Horse R. Co., 63 N. J. Eq. 804, 52 Atl. 1130, affirming 61 N. J. Eq. 543, 48 Atl. 1028; nor where there is unreasonable delay in the application; MacKintyre v. Jones, 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 543.

Preliminary or interlocutory injunctions are used to restrain the party enjoined from doing or continuing to do the wrong complained of, either temporarily or during the continuance of the suit or proceeding in equity in which such injunction is granted, and before the rights of the parties have been settled by the decree of the court in such suit or proceeding. The sole object of a preliminary injunction is to preserve the status quo until the merits can be heard. The status quo is the last actual peaceable uncontested status which preceded the pending controversy, and a wrongdoer cannot shelter himself behind a sudden or recently changed status, though made before the chancellor's hand actually reached him; Fredericks v. Huber, 180 Pa. 572, 37 Atl. 90. See RESTRAINING ORDER.

Final or perpetual injunctions are awarded, or directed to be issued, or the preliminary injunction already issued is made final or perpetual, by the final decree of the court, or when the rights of the parties so far as relates to the subject of the injunction are finally adjudicated and disposed of by the order or decree of the court; 2 Freem. Ch. 106; Caruthers v. Hartsfield, 3 Yerg. (Tenn.) 366, 24 Am. Dec. 580; Kruson v. Kruson, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 184; Kerr, Inj. *12.

In England, injunctions were divided into common injunctions and special injunctions; Eden, Inj. 178, n.; Will. Eq. Jur. 342. The common injunction was obtained of course when the defendant in the suit in equity was in default for not entering his appearance, or for not putting in his answer to the complainant's bill within the times prescribed by the practice of the court; Story, Eq. Jur. § 892; 18 Ves. 523; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. Special injunctions were founded upon the oath of the complainant, or other evidence of the truth of the charges contained in his bill of complaint. They were obtained upon a special application, and usually upon notice of such application given to the party whose proceedings were sought to be enjoined; Story, Eq. Jur. § 892; Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 339; 18 Ves. 522.

In the federal courts and in the equity courts of most of the states the English practice of granting the common injunction has been discontinued or superseded, either by statute or by rules of the courts; the preliminary injunctions are, therefore, all special injunctions in the courts of this country where such English practice has been superseded.

When used. The injunction is used in a great variety of cases, of which cases the following are some of the most common: to stay proceedings at law by the party enjoined; Albritton v. Bird, R. M. Charlt. (Ga.) 93; Lyles v. Halton, 6 Gill & J. (Md.) 122; Bell v. Cunningham, 1 Sumn. 89, Fed. Cas. No. 1,246; Gridley v. Wynant, 23 How. (U. S.) 500, 16 L. Ed. 411; Monson v. Lawrence, 27 Conn. 579; Frith v. Roe, 23 Ga. 139; to restrain the transfer of stocks, of promissory notes, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 906, 955; 2 Vern. 122; Osborn v. Bank, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 738, 6 L. Ed. 204; Jones v. Edwards, 57 N. C. 257; Burns v. Weesner, 134 Ind. 442, 34 N. E. 478; nor to restrain a defendant in a case pending for the infringement of letters patent, from issuing circulars alleging that the plaintiff's patent in suit is invalid; Baltimore Car-Wheel Co. v. Bemis, 29 Fed. 95; Kidd v. Horry, 28 Fed. 773; (contra, Emack v. Kane, 34 Fed. 46; Bell v. Mfg. Co., 65 Ga. 452; and it lies in England by statute; 14 Ch. Div. 763; Kidd v. Horry, 28 Fed. 774; L. R. 7 Eq. 488); nor to restrain a patentee who has begun, and is proceeding with, a suit on his patent, from notifying a manufacturer's customers, in a courteous way, that he intends to enforce his rights; New York Filter Co. v. Schwarzwalder, 58 Fed. 577; nor to restrain defendant from falsely representing that a patentee's invention is an infringement of his, and thus deterring purchasers; Whitehead v. Kitson, 119 Mass. 484.

It is necessary to the obtaining an injunction, as to other equitable relief, that there should be no plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law; Greene v. Mumford, 5 R. I. 472, 73 Am. Dec. 79; Thomas v. Protective Union, 121 N. Y. 45, 24 N. E. 24, 8 L. R. A. 175; Pusey v. Wright, 31 Pa. 387; Thomas v. James, 32 Ala. 723; Coe v. Mfg. Co., 37 N. H. 254; Franklin Telegraph Co. v Harrison, 145 U. S. 459, 12 Sup. Ct. 900, 36 L. Ed. 776; where there is adequate remedy at law one will not be granted; Harding v. Hawkins, 141 Ill. 572, 31 N. E. 307, 33 Am. St. Rep. 347; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Cannon, 49 Fed. 517; Wardens St. Peter's Episcopal Church v. Town of Washington, 109 N. C. 21, 13 S. E. 700; Wolf River Lumber Co. v. Boom Co., 83 Wis. 426, 53 N. W. 678; Planet Property & Financial Co. v. Ry. Co., 115 Mo. 618, 22 S. W. 616. An injunction will not be granted while the rights between the parties are undetermined, except in cases where material and irreparable injury will be done; Spring v. Strauss, 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 607; Bell v. Purvis, 15 Md. 22; Burnett v. Whitesides, 13 Cal. 156; Branch Turnpike Co. v. Board of Sup'rs, id. 190; Reed v. Jones, 6 Wis. 680; Watrous v. Rodgers, 16 Tex. 410; Patterson v. McCamant, 28 Mo. 210; Cohen v. L'Engle, 24 Fla. 542, 5 South. 235; but where it is irreparable and of a nature which cannot be compensated, and where there will be no adequate remedy, an injunction will be granted; Webber v. Gage, 39 N. H. 182; Pope v. Inhabitants of Halifax, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 410; Cunningham v. R. Co., 27 Ga. 499; U. S. v. Parrott, 1 McAll. 271, Fed. Cas. No. 15,998; Wood v. Braxton, 54 Fed. 1005; Griffith v. Hilliard, 64 Vt. 643, 25 Atl. 427. A preliminary injunction against the infringement of a patent will not be granted in case of doubt as to the infringement; Norton Door Check & Spring Co. v. Hall, 37 Fed. 691; where defendant confessedly intends to regain possession of certain premises by force, such act being punishable as a breach of the peace, he will not be restrained by injunction; Latham v. R. Co., 45 Fed. 721.

The owner of a dwelling-house, called for 60 years "Ashford Lodge," is not entitled to an injunction restraining the proprietor of an adjoining house known as "Ashford Villa" for 40 years from changing its name to "Ashford Lodge"; 10 Ch. D. 294. An injunction will not lie to prevent a club from carrying out the decision of the members when acting under their rules, unless it be shown that the rules are contrary to natural justice, or that what has been done is contrary to the rules, or that there has been bad faith in a decision; 5 Eq. 63; 13 Ch. D. 346; 17 Ch. D. 615. A member of an incorporated club has a standing in equity for an injunction to restrain the club from carrying out its declared purpose of committing an act which, if found to be criminal, will imperil the charter of the club; Klein v. Livingston Club, 177 Pa. 224, 35 Atl. 606, 34 L. R. A. 94, 55 Am. St. Rep. 717.

Where there was a conspiracy to prevent workmen by intimidation or persuasion from entering into or continuing in the plaintiff's employment, an injunction was granted to restrain the maintenance of a patrol of two men in front of the plaintiff's premises, placed there in furtherance of such conspiracy; Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L. R. A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443; but a corporation is not entitled to an injunction against persons or organizations on the ground that they have conspired to injure it by compelling its members to leave it; Silver State Council No. 1 of American Order of Steam Engineers v. Rhodes, 7 Colo. App. 211, 43 Pac. 451. See BOYCOTT.

Where a city had power to build waterworks, the fact that by so doing it would violate contract rights of an existing water company does not give an individual property owner the right to enjoin the city on the ground that his taxes would be increased thereby; Moore v. City of Walla Walla, 60 Fed. 961.

Equity will not enjoin a municipal corporation in the exercise of its lawful powers, unless the proposed act is ultra vires and would work irreparable injury; Murphy v. East Portland, 42 Fed. 308; but a resident taxpayer and real estate owner is entitled to bring a suit to enjoin the execution of a municipal contract illegally awarded, whatever may be alleged to be his ulterior purpose; Mazet v. City of Pittsburgh, 137 Pa. 561, 20 Atl. 693.

An injunction against a newspaper to restrain it from copying literary matter from another newspaper will not be refused because such is the practice of newspapers; [1892] 3 Ch. 489, where the cases are collected.

In England, equity, in special cases of contracts for personal services, will restrain the violation of the contract, whenever the legal remedy of damages would be inadequate and the contract is of such a kind that its negative specific enforcement is possible. This rule was at first applied to contracts which were in form expressly negative, but has since been extended to affirmative contracts which imply negative stipulations; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1343; L. R. 16 Eq. 149; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. R. Co., 1 McCra. 558, 3 Fed. 423; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. R. Co., 1 McCra. 565, 3 Fed. 430; Singer Sewing Mach. Co. v. Embroidery Co., 1 Holmes 253, Fed. Cas. No. 12,904. But where there was a contract for personal service containing a stipulation by the employed that he will "act exclusively for" his employer, the employed will not be restrained by injunction from entering the employ of another person in the absence of a negative covenant in the contract, express or implied, which is clear and definite; 75 L. T. Rep. 526; Sternberg v. O'Brien, 48 N. J. Eq. 370, 22 Atl. 348.

An injunction will not be granted to enforce a part of a bilateral contract where it cannot specifically enforce the whole; Welty v. Jacobs, 171 Ill. 624, 49 N. E. 723, 40 L. R. A. 98, 49 N. E. 723; unless the terms of the agreement are distinct and independent; 6 Sim. 333; 1 De G., M. & G. 604.

An injunction restraining the breach of a contract is a negative specific enforcement of that contract. The jurisdiction of equity to grant such injunction is substantially coincident with its jurisdiction to compel specific performance, and wherever a contract is one of a class which will be specifically enforced, a court of equity will restrain its breach by injunction, if this is the only practical mode of enforcement; Welty v. Jacobs, 171 Ill. 624, 49 N. E. 723, 40 L. R. A. 98. The breach of a negative promise will be enjoined whenever the contract is one of which the court would decree specific performance, if by such decree its observance by the party refusing to perform could be practically enforced; Metropolitan Exhibition Co. v. Ewing, 42 Fed. 198, 7 L. R. A. 381.

In this class of cases it is considered proper to interfere directly by preventing a breach which the person has bound himself not to make; L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 165; 1 De G. M., & G. 604. If the negative remedy of injunction will oblige the defendant either to carry out his contract or to lose all benefit of the breach, and the remedy at law is inadequate, and there is no reason of policy against it, the court will restrain conduct which is contrary to the contract, although it may be unable to enforce a specific performance of it; Philadelphia Ball Club v. Lajoie, 202 Pa. 210, 51 Atl. 973, 58 L. R. A. 227, 90 Am. St. Rep. 627.

Usually, in view of the peculiar personal relations which result from a contract of service, it would be inexpedient from the standpoint of public policy, to attempt to enforce such a contract specifically. It is held to be an invasion of one's natural liberty to compel him to work for another. One who is placed under such constraint is in a condition of involuntary servitude; Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed. 310, 11 C. C. A. 209, 25 L. R. A. 414. But where the promised service is of a special, unique, or unusual and extraordinary or intellectual character which gives it peculiar value, the loss of which can not be reasonably compensated in damages in an action at law, an injunction will be granted where there is an express negative covenant; Philadelphia Ball Club v. Lajoie, 202 Pa. 210, 51 Atl. 973, 58 L. R. A. 227, 90 Am. St. Rep. 627; Duff v. Russell, 14 N. Y. Supp. 134, affirmed 133 N. Y. 678, 31 N. E. 622; [1894] 1 Q. B. 125; 1 De G., M. & G. 604; but there must be a clear and definite negative covenant; Gossard Co. v. Crosby, 132 Ia. 155, 109 N. W. 483, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1115, and note; or, if one is to be implied, which is quite possible, it must be so definite that the court can see exactly the limit of the injunction that it is to grant; 75 L. T. N. S. 528, following [1891] 2 Ch. 428, where it was held that from a contract by an agent to act exclusively for his employer, a negative covenant not to do business for other employers could not be implied. In the Iowa case above cited, it is said: "The better and greater weight of the authorities tends to these conclusions: 1. That equity will not undertake to decree specific performance of contracts for personal service. 2. In the absence of an express negative covenant, equity will not aid the enforcement of these contracts by injunction. 3. Even when there is an express negative covenant, injunction will not be granted save in exceptional cases where by reason of the peculiar or extraordinary character of the promised service, a violation of the agreement will cause injury to the other party for which an action at law will afford no adequate remedy."

An injunction will be granted where the remedy at law, though there be one, is inadequate: To protect an innocent purchaser of the stock and good-will of a business by enjoining the sale thereof by the sheriff, where the damages recoverable would be only for the value of the stock, without compensation for the loss of business; North v. Peters, 138 U. S. 271, 11 Sup. Ct. 346, 34 L. Ed. 936; to prevent the illegal sale of a church-pew under an attachment, upon the ground that it would be an outrage to the owners' religious feelings; Deutsch v. Stone, 27 Weekly Law Bull. (Ohio) 20; to prevent the illegal issue of corporate bonds; Denny v. Denny, 113 Ind. 22, 14 N. E. 593; Watson v. Sutherland, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 74, 18 L. Ed. 580; to prevent the destruction of ornamental trees on the plaintiff's grounds; Shipley v. Ritter, 7 Md. 408, 61 Am. Dec. 371; to restrain the cutting off of the supply of natural gas furnished under a contract; Graves v. Gas Co., 83 Ia. 714, 50 N. W. 283; where the redress at law would be inadequate by reason of the defendant's insolvency; Saltus v. Belford Co., 133 N. Y. 499, 31 N. E. 518. An injunction will be granted to enjoin a public nuisance if it be continuous and peculiarly injures the plaintiff or his property; Lamming v. Galusha, 135 N. Y. 239, 31 N. E. 1024; or where a criminal prosecution is threatened, under color of an invalid statute, for the purpose of compelling the relinquishment of a property right; Central Trust Co. v. R. Co., 80 Fed. 218.

An injunction will not be granted on the application of a private person, to protect purely public rights; Springer v. Walters, 139 Ill. 419, 28 N. E. 761; nor, except in a great emergency, to interfere with public improvements; Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Everett, 40 N. J. Eq. 350, 3 Atl. 126; nor to restrain the abuse of a public trust, unless the complainant can show some peculiar interest therein; Chicago v. Building Ass'n, 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598; nor to compel the lessees of an opera house to allow the plaintiff to use the house under a contract therefor, where the effect would be to compel the lessee to break a contract with an innocent third party; Foster v. Ballenberg, 43 Fed. 821; nor to prevent the maintenance of a nuisance on a highway where it could be abated by indictment; Inhabitants of the Township of Raritan v. R. Co., 49 N. J. Eq. 11, 23 Atl. 127.

As a general rule equity has no jurisdiction to enjoin criminal prosecutions; Minneapolis Brewing Co. v. McGillivray, 104 Fed. 258; Fitts v. McGhee, 172 U. S. 516, 19 Sup.

Ct. 269, 43 L. Ed. 535; Davis & F. Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 189 U. S. 207, 23 Sup. Ct. 498, 47 L. Ed. 778; In re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 8 Sup. Ct. 482, 31 L. Ed. 402; Portis v. Fall, 34 Ark. 375; Paulk v. City of Sycamore, 104 Ga. 24, 30 S. E. 417, 41 L. R. A. 772, 69 Am. St. Rep. 128; State v. Wood, 155 Mo. 425, 56 S. W. 474, 48 L. R. A. 596; Flaherty v. Fleming, 58 W. Va. 669, 52 S. E. 857, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 461. So enforcement of contempt proceedings will not be enjoined; Sanders v. Metcalf, 1 Tenn. Ch. 419; Tyler v. Hamersley, 44 Conn. 419, 26 Am. Rep. 471; nor impeachment of city officers, where the power to impeach is given by charter; State v. Judges of Civil Dist. Court, 35 La. Ann. 1075.

There are cases, however, which form an exception to the general rule, in which it has been held that criminal acts may be restrained by injunction. In In re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 8 Sup. Ct. 482, 31 L. Ed. 402, Field, J., says: "In many cases proceedings criminal in their character, taken by individuals or organized bodies of men, tending, if carried out to despoil one of his property or other rights, may be enjoined by a court of equity." This is on the ground that the action sought to be enjoined is in the nature of a fraudulent use or an abuse of legal proceedings where the rights of the applicant for an injunction are clear, and the proceedings are obviously nothing but a circuitous method of depriving him of his property, or where municipal authorities are in fact attacking the vested property rights of individuals or corporations; Georgia Ry. & Elec. Co. v. Oakland City, 129 Ga. 576, 59 S. E. 296, where it was held that as a clear right was being invaded under an invalid ordinance, an injunction, might be granted, not against the proceeding altogether but against the excessive multiplicity of prosecutions. And injunctions were granted where a city attempted unlawfully to destroy a railroad franchise which it had no right to revoke, by means of a quasi criminal ordinance; Port of Mobile v. R. Co., 84 Ala. 115, 4 South. 106, 5 Am. St. Rep. 342; also where a city sought, by threatening arrest and prosecution of its employees, to prevent a railroad company from fencing a strip of land forming a part of its right of way but which it was sought to claim as a street; Georgia R. & Banking Co. v. Atlanta, 118 Ga. 486, 45 S. E. 256; and city officials were enjoined from closing a club house under an invalid ordinance which declared that every place where liquor was sold was a nuisance; Canon City v. Manning, 43 Colo. 144, 95 Pac. 537, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 272. But an injunction was refused against a county attorney for prosecuting salesmen for the sale of alcohol to druggists for use as a drug, on the ground that such sales were not in violation of the law, and that it was a question for the criminal court; Greiner-Kelley Drug Co. v. Truett, 97 Tex. 377, 79 S. W. 4.

So an injunction is sometimes granted to prevent an illegal action which is also a crime. The indictment is a punitive and not a preventive remedy and therefore does not oust the jurisdiction of equity; State v. Maury, 2 Del. Ch. 141; or it may be granted against acts which are indictable when they make a continuing injury to property or business; Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 44 N. E. 1077, 35 L. R. A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443. This comparatively recent development of equity jurisdiction is now comparatively well settled. Its efficiency has been in preventing the evils of strikes. See Judge Taft's Address, Report of Amer. Bar Ass'n, 1895, p. 265; 6 L. R. Eq. 551; Cœur d'Alene Consolidated & Min. Co. v. Miners' Union, 51 Fed. 260, 19 L. R. A. 382; Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 54 Fed. 730, 19 L. R. A. 387; Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. R. Co., 60 Fed. 803; Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed. 310, 11 C. C. A. 209, 25 L. R. A. 414; U. S. v. Agler, 62 Fed. 824; Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co. v. Saxey, 131 Mo. 212, 32 S. W. 1106, 52 Am. St. Rep. 622; In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 15 Sup. Ct. 900, 39 L. Ed. 1092; 33 Am. L. Reg. (N. S.) 609.

An injunction has also been granted to restrain a prize fight; Columbian Athletic Club v. State, 143 Ind. 98, 40 N. E. 914, 28 L. R. A. 727, 52 Am. St. Rep. 407; 35 Am. L. Reg. (N. S.) 100; an injunction will lie to restrain railroad employees from acts of violence and intimidation and from enforcing rules of labor unions resulting in irremediable injury to the company and the public, such as those requiring an arbitrary strike without cause; Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 54 Fed. 746, 19 L. R. A. 395. And also to restrain a railroad company and its employees from refusing to interchange interstate commerce, freight, and traffic facilities with a connecting line of railway; Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 54 Fed. 730, 19 L. R. A. 387.

An injunction will be granted to restrain one from inducing a breach of a contract of employment; Employing Printers' Club v. Doctor Blosser Co., 122 Ga. 509, 50 S. E. 353, 69 L. R. A. 90, 106 Am. St. Rep. 137, 2 Ann. Cas. 694; Flaccus v. Smith, 199 Pa. 133, 48 Atl. 894, 54 L. R. A. 640, 85 Am. St. Rep. 779; [1903] 2 K. B. 545; Beekman v. Marsters, 195 Mass. 205, 80 N. E. 817, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 201, 122 Am. St. Rep. 232, 11 Ann. Cas. 332, where it is said, "No case has been cited which holds that a right to compete justifies a defendant in intentionally inducing a third person to take away from the plaintiff his contractual rights"; and in [1902] 2 K. B. 86, in discussing the rights of a labor union to induce the plaintiff's employers to break their contract of apprenticeship with him, it is said: "The plaintiffs have a cause of action against the defendants, unless the court is satisfied when they interfered with the contractual right of the plaintiff, the defendants had a sufficient justification for their interference. I think their sufficient justification for interference with plaintiff's right must be an equal or superior right in themselves, and that no one can legally excuse himself to a man of whose contract he has procured a breach on the ground that he acted on a wrong understanding of his own rights, or without malice or bona fide, or in the best interests of himself, nor even that he acted as an altruist, seeking the good of another and careless of his own advantage."

So a malicious interference with an existing contract will be restrained; American Law Book Co. v. Edward Thompson Co., 41 Misc. 396, 84 N. Y. Supp. 225; or an attempt to induce a breach of a contract for the exclusive sale of a certain article within a certain territory; New York Phonograph Co. v. Jones, 123 Fed. 197; or one for the sale of manufactured articles under certain restrictions either as to the price on a re-sale or as to the manner of their use; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Goldthwaite, 133 Fed. 794.

But it has been held that, where defendants maliciously and by slanderous representations induced their son to break an engagement of marriage with the plaintiff, the plaintiff had no right of action against the defendants; Leonard v. Whetstone, 34 Ind. App. 383, 68 N. E. 197, 107 Am. St. Rep. 252.

The granting of an injunction is not limited to a case where damages could not be recovered in an action at law; Schuyler v. Curtis, 15 N. Y. Supp. 787; but as a general rule it will not be granted where the party may be compensated in damages; Lewis v. Lumber Co., 99 N. C. 11, 5 S. E. 19.

In England and here this writ was formerly used as the means of enforcing their decisions, orders, and decrees. But subsequent statutes have in most cases given to courts of equity the power of enforcing their decrees by the ordinary process of execution against the property of the party; so that an injunction to enforce the performance of a decree is now seldom necessary. See DECREE; WRIT OF ASSISTANCE.

Injunctions may be used to restrain the commencement or the continuance of proceedings in foreign courts, upon the same principles upon which they are used to restrain proceedings at law in courts of the same state or country where such injunction is granted, the jurisdiction in this class of cases, however, being purely in personam; 3 Myl. & K. 104; Story, Eq. Jur. § 899; High, Inj. § 103; Bisph. Eq. 424. But a state court will not grant an injunction to stay proceedings at law previously commenced in a federal court. But it is otherwise when the state court has first acquired jurisdiction; Home Ins. Co. v. Howell, 24 N. J. Eq. 238; Akerly v. Vilas, 15 Wis. 401; Knowlton v. Steamship Co., 53 N. Y. 76. Nor will a federal court grant an injunction to stay proceedings at law previously commenced in a state court, except where such injunction may be authorized by any law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy; Dial v. Reynolds, 96 U. S. 340, 24 L. Ed. 644; such suit being prohibited by U. S. R. S. § 720. As to what suits to enjoin state officers are suits against the state, see STATE.

And upon the ground of comity, as well as from principles of public policy, the equity courts of one state will not grant an injunction to stay proceedings previously commenced in a court of a sister state, where the courts of such sister state have the power to afford the party applying for the injunction the equitable relief to which he is entitled; Harris v. Pullman, 84 Ill. 20, 25 Am. Rep. 416; the power exists but could not be exercised where the court of law has concurrent jurisdiction and first assumed it, unless there be some special equity; Bank of Bellows Falls v. R. Co., 28 Vt. 470; but in a proper case, the equity courts of one state can restrain persons within their jurisdiction from the prosecution of suits in another state; Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 10 Sup. Ct. 269, 33 L. Ed. 538; Bigelow v. Smelting Co., 74 N. J. Eq. 457, 71 Atl. 153.

A very strong case should be made out to warrant a court of equity in interfering with a judgment at law; Hines v. Beers, 76 Ga. 9; Whitehill v. Butler, 51 Ark. 341, 11 S. W. 477; but it will enjoin a judgment at law if the matters set up in the bill, as a ground of relief, constitute equities unavailable as a defence in the action at law; Johnson v. Christian, 128 U. S. 374, 9 Sup. Ct. 87, 32 L. Ed. 442; no injunction against proceedings at law will issue where the plaintiff has a good defence at law; Cruickshank v. Bidwell, 176 U. S. 73, 20 Sup. Ct. 280, 44 L. Ed. 377; Clark v. Reeder, 40 Fed. 513. An injunction will lie to restrain a multiplicity of suits; Blindell v. Hagan, 54 Fed. 40. See MULTIPLICITY.

Established principles of equity jurisdiction are: (1) That one may not be enjoined from doing lawful acts to protect and enforce his rights of property or of person, unless his acts to that effect are clearly shown to be done unnecessarily, not for the purpose of preserving and enforcing his rights, but maliciously to vex, annoy and injure another; and (2) that where the injury to the applicant, if the preliminary injunction is refused, will be probably greater than the injury to the opponent if it is granted, it should be issued; while if the contrary is the probable result the application for it should be denied; Kryptok Co. v. Lens Co., 190 Fed. 767, 111 C. C. A. 495, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1, citing Russell v. Farley, 105 U. S. 433, 26 L. Ed.

1060; Shubert v. Woodward, 167 Fed. 47, 92 C. C. A. 509; Blount v. Societe, 53 Fed. 98, 3 C. C. A. 455.

An injunction bill is usually sworn to by the complainant, or is verified by the oath of some other person who is cognizant of the facts and charges contained in such bill, so far at least as relates to the allegations in the bill upon which the application for the preliminary injunction is based. And an order allowing such injunction is thereupon obtained by a special application, either with or without notice to the party enjoined and with or without security to such party, as the law or the rules and practice of the court may have prescribed in particular classes of cases; Perry v. Parker, 1 W. & M. 280, Fed. Cas. No. 11,010. Unless a preliminary injunction is to be applied for, a bill ordinarily need not be sworn to.

Equity rule 73 (U. S. S. C., 33 Sup. Ct. xxxix) provides that no temporary restraining order shall be made unless upon affidavit or a verified bill.

The bill must disclose a primary equity in aid of which this secondary remedy is asked; Washington v. Emery, 57 N. C. 29; Smith v. Lard, 28 Ga. 585; Pittman v. Robicheau, 14 La. Ann. 108.

Where the plaintiff has slept on his rights and allowed the alleged wrong to exist for a long time, he is not entitled to an injunction; Morris v. Edwards, 62 Tex. 205; as where the plaintiff had permitted the completion of the building which he sought to enjoin; Orne v. Fridenberg, 143 Pa. 487, 22 Atl. 832, 24 Am. St. Rep. 567; and where the plaintiff who was the owner of land bounded by a highway, permitted a railway to be built on the highway; Planet Property & Financial Co. v. Ry. Co., 115 Mo. 613, 22 S. W. 616. But it is otherwise where the plaintiff seeks the aid of an injunction for the protection of his legal rights, there being laches, but nothing to constitute an estoppel; Syracuse Solar Salt Co. v. R. Co., 67 Hun 153, 22 N. Y. Supp. 321. But delay in bringing suit is not a defence if it appear that matters still remain in statu quo; 2 Sim. N. S. 78. An injunction in a patent case will not be granted where, by reason of the plaintiff's delay, the defendant would be subjected to special hardship; Ney Mfg. Co. v. Drill Co., 56 Fed. 152; nor where the plaintiff has been guilty of misrepresentations as to his goods covered by a trademark; Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, 2 Sup. Ct. 436, 27 L. Ed. 706; Joseph v. Macowsky, 96 Cal. 518, 31 Pac. 914, 19 L. R. A. 53. An injunction will not be granted when the plaintiff's right is doubtful; Babcock & Wilcox Co. v. Exposition Co., 54 Fed. 214; Preston v. Smith, 26 Fed. 884; nor, it has been held, where the right on which it is claimed is, as a matter of law, unsettled; Citizens' Coach Co. v. R. Co., 29 N. J. Eq. 299; Delaware, Lackawanna & W. R. Co. v. Transit Co., 43 N. J. Eq. 71, 10 Atl. 490.

Formerly the plaintiff could not obtain relief by injunction until his rights had been settled at law; Gardner v. Newburgh, 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 162, 7 Am. Dec. 526; but this doctrine is not now maintained.

Injunctions are not granted where complainant's rights are not clear, and where an injury more or less irreparable is not likely to result unless defendants are enjoined; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Transit Co., 45 N. J. Eq. 50, 17 Atl. 146, 6 L. R. A. 855.

An injunction is ordinarily preventive, and will not be granted to correct a wrong already done or restore to a party rights of which he has been deprived; Com'rs of Highways v. Deboe, 43 Ill. App. 25; East Saginaw St. Ry. v. Wildman, 58 Mich. 286, 25 N. W. 193.

There must be at least a reasonable probability of injury to the plaintiff in order to justify an injunction; Genet v. Canal Co. & Co., 122 N. Y. 505, 25 N. E. 922; Lorenz v. Waldron, 96 Cal. 243, 31 Pac. 54; a mere threat of injury is not ordinarily a sufficient ground; Bond v. Wool, 107 N. C. 139, 12 S. E. 281; Johnson Railroad Signal Co. v. Signal Co., 55 Fed. 487, 5 C. C. A. 204. There must be a well-grounded apprehension of immediate injury; Potter v. Street Ry., 83 Mich. 285, 47 N. W. 217, 10 L. R. A. 176; Ruge v. Fish Co., 25 Fla. 656, 6 South. 489; Sherman v. Clark, 4 Nev. 142, 97 Am. Dec. 516. It is not necessary to prove that a wrong has actually been committed; where rights had been infringed, and the party has good reason to believe they will be infringed, an injunction will issue; Poppenhusen v. Comb Co., 4 Blatch. 184, Fed. Cas. No. 11,281. A bill will lie for an injunction, if a patent right has been admitted, upon the well-grounded proof of an intention to violate the right; Woodworth v. Stone, 3 Story, 749, Fed. Cas. No. 18,021. A bill in equity will lie for an injunction to prevent an anticipated infringement of a patent, no infringement having actually occurred: Sherman v. Nutt, 35 Fed. 149; where there was no proof of actual sales, but the defendant had exhibited his lamps at a fair, and distributed circulars to the public and otherwise advertised his lamps for sale, it was held that if sales had not actually been made, such a wrong was threatened, and that was sufficient to call for an injunction; White v. Heath, 10 Fed. 291. Where the defendant had formerly been engaged in infringing, the mere fact that since the commencement of the suit he had ceased to do so and did not threaten to renew his sales, is not an answer to an application for a preliminary injunction to restrain the continuance or renewal of such infringement; Potter v. Crowell, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 112, Fed. Cas. No. 11,323.

An injunction writ should contain upon its face sufficient to inform the party enjoined of what he is restrained from doing or from permitting to be done by those who are under his control, without the necessity of his resorting to the complainant's bill; Summers v. Farish, 10 Cal. 347.

Where a preliminary injunction is needed, the complainant's bill should contain a proper prayer for such process; Walker v. Devereau, 4 Paige Ch. (N. Y.) 229; Sullivan v. Judah, id. 444; 3 Sim. 273. Damages for breach of covenant may be decreed in conjunction with relief by injunction; Stofflet v. Stofflet, 160 Pa. 529, 28 Atl. 857. A court of equity may impose any terms in its discretion as a condition of granting or continuing an injunction; Myers v. Block, 120 U. S. 206, 7 Sup. Ct. 525, 30 L. Ed. 642.

The remedy of the party injured by the violation of an injunction by the party enjoined is by an application to the court to punish the party enjoined for contempt in disobeying the process of the court; People v. McKane, 78 Hun 154, 28 N. Y. Supp. 981; Lake Erie & W. Ry. Co. v. Bailey, 61 Fed. 494.

To render a person amenable to an injunction, it is neither necessary that he be a party to the suit or served with a copy of it, so long as he appears to have had actual notice; Ex parte Lennon, 166 U. S. 548, 17 Sup. Ct. 658, 41 L. Ed. 1110; and a stranger with notice or knowledge of its terms, is bound thereby, and may be punished for contempt for violating its provision; State v. Lavery, 31 Or. 77, 49 Pac. 852; Garrigan v. U. S., 163 Fed. 16, 89 C. C. A. 494, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1295; O'Brien v. People, 216 Ill. 354, 75 N. E. 108, 108 Am. St. Rep. 219, 3 Ann. Cas. 966.

Where trustees of a friendly society who had been enjoined from distributing certain funds, resigned, and their successors, with notice of the injunction, proceeded to make the forbidden distribution, both sets of trustees were held to be in contempt and were committed; 51 L. J. Ch. 414. See 66 L. T. Ch. D. 267.

Where the complainant in an injunction case after its issue contracted with the defendant in reference to the subject matter in a way inconsistent with the injunction, such contract would relieve from contempt for violating it; Howard v. Durand, 36 Ga. 346, 91 Am. Dec. 767; Com. v. Ward, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 479; James v. Mayrant, Harp. Eq. (S. C.) 180; Rodgers v. Nowill, 17 Jur. 111; Kempson v. Kempson, 61 N. J. Eq. 303, 48 Atl. 244; but a mere acquiescence in the violation of the injunction was held insufficient; Bond v. Pennsylvania Co., 126 Fed. 749, 61 C. C. A. 355; and a mere offer by an agent of the complainant to purchase an article which the defendant is enjoined from selling in order to ascertain whether the injunction is being violated, is not such an invitation to violate it as to relieve from the contempt; Ex parte Cash, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 623, 99 S. W. 1118, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 304, 123 Am. St. Rep. 865. The mere consent or solicitation of one party to the violation of the injunction by the other will not justify it, but there must be some action by the court; Bowers v. Von Schmidt, 87 Fed. 293. See CONTEMPT.

Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, § 2) conferred upon the Court of Chancery jurisdiction to award damages in lieu of an injunction. It enacts that "in all cases in which the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction * * * against the commission or continuance of any wrongful act * * * it shall be lawful for the same court, if it shall think fit, to award damages to the party injured, either in addition to or in substitution for such injunction." "Such jurisdiction ought not to be exercised except under very exceptional circumstances. I will not attempt to specify them or lay down rules for the exercise of judicial discretion. It is sufficient to refer by way of example to trivial and occasional nuisances; cases in which a plaintiff has shown that he only wants money; vexatious and oppressive cases; and cases where the plaintiff has so conducted himself as to render it unjust to give him more than pecuniary relief. In all such cases as these and in all others where an action for damages is really an adequate remedy—as where the acts complained of are already finished—an injunction can be properly refused"; Per Lindley, L. J., in [1895] 1 Ch. 287, 316.

In this country there has been no legislation by Congress except as to one class of cases, and the federal courts of equity have no inherent power to ascertain the damages sustained by reason of tortious acts unattended with profits to the wrong doer. It was said, in relation to this subject, that it required an act of parliament to change the law in England, and the only modification to be found in the federal law is with respect to the infringement of patents which has been effected by direct act of congress. R. S. § 4921; Corbin v. Taussig, 137 Fed. 151.

In some cases in the state courts damages have been settled as an incident to injunctive relief "under special circumstances"; Reese v. Wright, 98 Md. 272, 56 Atl. 976; or the right to an account for past damages as an incident to the injunction suit to restrain a continuing trespass; Lonsdale Co. v. Woonsocket, 25 R. I. 428, 56 Atl. 448; Roberts v. Vest, 126 Ala. 355, 28 South. 412; or damages for past injury in a suit to restrain further detention of land; Busby v. Mitchell, 29 S. C. 447, 7 S. E. 618; and in one case past damages for a nuisance were held recoverable under a practice act in an injunction suit; Platt v. City of Waterbury, 72 Conn. 531, 45 Atl. 154, 48 L. R. A. 691, 77 Am. St. Rep. 335. But it was held that damages for past overflows of land, the right to recover which was complete at the time of filing the bill and which could be enforced in a single action at law, could not be recovered in a suit to enjoin future overflows; Stephenson v. Morgan, 64 N. J. Eq. 219, 53 Atl. 677; and where the suit was to enjoin a trespass, the judgment could only cover such damages as had accrued and not permanent ones; Stowers v. Gilbert, 156 N. Y. 600, 51 N. E. 282; and in one state it was held that where the Court of Chancery, prior to the adoption of the constitution, had jurisdiction in a case independently of any statute, the legislature could not confer jurisdiction to adjudicate damages as incident to an injunction against a trespass; McMillan v. Wiley, 45 Fla. 487, 33 South. 993.

A remainderman or reversioner in a suit to enjoin waste may, to avoid multiplicity of actions, have damages as at law; Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. 411, 38 L. R. A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891; Corbin v. Taussig, supra. But as a rule damages are not recoverable in equity; see Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 112, 178.

In many jurisdictions in a suit for injunction it is held that affirmative relief may be given to the defendant as well as an injunction relating to the same matter; Sternberg v. Wolff, 56 N. J. Eq. 389, 39 Atl. 397, 39 L. R. A. 762, 67 Am. St. Rep. 494; Collinsville Granite Co. v. Phillips, 123 Ga. 830, 51 S. E. 666; Smith v. Richardson, 1 Utah, 245.

Equity will restrain the commission of injuries outside of its territorial jurisdiction, by a decree in personam, where it has acquired jurisdiction over the defendant. Such are suits for the specific performance of contracts, for the enforcement of trusts, for relief on the ground of fraud, for settling partnership accounts; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1318. Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sen. 144; Brown v. Desmond, 100 Mass. 267; Newton v. Bronson, 13 N. Y. 587, 67 Am. Dec. 89; Tardy v. Morgan, 3 McLean, 358, Fed. Cas. No. 13,752; Potter v. Hollister, 45 N. J. Eq. 508, 18 Atl. 204; and where a resident of another state having no property in the state of the forum is a plaintiff in an action at law, he is so far amenable to the jurisdiction of the courts of that state that an injunction bill may be entertained against him; Chalmers v. Hack, 19 Me. 124; a defendant may be enjoined from committing waste upon property situated abroad; Marshall v. Turnbull, 32 Fed. 124. But where the suit is strictly local, the subject-matter is specific property, and the relief such that, if granted, it must act directly upon the subject-matter, and not upon the person of the defendant, the jurisdiction must be exercised in the place where the subject-matter is situated, as a suit to abate a nuisance; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1318; Miss. & Mo. R. R. Co. v. Ward, 2 Black (U. S.) 485, 17 L. Ed. 311.

An injunction may issue to restrain a party over whom the court has jurisdiction from bringing a suit in a foreign state which would result in oppression; Royal League v. Kavanagh, 233 Ill. 175, 84 N. E. 178. The rule has been applied to a divorce suit; Kempson v. Kempson, 63 N. J. Eq. 783, 52 Atl. 360, 625, 58 L. R. A. 484, 92 Am. St. Rep. 682; to a patent suit where suits in another jurisdiction were enjoined until the pending cause should be decided; Commercial Acetylene Co. v. Lighting Co., 159 Fed. 935, 87 C. C. A. 206; and to a suit for the administration of a trust fund, where the fund and all the contesting creditors were within the state; O'Connor v. Root, 130 Ia. 553, 107 N. W. 608; also to a case where the foreign jurisdiction was sought in order to evade the laws of the domicil; Sandage v. Mfg. Co., 142 Ind. 148, 41 N. E. 380, 34 L. R. A. 363, 51 Am. St. Rep. 165; Miller v. Gittings, 85 Md. 601, 37 Atl. 372, 37 L. R. A. 654, 60 Am. St. Rep. 352; and to a case in which insolvency proceedings were pending and a creditor sought to prosecute attachment proceedings in another state; Hazen v. Bank, 70 Vt. 543, 41 Atl. 1046, 67 Am. St. Rep. 680; and where a party had accepted a legacy under a will and threatened proceedings in another state attacking the will; Rader v. Stubblefield, 43 Wash. 334, 86 Pac. 560, 10 Ann. Cas. 20; or where a party had recognized the validity of an assessment for creditors and was about to seek a preference over other creditors by proceedings in another state; Kendall v. Coke Co., 182 Pa. 1, 37 Atl. 823, 61 Am. St. Rep. 688; also where the foreign suit involved the same cause of action and was intended to reach practically the same result; Webster v. Ins. Co., 62 Misc. 345, 115 N. Y. Supp. 892; United Cigarette Mach. Co. v. Wright, 156 Fed. 244. Where the court could not enforce its decree, no injunction will be granted; Hawley v. Bank, 134 Ill. App. 96; American School-Furniture Co. v. J. M. Sauder Co., 106 Fed. 731. See a full note in 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267; and see Kessler v. Eldred, 206 U. S. 285, 27 Sup. Ct. 611, 51 L. Ed. 1065.

Where equity has issued a writ of ne exeat, it may enjoin a suit in another state for false imprisonment under the writ; Gooding v. Reid, Murdock & Co., 177 Fed. 684, 101 C. C. A. 310.

In the Judicial Code of March 3, 1911, 36 Stat. 1087, it is provided in section 264 that injunctions may be granted by any justice of the supreme court or any judge of a district court in cases in which they might be granted by such courts respectively. But applications for an injunction or restraining order in a cause pending in the circuit to which he is allotted shall not be heard by a justice of the supreme court elsewhere than within such circuit unless it is otherwise stipulated in writing by the parties. Section 265 provides that no injunction shall be granted by any federal court to stay proceedings in any state court except in cases where it is authorized in bankruptcy proceedings; and (by section 266) no interlocutory injunction suspending or restraining the enforcement of a state law, by restraining the action of a state officer in its enforcement, shall be granted upon the ground of the unconstitutionality of such statute, except upon application presented to a justice of the supreme court or to a circuit or district judge and it must be heard and determined by three judges of whom at least one shall be a supreme court or circuit judge; and an appeal may be taken from the order made in such case direct to the supreme court. Section 263 authorizes the granting of a restraining order upon notice of motion for an injunction where there appears to be danger of irreparable injury by reason of delay.

The equity rules (No. 73, 33 Sup. Ct. xxxix) provide that no preliminary injunction shall be granted without notice, nor shall any temporary restraining order unless it clearly appears that immediate and irreparable loss or damage will result before the matter can be heard on notice in which case a temporary restraining order may be granted without notice, but there must be a hearing in not more than ten days with precedence of all other matters not of the same character. The opposite party may move to dissolve the temporary restraining order on two days notice and the matter shall be heard as expeditiously as possible. Rule 74 provides that on appeal from a final decree granting or dissolving an injunction, the justice or judge allowing the same may suspend, modify or restore the injunction during the pendency of the appeal upon such terms as he may consider proper; and an injunction, when granted, independent of a statute, will usually not be modified or dissolved except by the judge who granted it; Klein v. Fleetford, 35 Fed. 98. It is provided in section 36 of the Judicial Code that all injunctions in a state court in cases afterwards removed to a federal court, remain in full force until dissolved or modified.

As to injunctions in particular cases, see the title of the particular subject to which the remedy is to be applied; and as to injunctions against enforcing an illegal contract, see full note in 48 L. R. A. 842.

INJURIA ABSQUE DAMNO (Lat.). Wrong without damage. Wrong done without damage or loss will not sustain an action. The following cases illustrate this principle: 1 Ld. Raym. 940, 948; 2 B. & P. 86; 5 Co. 72; 9 id. 113; Bull. N. P. 120.

INJURIOUS WORDS. In Louisiana. Slander, or libellous words.

INJURY (Lat. in, negative, jus, a right). A wrong or tort; cited in Woodruff v. Min. Co., 18 Fed. 753, 781.

Any legal wrong which will give a cause of action to the one whose rights, person or property are injured thereby. Penn. R. Co. v. Merchant, 119 Pa. 561, 13 Atl. 690, 4 Am. St. Rep. 659 (as used in Pa. Constitution).

Absolute injuries are injuries to those rights which a person possesses as being a member of society.

Private injuries are infringements of the private or civil rights belonging to individuals considered as individuals.

Public injuries are breaches and violations of rights and duties which affect the whole community as a community.

Injuries to personal property are the unlawful taking and detention thereof from the owner; and other injuries are some damage affecting the same while in the claimant's possession or that of a third person, or injuries to his reversionary interests.

Injuries to real property are ousters, trespasses, nuisances, waste, subtraction of rent, disturbances of right of way, and the like.

Relative injuries are injuries to those rights which a person possesses in relation to the person who is immediately affected by the wrongful act done.

It is obvious that the divisions overlap each other, and that the same act may be, for example, a relative, a private, and a public injury at once. For many injuries of this character the offender may be obliged to suffer punishment for the public wrong and to recompense the sufferer for the particular loss which he has sustained. The distinction is more commonly marked by the use of the terms civil injuries to denote private injuries, and of crimes, misdemeanors, etc., to denote the public injury done: though not always; as, for example, in case of a public nuisance which may be also a private nuisance.

Injuries arise in three ways: first, by nonfeasance, or the not doing what was a legal obligation, or duty, or contract, to perform; second, misfeasance, or the performance in an improper manner of an act which it was either the party's duty or his contract to perform; third, malfeasance, or the unjust performance of some act which the party had no right or which he had contracted not to do.

The remedies are different as the injury affects private individuals or the public.

When the injuries affect a private right and a private individual, although often also affecting the public, there are three descriptions of remedies; first, the preventive, such as defence, resistance, recaption, abatement of nuisance, surety of the peace, injunction, etc.; second, remedies for compensation, which may be by arbitration, suit, action, or summary proceedings before a justice of the peace; third, proceedings for punishment, as by indictment, or summary proceedings before a justice. When the injury is such as to affect the public, it becomes a crime, misdemeanor, or offence, and the party may be punished by indictment, or summary conviction for the public injury, and by civil action at the suit of the party for the private wrong. But in cases of felony the remedy by action for the private injury is generally suspended until the party particularly injured has fulfilled his duty to the public by prosecuting the offender for the public crime; and in cases of homicide the remedy is merged in the felony; 1 Chitty, Pr. 10; Ayliffe, Pand. 592.

There are many injuries for which the law affords no remedy. In general, it interferes only when there has been a visible physical injury inflicted, while it leaves almost totally unprotected the whole class of the most malignant mental injuries and sufferings, unless in a few cases where, by a fiction, it supposes some pecuniary loss, and sometimes affords compensation to wounded feelings. A parent, for example, cannot sue, in that character, for an injury inflicted on his child, and when his own domestic happiness has been destroyed, unless the fact will sustain the allegation that the daughter was the servant of her father, and that by reason of such seduction he lost the benefit of her services; but the proof of loss of service has reference only to the form of the remedy. And when the action is sustained in point of form, damages may be given not only for the loss of service, but also for all that the plaintiff can feel from the nature of the injury; Phelin v. Kenderdine, 20 Pa. 354; Lavery v. Crooke, 52 Wis. 612, 9 N. W. 599, 38 Am. Rep. 768. Another instance may be mentioned. A party cannot recover damages for verbal slander in many cases: as, when the facts published are true; for the defendant would justify, and the party injured must fail. Nor will the law punish criminally the author of verbal slander imputing even the most infamous crimes, unless done with intent to extort a chattel, money, or valuable thing. The law presumes, perhaps unnaturally enough, that a man is incapable of being alarmed or affected by such injuries to his feelings. See 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 591.

The true and sufficient reason for these rules would seem to be the uncertain character of the injury inflicted, the impossibility of compensation, and the danger, supposing a pecuniary compensation to be attempted, that injustice would be done under the excitement of the case. The sound principle, as the experience of the law amply indicates, is to inflict a punishment for crime, but not put up for sale, by the agency of a court of justice, those wounded feelings which would constitute the ground of the action.

The rule as indicated above has its limitations, however, in particular cases; Wyman v. Leavitt, 71 Me. 227, 36 Am. Rep. 303. Thus, it has been held that, when bodily pain is caused, mental pain follows necessarily, and the sufferer is entitled to damages for the mental pain as well as for the bodily; Lawrence v. R. Co., 29 Conn. 390; Fairchild v. Stage Co., 13 Cal. 599; Pennsylvania & O. Canal Co. v. Graham, 63 Pa. 290, 3 Am. Rep. 549; Ford v. Jones, 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 484; but damages for the mental suffering of one person, on account of physical injury to another, are too remote to be given by court or jury; 2 C. & P. 292.

There is a material distinction between damages and injury. Injury is the wrongful act or tort which causes loss or harm to another. Damages are allowed as an indemnity to the person who suffers loss or harm from the injury. The word injury denotes the illegal act, the term damages means the sum recoverable as amends for the wrong; City of North Vernon v. Voegler, 103 Ind. 319, 2 N. E. 821.

In Civil Law. A delict committed in contempt or outrage of any one, whereby his body, his dignity, or his reputation is maliciously injured. Voet, Com. ad Pand. 47, t. 10, n. 1.

A real injury is inflicted by any act by which a person's honor or dignity is affected: as, striking one with a cane, or even aiming a blow without striking; spitting in one's face; assuming a coat of arms, or any other mark of distinction proper to another, etc. The composing and publishing defamatory libels may be reckoned of this kind; Erskine, Pr. 4. 4. 45.

A verbal injury, when directed against a private person, consists in the uttering contumelious words, which tend to injure his reputation by making him little or ridiculous. Where the offensive words are uttered in the heat of a dispute and spoken to the person's face, the law does not presume any malicious intention in the utterer, whose resentment generally subsides with his passion; and yet even in that case the truth of the injurious words seldom absolves entirely from punishment. Where the injurious expressions have a tendency to blacken one's moral reputation or fix some particular guilt upon him, and are deliberately repeated in different companies, or handed about in whispers to confidants, the crime then becomes slander, agreeably to the distinction of the Roman law; Dig. 15, § 12 de Injur.

INLAGARE, INLEGIARE. To restore to protection of law. Opposed to utlagare. Bract. lib. 3, tr. 2, c. 14, § 1.; Du Cange.

INLAGATION. Restoration to the protection of law.

INLAGH. A man who is under the protection of the law, and not outlawed. Cowell.

INLAND. Within the same country. The demesne reserved for the use of the lord. Cowell. Inland, or domestic, navigation is that carried on in the interior of the country, and does not include that upon the great lakes; Moore v. Transp. Co., 24 How. (U. S.) 1, 16 L. Ed. 674; The Cotton Plant, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 577, 19 L. Ed. 983. As to what are inland bills of exchange, see BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

INMATE. One who dwells in a part of another's house, the latter dwelling at the same time in the said house. Kitch. 45 b; Com. Dig. Justices of the Peace (B 85); 1 B. & C. 578; 2 M. & R. 227; 2 Russ. Cr. 937; 1 M. & G. 83; Johnson v. Santa Clara County, 28 Cal. 545. See LODGER.

INN. A house where a traveller is furnished with everything he has occasion for while on his way. Bac. Abr. Inns (B); 3 B. & Ald. 283; Kisten v. Hildebrand, 9 B. Monr. (Ky.) 72, 48 Am. Dec. 416. A public house of entertainment for all who choose to visit it. Wintermute v. Clarke, 5 Sandf. (N. Y.) 247; Fay v. Imp. Co., 93 Cal. 253, 26 Pac. 1099, 28 Pac. 943, 16 L. R. A. 188, 27 Am. St. Rep. 198; Foster v. State, 84 Ala. 451, 4 South. 833. A coffee-house or a mere eating-house is not an inn. To constitute an inn there must be some provision for the essential needs of a traveller upon his journey, namely, lodging as well as food; 13 Rep. 299, citing People v. Jones, 54 Barb. (N. Y.) 316. See INNKEEPER.

INNAVIGABLE. A term applied in foreign insurance law to a vessel not navigable, through irremediable misfortune by a peril of the sea. The ship is relatively innavigable when it will require almost as much time and expense to repair her as to build a new one. Targa, 238, 256; Emerigon, to. 1, 577, 591; 3 Kent 323, n.

INNER BARRISTER. See BARRISTER.

INNER TEMPLE. See INNS OF COURT.

INNINGS. Lands gained from the sea by draining. Cunningham, Law Dict.; Callis, Sewers 38.

INNKEEPER. The keeper of a common inn for the lodging and entertainment of travellers and passengers, their horses and attendants, for a reasonable compensation. Bac. Abr. Inns, etc.; Story, Bailm. § 475. Any one who makes it his business to entertain travellers and passengers, and provide lodging and necessaries for them, their horses and attendants, is an innkeeper. Edw. Bailm. § 450; even though the house is situated on enclosed grounds; Fay v. Imp. Co., 93 Cal. 253, 26 Pac. 1099, 28 Pac. 943, 16 L. R. A. 188, 27 Am. St. Rep. 198. But one who entertains strangers occasionally, although he may receive compensation for it, is not an innkeeper; State v. Matthews, 19 N. C. 424; Bonner v. Welborn, 7 Ga. 296; 1 Morr. 184. See GUEST; BOARDER. It is not necessary that he should furnish accommodations for horses and carriages; 3 B. & Ald. 283; the keeper of a tavern; id.; and of a hotel; 2 Chitty 484; is an innkeeper. So is one who keeps a hotel on what is called the European plan, furnishing lodging to guests, and keeping an eating-house where they may purchase meals at their option; Krohn v. Sweeney, 2 Daly (N. Y.) 200. But the keeper of a mere restaurant is not an innkeeper if he only furnishes meals to his guests; Carpenter v. Taylor, 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 193. Nor is the keeper of a coffee-house, nor of a boarding house, nor lodging-house; 8 Co. 32; 2 E. & B. 144; Hall v. Pike, 100 Mass. 495; Jalie v. Cardinal, 35 Wis. 118. One who receives lodgers and boards them under a special contract for a limited time, or who lets rooms to guests by the day or week, and does not furnish them entertainment, is not an innkeeper; Cromwell v. Stephens, 2 Daly (N. Y.) 15. See Moore v. Development Co., 87 Cal. 483, 26 Pac. 92, 22 Am. St. Rep. 265. Where the plaintiff attended a ball given by an innkeeper, stabled his horse at the inn, drank and paid for liquors, and paid for his ticket of admission to the ball, it was held that the relationship of innkeeper and guest did not exist; Fitch v. Casler, 17 Hun (N. Y.) 126. Where one boarded with his family at a hotel in New York, paying a specified amount for his rooms, and an additional amount for board if he took his meals regularly, and if not, paying for whatever he ordered at the restaurant attached to the hotel, it was held that the innkeeper was liable for personal property stolen from the plaintiff's room; Hancock v. Rand, 17 Hun (N. Y.) 279 (criticized in 20 Alb. L. J. 64, citing many cases); and see Lusk v. Belote, 22 Minn. 468. Where one merely leaves his horse with an innkeeper, the relation of innkeeper and guest does not exist; Healey v. Gray, 68 Me. 489, 28 Am. Rep. 80; so where he leaves goods at the inn without indicating any intention to become a guest; Toub v. Schmidt, 60 Hun 409, 15 N. Y. Supp. 616; so when a guest paid his bill and left the inn, having deposited money with a clerk, to be kept till his return; Whitemore v. Haroldson, 2 Lea (Tenn.) 312. It terminates when the guest delivers his baggage to a porter to be checked for safe keeping, the porter having no authority to receive it, and pays his bill, and in his absence the baggage is stolen; Glenn v. Jackson, 93 Ala. 342, 9 South. 259, 12 L. R. A. 382.

The business of an innkeeper at common law is of a quasi public character invested with many privileges and burdened with many responsibilities; De Wolf v. Ford, 193 N. Y. 397, 86 N. E. 527, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 860, 127 Am. St. Rep. 969. They are not insurers of the safety of their guests. They are bound only to reasonable care. They are not liable for acts of their servants beyond the scope of their employment; Clancy v. Barker, 131 Fed. 161, 66 C. C. A. 469, 69 L. R. A. 653 (citing 47 L. J. C. P. 598; Weeks v. McNulty, 101 Tenn. 499, 48 S. W. 809, 43 L. R. A. 185, 70 Am. St. Rep. 693; Sheffer v. Willoughby, 163 Ill. 518, 45 N. E. 253, 34 L. R. A. 464, 54 Am. St. Rep. 483; Stanley v. Bircher's Ex'r, 78 Mo. 245, 248; Curtis v. Dinneen, 4 Dak. 245, 30 N. W. 148), Thayer, C. J., dissented upon the ground that the relation of an innkeeper to his guest is practically like that of a common carrier to a passenger, citing Clancy v. Barker, 71 Neb. 83, 98 N. W. 440, 103 N. W. 446, 69 L. R. A. 642, 115 Am. St. Rep. 559, 8 Ann. Cas. 682. He must protect a guest against third persons; a fortiori, he must protect him from injuries from his servants, and since the servants are provided, among other things for the purpose of protecting guests, every injury inflicted upon the guest by the servant, either intentionally or negligently, is a breach of his duty of protection and renders the innkeeper liable to the guest; Clancy v. Barker, 71 Neb. 83, 98 N. W. 440, 103 N. W. 446, 69 L. R. A. 642, 115 Am. St. Rep. 559, 8 Ann. Cas. 682; Curran v. Olson, 88 Minn. 307, 92 N. W. 1124, 60 L. R. A. 733, 97 Am. St. Rep. 517; contra, Rahmel v. Lehndorff, 142 Cal. 681, 76 Pac. 659, 65 L. R. A. 88, 100 Am. St. Rep. 554. In Rommel v. Schambacher, 120 Pa. 579, 11 Atl. 779, 6 Am. St. Rep. 732, the same rule was applied where the assault (a practical joke) was by the plaintiff's drunken companion in a saloon, but in full view of the defendant. He is bound to take in and receive all travellers and wayfaring persons, and to entertain them, if he can accommodate them, for a reasonable compensation; Wand. Inns, 46; 3 B. & Ald. 285; 4 Exch. 367. See Willis v. McMahan, 89 Cal. 156, 26 Pac. 649. For a refusal to do so he is liable civilly and criminally; 7 C. & P. 213. While he must accept all proper persons if he has room, he need not assign a guest to any particular apartment; but a room once assigned to a guest is his until he gives it up, subject to the right of access of the innkeeper at all reasonable times and for all reasonable purposes; De Wolf v. Ford, 193 N. Y. 397, 86 N. E. 527, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 860, 127 Am. St. Rep. 969. If all rooms are full he need not receive guests; [1902] 1 K. B. 696.

It is no defence that the traveller did not tender the price of his entertainment, or that the guest was travelling on Sunday, or that the innkeeper had gone to bed, or that the guest refused to tell his name, otherwise if the guest was drunk, or was behaving in an improper manner; Com. v. Naylor, 34 Pa. 86; 7 C. & P. 213. He may enforce reasonable rules to prevent immorality, drunkenness or other offensive conduct, inconsistent with the proprieties of life; De Wolf v. Ford, 193 N. Y. 397, 86 N. E. 527, 127 Am. St. Rep. 969, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 860. The innkeeper may demand prepayment; 9 Co. 87. He may not exclude persons from entering the inn and going into the public room on lawful business; Markham v. Brown, 8 N. H. 523, 31 Am. Dec. 209.

He must guard their goods with proper diligence. It has been held that he is liable only for the goods which are brought within the inn; 8 Co. 32; Scheffer v. Corson, 5 S. D. 233, 58 N. W. 555. A delivery of the goods into the personal custody of the innkeeper is not, however, necessary in order to make him responsible; for, although he may not know anything of such goods, he is bound to pay for them if they are stolen or carried away, even by an unknown person; Dig. 4, 9, 1; 3 B. & Ald. 283; 1 Sm. L. C. 47; Washburn v. Jones, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 193; 8 Co. 32; Fay v. Imp. Co., 93 Cal. 253, 26 Pac. 1099, 28 Pac. 943, 16 L. R. A. 188, 27 Am. St. Rep. 198; Bowell v. De Wald, 2 Ind. App. 303, 28 N. E. 430, 50 Am. St. Rep. 240; Labold v. Hotel Co., 54 Mo. App. 567; Quinton v. Courtney, 2 N. C. 41; Houser v. Tully, 62 Pa. 92, 1 Am. Rep. 390. Thus, when a guest's luggage was, at his suggestion, taken to the commercial room, 8 B. & C. 9; and when a lady's reticule with money in it was left for a few minutes on a bed in her room; 2 B. & Ad. 803; the innkeeper was held liable; and if he receive the guest, the custody of the goods may be considered as an accessory to the principal contract, and the money paid for the apartments as extending to the care of the box and portmanteau; Jones, Bailm. 94; 1 Bla. Com. 430; 2 Kent 458. The particular responsibility of an innkeeper does not extend to goods lost or stolen from a room occupied by a guest for a purpose of business distinct from his accommodation as guest, such as the exhibition of samples of merchandise; Fisher v. Kelsey, 121 U. S. 383, 13 Sup. Ct. 929, 30 L. Ed. 930. The liability of an innkeeper is the same in character and extent with that of a common carrier; Berkshire Woollen Co. v. Proctor, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 417; Manning v. Wells, 9 Humphr. (Tenn.) 746, 51 Am. Dec. 688; Mateer v. Brown, 1 Cal. 221, 52 Am. Dec. 303; 8 B. & C. 9; Norcross v. Norcross, 53 Me. 163; Thickstun v. Howard, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 535.

He is an insurer of a guests's goods; De Wolf v. Ford, 193 N. Y. 397, 86 N. E. 527, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 860, 127 Am. St. Rep. 969; he owes the duty of safely keeping the property of his guests; Rockhill v. Hotel Co., 237 Ill. 98, 86 N. E. 740, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 576. Even where the plaintiff's horse and wagon containing goods of value were destroyed in the night by fire, the cause of which was unknown it was held that the innkeeper was liable; Hulett v. Swift, 33 N. Y. 571, 88 Am. Dec. 405; contra, Cutler v. Bonney, 30 Mich. 259, 18 Am. Rep. 127, n. See 6 L. R. A. 483, n. It is held that he is prima facie liable for the loss of goods; Rockhill v. Hotel Co., 237 Ill. 98, 86 N. E. 740, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 576; Watt v. Kilbury, 53 Wash. 446, 102 Pac. 403.

His liability does not cease as soon as the guest has paid his bill and left; the guest has a reasonable time to remove his baggage; Kaplan v. Titus, 64 Misc. 81, 117 N. Y. Supp. 944. An innkeeper is liable for a valise delivered to the hotel porter at leaving; Rockhill v. Hotel Co., 237 Ill. 98, 86 N. E. 740, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 576. He is liable for baggage entrusted by a guest to a hotel porter sent to a railroad station to solicit guests; Coskery v. Nagle, 83 Ga. 696, 10 S. E. 491, 6 L. R. A. 483, 20 Am. St. Rep. 333; but not if he changes his mind and does not go to the hotel; Tulane Hotel Co. v. Holohan, 112 Tenn. 214, 79 S. W. 113, 105 Am. St. Rep. 930, 2 Ann. Cas. 345; or merely goes there, receives a telegram and leaves without registering; L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 27.

He is responsible for the acts of his domestics and servants, as well as for the acts of his other guests, if the goods are stolen or lost; Berkshire Woollen Co. v. Proctor, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 417; McDonald v. Edgerton, 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 560; Labold v. Hotel Co., 54 Mo. App. 567; but he is not responsible for any tort or injury done by his servants or others to the person of his guest, without his own co-operation or consent; 8 Co. 32. But it has been held that he is liable to a female guest for a servant's unjustifiable acts in the course of his employment in forcing his way into her room while she was in scant attire, accusing her of immoral conduct and ordering her to leave the hotel; De Wolf v. Ford, 193 N. Y. 397, 86 N. E. 527, 127 Am. St. Rep. 969, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 860; he must exercise reasonable care that neither he nor his servants shall by uncivil, harsh, or cruel treatment, destroy the comfort or peace of the guest; id.

The innkeeper will be excused whenever the loss has occurred through the fault of the guest, the act of God, or of the public enemy; 4 M. & S. 306; Hadley v. Upshaw, 27 Tex. 547, 86 Am. Dec. 654; Elcox v. Hill, 98 U. S. 218, 25 L. Ed. 103. An omission on the part of the guest to lock his door will not necessarily prevent his recovery; 6 H. & N. 265; Classen v. Leopold, 2 Sweeny (N. Y.) 705. Where a guest was given a room temporarily and in his absence his baggage was placed in the hall, the innkeeper was held liable for its loss; [1891] 2 Q. B. 11. When the guest misleads the innkeeper as to the value of a package and thus throws him off his guard, it has been held that he cannot recover; Edw. Bailm. § 466. See Bendetson v. French, 46 N. Y. 266. The failure of a guest to inform an innkeeper that his valise placed in the cloak or baggage room, contains valuables, is not negligence; Bowell v. De Wald, 2 Ind. App. 303, 28 N. E. 430, 50 Am. St. Rep. 240; guest may retain personal custody of necessary wearing apparel and jewelry worn daily, for which the innkeeper becomes liable; Fay v. Imp. Co., 93 Cal. 253, 26 Pac. 1099, 28 Pac. 943, 16 L. R. A. 188, 27 Am. St. Rep. 198; a guest may recover for the loss of goods brought into the inn in the usual manner; Epps v. Hinds, 27 Miss. 657, 61 Am. Dec. 528; Sasseen v. Clark, 37 Ga. 242.

An innkeeper may make reasonable regulations as to the manner in which he will receive and keep goods; Orange County Bank v. Brown, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 85, 114, 24 Am. Dec. 129. He must furnish reasonable accommodations. See 8 M. & W. 269. When the proprietor of a hotel employs a servant to receive and keep the property of guests while at meals, his liability for the default of this servant in the custody of property so received is not affected by the fact that he has also provided a check-room for the safekeeping of such property; Labold v. Hotel Co., 54 Mo. App. 567.

The innkeeper is entitled to a just compensation for his care and trouble in taking care of his guest and his property; and, to enable him to obtain this, the law invests him with some peculiar privileges, giving him a lien upon the goods brought into the inn by the guest, and, it has been said, upon the person of his guest (contra, 3 M. & W. 248), for his compensation; 3 B. & Ald. 287; see Mowers v. Fethers, 61 N. Y. 34, 19 Am. Rep. 244; Dunlap v. Thorne, 1 Rich. (S. C.) 213; McDaniels v. Robinson, 26 Vt. 335, 62 Am. Dec. 574; 3 M. & W. 248; Cook v. Kane, 13 Or. 482, 11 Pac. 226, 57 Am. Rep. 28; and this though the goods belong to a third person, if the innkeeper was ignorant of the fact; Schoul., Bailm. 326; 12 Q. B. 197; Young v. Kimball, 23 Pa. 193; Fox v. McGregor, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 41; Covington v. Newberger, 99 N. C. 523, 6 S. E. 205; Manning v. Hollenbeck, 27 Wis. 202; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Miller, 52 Minn. 516, 55 N. W. 56, 21 L. R. A. 229, 38 Am. St. Rep. 568; a lien was also held to attach upon the goods of the wife; 25 Q. B. Div. 491. Sewing machines were sent by his principal to a commercial traveller while he was at an inn, to be used in the course of business for sale to customers in the neighborhood. The innkeeper had express notice that they were the property of the employer but he received them as the baggage of the traveller, who left the inn without paying his bill; held that the innkeeper had a lien on the goods for the amount of the bill; [1895] 2 Q. B. 501. The court below considered that the question of knowledge was immaterial, because "the goods in question were of a kind which a commercial traveller would in the ordinary course carry about with him to the inns at which he put up as part of the regular apparatus of his calling, and which the innkeeper would consequently be bound to receive into his inn and to take care of while they were there."

At common law this lien could be enforced only by legal proceedings, and not by a sale; Fox v. McGregor, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 41; Edw. Bailm. § 476. This has been changed in New York by statute. As to detaining the horse of a guest, see Peet v. McGraw, 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 654; Mason v. Thompson, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 280, 20 Am. Dec. 471. The landlord may also bring an action for the recovery of his compensation. Where an innkeeper owes his guest for labor more than the guest owes for board, he has no lien; Hanlin v. Walters, 3 Colo. App. 519, 34 Pac. 686. An innkeeper's lien does not attach to goods in possession of one who is received as a boarder, and not as a guest or traveller; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Miller, 52 Minn. 516, 55 N. W. 56, 21 L. R. A. 229, 38 Am. St. Rep. 568.

An innkeeper in a town through which lines of stages pass has no right to exclude the driver of one of these lines from his yard and the common public rooms where travellers are usually placed, who comes there at proper hours, and in a proper manner, to solicit passengers for his coach and without doing any injury to the innkeeper; Markham v. Brown, 8 N. H. 523, 31 Am. Dec. 209.

The common-law liability of innkeepers has been changed in England and in most of the states by statute which provides that the innkeeper shall not be liable for money, etc., if he provides a safe for safe-keeping, and duly notifies his guests thereof. If due notice is not given, the common-law liability remains; Holstein v. Phillips, 146 N. C. 366, 59 S. E. 1037, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 475, 14 Ann. Cas. 323; L. R. 2 Ex. Div. 463. If, under the statute, the guest delivers the articles to the innkeeper, the latter's liability is not affected by the statute.

Where a trunk filled with goods for sale was left by an expressman on the sidewalk in the usual place in front of the inn and the expressman's check was given to the clerk, the innkeeper was held not liable; Becker v. Haynes, 29 Fed. 441; so of a stock of jewelry left with an attendant in the coat room; Elcox v. Hill, 98 U. S. 218, 25 L. Ed. 103; and of a package containing a gold locket of the value of $221 handed to the clerk without any information as to its contents; Horton v. Arcade Co., 114 Mo. App. 357, 89 S. W. 363.

Under the New York statute an innkeeper was held not liable for $50 stolen from under the guest's pillow while asleep; but was liable for a valuable watch; Ramaley v. Leland, 43 N. Y. 539, 3 Am. Rep. 728; see also Becker v. Warner, 90 Hun 187, 35 N. Y. Supp. 739; and for a gold watch and silver forks and a silver soup ladle stolen from a guest's trunk; Briggs v. Todd, 28 Misc. 208, 59 N. Y. Supp. 23. But in Rains v. Maxwell House Co., 112 Tenn. 219, 79 S. W. 114, 64 L. R. A. 470, 2 Ann. Cas. 488, the statute was held to apply to a watch. Money necessary for travelling expenses ($90) and a watch were held not within the statute; Maltby v. Chapman, 25 Md. 310. If the innkeeper is shown to have been negligent he is liable to the full value of the goods; [1891] 2 Q. B. 11; otherwise under the English statute, only for their value up to £30.

The act does not apply where a guest had packed her goods to leave the hotel and delivered them to the hotel porter sent to receive them; Rockhill v. Hotel Co., 237 Ill. 98, 86 N. E. 740, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 576; nor where the loss of goods is due to the negligence of the innkeeper's servant; id.

It has been held that a hotelkeeper, in whose safe a boarder deposits money for safe-keeping, is no more than a bailee, and when the money is stolen from the safe by his night clerk, is not liable therefor, in the absence of proof of want of ordinary care in employing him; Taylor v. Downey, 104 Mich. 532, 62 N. W. 716, 29 L. R. A. 92, 53 Am. St. Rep. 472. See Beale, Innkeepers.

INNOCENCE. The absence of guilt. See PRESUMPTION.

An act authorizing one alleging that he had been unjustly convicted of crime to present a claim for damages to the state board of claims was passed in New York in 1905. See Roberts v. State, 160 N. Y. 217, 54 N. E. 678.

Provisions for the compensation of innocent persons who have been imprisoned exist in many European states, including Germany, Hungary, Austria, France, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Portugal and Spain and in Mexico. See 3 Journ. Cr. L. & Criminology 684.

INNOCENT AGENT. One who does the forbidden thing, moved thereto by another person, yet incurs no legal guilt, because either not endowed with sufficient mental capacity or not acquainted with the necessary facts. Bish. Cr. L. § 310; Smith v. State, 21 Tex. App. 107, 17 S. W. 552.

INNOCENT CONVEYANCES. In English Law. A technical term used to signify those conveyances made by a tenant of his leasehold which do not occasion a forfeiture: these are conveyances by lease and release, bargain and sale, and a covenant to stand seised by a tenant for life. 1 Chitty, Pr. 243.

INNOMINATE CONTRACTS. In Civil Law. Contracts which have no particular names, as permutation and transaction. Inst. 2. 10. 13. There are many innominate contracts; but the Roman lawyers reduced them to four classes, namely, do ut des, do ut facias, facio ut des, and facio ut facias. Dig. 2. 14. 7. 2.

INNONIA. In Old English Law. A close or inclosure (clausum inclausura). Spel. Gloss.

INNOTESCIMUS (Lat.). In English Law. An epithet used for letters patent, which are always of a charter of feoffment, or some other instrument not of record, concluding with the words Innotescimus per præsentes, etc. Tech. Dict.

INNOVATION. In Scotch Law. The exchange of one obligation for another, so that the second shall come in the place of the first. Bell, Dict. Also the earlier use for NOVATION.

INNOXIARE. To purge one of a fault and declare him innocent. Toml.

INNS OF CHANCERY. See INNS OF COURT.

INNS OF COURT. Voluntary noncorporate legal societies seated in London having their origin about the end of the 13th and the beginning of the 14th century. Encyc. Brit. They consist of the Inns of Court and Chancery.

The four principal Inns of Court are the Inner Temple, Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn.

To each of the four Inns of Court certain Inns of Chancery were attached. To the Inner Temple, Clifford's Inn, Lyon's Inn and Clements' Inn; to the Middle Temple, the Strand Inn, New Inn and a third of which the name even is forgotten; to Lincoln's Inn, Thavie's Inn (Thavy) and Furnival's Inn; and to Gray's Inn, Staple Inn and Barnard's Inn. In these dwelt the clerks of the chancery who prepared the original writs issuing out of chancery, and also the younger apprentices who acquired some elementary knowledge of civil procedure by copying those writs. Many students entered an Inn of Chancery and passed from there to an Inn of Court. In Hale's time this custom had become obsolete. These Inns of Chancery gradually fell into the hands of solicitors and now have ceased to exist. See [1902] 1 Ch. 774; Odg. C. L. 1424. See 17 L. Q. R. 7, citing [1902] 2 Ch. 511.

There were formerly two (if not three) Serjeant's Inns, whose membership was confined to the Serjeants and Judges of the Superior Courts of Westminster. They no longer exist. See SERJEANTS-AT-LAW.

Of the origin of the Inns of Court Inderwick says: "The fixture of a certain court for the trial of civil causes in London also encouraged the calling or profession of advocacy, and led to the institution of the Inns of Court, where students of the law could congregate as at a University, hear lectures on the Roman law and the laws of their country, and prepare themselves for their future duties." King's Peace 91. Each inn is self-governing, and quite distinct from all others, all, however, possessing equal privileges; but latterly they have joined in imposing certain educational tests for the admission of students. It is entirely in the discretion of an inn of court to admit any particular person as a member. One who desires to enter must have passed an examination at some University in the British Dominion, approved by the Council of Legal Education, or some other examination required by the Consolidated Regulations of the four Inns.

No person can be called to the bar, and therefore no person can become a judge, unless he is a member of an Inn of Court. The Benchers of the four Inns are said to have the power to disbar barristers of their Inn; but see BARRISTER. As to the exercise of such power, see COUNCIL OF THE BAR. The Inns are not subject to the jurisdiction of the courts, but only to the control of the judges as visitors. See L. R. 18 Eq. 127.

The Benchers and Readers of the Inns were those who have publicly lectured in their Inn. They governed their Inn, under a Treasurer or Pensioner. From the Readers, the Serjeants-at-Law were usually appointed. Below them came the Utter-Barristers. The remaining or junior members were Inner-Barristers. 2 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 423.

INNUENDO (Lat. innucre, to nod at, to hint at; meaning. The word was used when pleadings were in Latin, and has been translated by "meaning").

In Pleading. A clause in the declaration, indictment, or other pleading containing an averment which is explanatory of some preceding word or statement.

An averment of the meaning of alleged libellous words. Collins v. Pub. Co., 152 Pa. 187, 25 Atl. 546, 34 Am. St. Rep. 636. The defamatory meaning which the plaintiff sets on words complained of, in an action for libel; its office is to show how they came to have that defamatory meaning and how they relate to him. Buckstaff v. Viall, 84 Wis. 129, 54 N. W. 111.

It derives its name from the leading word by which it was always introduced when pleadings were in Latin. It is mostly used in actions of slander, and is then said to be a subordinate averment, connecting particular parts of the publication with what has gone before, in order to elucidate the defendant's meaning more fully. 1 Stark. Sland. 431.

It is the office of an innuendo to define the defamatory meaning which the plaintiff sets on the words, to show how they come to have that meaning, and also to show how they relate to the plaintiff, whenever that is not clear on the face of them; Odg. Lib. & Sl. *100. See COLLOQUIUM. It may be used to point to the plaintiff as the person intended in the defendant's statement. It may show that a general imputation of crime is intended to apply to the plaintiff; Heard, Sland. § 226; 1 H. L. Cas. 637; Nestle v. Van Slyck, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 282; but it cannot be allowed to give a new sense to words where there is no such charge; 8 Q. B. 825. See Glatz v. Thein, 47 Minn. 278, 50 N. W. 127.

Where a defamatory meaning is apparent on the face of the libel itself, no innuendo is necessary, though often inserted; Sanford v. Rowley, 93 Mich. 119, 52 N. W. 1119; Republican Pub. Co. v. Miner, 3 Cal. App. 568, 34 Pac. 485; where the words prima facie are not actionable, an innuendo is essential to the action; Odg. Lib. & Sl. *99.

Its office is to deduce inferences from premises already stated, not to state the premises themselves. An innuendo is not an issuable averment. Facts extrinsic to the article and essential to the identification of the article with the person complaining cannot be embodied in an innuendo; Duvivier v. French, 104 Fed. 278, 43 C. C. A. 529, per Grosscup, C. J., citing McLaughlin v. Fisher, 136 Ill. 111, 24 N. E. 60.

It may point to the injurious and actionable meaning, where the words complained of are susceptible of two meanings; 8 Q. B. 841; and generally explain the preceding matter; 12 Ad. & E. 317; but cannot enlarge and point the effect of language beyond its natural and common meaning in its usual acceptation; Heard, Sland. § 219; Newell, Def. Sland. & L. 619, 620; 9 Ad. & E. 282; Commonwealth v. Snelling, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 335; Viedt v. Newspaper Co., 19 D. C. 534; unless connected with the proper introductory averments; 1 C. B. 728; Ryan v. Madden, 12 Vt. 51; Maxwell v. Allison, 11 S. & R. (Pa.) 343; Van Vechten v. Hopkins, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 211, 4 Am. Dec. 339. These introductory averments need not be in the same count; 2 Wils. 114; Bloss v. Tobey, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 329. Where the language of an alleged libel was ambiguous, the innuendoes averring the meaning plaintiff claimed should be attached to the words complained of, are proper; Barnard v. Pub. Co., 63 Hun 626, 17 N. Y. Supp. 573.

For the innuendo in case of an ironical libel, see 7 Dowl. 210; 4 M. & W. 446.

If not warranted by preceding allegations, it may be rejected as superfluous; Heard, Sland. § 225; but only where it is bad and useless,—not where it is good but unsupported by evidence, even though the words would be actionable without an innuendo; Newell, Def. Sland. & L. 629; 3 H. L. Cas. 395; 1 Ad. & E. 558; 4 B. & C. 655; Cro. Eliz. 609. See Turton v. New York Recorder, 3 Misc. 314, 22 N. Y. Supp. 766.

In the case of words not per se actionable, the innuendo must be pleaded and proved; Unterberger v. Scharff, 51 Mo. App. 102.

See LIBEL.

INOFFICIOSUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Inofficious; contrary to natural duty or affection. Used of a will of a parent which disinherited a child without just cause, or of that of a child which disinherited a parent, and which could be contested by querela inofficiosi testamenti; designated by Blackstone as remarkable on the ground "that the testator had lost the use of his reason;" 1 Com. 447; 2 id. 502; 2 Steph. Com. 589; Dig. 2. 5. 3, 13; Paulus, lib. 4, tit. 5, § 1. Even a brother or sister could set aside such a testament if the person actually instituted heir was turpis or infamous. The old writ de rationabili parte bonorum, in the English law, resembled in some respects the querela inofficiosi testamenti; but there is nothing which corresponds to it in the English law at the present day; Moz. & W.

INOFFICIOUS TESTAMENT. In Civil Law. A testament contrary to the natural duty of the parent, because it totally disinherited the child, without expressly giving the reason therefor. See preceding title.

INOFICIOCIDAD. In Spanish Law. Every thing done contrary to a duty or obligation assumed, as well as in opposition to the piety and affection dictated by nature: inofficiosum dicitur id omne quod contra pictatis officium factum est. The term applies especially to testaments, donations, dower, etc., which may be either revoked or reduced when they affect injuriously the rights of creditors or heirs.

INOPS CONSILII (Lat.). Destitute of or without counsel. In the construction of wills a greater latitude is sometimes given, because the testator is supposed to have been inops consilii.

INORDINATUS. An intestate.

INPENY and OUTPENY. Money which by the custom of some manors is paid by an incoming and an outgoing tenant. Spelm.; Holth.

INQUEST. A body of men appointed by law to inquire into certain matters: as, the inquest examined into the facts connected with the alleged murder. The grand jury is sometimes called the grand inquest.

The judicial inquiry itself by a jury summoned for the purpose, is called an inquest. The finding of such men, upon an investigation, is also called an inquest, or an inquisition.

The most familiar use of the word is to designate the inquiry by a coroner (q. v.) into the causes of death, whether sudden, violent, or in prison. To justify an inquest it is not necessary that a death should be both sudden and violent; either is sufficient; Lancaster County v. Dern, 2 Grant (Pa.) 262. The authority to hold an inquest extends to bodies brought into the county; People v. Fitzgerald, 105 N. Y. 146, 11 N. E. 378, 59

Am. Rep. 483; and when a person died in one county and was buried in another it was held that the inquest should be held by the coroner of the latter. After the verdict is returned the duty is completed and a second inquest cannot be held unless the first is quashed by a competent court; 3 El. & El. 137. No inquest can be held in any case except upon view of the body; this is jurisdictional and can be waived by no one; 3 B. & A. 260; if buried it may be exhumed, but must be reburied; 2 Hawk. P. C. 77. A post-mortem examination may be ordered; Allegheny County v. Watt, 3 Pa. 462; but it should not be made before the jury have viewed the body; 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 336; nor should it be in the presence of the jury, but they are to be instructed by the testimony of the physicians designated to make it; People v. Fitzgerald, 105 N. Y. 146, 11 N. E. 378, 59 Am. Rep. 483.

See DEAD BODY.

In holding an inquest the coroner acts judicially; Com. v. Hawkins, 3 Gray (Mass.) 463; People v. Devine, 44 Cal. 452; Boisliniere v. Board of County Com'rs, 32 Mo. 375. No person is entitled by reason of being suspected of causing the death, to be present, or to have counsel, or cross-examine the witnesses or produce others; 2 Hawk. P. C. 77; Crisfield v. Perine, 81 N. Y. 622, affirmed 15 Hun 200. The coroner may select and summon the jurors of inquest and fine any who are absent for non-attendance; Ex parte McAnnully, T. U. P. Charlt. (Ga.) 310; they must be sworn; 3 B. & A. 260; and this must appear in the certificate or be proved aliunde; People v. White, 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 167; they are the sole arbiters of the facts; but the coroner may instruct them in the law; id.; and compel the attendance of witnesses, for which purpose he has common-law powers; Com. v. Taylor, 11 Phila. (Pa.) 387.

After hearing the evidence the jury should retire to deliberate upon their verdict, without the presence of the coroner, and, when agreed upon, it should be put in writing and is final, and the inquisition should be signed by the coroner and jury; 6 C. & P. 179, 602; the jury may sign by marks; State v. Evans, 27 La. Ann. 297; and if several bear the same Christian and surname they need not be distinguished in the caption by abode or otherwise; 7 C. & P. 538.

The effect of the inquisition is to authorize the arrest and commitment of the person charged by it, and upon his arrest he may make his own statement and have it returned with the inquisition, but he cannot be discharged until his case is passed upon by the grand jury; People v. Collins, 20 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 111; except of course after hearing by a judge upon habeas corpus.

The testimony of a witness, not charged with crime, given at the inquest may be used against him, if afterwards accused; he must claim his privilege if he wishes to protect himself; Williams v. Com., 29 Pa. 102; Clough v. State, 7 Neb. 320; but if at the time of inquest he is in custody on suspicion, he cannot be examined as a mere witness, but only as an accused party in the same manner as if brought before a committing magistrate; People v. Mondon, 103 N. Y. 211, 8 N. E. 496, 57 Am. Rep. 709; the doctrine that silence gives consent does not apply to a coroner's inquest; People v. Willett, 92 N. Y. 29. These rules were settled by the New York court of appeals as the result of a series of cases; Hendrickson v. People, 10 N. Y. 13, 61 Am. Dec. 721; People v. McMahon, 15 N. Y. 384; Teachout v. People, 41 N. Y. 7; People v. Mondon, 103 N. Y. 211, 8 N. E. 496, 57 Am. Rep. 709; People v. McGloin, 91 N. Y. 241.

Where the accused testifies voluntarily at the coroner's inquest, his evidence may be used against him on his subsequent trial for murder; Reg. v. Wiggins, 10 Cox C. C. 562. But testimony given by persons suspected of crime cannot be regarded as voluntary, so as to be admissible upon a subsequent trial, if, because of the temper of the community, their refusal to answer questions would almost certainly have resulted in their immediate arrest; Tuttle v. People, 33 Colo. 243, 79 Pac. 1035, 70 L. R. A. 33, 3 Ann. Cas. 513. For admissibility, on a trial for murder of testimony of accused at coroner's inquest, see note 70 L. R. A. 33.

Preventing a coroner from holding an inquest over a dead body, when it is required by law, is indictable; 13 Q. B. D. 331. Where the captain of a man-of-war, mistaking his legal duty, had prevented the coroner from holding an inquest on the body of a man hanged on his ship, the court, granting an information, refused to proceed also against his boatswain, who had participated in the transaction under his order; Andr. 231; but, adds Bishop, "an information is in a measure discretionary with the court, and perhaps on an indictment the boatswain would have been deemed liable;" 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 688 (3).

In Massachusetts there is now no coroner, but an inquest is held in such cases by a justice of certain designated courts, after an examination by regular medical examiners and a report that the death was caused by violence, or without such report upon the direction of the prosecuting officer. See CORONER; CONFESSION; ADMISSION.

INQUEST OF OFFICE. An inquiry made by the king's officer, his sheriff, coroner, or escheator, either virtute officii, or by writ sent to him for that purpose, or by commissioners specially appointed, concerning any matter that entitles the king to the possession of lands or tenements, goods or chattels. It is done by a jury of no determinate number,—either twelve, or more, or less; 3 Bla. Com. 258; Finch, Law 323. An inquest of office was bound to find for the king upon the direction of the court. The reason given is that an inquest concluded no man of his right, but only gave the king an opportunity to enter, so that he could have his right tried; 3 Bla. Com. 260; 4 Steph. Com. 61; F. Moore 730; 3 Hen. VII. 10; 2 Hen. IV. 5. An inquest of office was also called, simply, "office."

INQUEST OF SHERIFFS. An inquest which directs a general inquiry as to the methods in which the sheriffs had been conducting the local government of the country (1170). 1 Holdsw. H. E. L. 21.

INQUIRY, WRIT OF. A writ sued out by a plaintiff in a case where the defendant has let the proceedings go by default, and an interlocutory judgment has been given for damages generally, where the damages do not admit of calculation. It issues to the sheriff of the county in which the venue is laid, and commands him to inquire, by a jury of twelve men, concerning the amount of damages. The sheriff thereupon tries the cause in his sheriff's court, and some amount must always be returned to the court. But the return of the inquest merely informs the court, which may, if it choose, in all cases assess damages and thereupon give final judgment. 2 Archb. Pr., Waterman ed. 952; 3 Bla. Com. 398; 3 Chitty, Stat. 495, 497.

INQUISITION. In Practice. An examination of certain facts by a jury impanelled by the sheriff for the purpose. The instrument of writing on which their decision is made is also called an inquisition. The sheriff or coroner, and the jury who make the inquisition, are called the inquest.

An inquisition on an untimely death, if omitted by the coroner, may in England be taken by justices of gaol delivery and oyer and terminer, or of the peace; but it must be done publicly and openly; otherwise it will be quashed. Inquisitions either of the coroner or of the other jurisdictions are traversable; 1 Burr. 18.

INQUISITOR. A designation of sheriffs, coroners super visum corporis, and the like, who have power to inquire into certain matters.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The name of an officer who is authorized to inquire into heresies, and the like, and to punish them. A judge.

INROLMENT, ENROLMENT (Law Lat. irrotulatio). The act of putting upon a roll.

Formerly, the record of a suit was kept on skins of parchment, which, best to preserve them, were kept upon a roll or in the form of a roll; what was written upon them was called the inrolment. After, when such records came to be kept in books, the making up of the record retained the old name of inrolment. Thus, in equity, the inrolment of a decree is the recording of it, and will prevent the rehearing of the cause, except on appeal or by bill of review. The decree may be enrolled immediately after it has been passed and entered, unless a caveat has been entered; 2 Freem. 179; Davoue v. Fanning, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 199. And before signing and inrolment, a decree cannot be pleaded in bar of a suit, though it can be insisted on by way of answer; 2 Ves. 577; Davoue v. Fanning, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 199. See Saunders, Ord. in Ch. Inrolment.

Transcribing upon the records of a court deeds, etc., according to the statutes on the subject. See 1 Chitty, Stat. 425, 426; 2 id. 69, 76–78; 3 id. 1497. Placing on file or record generally; as annuities, attorneys, etc.

INSANE PERSON. See INSANITY.

INSANITY. In Medical Jurisprudence. The prolonged departure, without any adequate cause, from the states of feeling and modes of thinking usual to the individual in health.

Insanity is such a deprivation of reason that the subject is no longer capable of understanding and acting with discretion in the ordinary affairs of life. Snyder v. Snyder, 142 Ill. 60, 31 N. E. 303.

Legal insanity, which exonerates from crime or incapacitates from civil action, is a mental deficiency with reference to the particular act in question and not a general incapacity. It is the latter only as the result of judicial ascertainment that a person is non compos mentis, by inquisition in lunacy, or similar statutory proceeding, and this only results in a general civil disability and not, proprio vigore, in immunity from punishment for crime.

It results that there can be no general definition of legal insanity. It is a state or condition which must be noted with reference to each class of actions to which it is applied.

In criminal law it "is any defect, weakness, or disease of the mind rendering it incapable of entertaining, or preventing its entertaining in the particular instance, the criminal intent which constitutes one of the elements in every crime." 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 381.

As a cause of civil incapacity it is such defect or weakness as prevents rational assent to a contract or due consideration of the facts properly and naturally entering into the testamentary disposition of one's estate. It is a want of due proportion in quality or quantity, or both,—between the mental capacity and power and the particular act, civil or criminal, as to which the inquiry arises.

The legal and the medical ideas of insanity are essentially different, and the difference is one of substance. The failure to keep it in mind has been the fruitful cause of confusion in trials involving the question of mental capacity for crime or contract, and has tended to render valueless and often absurd the testimony of witnesses called as experts. Many of these have testified without any conception of the real nature and definition of the insanity, which alone could have relation to the case.

The distinction between the medical and the legal idea of insanity has, perhaps, not been better stated than by Ray, who is quoted by Ordronaux, and again by Witthaus & Becker: "Insanity in medicine has to do with a prolonged departure of the individual from his natural mental state arising from bodily disease." "Insanity in law covers nothing more than the relation of the person and the particular act which is the subject of judicial investigation. The legal problem must resolve itself into the inquiry, whether there was mental capacity and moral freedom to do or abstain from doing the particular act." 1 Whitth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 181; U. S. v. Faulkner, 35 Fed. 730.

Of late years this word has been used to designate all mental impairments and deficiencies formerly embraced in the terms lunacy, idiocy, and unsoundness of mind. Even to the middle of the last century the law recognized only two classes of persons requiring its protection on the score of mental disorder, viz.: lunatics and idiots. The former were supposed to embrace all who had lost the reason which they once possessed and their disorder was called dementia accidentalis; the latter, those who had never possessed any reason, and this deficiency was called dementia naturalis. Lunatics were supposed to be much influenced by the moon; and another prevalent notion respecting them was that in a very large proportion there occurred lucid intervals, when reason shone out, for a while, from behind the cloud that obscured it, with its natural brightness. It may be remarked, in passing, that lucid intervals are far less common than they were once supposed to be, and that the restoration is not so complete as the descriptions of the older writers would lead us to infer. In modern practice, the term lucid interval signifies merely a remission of the disease, an abatement of the violence of the morbid action, a period of comparative calm; and the proof of its occurrence is generally drawn from the character of the act in question. It is hardly necessary to say that this is an unjustifiable use of the term, which should be confined to the genuine lucid interval that does occasionally occur.

It began to be found at last that a large class of persons required the protection of the law, who were not idiots, because they had reason once, nor lunatics in the ordinary signification of the term, because they were not violent, exhibited no very notable derangement of reason, were independent of lunar influences, and had no lucid intervals. Their mental impairment consisted in a loss of intellectual power, of interest in their usual pursuits, of the ability to comprehend their relations to persons and things. A new term—unsoundness of mind—was therefore introduced to meet this exigency; but it has never been very clearly defined.

The law has never held that all lunatics and idiots are absolved from all responsibility for their civil or criminal acts. This consequence was attributed only to the severest grades of these affections,—to lunatics who have no more understanding than a brute, and to idiots who cannot "number twenty pence nor tell how old they are." Theoretically the law has changed but little, even to the present day; but practically it exhibits considerable improvement: that is, while the general doctrine remains unchanged, it is qualified, in one way or another, by the courts, so as to produce less practical injustice.

Insanity implies the presence of disease or congenital defect in the brain, and though it may be accompanied by disease in other organs, yet the cerebral affection is always supposed to be primary and predominant. It is to be borne in mind, however, that bodily diseases may be accompanied, in some stage of their progress, by mental disorder which may affect the legal relations of the patient.

To give a definition of insanity not congenital, or, in other words, to indicate its essential element, the present state of our knowledge does not permit. Most of the attempts to define insanity are sententious descriptions of the disease, rather than proper definitions. For all practical purposes, however, a definition is unnecessary, because the real question at issue always is, not what constitutes insanity in general, but wherein consists the insanity of this or that individual. Neither sanity nor insanity can be regarded as an entity to be handled and described, but rather as a condition to be considered in reference to other conditions. Men vary in the character of their mental manifestations, insomuch that conduct and conversation perfectly proper and natural in one might in another, differently constituted, be indicative of insanity. In determining, therefore, the mental condition of a person, he must not be judged by any arbitrary standard of sanity or insanity, nor compared with other persons unquestionably sane or insane. He can properly be compared only with himself. When a person, without any adequate cause, adopts notions he once regarded as absurd, or indulges in conduct opposed to all his former habits and principles, or changes completely his ordinary temper, manners, and disposition,—the man of plain practical sense indulging in speculative theories and projects, the miser becoming a spendthrift and the spendthrift a miser, the staid, quiet, unobtrusive citizen becoming noisy, restless, and boisterous, the gay and joyous becoming dull and disconsolate even to the verge of despair, the careful, cautious man of business plunging into hazardous schemes of speculation, the discreet and pious becoming shamefully reckless and profligate,—no stronger proof of insanity can be had. And yet not one of these traits, in and by itself alone, disconnected from the natural traits of character, could be regarded as conclusive proof of insanity. In accordance with this fact, the principle has been laid down, with the sanction of the highest legal and medical authority, that it is the prolonged departure, without any adequate cause, from the states of feeling and modes of thinking usual to the individual when in health; which is the essential feature of insanity. Gooch, Lond. Quart. Rev. xliii. 355; Combe, Ment. Derang. 196; Meidway v. Croft, 3 Curt. Eccl. 671.

Insanity produced by alcoholism is of two kinds: Delirium tremens, caused by the breaking down of the person's system by long continued or habitual drunkenness, and brought on by abstinence from drink, and called "settled insanity," to distinguish it from "temporary insanity," or drunkenness, directly resulting from drink; Evers v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 318, 20 S. W. 744, 18 L. R. A. 421, 37 Am. St. Rep. 811. See DRUNKENNESS.

Criminal Responsibility. There is a concurrence in the law of civilized countries in absolving persons mentally unsound from criminal responsibility. In France, Germany, and Austria the rule is in substance that if a person is unconscious of the nature of his act, or his will is affected or the character of the act is not perceived, there is no crime; 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 181; Krafft-Ebing, Ger. Psycho-Path.

That insanity, in some of its forms, annuls all criminal responsibility, and, in the same or other forms, disqualifies its subject from the performance of certain civil acts, is a well-established doctrine of the common law. In the application of this principle there has prevailed, for many years, the utmost diversity of opinion. The law as expounded by Hale, who divided insanity into partial insanity as to certain subjects, partial as to degree, and total insanity, was that partial insanity was not sufficient to excuse a person in the committing of any capital offence; 1 Hale, P. C. 30; and his doctrine was received without question until the beginning of the present century; 8 How. St. Tr. 322; 16 id. 764; 19 id. 947.

This ancient doctrine received its first serious shock in Hadfield's case, 27 id. 1281, 1311, in which Erskine, for the defence, admitted the language used by Coke and Hale as to requiring deprivation of memory and understanding to absolve from crime, but contended that, if taken literally, the words would apply to idiocy alone. He insisted that "of all the cases that have filled Westminster Hall with complicated considerations, the insane persons have not only had the most perfect knowledge and recollection of all the relations in which they stood towards others, and of the acts and circumstances of their lives, but have, in general, been remarkable for subtlety and acuteness; and that delusion of which the criminal act in question was the immediate unqualified offspring, was the kind of insanity which should rightly exempt from punishment." These views prevailed and Lord Kenyon held that the prisoner was deranged immediately prior to the act and that it was unlikely that he had meanwhile recovered, though, strictly speaking, proof might be required of his condition at the very moment of the shooting; accordingly the prisoner was acquitted with the approbation of the court. Subsequently, in Bellingham's case, 1 Collinson, Lun. 636; Shelf. Lun. 462, Lord Mansfield held that it must be proved that the prisoner was incapable of judging between right and wrong; that at the time of the act he did not consider that murder was a crime against the laws of God and nature; and that there was no other proof of insanity which would excuse crime. Similar language was used in Parker's case, Collin. Lun. 477; Higginson's case, 1 C. & K. 129; Stokes' case, 3 C. & K. 185, and so for about a generation the law of England was practically as settled by Hadfield's and Bellingham's cases, though there were occasional variations from it. The special feature of the law of that period was that, to make a person responsible for crime, there must be a knowledge of right and wrong in the abstract. But the tendency of the cases was towards the modification of the test, so as to make the knowledge of right and wrong refer solely to the act in question; 5 C. & P. 168; 9 id. 525; 1 Cox, Cr. Cas. 80; 3 id. 275. This was pronounced to be the law by the English judges, in their answer to the questions propounded to them by the House of Lords on the occasion of the McNaghten trial, 10 Cl. & F. 200, where it was said by Tindal, C. J., for himself and the other judges: "To establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved that at the time of committing the act, the party accused was laboring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature or quality of the act he was doing; or, if he did know it, that he was not aware he was doing what was wrong." Most of the English cases will be found in 1 Russ. Cr., Shars. ed. 14, and in the notes will be found a collection of American cases.

The test laid down in McNaghten's case has been generally applied in England and this country. In the former it has been definitely recognized as the law, and in the latter it has been generally adopted, though with frequent variations, as will appear infra.

As to the answers of the judges, Sir J. F. Stephen (3 Hist. Cr. L. 154) has stated his opinion that their authority is questionable, adding that he "knows that some of the most distinguished judges on the bench have been of the same opinion"; he also observes that they "leave untouched the most difficult questions connected with the subject." It appears that, since that case, neither the Court for Crown Cases Reserved nor any other English court in banc has delivered a considered written opinion on the subject.

In Coleman's case, in New York, Davis, J., charged the jury that the "test of the responsibility for criminal acts, when insanity is asserted, is the capacity of the accused to distinguish between right and wrong at the time and with respect to the act which is the subject of inquiry." He left it to the jury to determine "whether or not at the time the accused committed the act she knew what she was doing, and knew that in shooting him she was doing a wrongful act." 1 N. Y. Cr. Rep. 1. With variations of expression this is the prevailing doctrine of the American courts; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 590, 21 L. Ed. 236; People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 50; State v. Windsor, 5 Harring. (Del.) 512; State v. Danby, 1 Houst. Cr. Cas. (Del.) 166; State v. West, id. 371; Humphreys v. State, 45 Ga. 190; Westmoreland v. State, id. 225; State v. Lawrence, 57 Me. 574; State v. Mahn, 25 Kan. 182; U. S. v. Faulkner, 35

Fed. 730; Com. v. Heath, 11 Gray (Mass.) 303; Cunningham v. State, 56 Miss. 269, 21 Am. Rep. 360; People v. Finley, 38 Mich. 482; State v. Shippey, 10 Minn. 223 (Gil. 178), 88 Am. Dec. 70; State v. Erb, 74 Mo. 199; State v. Kotovsky, 74 Mo. 247; Hawe v. State, 11 Neb. 537, 10 N. W. 452, 38 Am. Rep. 375; State v. Spencer, 21 N. J. L. 196; State v. Brandon, 53 N. C. 463; Thomas v. State, 40 Tex. 60; Dove v. State, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 348; Dunn v. People, 109 Ill. 635; State v. Alexander, 30 S. C. 74, 8 S. E. 440, 14 Am. St. Rep. 879; Com. v. Winnemore, 1 Brewst. (Pa.) 356; Com. v. Mosler, 4 Pa. 264; U. S. v. Shults, 6 McLean, 121, Fed. Cas. No. 16,286; Walker v. People, 88 N. Y. 86; Loeffner v. State, 10 Ohio St. 599. In many of the cases it is difficult to distinguish with certainty between what the court intends for a statement of the law and what is rather in the nature of practical suggestions addressed to the jury. In a New Hampshire case it was held that no one of the circumstances ordinarily relied upon is, as a matter of law, a test of mental disease, but that all symptoms and all tests of mental disease are purely matters of fact to be determined by the jury; State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, 6 Am. Rep. 533; and the same doctrine has been followed in other states; Hopps v. People, 31 Ill. 385, 83 Am. Dec. 231; Bradley v. State, 31 Ind. 492; Stevens v. State, 31 Ind. 485, 99 Am. Dec. 634. Very similar were the remarks addressed to the jury by the Lord Justice Clerk in a Scotch Justiciary case: "The question is one of fact, that matter of fact being whether when he committed this crime the prisoner was of an unsound mind. The counsel for the crown very properly said that this was entirely for you. It is not a question of medical science, neither is it one of legal definition, although both may materially assist you. It is a question for your common and practical sense." 3 Couper 16.

It was said that mental unsoundness, to render one free from criminal liability, must be such on the particular subject out of which the acts charged as an offence are claimed to have sprung, as to render him incapable of discerning the wrong of committing the same; U. S. v. Faulkner, 35 Fed. 730; Kearney v. People, 11 Colo. 258, 17 Pac. 782. Occasionally the court has thought it sufficient for the jury to consider whether the prisoner was sane or insane,—of sound memory and discretion, or otherwise; see State v. Cory, State v. Prescott, in Ray, Med. Jur. 55. The capacity to distinguish between right and wrong has been held not to be a safe test in all cases; State v. Felter, 25 Ia. 67, per Dillon, C. J.; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 580, 21 L. Ed. 236. See also Brown v. Com., 78 Pa. 122. In Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 120, this test is said to be generally satisfactory, but not to cover all cases. An instruction has been sustained, where there was a defence of insanity, that the defendant was not responsible unless he was conscious of his act at the time it was committed; People v. Clendennin, 91 Cal. 35, 27 Pac. 418.

The definition of insanity, in the trial of a case involving that issue, is for the court; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 112; see 1 F. & F. 87; and it has entire discretion as to the method of disposing of a suggestion that the prisoner is so insane as to render him unable to make a rational defence; U. S. v. Chisholm, 149 Fed. 284.

It is not error to instruct that insanity is a defence sometimes resorted to in default of other defences, and, while it is to be justly weighed, it is to be reckoned with; People v. Allender, 117 Cal. 81, 48 Pac. 1014.

It is proper to refuse to charge that if the defendant at the time of the act was affected with a mental disease that impaired his will and rendered him likely at any time to commit such an act, he must be acquitted; People v. Barthleman, 120 Cal. 7, 52 Pac. 112. Where the accused killed his wife during an attack of epilepsy, it is not error to charge that if he was insane up to the time of the act and was sane afterwards and remained sane until the present time they should find that he was sane when he committed the act; Taylor v. U. S., 7 App. D. C. 27; Snell v. U. S., 16 App. D. C. 501.

The defence of insanity is a legal defence and an instruction that it is viewed with disfavor is error; State v. Barry, 11 N. D. 428, 92 N. W. 809. Where the accused had been twice adjudged insane and committed to an asylum, but was discharged therefrom nearly two years before the act, there was no presumption of insanity; State v. Austin, 71 Ohio St. 317, 73 N. E. 218, 104 Am. St. Rep. 778.

The law of self-defence is applicable alike to the insane and the sane and the two defences are consistent and either one, if sustained, would justify a verdict of "not guilty"; State v. Wade, 161 Mo. 441, 61 S. W. 800.

In homicide, where there was evidence to support the request, the court should have charged that defendant was not guilty if he was laboring under such a defect of mind and reason as not to know the nature and quality of the acts he was doing, and was incapable of forming a criminal intent; that if the jury were not convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that, on the night of the shooting, defendant was of sound mind and discretion, and was capable of forming a criminal intent, they should acquit; that it was incumbent upon the prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the criminal intent with which the fatal shot was fired, and defendant's mental capacity for forming an intent to commit the alleged crime; and that if the jury could not say that they had a moral certainty that, on the night of the shooting, defendant's mind and discretion were sufficient for him to form a rational intent to kill, his guilt had not been established; People v. Muste, 137 Mich. 216, 100 N. W. 455.

The rule already stated as to partial insanity applies equally to delusions, which as has been stated were first brought within the law of mental irresponsibility for crime by Hadfield's case, supra. In McNaghten's case, supra, the question as to delusions was answered thus: "That if a person was acting under an insane delusion, and was in other respects sane, he must be considered in the same situation as to responsibility as if the facts with respect to which the delusion exists were real. That is to say, that the acts of the criminal should be judged as if he had really been in the circumstances he imagined himself to be in. For example, if, under the influence of delusion, he supposes another man to be in the act of attempting to take his life, and he kills him, as he supposes, in self-defence, he would be exempt from punishment. If his delusion was that the deceased had inflicted an injury upon him in character and fortune, and he killed him in revenge for such supposed injury, he would be liable to punishment." In the Guiteau case, the jury were charged by Cox, J., on this subject, as follows: "An insane delusion is never the result of reasoning and reflection. It is not generated by them and it cannot be dispelled by them. . . . Whenever convictions are founded on evidence, on comparison of facts and opinions and arguments, they are not insane delusions. The insane delusion does not relate to mere sentiments or theories, or abstract questions of law, politics, or religion. All these are the subject of opinions, which are beliefs founded on reasoning and reflection. These opinions are often absurd in the extreme, and result from naturally weak or ill-trained reasoning powers, hasty conclusions from insufficient data, ignorance of men and things, credulous dispositions, fraudulent imposture, and often from perverted moral sentiments. But still, they are opinions, founded upon some kind of evidence, and liable to be changed by better external evidence or sounder reasoning. But they are not insane delusions;" Guiteau's Case, 10 Fed. 161. Following this opinion it was said that: "An insane delusion is an incorrigible belief, not the result of reasoning in the existence of facts which are either impossible absolutely or impossible under the circumstances of the individual." State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 333, 22 Pac. 241.

It is a logical result of the nature of delusion and its legal relations as shown by these definitions that it will be of no avail as a defence unless, if true, the facts supposed to exist would have excused the crime; id.; Thurman v. State, 32 Neb. 224, 49 N. W. 338; People v. Taylor, 138 N. Y. 398, 34 N. E. 275; Smith v. State, 55 Ark. 259, 18 S. W. 237. This rule is well illustrated by a case in which it was held that an instruction that "defendant would not be responsible if he killed deceased under an insane delusion that deceased was trying to marry defendant's mother, and that this delusion caused the killing," was properly refused; Bolling v. State, 54 Ark. 588, 16 S. W. 658.

In order that delusion may be a defence it must be connected with the crime, and if a person has an insane delusion upon any one subject, but commits a crime not connected therewith, he is equally guilty as if he were in all respects sane; State v. Gut, 13 Minn. 341 (Gil. 315); Bovard v. State, 30 Miss. 600; State v. Huting, 21 Mo. 464. "A man whose mind squints, unless impelled to crime by this very mental obliquity, is as much amenable to punishment as one whose eye squints." Gibson, C. J., in Com. v. Mosler, 4 Pa. 264. See also Alison, Cr. L. 647; Ray, Insan. 106, 135, 227; 3 Couper 357; State v. Simms, 71 Mo. 538; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. 394.

"Where a defendant is acting under an insane delusion as to circumstances which, if true, would relieve the act from responsibility, such delusion is a defence;" Whart. & St. Med. Jur. § 125; but such delusions must involve an honest mistake as to the object to which the crime is directed; id. § 127; 3 F. & F. 839. The term delusion as applied to insanity, does not mean a mere mistake of fact, or being induced by false evidence to believe that a fact exists which does not exist; Middleditch v. Williams, 45 N. J. Eq. 726, 17 Atl. 826, 4 L. R. A. 738.

A disposition to multiply the tests, so as to recognize essential facts in the nature of insanity, has been manifested in this country to a much greater extent than in England.

The existence of an irresistible impulse to commit a crime has been recognized in the law; Steph. Cr. L. 91; and medical authorities are generally in agreement that, as it is put by Bishop, "the mental and physical machine may slip the control of its owner; and so a man may be conscious of what he is doing, and of its criminal character and consequences, while yet he is impelled to it by a power to him irresistible." 1 New Cr. L. 387; 3 Witth. & Beck. 270, 275; 1 Beck, Med. Jur., 10th ed. 723; Ray, Insan., 3d ed. §§ 17, 18, 22. But the writer last quoted adds: "Whether or not such is truly so must, in the nature of things, be a pure question of fact, it cannot be of law."

In England the courts have refused to recognize this ground of exemption from responsibility and limit the test to ability to distinguish between right and wrong; Clarke, Cr. L. 56; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 387; 3 C. & K. 185; 1 F. & F. 666; 3 Cox, C. C. 275.

The American cases are very difficult to classify with reference to this test, as indeed they are on most branches of the subject, nor is such the present purpose; all that is possible being, by reference to a selection of the cases, to illustrate the progress of the law and the direction in which, but not, critically, the precise extent to which, changes have been made since Lord Hale's time, keeping pace with the growth of scientific knowledge.

A full understanding of the scope of the doctrine now under consideration involves the further subject of power of resistance, which enters largely into this class of cases and is also more particularly referred to, infra.

In Roger's case, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 500, 41 Am. Dec. 458, the jury were directed to consider, in addition to the test of right and wrong, whether the prisoner, in committing the homicide, acted from an irresistible and uncontrollable impulse; and this case has been much relied on in American courts; Ray, Med. Jur. 58.

In Freth's case, 3 Phila. (Pa.) 105, Judge Ludlow charged: "If the prisoner was actuated by an irresistible inclination to kill, and was utterly unable to control his will, or subjugate his intellect, and was not actuated by anger, jealousy, revenge, and kindred evil passions, he is entitled to an acquittal," etc.

In the leading case of State v. Harrison it was said by Brannon, J.: "This irresistible-impulse theory test has been only recently presented, and while it is supported by plausible arguments, it is rather refined, and introduces what seems to me a useless element of distinction for a test, and is misleading to juries, and fraught with great danger to human life, so much so that even its advocates have warningly said it should be very cautiously applied and only in the clearest cases. What is this irresistible impulse? How shall we of the courts and juries know it? Does it exist when manifested in one single instance, as in the present case, or must it be shown to be habitual, or, at least, to have evinced itself in more than a single instance? . . . I admit the existence of irresistible impulse and its efficacy to exonerate from responsibility, but not as consistent with an adequate realization of the wrong of the act. It is that uncontrollable impulse produced by the disease of the mind, when that disease is sufficient to override judgment and obliterate the sense of right as to the acts done, and deprives the accused of power to choose between them;" 36 W. Va. 729, 15 S. E. 982, 18 L. R. A. 224.

For other cases in which irresistible impulse is regarded as a defence, see Stevens v. State, 31 Ind. 485, 99 Am. Dec. 634; Blackburn v. State, 23 Ohio St. 146; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 580, 21 L. Ed. 236; but it is held that no impulse, however irresistible, is a defence, where there is a knowledge as to the particular act between right and wrong; State v. Brandon, 53 N. C. 463; State v. Miller, 111 Mo. 542, 20 S. W. 243; Lovegrove v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 491, 21 S. W. 191; People v. Clendennin, 91 Cal. 35, 27 Pac. 418; Thomas v. State, 71 Miss. 345, 15 South. 237; Patterson v. State, 86 Ga. 70, 12 S. E. 174; Wilcox v. State, 94 Tenn. 106, 28 S. W. 312; Tayl. Med. Jur. 720; and that it was a crime morally, and punishable by the laws of the country; State v. Alexander, 30 S. C. 74, 8 S. E. 440, 14 Am. St. Rep. 879; Williams v. State, 50 Ark. 511, 9 S. W. 5.

As a perfectly natural outgrowth of the doctrine of irresistible impulse, there is to be found in the American cases a tendency more noticeable in late years, to add an additional qualification to the right and wrong test. These cases hold, not merely that the accused, to be considered accountable, must be able to distinguish between right and wrong with respect to the act in question, but must have sufficient mental power to control his impulses.

As the theory of irresistible impulses owes much of its development to the courts of Pennsylvania, so also has this correlative doctrine of the necessity of power to control it received great attention in that state. In Mosler's case, 4 Pa. 264, Gibson, C. J., said: "His insanity must be so great as entirely to destroy his perception of right and wrong; and it is not until that perception is thus destroyed that he ceases to be responsible. It must amount to delusion or hallucination, controlling his will and making the commission of the act, in his apprehension, a duty of overruling necessity. The law is, that, whether the insanity be general or partial, the degree of it must be so great as to have controlled the will of its subject, and to have taken from him the freedom of moral action." And this language is repeated in Ortwein's case, 76 Pa. 414, 18 Am. Rep. 420, by Agnew, C. J., who declares it to be the law of the state. The essential relation of power to such cases is thus put, in Haskell's case, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 491, by Brewster, J.: "A review of all the authorities I have been able to examine satisfies me that the true test in all these cases lies in the word 'power.' Has the defendant in a criminal case the power to distinguish right from wrong, and the power to adhere to the right and avoid the wrong? In these cases has the defendant, in addition to the capacities mentioned, the power to govern his mind, his body, and his estate? If he possess this power over his imagination he will be able to expel all delusive images, and the like control over his will would subdue all homicidal and other monomania. . . . I use the word power with reference to that control which humanity can expect from humanity."

Other cases supporting this view are, Smith v. Com., 1 Duv. (Ky.) 224; Com. v. Rogers, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 500, 41 Am. Dec. 458.

Other cases seem to hold that one mentally disordered, though knowing right and wrong, and that the act is forbidden and punishable, is criminally responsible whether he has power over his conduct or not; Walker v. People, 26 Hun (N. Y.) 67; Flanagan v. People, 52 N. Y. 467, 11 Am. Rep. 731; People v. Carpenter, 102 N. Y. 238, 6 N. E. 584; Anderson v. State, 42 Ga. 9; Brinkley v. State, 58 Ga. 296; People v. Hoin, 62 Cal. 120, 45 Am. Rep. 651; State v. Murray, 11 Or. 413, 5 Pac. 55; State v. Scott, 41 Minn. 365, 43 N. W. 62; State v. Pratt, Houst. Cr. Cas. (Del.) 249; State v. Pagels, 92 Mo. 300, 4 S. W. 931. Though a crime is committed through lack of sufficient will power to control the conduct, and under an irresistible and uncontrollable impulse, the offender is responsible for the act; State v. Miller, 111 Mo. 542, 20 S. W. 243. In discussing this class of cases Bishop considers that a doctrine that "our law punishes any man for what he does under a necessity which it is impossible for him to resist," would be an "unprecedented horror." He assumes that the cases which appear to hold it are to be explained upon the theory that the judges do not believe in the existence of an irresistible or uncontrollable impulse. He himself does not assume to know whether as a fact there is, but as the experts assert it, he deems it to be the duty of a judge, where there is evidence tending to support the theory, to submit it to the jury and cast the responsibility upon them. 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 383 b, 387.

To this remarkable diversity of views may be attributed, in some measure, no doubt, the actual diversity of results. To any one who has followed with some attention the course of criminal justice in trials where insanity has been pleaded in defence, it is obvious that, if some have been properly convicted, others have just as improperly been acquitted. It must be admitted, however, that the verdict in such cases is often determined less by the instructions of the court than by the views and feelings of the jury and the testimony of experts.

The defence of irresistible impulse has been the subject of legislation in some states, as in New York and Michigan, where by statute a morbid propensity, or uncontrollable impulse to commit a crime, in the mind of one who is conscious of the nature of the act or that it is wrong, or to be incapable of such knowledge, is no defence. See N. Y. Pen. Code § 21; Mich. Pen. Code §§ 19, 20.

What is sometimes called moral insanity, as distinguished from mental unsoundness, is not a defence to a charge of crime; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. §§ 164, 174; Tayl. Med. Jur. 677; 6 Jur. 201; 4 Cox, C. C. 149; Com. v. Heath, 11 Gray (Mass.) 303; Flanagan v. People, 52 N. Y. 467, 11 Am. Rep. 731; People v. McDonell, 47 Cal. 134; People v. Kerrigan, 73 Cal. 222, 14 Pac. 849; Guiteau's Case, 10 Fed. 161; State v. Potts, 100 N. C. 457, 6 S. E. 657; People v. Wood, 126 N. Y. 269, 27 N. E. 362; Flanagan v. People, 52 N. Y. 469, 11 Am. Rep. 731; but see Smith v. Com., 1 Duv. (Ky.) 224; Scott v. Com., 4 Metc. (Ky.) 227, 83 Am. Dec. 461; Andersen v. State, 43 Conn. 514, 21 Am. Rep. 669; St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Graves, 6 Bush (Ky.) 268. See also Mann, Med. Jur. of Insan. 66, 120, 135. Nor, however violent and unnatural, will it defeat a will unless it is the emanation of a delusion; Taylor v. McClintock, 87 Ark. 243, 112 S. W. 405.

Morbid religious feelings may be of such a character as to amount to partial insanity, which, though sometimes the basis of delusions affecting criminal cases, is more frequently met with in connection with the subject of undue influence. In a case in which it was alleged that a testator was insane on the subject of spiritualism, it was held that, as an abstract proposition, a belief in spiritualism, though a person may be a monomaniac on that subject or any other form of religion, does not prove insanity; Connor v. Stanley, 72 Cal. 556, 14 Pac. 306, 1 Am. St. Rep. 84; Chafin Will Case, 32 Wis. 557; Will of Smith, 52 Wis. 543, 8 N. W. 616, 9 N. W. 665, 38 Am. Rep. 756; Turner v. Hand, 3 Wall. Jr. 88, Fed. Cas. No. 14,257; nor belief in the transmigration of souls; Bonard's Will, 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 128.

Insanity is not necessarily established by mere eccentricity of mind, manifesting itself in absurd opinions or extravagancies of dress and manners; Lee's Heirs v. Lee's Ex'rs, 4 McCord (S. C.) 183, 17 Am. Dec. 722; or an irritable temper and an excitable disposition; Willis v. People, 32 N. Y. 715; or depression coupled with a monomania or delusion that, by the lands wearing out and buildings going to ruin, starvation and the poorhouse were threatened; Gillespie v. Shuliherrier, 50 N. C. 157. Insanity produced by continued dissipation is a good defence; State v. Harrigan, 9 Houst. (Del.) 369, 31 Atl. 1052; mania à potu is a species of insanity; State v. Dillahunt, 3 Harr. (Del.) 551; and so is delirium tremens; People v. O'Connell, 62 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 436; Maconnehey v. State, 5 Ohio St. 77; Kelley v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 216, 20 S. W. 357; but it must be shown to exist at the time the act is perpetrated, not antecedently;

State v. Sewell, 48 N. C. 245. As to drunkenness in its varied forms, see that title.

If the accused was wanting in self-governing power, whether caused by insanity, gross intoxication or other controlling influences other than depravity or wickedness of heart, then his mind was not fully conscious of its own purposes and he was not guilty of murder in the first degree; Com. v. Van Horn, 188 Pa. 143, 41 Atl. 469. Where a defendant was insane from drugs, the court must charge thereon, though a charge on the general issue of insanity is given; Burton v. State, 46 Tex. Cr. R. 493, 81 S. W. 742. If the accused had sufficient mind to know right from wrong and to understand the nature and quality of the act, he was sane in law; Eckert v. State, 114 Wis. 160, 89 N. W. 826; if he did not possess the power to avoid the wrong and do the right, he was irresponsible; People v. Barthleman, 120 Cal. 7, 52 Pac. 112; Abbott v. Com., 107 Ky. 624, 55 S. W. 196; Jolly v. Com., 110 Ky. 190, 61 S. W. 49, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1622.

Suicide is not conclusive evidence of insanity, but is admissible to show the absence of a sound and disposing mind; Pettitt's Ex'rs v. Pettitt, 4 Humph. (Tenn.) 191. Epilepsy alone does not establish insanity which will excuse crime; Lovegrove v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 491, 21 S. W. 191; Com. v. Buccleri, 153 Pa. 535, 26 Atl. 228; and in its milder forms, causing temporary fits of insanity, the prima facie presumption is in favor of mental soundness; Corbit v. Smith, 7 Ia. 60, 71 Am. Dec. 431. See 3 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 319. Proof that insanity was hereditary is admissible; Shaeffer v. State, 61 Ark. 241, 32 S. W. 679; but that alone is insufficient when the other evidence clearly shows that defendant knew that he was committing a wrong; Lovegrove v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 491, 21 S. W. 191; Snow v. Benton, 28 Ill. 306.

An insane person cannot be legally charged with a criminal intent; State v. Brown, 36 Utah 46, 102 Pac. 641, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 545. Where it is admitted that a defendant in a murder case is neither an idiot nor an insane person, it is not competent to prove that he is weakminded; Rogers v. State, 128 Ga. 67, 57 S. E. 227, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 999, 119 Am. St. Rep. 364.

In reply to a defence of want of criminal capacity, proof was admitted that defendant had sometimes feigned insanity; Naanes v. State, 143 Ind. 299, 42 N. E. 609. But insanity cannot be proved by reputation; Walker v. State, 102 Ind. 502, 1 N. E. 856; State v. Coley, 114 N. C. 879, 19 S. E. 705.

See HYPNOTISM; KLEPTOMANIA.

The effect of the plea of insanity has sometimes been controlled by the instructions of the court in regard to the burden of proof and the requisite amount.

In many of the American states, there has been a tendency towards a relaxation of the rule settled in England, and which formerly prevailed in almost all the states, to treat a plea of insanity as being strictly one in confession and avoidance which must be proved by the defendant either beyond a reasonable doubt or, as was said in many American cases, by a preponderance of evidence. See BURDEN OF PROOF.

The English rule was thus stated in McNaghten's case: "Every man is presumed to be sane, and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crimes, until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction;" 10 Cl. & F. 200; and it is the settled law of England; 3 C. & K. 188; 4 Cox, C. C. 149; 3 id. 155.

As to whether such proof must be by a preponderance of evidence or beyond a reasonable doubt, the language of the English judges is not entirely free from ambiguity.

In many of the American cases the English rule is adhered to; State v. Spencer, 21 N. J. L. 202, followed in Genz v. State, 59 N. J. L. 488, 37 Atl. 69, 59 Am. St. Rep. 619; Ortwein v. Com., 76 Pa. 414, 18 Am. Rep. 420; Com. v. Gerade, 145 Pa. 289, 22 Atl. 464, 27 Am. St. Rep. 689; State v. Brandon, 53 N. C. 463; Kriel v. Com., 5 Bush. (Ky.) 362; Moore v. Com., 92 Ky. 630, 18 S. W. 833; Lovegrove v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 491, 21 S. W. 191; Boswell v. State, 63 Ala. 307, 35 Am. Rep. 20; Maxwell v. State, 89 Ala. 150, 7 South. 824; Parsons v. State, 81 Ala. 577, 2 South. 854, 60 Am. Rep. 193 (where the subject is discussed at large); Bolling v. State, 54 Ark. 588, 16 S. W. 658; People v. Bawden, 90 Cal. 195, 27 Pac. 204; State v. De Rance, 34 La. Ann. 186, 44 Am. Rep. 426; State v. Clements, 47 La. Ann. 1088, 17 South. 502; State v. Lawrence, 57 Me. 574; Com. v. Rogers, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 500, 41 Am. Dec. 458; State v. Hanley, 34 Minn. 430, 26 N. W. 397; State v. Pagels, 92 Mo. 310, 4 S. W. 931; Bond v. State, 23 Ohio St. 349; State v. Bundy, 24 S. C. 439, 58 Am. Rep. 263; Baccigalupo v. Com., 33 Gratt. (Va.) 807, 36 Am. Rep. 795; State v. Strauder, 11 W. Va. 747, 27 Am. Rep. 606. See 36 Am. Rep. 467, n.

The terms of this rule cannot be better stated than in Com. v. Drum, 58 Pa. 9: "Where the killing is admitted, and insanity or want of legal responsibility is alleged as an excuse, it is the duty of the defendant to satisfy the jury that insanity actually existed at the time of the act, and a doubt as to such insanity will not justify a jury in acquitting upon that ground." This language was quoted with strong approval in Ortwein v. Com., 76 Pa. 414, 425, 18 Am. Rep. 420. In a much later Pennsylvania case it was said that "the burden of proof of insanity was with the defence from the beginning, and that it never shifted." Com. v. Heidler, 191 Pa. 375, 43 Atl. 211.

Many of the cases above cited rest upon the idea that the issue is to be determined in each case by a preponderance of evidence, so that an effort to deduce from them a well established rule, supported by the weight of authority, as to whether the test is to be considered a preponderance of evidence or the establishment of the defence beyond a reasonable doubt, is subject to the same ambiguity that attaches to the language of the English judges. In addition to this question which arises upon the cases which put the burden of the defence upon the accused many courts have held that when evidence of insanity is introduced by the defendant, the burden of proving his criminal capacity is cast upon the prosecution (and most of the cases go to the extent of including this as one of the elements of the crime which must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt); U. S. v. Faulkner, 35 Fed. 730; Guiteau's Case, 10 Fed. 161, and note; Hodge v. State, 26 Fla. 11, 7 South. 593; Brown v. State, 40 Fla. 459, 25 South. 63; State v. Johnson, 40 Conn. 136; Langdon v. People, 133 Ill. 382, 24 N. E. 874; Plake v. State, 121 Ind. 433, 23 N. E. 273, 16 Am. St. Rep. 408; State v. Nixon, 32 Kan. 205, 4 Pac. 159; People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 97 Am. Dec. 162 (but where the evidence is insufficient to raise a reasonable doubt, it does not shift the burden of proof to the prosecution; Snider v. State, 56 Neb. 309, 76 N. W. 574); State v. Pressler, 16 Wyo. 214, 92 Pac. 806, 15 Ann. Cas. 93; Territory v. McNabb, 16 N. M. 625, 120 Pac. 907; Cunningham v. State, 56 Miss. 269, 21 Am. Rep. 360; State v. Bartlett, 43 N. H. 224, 80 Am. Dec. 154; Brotherton v. People, 75 N. Y. 159; Walker v. People of N. Y., 88 N. Y. 81; King v. State, 91 Tenn. 617, 20 S. W. 169; Revoir v. State, 82 Wis. 295, 52 N. W. 84; and the supreme court of the United States has accepted this latter doctrine; Davis v. U. S., 160 U. S. 469, 16 Sup. Ct. 353, 40 L. Ed. 499; where it was held that the jury, to convict, must be "able, upon their consciences, to say that the evidence before them, by whomsoever adduced, is sufficient to show beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of every fact necessary to constitute the crime charged."

In a later case, Battle v. U. S., 209 U. S. 38, 28 Sup. Ct. 422, 52 L. Ed. 670, where the defence of insanity was interposed, the same court said: "The judge instructed the jury that the burden of proof was on the government to prove that fact beyond a reasonable doubt, and he was not called upon to go further. Until evidence is given on the other side, the burden of proof is satisfied by a presumption arising from the fact that most men are sane. In this case there was the merest shadow of evidence that the defendant was not of sound mind. The jury were told to consider all the evidence, including the bearing of the prisoner and the manner of his own testimony, and the evidence relied upon by him was stated. In the circumstances he could ask no more."

In a criminal case the burden is on the defendant to prove by a preponderance of evidence the defence of insanity; People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 75 Pac. 1093; State v. Scott, 49 La. Ann. 253, 21 South. 271, 36 L. R. A. 721; State v. Robbins, 109 Ia. 650, 80 N. W. 1061; People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 543, 89 Pac. 124; Fults v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 502, 98 S. W. 1057; Thomas v. State, 55 Tex. Cr. R. 293, 116 S. W. 600; State v. Hancock, 151 N. C. 699, 66 S. E. 137; Pribble v. People, 49 Colo. 210, 112 Pac. 220; though he need not prove it beyond a reasonable doubt; Burt v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 397, 40 S. W. 1000, 43 S. W. 344, 39 L. R. A. 305, 330; Adair v. State, Okl. Cr. 284, 118 Pac. 416; but only to the satisfaction of the jury; State v. Porter, 213 Mo. 43, 111 S. W. 529, 127 Am. St. Rep. 589; and when that is done the burden is shifted; Hobbs v. State, 8 Ga. App. 53, 68 S. E. 515; but if not established by the state's evidence, defendant must prove it by direct evidence to the satisfaction of the jury; State v. Cole, 2 Pennewill (Del.) 344, 45 Atl. 391; or at least so as to raise a reasonable doubt; Johnson v. State, 57 Fla. 18, 49 South. 40. The burden of the defence of temporary insanity is on the defendant; State v. Hand, 1 Marv. (Del.) 545, 41 Atl. 192; or of incapacity produced by delirium tremens at the very time of the act; State v. Kavanaugh, 4 Pennewill (Del.) 131, 53 Atl. 335.

Where the defence is insanity, until the defendant furnishes evidence thereon sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt, the prosecution may rest on the legal presumption that men are sane; State v. Wetter, 11 Idaho 433, 83 Pac. 341; and the mere fact of the commission of the crime is not sufficient to overcome this presumption; Davis v. State, 44 Fla. 32, 32 South. 822.

The rule that a person adjudged insane continues so until the contrary is shown, applies only to insanity of a nature liable to be permanent; Hempton v. State, 111 Wis. 127, 86 N. W. 596.

As to the rule on the subject, applied by the class of cases last referred to, see BURDEN OF PROOF. The cases of the former class, which put the burden on the defendant, as has already been suggested, in very many instances hold that a preponderance of proof only is required; and in some states the later cases show a virtual abandonment of the rule formerly adhered to by them. As for example in Massachusetts as will appear by the review of cases in that state in Davis v. U. S., 160 U. S. 481, 483, 16 Sup. Ct. 353, 40 L. Ed. 499. It results that it is not practicable to state what might be designated as a prevailing American rule. The subject is very fully discussed by Mr. Justice Harlan in the case last cited. The cases holding different views of the subject will be found collected in the opinion and argument in that case and also in 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 25; 16 id. 449; Cl. Cr. L. 58; Mann, Med. Jur. of Insan. ch. iii.; Witth. & Beck. 508. And see memorandum on plea of insanity, State v. Baber, 11 Mo. App. 586.

A statute imposing upon the accused the burden of proving the defence of insanity is constitutional; McGhee v. State (Ala.), 59 South. 573.

In England, under 46 & 47 Vict. c. 38, relating to the trial of lunatics, the jury returns a verdict that the prisoner is "guilty, but insane at the time," whereupon the court records the verdict and orders the prisoner to be imprisoned during the pleasure of the Crown. Under 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 94, the verdict was "not guilty, on the ground of insanity."

In some states in this country, where the verdict is an acquittal by reason of insanity, the fact must be so returned by the jury, and in such case the court are required to direct the confinement of the prisoner in an insane asylum.

A statute is not unconstitutional which provides that one acquitted of murder on the ground of insanity may be committed to the state lunatic asylum till he becomes sane. The fact of sanity is not established by the fact that he is placed on trial, if, under the statute, an insane person may be tried if he is competent to understand the proceeding and make his defense. His right to habeas corpus, after committal, to establish his sanity, satisfies his constitutional right to a hearing. The state may summarily deprive him of his liberty, under the police power, though no appeal is allowed from the order of acquittal. These questions were decided in People v. Chanler, 133 App. Div. 159, 117 N. Y. Supp. 322, id., 196 N. Y. 525, 89 N. E. 1109, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 946. See also People v. Baker, 59 Misc. 359, 110 N. Y. Supp. 848. In subsequent habeas corpus proceedings the burden is on the petitioner to prove recovery of reason; People v. Lamb (the Thaw case) 118 N. Y. Supp. 389; so also in State v. Snell, 46 Wash. 327, 89 Pac. 931, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1191; and he is not denied the protection of the law in such case; Petition of Dowdell, 169 Mass. 387, 47 N. E. 1033, 61 Am. St. Rep. 290; Petition of Le Donne, 173 Mass. 550, 54 N. E. 244. A committal of such person until the further order of the court is not void for uncertainty; and is no deprivation of due process of law; In re Brown, 39 Wash. 160, 81 Pac. 552, 109 Am. St. Rep. 868, 4 Ann. Cas. 488, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 540, where there is a full note on the confinement of one acquitted of crime by reason of insanity.

The insanity of one acquitted of murder on that ground is presumed to continue until the contrary is shown; State v. Snell, supra; and the court may thereupon commit him to an asylum until he is proved sane; People v. Baker, supra; and so a court may stay an execution on the ground of insanity until a prisoner recovers; Ex parte State, ex rel. Atty. Gen., 150 Ala. 489, 43 South. 490, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1129, 124 Am. St. Rep. 79.

A jury cannot disregard an overwhelming mass of evidence of insanity on the part of the accused and convict him on a legal presumption of sanity; State v. Brown, 36 Utah 46, 142 Pac. 641, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 545.

Side by side with this doctrine of the criminal law which makes persons, who from a medical point of view are considered insane, responsible for their criminal acts is another equally well authorized, viz.: that a kind and degree of insanity which would not excuse a person for a criminal act may render him legally incompetent for the management of himself or his affairs; Bellingham's case, 5 C. & P. 168. This implies that the mind of an insane person acts more clearly and deliberately, and with a sounder view of its relations to others, when about to commit a great crime than when buying or selling a piece of property. It is scarcely necessary to add that no ground for this distinction can be found in our knowledge of mental disease. On the contrary, we know that the same person who destroys his neighbor, under the delusion that he has been disturbing his peace or defaming his character, may, at the very time, dispose of his property with as correct an estimate of its value and as clear an insight into the consequences of the act as he ever had. If a person is incompetent to manage property, it is because he has lost some portion of his mental power; and this fact cannot be justly ignored in deciding upon his responsibility for criminal acts. Insanity once admitted, it is within the reach of no mortal comprehension to know exactly how far it may have affected the quality of his acts. To say that, possibly, it may have had no effect at all, is not enough: it should be proved by the party who affirms it. See Maudsley, Responsibility in Mental Disease 111.

By the French penal code there can be no crime nor offence if the accused were in a state of madness at the time of the act. Art. 64. The same provision was introduced into Livingston's Code and into the Revised Statutes of New York, vol. 2, § 697. The law of Arkansas provides that a lunatic or insane person without lucid intervals shall not be found guilty of any crime or misdemeanor with which he may be charged; Rev. Stat. 236. In New York, however, in spite of this clear and positive provision of law, the courts have always acted upon the doctrines of the common law, and instructed the jury respecting the tests of that kind of insanity which annuls criminal responsibility; Freeman v. People, 4 Den. (N. Y.) 27, 47 Am. Dec. 216. In this case, the court declared that the insanity mentioned in the statute means only insanity in reference to the criminal act, and therefore its qualities must be defined.

Civil Incapacity. The general principle governing the civil incapacity of a person of an unsound mind is that any civil act is invalid if the actor was at the time laboring under such mental defect as to render him incapable of performing the act in question, rationally and without detriment to any person affected thereby.

The rule as to contracts is that insanity is such a defect as precludes rational assent, with respect to the nature of the contract, whether marriage, partnership, sale, or the like.

A judicial ascertainment of the insanity of a person is said to deprive him of contractual capacity, as a matter of law, and subsequent contracts are void; 4 Co. 123 b; Bac. Abr. Idiots and Lunatics (F.); Carter v. Beckwith, 128 N. Y. 312, 28 N. E. 582; Leonard v. Leonard, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 280; Imhoff v. Witmer's Adm'r, 31 Pa. 243; but when no conservator was appointed and there was no appearance of incapacity, a purchase was held valid; McCormick v. Littler, 85 Ill. 62, 28 Am. Rep. 610. See also 5 B. & C. 170; Sawyer v. Lufkin, 56 Me. 308; Richardson v. Strong, 35 N. C. 106, 55 Am. Dec. 430.

Such incapacity is not retroactive; Knox v. Knox, 30 S. C. 377, 9 S. E. 353; prior acts are not void but voidable; Jackson v. Gumaer, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 552; but the condition is conclusively presumed to continue, after the finding, until it is superseded; In re Otis, 101 N. Y. 580, 5 N. E. 571; People v. Tax Com'rs, 100 N. Y. 215, 3 N. E. 85; but see McCleary v. Barcalow, 6 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 481; Reese v. Reese, 89 Ga. 645, 15 S. E. 846. A deed or mortgage executed by such person during the period of lunacy, as found, is voidable, the presumption being against validity, but subject to be overcome by proof of sanity; Hughes v. Jones, 116 N. Y. 67, 22 N. E. 446, 5 L. R. A. 637, 15 Am. St. Rep. 386; and see Mott v. Mott, 49 N. J. Eq. 192, 22 Atl. 997; 1 Gr. Ev. § 556. The fact that one who assigns a leasehold interest is found to be a lunatic a few months later is only prima facie evidence of his incompetency at the time of his assignment; Sbarbero v. Miller, 72 N. J. Eq. 248, 65 Atl. 472.

The marriage of a person insane is void; Inhabitants of Middleborough v. Inhabitants of Rochester, 12 Mass. 363; Gathings v. Williams, 27 N. C. 487, 44 Am. Dec. 49; Powell v. Powell, 18 Kan. 371, 26 Am. Rep. 774; Wightman v. Wightman, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 343; L. R. 1 P. & D. 335; Waymire v. Jetmore, 22 Ohio St. 271; True v. Ranney, 21 N. H. 52, 53 Am. Dec. 164. A marriage contracted while one party was insane from delirium tremens was held void; Clement v. Mattison, 3 Rich. (S. C.) 93; but mere weakness of mind not amounting to derangement is not sufficient; Rawdon v. Rawdon, 28 Ala. 565; Crump v. Morgan, 38 N. C. 91, 40 Am. Dec. 447; and for that merely, or intoxication, a court has no power to declare a marriage null and void; Elzey v. Elzey, 1 Houst. (Del.) 308. The same degree of mental capacity which enables a person to make a valid deed or will is sufficient to enable him to marry; Inhabitants of Atkinson v. Inhabitants of Medford, 46 Me. 510. It was held that a marriage celebrated by a person while insane might be affirmed upon recovery without a new solemnization; Cole v. Cole, 5 Sneed (Tenn.) 57, 70 Am. Dec. 275.

Other civil contracts made by insane persons are voidable, not void; Turner v. Rusk, 53 Md. 65; George v. R. Co., 34 Ark. 613; McClain v. Davis, 77 Ind. 419; Van Patton v. Beals, 46 Ia. 62; Ingraham v. Baldwin, 9 N. Y. 45; Broadwater v. Darne, 10 Mo. 277; Ordron, Jud. Asp. Insan. ch. 6.

With respect to contracts, persons non compos mentis and infants are said to be parallel, both in law and reason; Seaver v. Phelps, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 304, 22 Am. Dec. 372; Breckenridge's Heirs v. Ormsby, 1 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 236, 19 Am. Dec. 71. A power of attorney made by an insane person is absolutely void; Dexter v. Hall, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 9, 21 L. Ed. 73; and a contract executory on both sides cannot be enforced against an insane person; Ewell, L. Cas. Disab. 525, where the cases are collected.

The test of legal capacity to contract, it was said, is that the party is capable of recollecting the property he is about to dispose of, the manner of distributing it, and the object of his bounty; the particular act being attended with the consent of his will and understanding; Miller v. Rutledge, 82 Va. 863, 1 S. E. 202.

Pollock enumerates three different theories as to contracts by insane persons which "have, at different times, been entertained in English courts and supported by respectable authority;" Poll. Cont. 87. These theories, with some of the authorities cited in support of them, are substantially as follows: 1. That it is no ground, whatever, for avoiding a contract; Co. Litt. 2 b; 4 Co. 123 b; Bract. fol. 100 a, 165 b. As to this it is characterized as a frivolous technicality and doubtful whether it was really supported by the authorities Coke had before him; Poll. Cont. 89. 2. If one who contracts is too drunk or insane to know what he is about, his agreement is void for want of the consenting mind, but if his mind is only so confused or weak that he may know what he is about, but not fully understand the terms and effect, and this is known to the other party, the contract will be voidable at his option. The first division of this class would be simply void for want of consent; 2 Stra. 1104; 3 Campb. 33; Reinskopf v. Rogge, 37 Ind. 207; Burke v. Allen, 29 N. H. 106, 61 Am. Dec. 642; the second would come under the head of fraud; Miller v. Finley, 26 Mich. 249, 12 Am. Rep. 306; Wilson v. Oldham, 12 B. Monr. (Ky.) 55; Caulkins v. Fry, 35 Conn. 170. 3. The doctrine which has prevailed as already stated that all contracts by insane persons are voidable, not void, see supra.

In some courts what has been termed the Massachusetts doctrine prevails that contracts of insane persons are voidable without any reference to the knowledge of the other party; Seaver v. Phelps, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 304, 22 Am. Dec. 372; in others what is termed the English doctrine (because supported by more recent English authorities) that they are voidable if the other party knows of the insanity; Stockmeyer v. Tobin, 139 U. S. 176, 11 Sup. Ct. 504, 35 L. Ed. 123; Martinez v. Moll, 46 Fed. 724; (under La. Civ. Code); [1892] 1 Q. B. 599; Lancaster County Nat. Bank v. Moore, 78 Pa. 407, 21 Am. Rep. 24; and reasonable ground for knowledge is equivalent thereto; Lincoln v. Buckmaster, 32 Vt. 652; and there is still a third doctrine supported by some courts that if the other party was ignorant and the contract reasonable and not capable of rescission, so that the parties could be restored to their original position, the contract will be sustained; Matthiessen & Weichers Refining Co. v. McMahon's Adm'r, 38 N. J. L. 536; Young v. Stevens, 48 N. H. 133, 2 Am. Rep. 202, 97 Am. Dec. 592; Northwestern Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Blankenship, 94 Ind. 535, 48 Am. Rep. 185; Riggs v. Tract Society, 84 N. Y. 330; Alexander v. Haskins, 68 Ia. 73, 25 N. W. 935; Appeal of Kneedler, 92 Pa. 428.

The cases last cited rest upon Molton v. Camroux, 2 Ex. 487; 4 id. 17, which is considered the cornerstone of the law as to contracts with insane persons; Poll. Cont. 92; Leake, Cont. 248; but has been recently characterized as containing "loose statements" which have given rise to "an anomalous doctrine;" Harr. Cont. 235.

Whatever may be said of it, the case undoubtedly settled the law that such a contract was voidable and not void, and this was confirmed inferentially by a later case which held that such a contract might be ratified after the disability had passed; L. R. 8 Ex. 132.

It is generally considered that contracts for necessaries for an insane person are binding, if suited to their condition in life; 5 B. & C. 170; Richardson v. Strong, 35 N. C. 106, 55 Am. Dec. 430; Pearl v. M'Dowell, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 658, 20 Am. Dec. 199; Maddox v. Simmons, 31 Ga. 512; Skidmore v. Romaine, 2 Bradf. Sur. (N. Y.) 122; Crowther v. Rowlandson, 27 Cal. 376; Fitzgerald v. Reed, 9 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 94; and this rule has been extended to other things which were reasonable and proper; Kendall v. May, 10 Allen (Mass.) 59; but if the other party has knowledge of the insanity the nature of the liability is rather quasi-contractual; 44 Ch. D. 94; Sawyer v. Lufkin, 56 Me. 308; Keener, Quasi-Cont. 20. This liability is not removed by the appointment of a committee, where necessaries are furnished in good faith and the committee has failed to provide them; Barnes v. Hathaway, 66 Barb. (N. Y.) 452; Stannard v. Burns' Adm'r, 63 Vt. 244, 22 Atl. 460.

Statutes making the estates of insane persons liable for their maintenance in state institutions are valid; Kaiser v. State, 80 Kan. 364, 102 Pac. 454, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 295.

The fact that a husband causes his wife to be placed in an insane asylum is not evidence of his refusal to support her, nor of consent to her absence outside the home, rendering him liable for her support; Richardson v. Stuesser, 125 Wis. 66, 103 N. W. 261, 69 L. R. A. 829, 4 Ann. Cas. 784.

Deeds executed by persons of unsound mind are absolutely void; Wilkinson v. Wilkinson, 129 Ala. 279, 30 South. 578; Riggs v. Tract Society, 95 N. Y. 503; Ballew v. Clark, 24 N. C. 23; Bensell v. Chancellor, 5 Whart. (Pa.) 371, 34 Am. Dec. 561; 3 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 386. In other cases it has been held that such a deed is voidable only; Arnold v. Iron Works, 1 Gray (Mass.) 434; Somers v. Pumphrey, 24 Ind. 231; Cates v. Woodson, 2 Dana (Ky.) 452. Other cases again hold that want of perfect soundness of mind does not affect the conveyance if there is still capacity for fully comprehending the import of the act; Miller v. Craig, 36 Ill. 109; Dennett v. Dennett, 44 N. H. 531, 84 Am. Dec. 97; Odell v. Buck, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 142; Rippy v. Gant, 39 N. C. 443. See Smith v. Elliott's Adm'r, 1 Patt. & H. (Va.) 307; 1 Pingr. Mortg. § 349.

An action cannot be dismissed because it is brought by an insane person in his own name, unless the statute so provides; Wiesmann v. Donald, 125 Wis. 600, 104 N. W. 916, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 961.

As to testamentary capacity as affected by insanity, see WILL; DEMENTIA; UNDUE INFLUENCE.

In most states the statutes of limitation do not run against a person insane, nor does adverse possession ripen into title while the person out of possession is insane; Clarity v. Sheridan, 91 Ia. 304, 59 N. W. 52; but a plaintiff's claim is not affected by the insanity of the defendant's ancestor after the statute had begun to run; Asbury v. Fair, 111 N. C. 251, 16 S. E. 467. The time of sanity required in order to allow the statute to begin to run is such as will enable the party to examine his affairs and institute an action, and is for the jury; Clark's Executor v. Trail's Adm'rs, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 35.

Insanity is not a defence in an action of tort; but damages are compensatory and not punitive; McIntyre v. Sholty, 121 Ill. 660, 13 N. E. 239, 2 Am. St. Rep. 140; Lassone v. R. R., 66 N. H. 345, 24 Atl. 902, 17 L. R. A. 525; Williams v. Hays, 143 N. Y. 442, 38 N. E. 449, 26 L. R. A. 153, 42 Am. St. Rep. 743; Meyer v. Ry. Co., 54 Fed. 116, 4 C. C. A. 221.

A master of a vessel cannot excuse himself for negligently causing its destruction by showing that the orders which were given by him while temporarily insane caused such destruction; Williams v. Hays, 143 N. Y. 442, 38 N. E. 449, 26 L. R. A. 153, 42 Am. St. Rep. 743; but it is a complete defence in an action for words spoken slanderously about the plaintiff that they were uttered under an insane delusion of their truth; Irvine v. Gibson, 117 Ky. 306, 77 S. W. 1106, 111 Am. St. Rep. 251, 4 Ann. Cas. 569; and where a visitor falls through a hole in the floor of a building owned by a lunatic and left unguarded by him, there is no cause of action; Ward v. Rogers, 51 Misc. 299, 100 N. Y. Supp. 1058.

INSCRIPTION. In Civil Law. An engagement which a person who makes a solemn accusation of a crime against another enters into that he will suffer the same punishment, if he has accused the other falsely, which would have been inflicted upon him had he been guilty. Code, 9. 1. 10; 9. 2. 16 and 17.

In Evidence. Something written or engraved.

Inscriptions upon tombstones and other proper places, as rings, and the like, are held to be evidence of pedigree; Bull. N. P. 233; 10 East 120; 13 Ves. 145. But their value as evidence depends largely on the authority under which they were made, and the length of time between their establishment and the events they commemorate; Clark v. Cassidy, 62 Ga. 407; Wanita Woolen Mills v. Rollins, 75 Miss. 253, 22 South. 819; Shotwell v. Harrison, 22 Mich. 415; Fondren v. Durfeé, 39 Miss. 326; Terwilliger v. Industrial Benefit Ass'n, 83 Hun 323, 31 N. Y. Supp. 938; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 106. See DECLARATION; HEARSAY EVIDENCE.

INSCRIPTIONES (Lat.). The name given by the old English law to any written instrument by which anything was granted. Blount.

INSENSIBLE. In Pleading. That which is unintelligible is said to be insensible. Steph. Pl. 378.

INSIDIATORES VIARUM (Lat.). Persons who lie in wait in order to commit some felony or other misdemeanor.

INSIMUL COMPUTASSENT (Lat.). They had accounted together. See ASSUMPSIT.

INSINUACION. In Spanish Law. The presentation of a public document to a competent judge, in order to obtain his approbation and sanction of the same, and thereby giving it judicial authenticity.

"Insinuatio est ejus quod traditur sive agitur coram quocumque judice in scripturam redactio."

This formality is requisite to the validity of certain donations inter vivos. Escriche, voc. Insinuacion.

INSINUATION. In Civil Law. The transcription of an act on the public registers, like our recording of deeds. It was not necessary in any other alienation but that appropriated to the purpose of donation. Inst. 2. 7. 2; Pothier, Traité des Donations, Entre Vifs, sec. 2, art. 3, § 3; 8 Toullier, n. 198.

INSINUATION OF A WILL. In Civil Law. The first production of it; or, leaving it in the hands of the register in order to its probate. 21 Hen. VIII. c. 5; Jacob, Law Dict.

INSOLVENCY. The condition of a person who is insolvent (q. v.). Inability to pay one's debts.

Bankruptcy, which is one species or phase of insolvency, denotes the condition of a trader or merchant who is unable to pay his debts in the course of business; 2 Bell, Com. 162; 1 M. & S. 338; Herrick v. Borst, 4 Hill (N. Y.) 650; Thompson v. Thompson, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 134. Insolvency, then, as distinguished from strict bankruptcy, is the condition or status of one who is unable to pay his debts; and insolvent laws are distinguished from strict bankruptcy laws by the following characteristics:

Bankruptcy laws apply only to traders or merchants; insolvent laws, to those who are not traders or merchants. Bankrupt laws discharge absolutely the debt of the honest debtor; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. (U. S.) 230, 6 L. Ed. 606; Le Roy v. Crowninshield, 2 Mas. 161, Fed. Cas. No. 8,269; Pugh v. Bussel, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 394; Van Hook v. Whitlock, 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 43, 37 Am. Dec. 246; 4 B. & Ald. 654; Baldw. 296. Insolvent laws discharge the person of the debtor from arrest and imprisonment, but leave the future acquisitions of the debtor still liable to the creditor; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 122, 4 L. Ed. 529; Pollitt v. Parsons, 2 H. & J. (Md.) 61. Both laws contemplate an equal, fair, and honest division of the debtor's present effects among his creditors pro rata. A bankrupt law may contain those regulations which are generally found in insolvent laws, and an insolvent law may contain those which are common to a bankrupt law; per Marshall, C. J., Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 195, 4 L. Ed. 529. And insolvent laws quite coextensive with the English bankrupt system have not been infrequent in our colonial and state legislation, and no distinction was ever attempted to be made in the same between bankruptcies and insolvencies; 3 Sto. Const. 11; Bish. Insolv. Debt. 4.

Under the United States constitution the power to pass a bankrupt law is vested in congress, and this is held to include power to pass an act which provides for voluntary bankruptcy, or, strictly speaking, an insolvent law. So in the absence of congressional action, the states have passed laws which, though called insolvent laws, were in fact bankrupt laws, and their right to do so has been sustained, such laws being held valid; see BANKRUPT; except as limited by the prohibition against impairing the obligation of contracts, which title see; see also Cook v. Moffat, 5 How. (U. S.) 295, 12 L. Ed. 159; Hall v. Boardman, 14 N. H. 38; Savoye v. Marsh, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 594, 43 Am. Dec. 451. Stone v. Tibbetts, 26 Me. 110; Towne v. Smith, 1 Woodb. & M. 115, Fed. Cas. No. 14,115; Larrabee v. Talbott, 5 Gill (Md.) 437, 46 Am. Dec. 637; Baldwin v. Hale, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 229, 17 L. Ed. 531; Cooley, Const. Lim. 360; Miller, Const. U. S. 616.

U. S. Bankruptcy Act of 1898 supersedes all state insolvent laws from the date of its passage; Parmenter Mfg. Co. v. Hamilton, 172 Mass. 178, 51 N. E. 529, 70 Am. St. Rep. 258.

So far as the jurisdiction of the state extends, its insolvent laws may have all the essential operation of a bankrupt law, not being limited to a mere discharge of the person of the debtor on surrendering his effects. And a creditor out of a state who voluntarily makes himself a party and accepts a dividend, is bound by his own act, and is deemed to have waived his ex-territorial immunity and right; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 122, 4 L. Ed. 529; Braynard v. Marshall, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 194; Norton v. Cook, 9 Conn. 314, 23 Am. Dec. 342; Pugh v. Bussel, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 394; Browne v. Stackpole, 9 N. H. 478. See 4 B. & Ald. 654;

Van Hook v. Whitlock, 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 43, 37 Am. Dec. 246; Scribner v. Fisher, 2 Gray (Mass.) 43; Beer v. Hooper, 32 Miss. 246.

The effect of a discharge upon non-resident creditors is examined in 6 Harv. L. Rev. 349, containing a very complete list of cases, to that date and concluding that it is the generally accepted doctrine that, in such case, a discharge will be of no effect (even in the courts of the state where the discharge is granted) against a non-resident, unless he becomes a party by voluntary appearance or personal service. The correctness of this conclusion, though it is admitted as established, is seriously challenged on grounds of expediency which are stated at large.

Where a discharge under a state insolvency law is obtained, it does not discharge the debt of a non-resident creditor who refuses to prove its claim in such proceedings; Bergner & Engel Brewing Co. v. Dreyfus, 172 Mass. 154, 51 N. E. 531, 70 Am. St. Rep. 251.

Insolvency may of course be simple or notorious. Simple insolvency is attended by no badge of notoriety. Notorious or legal insolvency, with which the law has to do, is designated by some public act or legal proceeding. This is the situation of a person who has done some notorious act to divest himself of all his property: as, making an assignment, applying for relief, or having been proceeded against in invitum under bankrupt or insolvent laws; Bish. Insolv. Debt. 3, n.; Thelusson v. Smith, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 396, 4 L. Ed. 271; 7 Toullier, n. 45; Domat, liv. 4, tit. 5, nn. 1, 2; 2 Bell, Com. 165.

It is with regard to the latter that the insolvency laws (so called) are operative. They are generally statutory provisions by which the property of the debtor is surrendered for his debts; and upon this condition, and the assent of a certain proportion of his creditors, he is discharged from all further liabilities; Bartlet v. Prince, 9 Mass. 431; Otis v. Warren, 16 Mass. 53; 2 Kent 321; Ingr. Insolv. 9. This legal insolvency may exist without actual inability to pay one's debts when the debtor's estate is finally settled and wound up. (See definition). Insolvency, according to some of the state statutes, may be of two kinds, voluntary and involuntary. The latter is called the proceeding against the creditor in invitum. Voluntary insolvency, which is the more common, is the case in which the debtor institutes the proceedings, and is desirous of availing himself of the insolvent laws, and petitions for that purpose.

Involuntary insolvency is where the proceedings are instituted by the creditors in invitum, and so the debtor forced into insolvency. The circumstances entitling either debtor or creditors to invoke the aid of the insolvent law are in a measure peculiar to each state. But their general characteristics are as follows:

Proceedings by creditors may usually be taken for fraudulent concealment, conveyance, or collusive attachment, of property; by petition in the designated tribunal, on notice to the debtor; possession of the property is taken by an officer of the courts, usually after proof of the allegations, and a meeting of creditors is called for the choice of an assignee by a vote of creditors, having relation both to number and amount. The assignee becomes practically the owner, in trust, with power to wind up the estate; he acts under the general direction of the court, calling meetings of creditors when required. The right to a discharge varies in different states, in some being conditioned upon payment of a certain percentage or the assent of the majority of creditors or upon more stringent conditions in case of subsequent insolvency. The statutes vary as to the grounds of refusing a discharge for fraud, as in cases of paying or securing debts within a certain time before the application, or when the debtor is insolvent, or has reasonable cause to believe himself so. As to all these details the state statutes should be referred to.

As to American and English bankrupt law proper, see BANKRUPT LAWS; BANKRUPT.

The English act 34 Geo. III. ch. 69, was called an insolvent debtor's act; but the first insolvency act properly so called was passed in 1826. The act of 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 70, called "an act for facilitating arrangements between debtor and creditor," is properly an insolvency law. This provided for the discharge of a non-trading debtor if he had a certain concurrence from his creditors. This was one-third, both in value and number, to the initiatory steps. To the discharge, a proportional consent at an initiatory meeting, and, finally, the consent of three-eighths in both number and value, or nine-tenths in value of creditors to the sum of twenty pounds and upwards.

Many of the states have laws for the distribution of insolvent estates, and also laws for the relief of poor debtors. These are not properly called insolvent laws in the sense in which we have used the words,—though the latter relieve the debtor's body from restraint upon a surrender of his goods and estate, and leave his future acquisitions still liable. See POOR DEBTORS.

INSOLVENT (Lat. in, privative, solvo, to pay). The condition of a person who is unable to pay his debts. 2 Bla. Com. 285, 471; Brouwer v. Harbeck, 9 N. Y. 589.

One who is unable to pay his debts as they fall due in the usual course of trade or business. 2 Kent 389; 1 M. & S. 338; Lee v. Kilburn, 3 Gray (Mass.) 600; Mitchell v. Bradstreet Co., 116 Mo. 226, 22 S. W. 358, 724, 20 L. R. A. 138, 38 Am. St. Rep. 592; although his assets in value exceed the amount of his liability; In re Ramazzina, 110 Cal. 488, 42 Pac. 970; or the embarrassment is only temporary; Langham v. Lanier, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 4, 26 S. W. 255; but it is held that mere inability to pay debts promptly as they mature is not conclusive; Mensing v. Atchison (Tex.) 26 S. W. 509; that one who has sufficient property subject to legal process to satisfy all legal demands is not insolvent; Smith v. Collins, 94 Ala. 394, 10

South. 334; and that a person who suspended business because of difficulties arising out of the commencement of an action was not necessarily an insolvent; American Waterworks Co. of New Jersey v. Venner, 18 N. Y. Supp. 379.

One who is unable to pay commercial paper in the due course of business is insolvent; Warren v. Nat. Bank, 10 Blatchf. 493, Fed. Cas. No. 17,202; Clarke v. Mott (Cal.) 33 Pac. 884.

A corporation is insolvent when its assets are insufficient for the payment of its debts, and it has ceased to do business, or has taken, or is in the act of taking, a step which will practically incapacitate it from conducting the corporate enterprise with reasonable prospect of success, or its embarrassments are such that early suspension and failure must ensue; Corey v. Wadsworth, 99 Ala. 68, 11 South. 350, 23 L. R. A. 618, 42 Am. St. Rep. 29.

A bank is insolvent when the cash value of its assets realizable in a reasonable time is not equal to its liabilities exclusive of stock liabilities; Ellis v. State, 138 Wis. 513, 119 N. W. 1110, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 444, 131 Am. St. Rep. 1022. An allegation that a corporation cannot pay its current obligations as they mature is sufficient for insolvency proceedings in equity; American Can Co. v. Preserving Co., 171 Fed. 540.

The clearing house rules, making members responsible for clearances of outside banks, for which they engage to clear, for one day after notice of the termination of their agreement, require payment of checks of such outside bank though known to be insolvent; and a contract for a deposit by the latter of cash and notes as indemnity for such clearances is valid, and the payments are not within a statute forbidding payments by an insolvent corporation made with intent to prefer creditors, and the money and securities held under the aforesaid contract are applicable to the amount of the checks so paid; O'Brien v. Grant, 146 N. Y. 163, 40 N. E. 871, 28 L. R. A. 361.

An insolvent building association may make an assessment on stock of a borrowing member to cover losses, and thereby equalize the members, so that they may go out on an equal footing at the closing up of the association; Wohlford v. Sav. Ass'n, 140 Ind. 662, 40 N. E. 694, 29 L. R. A. 177.

INSPECTION (Lat. inspicere, to look into). The examination of certain articles made by law subject to such examination, so that they may be declared fit for commerce. Quoted in Patapsco Guano Co. v. Board of Agriculture, 171 U. S. 345, 356, 18 Sup. Ct. 862, 43 L. Ed. 191.

The decision of the inspectors is not final; the object of the law is to protect the community from fraud, and to preserve the character of the merchandise abroad; Clintsman v. Northrop, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 45. See Griswold v. Ins. Co., 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 205; Hancock v. Sturges, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 331; Seaman v. Patten, 2 Cai. (N. Y.) 312. Quantity is as legitimate a subject of inspection as quality; State v. Ins. Co., 40 La. Ann. 465, 4 South. 504.

In Practice. Examination. As to the right to inspect public records, see RECORDS.

INSPECTION LAWS. The right in the states to enact inspection laws, quarantine and health laws is undoubted and is recognized in the constitution; Story, Const. 515; Cooley, Const. Lim. 730. These may be carried to the extent of ordering the destruction of private property, when infected with disease or otherwise dangerous; id.; Thurlow v. Massachusetts, 5 How. (U. S.) 632, 12 L. Ed. 256.

The object of such laws is "to improve the quality of articles produced by the labor of the country; to fit them for exportation, or it may be for domestic use"; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 203, 6 L. Ed. 23; to protect the community from frauds and impositions, and, as to articles designed for exportation, to preserve our reputation in foreign markets; Clintsman v. Northrop, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 46.

Whenever inspection laws act on the subject before it becomes an article of commerce, they are confessedly valid; and also when, although operating on articles in interstate commerce, they provide for inspection under the police power of a state in the interest of public health etc.; Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, 10 Sup. Ct. 862, 34 L. Ed. 455; Patapsco Guano Co. v. Board of Agriculture, 171 U. S. 345, 18 Sup. Ct. 862, 43 L. Ed. 191; so as to oleomargarine inspection; Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461, 15 Sup. Ct. 154, 39 L. Ed. 223; so as to a statute regulating the sale of commercial fertilizers for the protection of the public; Steiner v. Ray, 84 Ala. 93, 4 South. 172, 5 Am. St. Rep. 332; Vanmeter v. Spurrier, 94 Ky. 22, 21 S. W. 337. A Virginia act for the inspection of flour was held invalid because it required the inspection of flour from other states when it was not required from the native product; Voight v. Wright, 141 U. S. 62, 11 Sup. Ct. 855, 35 L. Ed. 638; a statute for the inspection of fertilizers was held not applicable where the sale and delivery were without the state; Martin v. Guano Co., 77 Ga. 257.

An inspection law (hides) affecting interstate commerce, is not, for that reason, invalid unless it is in conflict with an act of congress, or is an attempt to regulate interstate commerce; New Mexico v. R. Co., 203 U. S. 38, 27 Sup. Ct. 1, 51 L. Ed. 78. Congress has not enacted any legislation destroying the right of a state to provide for the inspection of cattle and prohibiting the bringing in of diseased cattle not inspected and passed as healthy either by state or national officials; Asbell v. Kansas, 209 U. S. 251, 28 Sup. Ct. 485, 52 L. Ed. 778, 14 Ann. Cas. 1101.

A state may declare that certain articles shall not be sold within its limits without inspection, and charge the cost of the inspection on those offering the article for sale; Patapsco Guano Co. v. Board of Agriculture, 52 Fed. 690. The question of the constitutionality of an inspection law affecting interstate commerce depends not only upon whether the excess proceeds of the tax may be used for other purposes, but whether they are actually so used; Foote v. Maryland, 232 U. S. 494, 34 Sup. Ct. 377, 58 L. Ed. —. If it has a real relation to the protection of the people and is reasonable, it is not invalid because it may incidentally affect interstate commerce, provided it does not conflict with legislation enacted by congress pursuant to its constitutional authority; Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, 32 Sup. Ct. 790, 56 L. Ed. 1182. Prima facie the charge is reasonable; Red "C." Oil Mfg. Co. v. Board, 222 U. S. 380, 32 Sup. Ct. 152, 56 L. Ed. 240.

A state cannot, under the guise of exerting its police powers, or of enacting inspection laws, make discrimination against the products and industries of some of the states in favor of the products and industries of its own or of other states; Brimmer v. Rebman, 138 U. S. 78, 11 Sup. Ct. 213, 34 L. Ed. 862; Voight v. Wright, 141 U. S. 62, 11 Sup. Ct. 855, 35 L. Ed. 638.

See POLICE POWER; COMMERCE; LICENSE.

INSPECTOR. The name given to certain officers whose duties are to examine and inspect things over which they have jurisdiction: as, inspector of bark, one who is by law authorized to examine bark for exportation, and to approve or disapprove of its quality. Inspectors of customs are officers appointed by the general government.

INSPEXIMUS (Lat.). We have seen. A word sometimes used in letters patent, reciting a grant, inspeximus such former grant, and so reciting it verbatim: it then grants such further privileges as are thought convenient. 5 Co. 54.

Inspeximus charters appear to have originated in 11 Henry III, when he announced to all religious and other persons who wished to enjoy their liberties that they must renew their charters under the king's new seal. A renewal tax was levied.

It was not until the time of Edward I that such charters became common; in the 13th year of his reign their various forms were prescribed by parliament. An inspeximus is nothing more than a royal acknowledgment of having seen some diplomas granted by the king, or one of his predecessors, which he confirms under the great seal, etc.; A. M. Eaton in 1902 Am. Bar Ass'n Rep. 310. They were also called charters of confirmation.

INSTALLATION, INSTALMENT. The act by which an officer is put in public possession of the place he is to fill. The president of the United States, or a governor, is installed into office, by being sworn agreeably to the constitution and laws.

INSTALMENT. A part of a debt due by contract, and agreed to be paid at a time different from that fixed for the payment of the other part. For example, if I engage to pay you one thousand dollars, in two payments, one on the first day of January and the other on the first day of July, each of these payments or obligations to pay will be an instalment.

In such case, each instalment is a separate debt so far that it may be tendered at any time, or the first may be sued for although the other shall not be due; 3 Dane, Abr. 493, 494; 1 Esp. 129; 1 Maule & S. 706.

Successive actions may be brought for instalments as they fall due; but all sums due when an action is begun must be included in it; Puckett v. Annuity Ass'n, 134 Mo. App. 501, 114 S. W. 1039. See SALES; PERFORMANCE; INDEPENDENT PROMISES.

INSTANCE. Literally, standing on, hence, urging, solicitation. Webster, Dict.

In Civil and French Law. In general, all sorts of actions and judicial demands. Dig. 44, 7, 58.

In Ecclesiastical Law. Causes of instance are those proceeded in at the solicitation of some party, as opposed to causes of office, which run in the name of the judge. Halif. Anal. p. 122.

INSTANCE COURT. In English Law. That branch of the admiralty court which had the jurisdiction of all matters except those relating to prizes.

The term is sometimes used in American law for purposes of explanation, but has no proper application to admiralty courts in the United States, where the powers of both instance and prize courts are conferred without any distinction; Glass v. The Betsy, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 6, 1 L. Ed. 485; The Emulous, 1 Gall. 563, Fed. Cas. No. 4,479; 3 Kent 355, 378. See ADMIRALTY.

INSTANCIA. In Spanish Law. The institution and prosecution of a suit from its inception until definitive judgment. The first instance, "primera instancia," is the prosecution of the suit before the judge competent to take cognizance of it at its inception: the second instance, "secunda instancia," is the exercise of the same action before the court of appellate jurisdiction; and the third instance, "tercera instancia," is the prosecution of the same suit, either by an application of revision before the appellate tribunal that has already decided the cause, or before some higher tribunal, having jurisdiction of the same.

All civil suits must be tried and decided, in the first instance, within three years; and all criminal, within two years.

As a general rule, three instances are admitted in all civil and criminal cases. Art. 285, Const. 1812.

INSTANTER (Lat.). Immediately; presently. This term, it is said, means that the act to which it applies shall be done within twenty-four hours; but a doubt has been suggested by whom is the account of the hours to be kept, and whether the term instanter as applied to the subject-matter may not be more properly taken to mean "before the rising of the court," when the act is to be done in court, or "before the shutting of the office the same night," when the act is to be done there; 6 East 587; Tidd, Pr., 3d ed. 508, n.; 3 Chitty, Pr. 112. See 3 Burr. 1809; Co. Litt. 157.

INSTANTLY. Immediately; directly; without delay; at once. The word is a frequent occurrence in indictments for murder where the death is charged as having been the immediate result of a wound or blow inflicted. Where the killing has been alleged to have been caused by a battery it is necessary to allege an assault and to specify the time when the mortal stroke was given and the time of the death; the allegation that he "instantly did die" is insufficient; Lester v. State, 9 Mo. 666; as was an indictment which described the assault and then charges that of the mortal wound inflicted by defendant the deceased "did instantly die;" State v. Lakey, 65 Mo. 217; otherwise had the averment been that the deceased "did then and there instantly die"; State v. Steeley, 65 Mo. 218, 27 Am. Rep. 271. 8 Dowl. 157; 11 Ad. & El. 127; 3 Per & Dav. 52.

INSTAR (Lat.). Like; resembling; equivalent: as, instar dentium, like teeth; instar omnium, equivalent to all.

INSTIGATION. The act by which one incites another to do something, as, to injure a third person, or to commit some crime or misdemeanor, to commence a suit, or to prosecute a criminal. See ACCOMPLICE.

INSTITOR (Lat.). In Civil Law. A clerk in a store; an agent.

He was so called because he watched over the business with which he was charged; and it is immaterial whether he was employed in making a sale in a store, or whether charged with any other business. Institor appellatus est ex eo, quod negotio gerendo instet; nec multum facit tabernæ sit præpositus, an cuilibet alii negotiationi; Dig. lib. 14, tit. 3, 1, 3. Mr. Bell says that the charge given to a clerk to manage a store or shop is called institorial power; 1 Bell, Com. 479, 5th ed.; Erskine, Inst. 3. 3. 46; 1 Stair, Inst. by Brodie, b. 1, tit. 11, §§ 12, 18, 19; Story, Ag. § 8.

INSTITUTE. In Scotch Law. The person first called in the tailzie; the rest, or the heirs of tailzie, are called substitutes; Erskine Pr. 3. 8. 8. See TAILZIE, HEIR OF; SUBSTITUTES.

In Civil Law. One who is appointed heir by testament, and is required to give the estate devised to another person, who is called the substitute.

To name or to make an heir by testament; Dig. 28. 5. 65. To make an accusation; to commence an action.

INSTITUTES. Elements of jurisprudence; text-books containing the principles of law made the foundation of legal studies.

The word was first used by the civilians to designate those books prepared for the student and supposed to embrace the fundamental legal principles arranged in an orderly manner. Two books of Institutes were known to the civil lawyers of antiquity,—Gaius and Justinian.

I. COKE'S INSTITUTES. Four volumes of commentaries upon various parts of the English law.

Sir Edward Coke wrote four volumes of Institutes, as he was pleased to call them, though they have little of the institutional method to warrant such a title. The first volume is a very extensive commentary upon an excellent little treatise of tenures, compiled by Judge Littleton in the reign of Edw. IV. This comment is a rich mine of valuable common-law learning, collected and heaped together from the ancient reports and year-books, but greatly defective in method. The second volume is a comment on many old acts of parliament, without any systematic order; the third, a more methodical treatise on the pleas of the crown; and the fourth, an account of the several species of courts. These Institutes are usually cited thus: the first volume as Co. Litt., or 1 Inst.; the second, third, and fourth as, 2, 3, or 4 Inst., without any author's name. 1 Bla. Com. 72.

II. GAIUS'S INSTITUTES. A tractate upon the Roman law, ascribed to Caius or Gaius.

Of the personal history of this jurist nothing is known. Even the spelling of his name is matter of controversy, and he is known by no other title than Gaius, or Caius. He is believed to have lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius. The history of Gaius's Institutes is remarkable. In 1816, Niebuhr was sent to Rome by the king of Prussia. On his way thither, he spent two days in the cathedral library of Verona, and at this time discovered these Institutes, which had been lost to the jurists of the middle ages. In 1817, the Royal Academy of Berlin charged Goeschen, Bekker, and Hollweg with the duty of transcribing the discovered manuscript. In 1819, Goeschen gave the first completed edition, as far as the manuscript could be deciphered, to his fellow-jurists. It created an unusual sensation, and became a fruitful source of comment. It formed a new era in the study of Roman law. It gave the modern jurist the signal advantage of studying the source of the Institutes of Justinian. It is believed by the best modern scholars that Gaius was the first original tractate of the kind, not being compiled from former publications. The language of Gaius is clear, terse, and technical,—evidently written by a master of law and a master of the Latin tongue. The Institutes were unquestionably practical. There is no attempt at criticism or philosophical discussion: the disciple of Sabinus is content to teach law as he finds it. Its arrangement is solid and logical, and Justinian follows it with an almost servile imitation.

The best editions of Gaius are Goeschen's 2d ed., Berlin, 1824, in which the text was again collated by Bluhme, and the 3d ed. of Goeschen, Berlin, 1842, edited by Lachman from a critical revision by Goeschen which had been interrupted by his death. Gneist's edition (1857) is a recension of all the German editions prior to that date. In France, Gaius attracted equal attention, and we have three editions and translations: Boulet, Paris, 1827; Demangeat, 1866; and Pellat, 1870.

In 1859, Francesco Lisi, a learned Italian scholar, published, at Bologna, a new edition of the first book of Gaius, with an Italian translation en régard. The edition is accompanied and enriched by many valuable notes, printed in both Latin and Italian.

See also Abdy & Walker; S. F. Harris; Muirhead; T. L. Mears, Gaius, Poste's translation, 1890.

III. JUSTINIAN'S INSTITUTES are an abridgment of the Code and Digest, composed by order of that emperor and under his guidance, with an intention to give a summary knowledge of the law to those persons not versed in it, and particularly to students. Inst. Proem. § 3.

The lawyers employed to compile it were Tribonian, Theophilus, and Dorotheus. The work was first published on the 21st of November, 533, and received the sanction of statute law by order of the emperor. They are divided into four books: each book is divided into titles, and each title into separate paragraphs or sections, preceded by an introductory part. The first part is called principium, because it is the commencement of the title; those which follow are numbered, and called paragraphs. The work treats of the rights of persons, of things, and of actions. The first book treats of persons; the second, third, and the first five titles of the fourth book, of things; and the remainder of the fourth book, of actions. The method of citing the Institutes should be understood, and is now commonly by giving the number of the book, title, and section, thus: Inst. I. 2. 5.—thereby indicating book I. title 2, section 5. Where it is intended to indicate the first paragraph, or principium, thus: Inst. B. I. 2. pr. Frequently the citation is simply I. or J. I. 2. 5. A second mode of citation is thus: § 5, Inst. or I. I. 2.—meaning book I, title 2, paragraph 5. A third method of citation, and one in universal use with the older jurists, was by giving the name of the title and the first words of the paragraph referred to, thus: § senatusconsultum est I de jure nat. gen. et civil.—which means, as before, Inst. B. I. tit. 2, § 5. See 1 Colquhoun, s. 61.

The first printed edition of the Institutes is that of Schoyffer, fol. 1468. The last critical German edition is that of Schrader, 4to, Berlin, 1832. This work of Schrader is the most learned and most elaborate commentary on the text of Justinian in any language, and was intended to form a part of the Berlin Corpus Juris. It is impossible in this brief article to name all the commentaries on these Institutes, which in all ages have commanded the study and admiration of jurists. More than one hundred and fifty years ago one Homberg printed a tract De Multitudine nimia Commentatorum in Institutiones Juris. But we must refer the reader to the best recent French and English editions. Ortolan's Institutes de l'Empereur Justinien avec le texte, la traduction en régard, et les explications sous chaque paragraphe, Paris, 3 vols., 8th Ed. 1870; Sohm's Institutes by Ledlie, 1892. This is, by common consent of scholars, regarded as the best historical edition of the Institutes ever published. Du Caurroy's Institutes de Justinien traduites et expliquées par A. M. Du Caurroy, Paris, 1851, 8th ed. 2 vols. 8vo. The Institutes of Justinian: with English Introduction, Translation, and Notes, by Thomas Collet Sandars, M. A. London, 1853, 8vo; 9th Ed. 1898, 1910. This work has been prepared expressly for beginners, and is founded mainly upon Ortolan, with a liberal use of LaGrange, Du Caurroy, Warnkoenig, and Puchta, as well as Harris and Cooper. The English edition of Harris, and the American one of Cooper, have ceased to attract attention. See J. B. Moyle's Institutiones Justiniani.

The most authoritative German treatises on the Pandects are the following: Windscheid, Dr. B., 3d ed., Dusseldorff, 1875; 2 vols.; Vangerow, Dr. K. A., 7th ed., Marburg, 1869; Brintz, Dr. A. B., 2d ed., Erlangen, 1879; Ihering, Dr. R., Jena, 1881. Incomparably the most philosophical exposition of the Roman system of jurisprudence is Savigny's Gesch. des röm. Rechts, coupled with his System des heut. röm. Rechts, the latter published in Berlin in 1840. Of both, French translations have been published by Guenoux. See also Sandars' Justinian, with an introduction by William G. Hammond (1876), and Abdy and Walker's translation of the Institutes (1876), and T. L. Mears.

IV. THEOPHILUS' INSTITUTES. A paraphrase of Justinian, made, it is believed, soon after A. D. 533.

It is generally supposed that in A. D. 534, 535; and 536, Theophilus read his commentary in Greek to his pupils in the law school of Constantinople. He is conjectured to have died some time in A. D. 536. This paraphrase maintained itself as a manual of law until the eighth or tenth century. This text was used in the time of Hexabiblos of Harmenipulus, the last of the Greek jurists. It is also conjectured that Theophilus was not the editor of his own paraphrase, but that it was drawn up by some of his pupils after his explanations and lectures, inasmuch as it contains certain barbarous phrases, and the texts of the manuscripts vary greatly from each other.

It has, however, always been somewhat in use, and jurists consider that its study aids the text of the Institutes; and Cujas and Hugo have both praised it. The first edition was that of Zuichem, fol., Basle, 1531; the best edition is that of Reitz, 2 vols. 4to, 1751, Haag. There is a German translation by Wüsterman, 1823, 2 vols. 8vo; and a French translation by Mons. Hrégier, Paris, 1847, 8vo, whose edition is prefaced by a learned and valuable introduction and dissertation. Consult Mortreuil, Hist. Du Droit Byzan., Paris, 1843; Smith, Dict. Biog. London, 1849, 3 vols. 8vo; 1 Kent 533; Profession d'Avocat, tom. ii. n. 536, page 95; Introd. á l'Etude du Droit Romaine, p. 124; Dict. de Jurisp.; Merlin, Répert.; Encyclopédie de d'Alembert.

INSTITUTION (Lat. instituere, to form, to establish).

In Civil Law. The appointment of an heir; the act by which a testator nominates one or more persons to succeed him in all his rights active and passive. Halifax, Anal. 39; Pothier, Tr. des Donations testamentaires, c. 2, s. 1, § 1; La. Civ. Code, 1598; Dig. 28. 5; 1, 1; 28. 6. 1, 2, § 4.

In Ecclesiastical Law. To become a parson or vicar, four things are necessary, viz.: holy orders, presentation, institution, induction. Institution is a kind of investiture of the spiritual part of the benefice; for by institution the care of the souls of the parish is committed to the charge of the clerk,—previous to which the oath against simony and of allegiance and supremacy are to be taken. By institution the benefice is full: so that there can be no fresh presentation (except the patron be the king), and the clerk may enter on parsonage-house and glebe and take the tithes; but he cannot grant or let them, or bring an action for them, till induction. See 1 Bla. Com. 389; 1 Burn, Eccl. Law 169.

In Political Law. A law, rite, or ceremony enjoined by authority as a permanent rule of conduct or of government: as, the Institutions of Lycurgus. Webster, Dict. An organized society, established either by law or the authority of individuals, for promoting any object, public or social. A private school or college may, by curtesy, be called an institution; but in legal parlance it implies foundation by law, by enactment or prescription; one may open and keep a private school, but cannot properly be said to institute it; Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 70, 1 N. W. 92, 50 N. W. 1103.

In Practice. The commencement of an action: as, A B has instituted a suit against C D to recover damages for trespass.

INSTRUCTIONS. Orders given by a principal to his agent in relation to the business of his agency.

The agent is bound to obey the instructions he has received; and when he neglects so to do he is responsible for the consequences, unless he is justified by matter of necessity; Dusar v. Perit, 4 Binn. (Pa.) 361; 1 Liverm. Ag. 368. See AGENT.

In Practice. The statement of a cause of action given by a client to his attorney, and which, where such is the practice, are sent to his pleader to put into legal form of a declaration. Warren, Law Stud. 284.

Instructions to counsel are their indemnity for any aspersions they may make on the opposite party; but attorneys who have a just regard to their own reputation will be cautious, even under instructions, not to make any unnecessary attack upon a party or witness. For such unjustifiable conduct the counsel will be held responsible. Eunom. Dial. 2, § 43, p. 132. For a form of instructions, see 3 Chitty, Pr. 117, 120, n.

Also the written or oral address of the presiding judge, in jury trials, delivered usually at the close of the arguments of counsel to the jury, informing them of the law applicable to the cause at trial, and their duties thereunder. A. & E. Encyc.

An omission to give instructions is not assignable as error where no request was made therefor in the court below; State v. Jackson, 112 N. C. 851, 17 S. E. 149; Bailey v. State, 26 Tex. App. 706, 9 S. W. 270; Duncombe v. Powers, 75 Ia. 185, 39 N. W. 261; Stuckslager v. Neel, 123 Pa. 53, 16 Atl. 94; State v. Johnson, 37 Minn. 493, 35 N. W. 373; People v. Fice, 97 Cal. 459, 32 Pac. 531; and errors or inaccuracies in charging the jury cannot be considered on appeal unless duly excepted to on the trial; State v. Hair, 37 Minn. 351, 34 N. W. 893; Georgia Pac. R. Co. v. West, 66 Miss. 310, 6 South. 207; Paddleford v. Cook, 74 Ia. 433, 38 N. W. 137; Frauenthal v. Bridgeman, 50 Ark. 348, 7 S. W. 388; Schroeder v. Rinehard, 25 Neb. 75, 40 N. W. 593; Chemical Co. of Canton v. Johnson, 101 N. C. 223, 7 S. E. 770, 775; a refusal to give instructions not excepted to cannot be complained of on appeal; Burns v. People, 126 Ill. 282, 18 N. E. 550. Where a charge correctly states the law of the case, a judgment will not be reversed because the charge was abstract; Bonner v. State, 97 Ala. 47, 12 South. 408; State v. King, 111 Mo. 576, 20 S. W. 299; but an instruction is wrong which states hypothetically facts as to which there is no evidence; Jackson v. State, 88 Ga. 784, 15 S. E. 677; State v. Brackett, 45 La. Ann. 46, 12 South. 129. It is not error to recall a jury and charge them again at their request; Caston v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 304, 20 S. W. 585. The improper admission of evidence is cured by an instruction not to consider the evidence so admitted; Shepard v. Ry. Co., 77 Ia. 54, 41 N. W. 564; Durant v. Mining Co., 97 Mo. 62, 10 S. W. 484; Dismukes v. State, 83 Ala. 287, 3 South. 671. Refusal to give correct instructions is not error if the court has already given them on the same point; Bener v. Edgington, 76 Ia. 105, 40 N. W. 117; People v. Madden, 76 Cal. 521, 18 Pac. 402; Beck v. State, 76 Ga. 452; Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Wright, 115 Ind. 394, 16 N. E. 145, 17 N. E. 584, 7 Am. St. Rep. 432; Va. Midland R. Co. v. White, 84 Va. 498, 5 S. E. 573, 10 Am. St. Rep. 874; or where given in different words; Grand Trunk Ry. Co. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 408, 12 Sup. Ct. 679, 36 L. Ed. 485; Anthony v. R. Co., 132 U. S. 172, 10 Sup. Ct. 53, 33 L. Ed. 301.

The principles governing the subject of peremptory instructions were clearly stated by Harlan, J., in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Randolph, 78 Fed. 754, 24 C. C. A. 305:

"It is well settled that if, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the court refuses to give a peremptory instruction for the defendant, such refusal cannot be assigned for error if the defendant does not stand upon the case made by the plaintiff, but introduces evidence in support of his defence" (citing Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Cummings, 106 U. S. 700, 1 Sup. Ct. 493, 27 L. Ed. 266; Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527, 7 Sup. Ct. 685, 30 L. Ed. 740; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Callaghan, 161 U. S. 91, 16 Sup. Ct. 493, 40 L. Ed. 628). "But the failure of the defendant, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, to ask a peremptory instruction will not, of itself, preclude such a motion at the close of the whole evidence." Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Randolph, 78 Fed. 759, 24 C. C. A. 305.

"A mere scintilla of evidence in favor of one party does not entitle him of right to go to the jury" (citing Schuylkill & D. Imp. & R. Co. v. Munson, 14 Wall. [U. S.] 442, 448, 20 L. Ed. 867). Nor can it "be withdrawn from the consideration of the jury simply because, in the judgment of the court, there is a preponderance of evidence in favor of the party asking a peremptory instruction. If the facts are entirely undisputed or uncontradicted, or if, upon any issue dependent upon facts, there is no evidence whatever in favor of one party, or, what is the same thing, if the evidence is so slight as to justify the court in regarding the proof as substantially all one way, then the court may direct a verdict according to its view of the law arising upon such a case. If a verdict is rendered contrary to the evidence, the remedy of the losing party is a motion for a new trial." 78 Fed. 759, 24 C. C. A. 305.

The conclusions were thus stated:

"That there must be something more than a scintilla of evidence supporting the case of the party upon whom the burden of proof rests, to require the submission of the case to the jury; that where there is a real conflict of evidence on a question of fact, whatever may be the opinion of the judge who tries the case as to the value of that evidence, he must leave the consideration of it for the decision of the jury; that where there are material and substantial facts which, if credited by the jury, would in law justify a verdict in favor of one party, it is not error for the trial judge to refuse a peremptory instruction to the jury; that it is not a 'proper standard to settle for a peremptory instruction that the court, after weighing the evidence in the case, would, upon motion for a new trial, set aside the verdict,' and that the court 'may, and often should, set aside a verdict, when clearly against the weight of the evidence, where it would not be justified in directing a verdict'; that, upon reason and authority, 'there is a difference between the legal discretion of the court to set aside a verdict as against the weight of evidence, and that obligation which the court has to withdraw a case from the jury, or direct a verdict for insufficiency of evidence'; and that 'in the latter case it must be so insufficient in fact as to be insufficient in law.'" 78 Fed. 760, 24 C. C. A. 305 (citing Mt. Adams & E. P. Inclined R. Co. v. Lowery, 74 Fed. 463, 20 C. C. A. 596).

In French Law. The means used and formality employed to prepare a case for trial. It is generally applied to criminal cases, and is then called criminal instruction; it is then defined the acts and proceedings which tend to prove positively a crime or delict, in order to inflict on the guilty person the punishment which he deserves.

INSTRUMENT. A document or writing which gives formal expression to a legal act or agreement, for the purpose of creating, securing, modifying, or terminating a right; a writing executed and delivered as the evidence of an act or agreement.

The writing which contains some agreement, and is so called because it has been prepared as a memorial of what has taken place or been agreed upon. It includes bills, bonds, conveyances, leases, mortgages, promissory notes, and wills, but scarcely accounts, ordinary letters or memoranda. The agreement and the instrument in which it is contained are very different things,—the latter being only evidence of the existence of the former. The instrument or form of the contract may be valid, but a contract itself may be void on account of fraud. See Ayliffe, Parerg. 305; Dun. Adm. Pr. 220. A forthcoming bond is an "instrument for the payment of money." Coe v. Straus, 11 Wis. 72. A bank check payable in confederate currency was held not "an instrument payable in money" under the Alabama Code in relation to commercial paper; Bank of Mobile v. Brown, 42 Ala. 108.

A statute requiring "any instrument of writing" sued on to be filed, does not apply to a contract signed by both parties and deposited with a third person for safe keeping, it applies only to obligations executed only by the party sued; Bowling v. Hax, 55 Mo. 446.

INSTRUMENT OF SASINE. An instrument in Scotland by which the delivery of "sasine" (i. e. seisin) is attested. Moz. & W.

INSTRUMENTA (Lat.). That kind of evidence which consists of writings not under seal: as, court-rolls, accounts, and the like. 3 Co. Litt., Thomas ed. 487.

INSUFFICIENCY. In Chancery Practice. After filing of defendant's answer, the plaintiff has six weeks in which to file exceptions to it for insufficiency,—which is the fault of not replying specifically to specific charges in the bill. Smith, Ch. Pr. 344; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 376, note. Sanders, Ord. in Ch., Index; Beach, Mod. Eq. Pr. 413.

Under the Judicature Act, 1875, order xxxi., rules 6, 9, 10, interrogatories are to be answered by affidavit, and if the party interrogated answers insufficiently, the party interrogating may apply to the court for an order requiring him to answer further. Moz. & W.

INSULA (Lat. island). A house not connected with other houses, but separated by a surrounding space of ground. Calvinus, Lex.

INSULAR POSSESSIONS. See PHILIPPINES; PORTO RICO; TERRITORY.

INSUPER. Moreover; over and above. An old exchequer term, applied to a charge made upon a person in his account. Blount.

INSURABLE INTEREST. Such an interest in a subject of insurance as will entitle the person possessing it to obtain insurance.

It is essential to the contract of insurance, as distinguished from a wager, that the assured should have a legally recognizable interest in the insured subject, the pecuniary value of which may be appreciated and computed or valued. An earlier examination of the subject, as connected with life insurance, results in the conclusion from the authorities, that at common law that contract was not one of indemnity, and wagering policies were not unlawful, and therefore that logically, in such policies, an insurable interest should not be required, but that the American courts adopted what has been termed a rule of American common law that all wagers were void on grounds of public policy and, therefore, that there must be an insurable interest; 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 65. This rule, it was said, obtains in all the states except New Jersey and Rhode Island; Trenton Mut. Life & Fire Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 24 N. J. L. 576; Mowry v. Home Life Ins. Co., 9 R. I. 354; and see Clark v. Allen, 11 R. I. 439, 23 Am. Rep. 496.

Absence of an insurable interest is always a defense for the insurer even though there is an incontestible clause; Bromleys' Adm'r v. Life Ins. Co., 122 Ky. 402, 92 S. W. 17, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 747, 121 Am. St. Rep. 467, 12 Ann. Cas. 685.

The case of Godsall v. Boldero, 9 East 72, was so generally cited and relied on in the American cases that it is not easy to estimate the influence of that case before it was overruled by Dalby v. I. & L. L. Assurance Company, 15 C. B. 365. It is of special interest to note that the New Jersey case in which the court expressly refused to follow Godsall v. Boldero, was decided about the time of the case which overruled it, but before it was reported in the United States. See also 2 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 1530, where both the English cases mentioned are reported, and the authorities in both countries are collected, the conclusion of the American editors being, that as to fire, marine, and life insurance there must be some interest in the insurer. See also Biddle, Ins. § 184, where it is said that wagering policies were not void in England at common law. See WAGER.

Where the subject-matter is property, as in fire and marine insurance, the question whether there is an insurable interest is generally free from difficulty and the rule established by the decisions is comparatively simple. It is not requisite that the insured party should have an absolute property in the insured subject, or that the subject or interest should be one that can be exclusively possessed or be transferable by delivery or assignment. Insurable interest involves neither legal nor equitable title; Carter v. Ins. Co., 12 Ia. 287; Pedrick v. Fisher, 1 Sprague 565, Fed. Cas. No. 10,900. The subject or interest must, however, be such that it may be destroyed, lost, damaged, diminished, or intercepted by the risks insured against. The interests usually insured are those of the owner in any species of property, of mortgagor, mortgagee, holder of bottomry or respondentia bond, of an agent, consignee, lessee, factor, carrier, bailee, or party having a lien or entitled to a rent or income, or being liable to a loss depending upon certain conditions or contingencies, or having the certainty or probability of a profit or pecuniary benefit depending on the insured subject; 1 Phill. Ins. c. 3; 11 E. L. & Eq. 2; 48 id. 292; Cobb v. Ins. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 192; Allen v. Ins. Co., 2 Md. 111; Rohrbach v. Ins. Co., 62 N. Y. 47, 20 Am. Rep. 451; Home Protection of North Ala. v. Caldwell Bros., 85 Ala. 607, 5 South. 338; California Ins. Co. v. Compress Co., 133 U. S. 387, 10 Sup. Ct. 365, 33 L. Ed. 730. Property subject to a deed of trust is encumbered under a provision against a chattel mortgage, and the insured has not unconditional and sole ownership; Hunt v. Fire Ins. Co., 196 U. S. 47, 25 Sup. Ct. 179, 49 L. Ed. 381. See Clymer Opera Co. v. Fire Ins. Co., 238 Pa. 137, 85 Atl. 1111.

It was formerly held that the interest in property insured must exist when the insurance was effected, and also at the time of the loss; Howard v. Ins. Co., 3 Den. (N. Y.) 301; Chrisman v. Ins. Co., 16 Or. 283, 18 Pac. 466; Folsom v. Ins. Co., 38 Me. 414; Biddle, Ins. § 157. This is not now the rule;

Arnould, Ins. 59; and in a case in which the insurance was upon a cargo, "on account of whom it may concern," the author just cited is approvingly quoted by Mr. Justice Swayne to the effect that, "it is now clearly established that an insurable interest, subsisting during the risk and at the time of loss, is sufficient, and the assured need not also allege or prove that he was interested at the time of effecting the policy," and he adds, "This is consistent with reason and justice, and is supported by analogies of the law in other cases." Hooper v. Robinson, 98 U. S. 528, 25 L. Ed. 219; Sun Ins. Office of London v. Merz, 64 N. J. L. 301, 45 Atl. 785, 52 L. R. A. 330.

It has been held that there is an insurable interest in an attaching creditor; 86 Me. 518; a purchaser in possession under a contract of sale; Dupuy v. Ins. Co., 63 Fed. 680; Quinn v. Parke & Lacy Machinery Co., 5 Wash. 276, 31 Pac. 866; Carpenter v. Ins. Co., 135 N. Y. 298, 31 N. E. 1015; 21 Can. S. C. R. 288; a person admitted as a partner, though the consideration was unpaid; Hanover Fire Ins. Co. v. Shrader, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 255, 31 S. W. 1100, 32 S. Dec. 507; but the interests are independent and insurance by the mortgagor cannot be claimed by the mortgagee; McDonald v. Black's Adm'r, 20 Ohio 185, 55 Am. Dec. 448; where the mortgagor insures and makes the loss payable to the mortgagee, as his interest may appear, the company is estopped to deny the insurable interest; Appleton Iron Co. v. Assurance Co., 46 Wis. 23, 1 N. W. 9, 50 N. W. 1100; a mortgagor who conveys subject to the mortgage, has an insurable interest in the real estate, being liable to the mortgagee for any deficiency; Hanover Fire Ins. Co. v. Bohn, 48 Neb. 743, 67 N. W. 774, 58 Am. St. Rep. 719. A partner may have an insurable interest in a building erected by the partnership on land of the other partner; Converse v. Ins. Co., 10 Cush. (Mass.) 37; and an agent in control may insure the property in his own name; Roberts v. Ins. Co., 165 Pa. 55, 30 Atl. 450, 44 Am. St. Rep. 642; a master of a ship on his right to primage on freight; Pedrick v. Fisher, 1 Sprague 565, Fed. Cas. No. 10,900; or a half-owner of property in possession, may, if so authorized by the other owners, insure all the property in his own name; Hebner v. Ins. Co., 55 Ill. App. 275.

A partnership has been held to have no insurable interest in household furniture and wearing apparel of one of the partners; Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Hall, 94 Ga. 630, 21 S. E. 828; so also an administratrix in real estate of the intestate; Bradford v. Ins. Co., 8 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 261, note; a charterer, who advances on the personal credit of the owner, who must pay, without regard to the issue of the voyage; Lee v. Barreda, 16 Md. 190; a stockholder as an individual in the property of the corporation; Philips v. Ins. Co., 20 Ohio 174. It was held that an interest in the profit to be derived by the insured from the adventure of laying an Atlantic cable was insurable; though the insured was a shareholder in the company and would derive his profits from dividends; L. R. 2 Exch. 139.

Life Insurance. The insurable interest in life insurance rests upon a different basis from that on property. It has been said "that while in fire and marine insurance it is the interest and not the thing that is insured, in life insurance it is the thing and not the interest;" 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 79.

With regard to the nature and amount of interest necessary for a policy of life insurance, no definite general principle seems yet to have been established, though the classes of insurable interests have been increasing. Every person has an insurable interest in his own life; Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 561, 24 L. Ed. 287; Union Fraternal League v. Walton, 109 Ga. 1, 34 S. E. 317, 46 L. R. A. 424, 77 Am. St. Rep. 350; Bloomington Mut. Ben. Ass'n v. Blue, 120 Ill. 121, 11 N. E. 331, 60 Am. Rep. 558; Campbell v. Life Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 381; Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 6, 56 Am. Rep. 192; 1 Moo. & Rob. 481. It has been a much mooted question whether the beneficiary must have an interest. It has been held in many cases that a person may insure his own life and pay the premiums, for a beneficiary designated by him; Campbell v. Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 381; Gambs v. Life Ins. Co., 50 Mo. 44; Olmsted v. Keyes, 85 N. Y. 593; and there are dicta to this effect, frequently referred to, of Sharswood, J., American & Health Ins. Co. v. Robertshaw, 26 Pa. 189, and Paxson, J., in Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 6, 56 Am. Rep. 192. To the contrary are Gilbert v. Moose's Adm'rs, 104 Pa. 74, 49 Am. Rep. 570; Watson v. Mut. Life Ass'n, 21 Fed. 698; and see Mutual Benefit Ass'n v. Hoyt, 46 Mich. 473, 9 N. W. 497, and a dictum in Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 561, 24 L. Ed. 287. If the beneficiary pays the premiums, it is generally held that he must have an interest; Goldbaum v. Leon, 79 Tex. 638, 15 S. W. 564; Amick v. Butler, 111 Ind. 578, 12 N. E. 518, 60 Am. Rep. 722; Riner v. Riner, 166 Pa. 617, 31 Atl. 347, 45 Am. St. Rep. 693. See Biddle, Ins. § 194; 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 79, where the authorities are collected.

It was held that when the policy is caused by the assured to be issued to another, the effect is the same as if issued to the applicant and assigned to the other, and an insurable interest is not required; Classey v. Ins. Co., 84 Hun 350, 32 N. Y. Supp. 335. A member of a beneficial association may change the beneficiary according to the rule and substitute a new one without regard to insurable interest; 22 Wash. L. R. 329; and where the policy was for the benefit of the insured unless he sustained a fatal accident, and in that case to a nephew, the latter contingency having happened, the nephew was not required to show an insurable interest; American Employers' Liability Ins. Co. v. Barr, 68 Fed. 873, 16 C. C. A. 51.

The interest required to support an insurance on the life of another has been found by the courts difficult to define, and indeed as was said they "have left it very much undefined;" Mowry v. Ins. Co., 9 R. I. 346. Many attempts to formulate a definition have been made, but they are similar mainly in their vagueness and generality. One of those most quoted was that of Chief Justice Shaw, in Loomis v. Ins. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 396: "It must appear that the insured has some interest in the life of the cestui que vie; that his temporal affairs, his just hopes and well-grounded expectations of support, of patronage, and advantages in life will be impaired so that the real purpose is not a wager, but to secure such advantage, supposed to depend on the life of another; such, we suppose, would be sufficient to prevent it from being regarded as a mere wager. . . . We cannot doubt that a parent has an interest in the life of a child, and, vice versa, a child in that of a parent, not merely on the ground of a provision of law that parents and grandparents are bound to support their lineal kindred when they may stand in need of relief, but upon considerations of strong morals and the force of natural affection between near kindred, operating often more efficaciously than those of positive law." This was quoted with approval in Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. Ed. 251, and in the opinion, Bradley, J., added some observations not more definite: "Precisely what interest is necessary in order to take a policy out of the category of a mere wager has been the subject of much discussion. In marine and fire insurance the difficulty is not so great, because there insurance is considered as strictly an indemnity. But in life insurance the loss can seldom be measured by pecuniary values. Still, an interest of some sort in the insured life must exist. A man cannot take out insurance on the life of a total stranger, nor on that of one who is not so connected with him as to make the continuance of the life a matter of some real interest to him. . . . Indeed, it may be said generally that any reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit or advantage from the continued life of another creates an insurable interest in such life. . . . The essential thing is, that the policy shall be obtained in good faith, and not for the purpose of speculating upon the hazard of a life in which the insured has no interest." In the same court, later, Field, J., in Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. Ed. 924, says: "It may be stated generally, however, to be such an interest arising from the relations of the party obtaining the insurance, either as creditor of or surety for the assured, or from the ties of blood or marriage to him, as will justify a reasonable expectation of advantage or benefit from the continuance of his life. It is not necessary that the expectation of advantage or benefit should be always capable of pecuniary estimation. . . . But in all cases there must be a reasonable ground, founded on the relations of the parties to each other, either pecuniary or of blood or affinity, to expect some benefit or advantage from the continuance of the life of the assured." The last quotation was approved in Appeal of Corson, 113 Pa. 438, 6 Atl. 213, 57 Am. Rep. 479.

Notwithstanding the high authority both of these judges and the courts for which they were speaking, their utterances have been characterized as dicta, and such they are technically, but they undoubtedly fairly represent the views of those courts and all others who recognize that the interest may be based upon kinship and need not be pecuniary. Any effort to extract a more precise definition from the American cases is likely to end in the conclusion of another able judge, who said: "The question, what is such an interest in the life of another as will support a contract of insurance upon the life, is one to which a complete and satisfactory answer, resting upon sound principles, can hardly yet be said to have been given;" Hoar, J., in Forbes v. Ins. Co., 15 Gray (Mass.) 249, 77 Am. Dec. 360.

In England a pecuniary interest is required and must be proved; [1892] 1 Q. B. 864; with the possible exception that it is presumed in case of a wife who insures the life of her husband; Peake, Add. Cas. 70. The American courts take a less restricted view as shown by the definitions quoted, but no certain rule can be stated and the cases must be referred to, to ascertain whether any given relationship has been held sufficient.

A creditor may always insure the life of the debtor; Ulrich v. Reinoehl, 143 Pa. 238, 22 Atl. 862, 13 L. R. A. 433, 24 Am. St. Rep. 534; Martin v. Stubbings, 126 Ill. 387, 18 N. E. 657, 9 Am. St. Rep. 620; Rittler v. Smith, 70 Md. 261, 16 Atl. 890, 2 L. R. A. 844; Mace v. Life Ass'n, 101 N. C. 122, 7 S. E. 674; and in such case it has been termed a contract of indemnity, differing from other life insurance; Sharswood, J., in 4 Big. L. & Ac. Cas. 458; but this would be only as to the creditor; 15 C. B. 365; Goldbaum v. Leon, 79 Tex. 638, 15 S. W. 564; Crotty v. Ins. Co., 144 U. S. 621, 12 Sup. Ct. 749, 36 L. Ed. 566; and it is said that there is no further interest after the payment of the debt; id.; Ulrich v. Reinoehl, 143 Pa. 238, 22 Atl. 862, 13 L. R. A. 433, 24 Am. St. Rep. 534; but the question of interest is determined at the time of insurance and not of loss; see infra; Biddle, Ins. § 189. When the debtor pays the premiums, and assigns the policy as collateral security, the policy is in trust for him, and he is entitled to have it delivered up to him on payment; L. R. 5 Ch. App. 32; but it is otherwise if the creditor pays the premiums and there is no agreement for redemption; 2 De G. & J. 582; Appeal of Corson, 113 Pa. 438, 6 Atl. 213, 57 Am. Rep. 479.

In cases other than these of creditors it may be said, in the language of Mr. Justice Bradley, that any reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit or advantage from the continued life of another creates an insurable interest in such life; Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. Ed. 251; United Brethren Mut. Aid Soc. v. McDonald, 122 Pa. 324, 15 Atl. 439, 1 L. R. A. 238, 9 Am. St. Rep. 111; Bevin v. Ins. Co., 23 Conn. 244; Valton v. Assurance Society, 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 9; McKee v. Ins. Co., 28 Mo. 383, 75 Am. Dec. 129; 28 E. L. & Eq. 312; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. O'Brien, 92 Mich. 584, 52 N. W. 1012.

It has been held that there was an insurable interest in a tenant, in the life of the landlord who had a life estate; Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 6, 56 Am. Rep. 192; or of one partner in the life of another; Valton v. Assurance Co., 20 N. Y. 32; whose interest was not fully paid for; Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Luchs, 108 U. S. 498, 2 Sup. Ct. 949, 27 L. Ed. 800; Bevin v. Ins. Co., 23 Conn. 244; Trenton Mut. Life & Fire Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 24 N. J. L. 576.

When an adequate interest exists at the time of the insurance, it is immaterial if there occur before death a diminution or entire cessation of it; Sides v. Ins. Co., 16 Fed. 650; Rawls v. Ins. Co., 27 N. Y. 282, 84 Am. Dec. 280; Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. Ed. 251; and see note by J. D. Brannan on the last case in 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 399. But see Chrisman v. Ins. Co., 16 Or. 283, 18 Pac. 466.

On the subject of relationship there is little but confusion. It is said to be only of importance as tending to give rise to a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit from the continuance of the life of the insured; May, Ins. § 107; Bliss, Ins. § 31; United Brethren Mut. Aid Soc. v. McDonald, 122 Pa. 324, 15 Atl. 439, 1 L. R. A. 238, 9 Am. St. Rep. 111; Rombach v. Ins. Co., 35 La. Ann. 233, 48 Am. Rep. 239; or when there is a legal claim on the insured for support or service; id.; Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. v. Brant, 47 Mo. 419, 4 Am. Rep. 328; Keystone Mut. Benefit Ass'n v. Norris, 115 Pa. 446, 8 Atl. 638, 2 Am. St. Rep. 572. The interest has been held to exist in the case of a wife in the life of her husband; Central Nat. Bank v. Hume, 128 U. S. 195, 9 Sup. Ct. 41, 32 L. Ed. 370; McKee v. Ins. Co., 28 Mo. 383, 75 Am. Dec. 129 (but see Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. v. Brant, 47 Mo. 419, 4 Am. Rep. 328); Thompson v. Ins. Co., 46 N. Y. 674 (and see criticism of this case in 25 Am. L. Rev. 185 and 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 171); Wallace v.

Ins. Co., 97 Minn. 27, 106 N. W. 84, 3 L. R. A. (N. S) 478 (which he cannot after divorce compel her to relinquish); and the husband in the life of the wife; Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Paterson, 41 Ga. 338, 5 Am. Rep. 535; Currier v. Ins. Co., 57 Vt. 496, 52 Am. Rep. 134; the marriage gives an interest; Keystone Mut. Benefit Ass'n v. Norris, 115 Pa. 446, 8 Atl. 638, 2 Am. St. Rep. 572; Holabird v. Ins. Co., 2 Dill. 166, Fed. Cas. No. 6,587; and before marriage a feme sole has an interest in the life of her betrothed; Chisholm v. Ins. Co., 52 Mo. 213, 14 Am. Rep. 414; and so, semble, in Pennsylvania; Appeal of Corson, 113 Pa. 438, 6 Atl. 213, 57 Am. Rep. 479. As to other relations, it has been held that a son has an interest (on different grounds) in the life of his father; Appeal of Plymouth Mfg. Co., *81 Pa. 154; Guardian Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Hogan, 80 Ill. 35, 22 Am. Rep. 180; but not merely as son; id.; Continental Life Ins. Co. v. Volger, 89 Ind. 572, 46 Am. Rep. 185 (contra, Tucker v. Ins. Co., 50 Hun 50, 4 N. Y. Supp. 505); a father, in that of a minor son; Mitchell v. Ins. Co., 45 Me. 104, 71 Am. Dec. 529; or an adult son; Reserve Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kane, 81 Pa. 154, 22 Am. Rep. 741; Central Nat. Bank v. Hume, 128 U. S. 195, 9 Sup. Ct. 41, 32 L. Ed. 370; Loomis v. Ins. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 396; Grattan v. Ins. Co., 15 Hun (N. Y.) 74 (contra, in England, 1 Ch. D. 419); and the interest exists when relationship is by adoption; Hodge v. Ellis, 76 Ga. 272; as where the relation of father is assumed; Carpenter v. Ins. Co., 161 Pa. 9, 28 Atl. 943, 23 L. R. A. 571, 41 Am. St. Rep. 880; but a stepson has no interest in the life of his stepfather; United Brethren Mut. Aid Soc. v. McDonald, 122 Pa. 324, 15 Atl. 439, 1 L. R. A. 238, 9 Am. St. Rep. 111; nor a son-in-law in the life of the mother-in-law; Stambaugh v. Blake, 22 W. N. C. (Pa.) 407. A grandmother has an interest in the life of a grandchild; Burke v. Ins. Co., 155 Pa. 295, 26 Atl. 445; an old woman who lived with her daughter and the father-in-law of the latter, who had promised to keep her for life had an interest in his life; 16 Ins. L. J. 682. There is much difference of opinion as to brother and sister, but it is said that the relationship, without more, does not give an interest; Biddle, Ins. § 193; Lewis v. Ins. Co., 39 Conn. 100; Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 561, 24 L. Ed. 287; however, it has been held that a policy will stand if there is dependence, or indebtedness; Keystone Mut. Ass'n v. Beaverson, 16 W. N. C. (Pa.) 188; see Goodwin v. Ins. Co., 73 N. Y. 480; [1892] 1 Q. B. 864; the last being the case of a stepsister. No interest exists in case of uncle or aunt and nephew or niece; Riner v. Riner, 166 Pa. 617, 31 Atl. 347, 45 Am. St. Rep. 693; Singleton v. Ins. Co., 66 Mo. 63, 27 Am. Rep. 321; but an aunt who stands in loco parentis to a nephew has an insurable interest in his life; Weber v. Ins. Co., 172 Pa. 111, 33 Atl. 712. One who was merely the "protector of the deceased whenever he stood in need of protection" has no insurable interest in his life; [1899] A. C. 604.

An insurance procured by a religious society, supported largely by voluntary contributions, on the life of one of its members, is void; Trinity College v. Ins. Co., 113 N. C. 244, 18 S. E. 175, 22 L. R. A. 291. In the absence of any insurable interest, the law will presume that the policy was taken out for the purpose of a wager or speculation; United Brethren Mut. Aid Soc. v. McDonald, 122 Pa. 324, 15 Atl. 439, 1 L. R. A. 238, 9 Am. St. Rep. 111; and wagering contracts in life insurance are not valid; Crotty v. Ins. Co., 144 U. S. 621, 12 Sup. Ct. 749, 36 L. Ed. 566.

The amount of insurable interest is the value of the insured subject as agreed by the policy, or its market value, or the pecuniary loss to which the assured is liable by the risks insured against, though the insured subject—for example, life or health—has not a market value; Mead v. Ins. Co., 7 N. Y. 530; 2 Pars. Mar. Law, c. 2, sec. 2.

In insurance cases generally an interest must be averred and some proof thereof be made; Biddle, Ins. § 197, and cases cited; but on fire policies if the application or policy shows an interest, it is generally sufficient, prima facie; id.; and so it was held on a life policy; Lewis v. Ins. Co., 39 Conn. 100; and the fact that the policy was made payable to plaintiff made a prima facie case; Parks v. Ins. Co., 26 Mo. App. 511. The facts showing interest are to be determined by the jury; Mitchell v. Ins. Co., 32 Ia. 421; Guardian Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Hogan, 80 Ill. 37, 22 Am. Rep. 180; Shaak v. Meily, 26 W. N. C. (Pa.) 569.

The weight of authority is that a policy of life insurance may be assigned to one who has no insurable interest; Grigsby v. Russell, 222 U. S. 149, 32 Sup. Ct. 58, 56 L. Ed. 133, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 642, where all the cases are given in the brief of counsel. A policy of life insurance is not avoided by a cessation of insurable interest; id.; distinguishing Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457, 24 L. Ed. 251, and Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. Ed. 924.

See, generally, articles by Erskine Hazard Dickson, 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 65, 161.

INSURANCE. A contract whereby, for an agreed premium, one party undertakes to compensate the other for loss on a specified subject by specified perils.

"An agreement by which one party, for a consideration (which is usually paid in money either in one sum or at different times during the continuance of the contract of the risk), promises to make a certain payment of money upon the destruction or injury of something in which the other party has an interest." Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149, 160.

An insurance in relation to property is a contract whereby the insurer becomes bound, for a definite consideration, to indemnify the insured against loss or damage, to a certain property named in the policy, by reason of certain perils to which it may be exposed. Dover Glass-Works Co. v. Ins. Co., 1 Marv. (Del.) 32, 29 Atl. 1039, 65 Am. St. Rep. 264.

"In fire insurance and marine insurance the thing insured is property; in life or accident insurance, it is the life or health of a person. In either case neither the time and amounts of payments by the assured, nor the modes of estimating or securing the payment of the sum to be paid by the insurer, affect the question whether the agreement between them is a contract of insurance. All that is requisite to constitute such a contract is the payment of the consideration by the one, and the promise of the other to pay the amount of the insurance upon the happening of injury to the subject by a contingency contemplated in the contract;" Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 160; Masonic Association v. Taylor, 2 S. D. 324, 15 N. W. 93; Physicians Defense Co. v. Cooper, 199 Fed. 576, 118 C. C. A. 50.

Any one sui juris and capable of contracting generally may be insured, but insurance has been held not to be a necessary for which an infant might contract and be held liable against his option on coming of age; N. H. Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Noyes, 32 N. H. 345; Monaghan v. Ins. Co., 53 Mich. 238, 18 N. W. 797. In recent years, contracts of insurance by married women have been generally held valid, usually under statutes; McQuitty v. Ins. Co., 15 R. I. 573, 10 Atl. 635; Queen Ins. Co. v. Young, 86 Ala. 424, 5 South. 116, 11 Am. St. Rep. 51; Commercial Ins. Co. v. Spankneble, 52 Ill. 53, 4 Am. Rep. 582; Charter Oak Life Ins. Co. v. Brant, 47 Mo. 419, 4 Am. Rep. 328.

Any one otherwise capable of contracting may become an insurer, and formerly the business was largely conducted by partnerships, but, with the exception of risks taken at Lloyds (q. v.) and some other large partnerships, the business is now conducted, mainly, by insurance companies (q. v.), though, in England, quasi corporations organized under the Joint Stock Companies Acts insure under the authority of letters patent securing limited liability. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

The insurer is sometimes called the underwriter, and the insured, the assured. The agreed consideration is called the premium; the written contract, a policy; the events insured against, risks or perils; and the subject, right, or interest to be protected, the insurable interest. See these several titles. As to insured and assured, see Connecticut Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Luchs, 108 U. S. 504, 2 Sup. Ct. 949, 27 L. Ed. 800.

The policy is usually issued upon the application (q. v.) of the insured in writing, which contains the statement of facts entering into and forming a part of the contract.

It is reasonable to stipulate in a fire insurance policy that, if any statements made by the applicant are untrue, the policy shall be void; Deming Inv. Co. v. Ins. Co., 16 Okl. 1, 83 Pac. 918, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 607.

A renewal reinstates the original contract with all its terms and also incorporates into it the new terms expressed in the renewal application and representations contained therein become part of the contract; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. McTague, 49 N. J. L. 587, 9 Atl. 766, 60 Am. Rep. 661.

It is not a false representation for a pregnant woman to state she is in sound bodily health, and she is not required to inform the company of her pregnancy; Merriman v. Grand Lodge, 77 Neb. 544, 110 N. W. 302, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, 124 Am. St. Rep. 867, 15 Ann. Cas. 124.

See REPRESENTATION; WARRANTY.

Whether facts concealed or misstated in an application are material is a question for the jury; State Ins. Co. of Des Moines v. Du Bois, 7 Colo. App. 214, 44 Pac. 756.

The happening of the event insured against and the consequent damage to the subject-matter, is termed the loss (q. v.).

Where the insurance is on property, an alienation will terminate the contract unless the insurance be transferred with the consent of the underwriter. See ASSIGNMENT. An alienation of part of the property or diminution of the interest of the insured will not, in the absence of an express condition, avoid the policy; Pennsylvania Fire Ins. Co. v. Dougherty, 102 Pa. 568; Ætna Fire Ins. Co. v. Tyler, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 385, 30 Am. Dec. 90; Sides v. Ins. Co., 16 Fed. 650; Gordon v. Ins. Co., 2 Pick. (Mass.) 249; Tiefenthal v. Ins. Co., 53 Mich. 306, 19 N. W. 9; 14 U. C. Q. B. 342; 25 Beav. 444; and the sale of a part does not avoid a policy forbidding merely "sale or transfer;" Quarrier v. Ins. Co., 10 W. Va. 507, 27 Am. Rep. 582; Blackwell v. Ins. Co., 48 Ohio St. 533, 29 N. E. 278, 14 L. R. A. 431, 29 Am. St. Rep. 574.

There is usually a clause, varying in exact terms, forbidding any change in title or possession, and, in such case, the sale of an undivided half interest is within its meaning and avoids the policy; McEwan v. Ins. Co., 1 Mich. N. P. 118; but a distinction has been taken between a sale of an interest in property and a sale of the property, and the assignment by a new partner to his firm of his insured property as firm assets was not a forfeiture; Scanlon v. Union Fire Ins. Co., 4 Biss. 511, Fed. Cas. No. 12,436; Savage v. Ins. Co., 52 N. Y. 502, 11 Am. Rep. 741. Clauses against alienation are conditions precedent; Lett v. Ins. Co., 125 N. Y. 82, 25

N. E. 1088; Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Bethel, 42 Ill. App. 475; and the question usually is whether there is a sale outright or by reason of something in the nature of a defeasance, either in law or by contract, the insured has not wholly parted with the property. As to such cases it is difficult, if not impossible, to lay down any general rule, and each case must be governed by the application of the general principles of the law of contracts and conditions to the particular form of the policy and the facts of the case. If there is, in fact, a total alienation, the opinion or motives of the parties in respect to it are not material; Langdon v. Fire Ins. Ass'n, 22 Minn. 193. A conveyance upon a condition to be performed before title vests will not avoid; Tittemore v. Ins. Co., 20 Vt. 546; so where the owner of an equity of redemption sells with a stipulation for payment of the mortgage by the purchaser and is compelled to take back the title for non-performance; Worthington v. Bearse, 12 Allen (Mass.) 382, 90 Am. Dec. 152; or where, for other reasons, the sale is not carried out and there is a reconveyance before loss; Power v. Ins. Co., 19 La. 28, 36 Am. Dec. 665; but see Davidson v. Ins. Co., 71 Ia. 532, 32 N. W. 514, 60 Am. Rep. 818.

An executory contract to convey the insured property with a consideration fully paid, but no transfer of title or possession, is not a change in interest, title or possession within the meaning of a forfeiture clause; Garner v. Ins. Co., 73 Kan. 127, 84 Pac. 717, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 654, 117 Am. St. Rep. 460, 9 Ann. Cas. 459; nor is the filing of a voluntary petition in bankruptcy where the fire occurs before the appointment of the receiver or trustee; Gordon v. Ins. Co., 120 La. 441, 45 South. 384, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 827, 124 Am. St. Rep. 434, 14 Ann. Cas. 886. Such conditions will apply to a mortgagee although there is a slip attached to the policy making the loss payable to him; Brecht v. Ins. Co., 160 Fed. 399, 87 C. C. A. 351, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 197; where property is insured in a trade name, a change in the personnel of the partners avoids the policy; American Steam Laundry Co. v. Ins. Co., 121 Tenn. 13, 113 S. W. 394, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 442; although the trade name is continued by the new owners; id. Void means voidable and the insurer must with reasonable promptness notify the assured of its intention to avoid the policy and tender the unearned premium which it has received; Glens Falls Ins. Co. v. Michael, 167 Ind. 659, 74 N. E. 964, 79 N. E. 905, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 708.

Policies of insurance also usually contain conditions for forfeiture in case of incumbrance without notice, or in case the property be "levied upon or taken into possession or custody," and such conditions are valid; Dover Glass-Works Co. v. Ins. Co., 1 Marv. (Del.) 32, 29 Atl. 1039, 65 Am. St. Rep. 264. Where the property insured is subject to deeds of trust and there is a condition in the policy against a chattel mortgage, it was held that they were one and the same thing; Hunt v. Ins. Co., 196 U. S. 47, 25 Sup. Ct. 179, 49 L. Ed. 381. A breach renders the policy void; id.; Gray v. Assur. Co., 82 Hun 380, 31 N. Y. Supp. 237; and the question whether the execution of a mortgage increased the risk is immaterial; Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. Niewedde, 12 Ind. App. 145, 39 N. E. 757; breach of any promissory warranty avoids the policy irrespective of its materiality; McKenzie v. Ins. Co., 112 Cal. 548, 44 Pac. 922; nor does it matter that the loss was not produced or contributed to by the breach; Cogswell v. Chubb, 1 App. Div. 93, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1076. A judgment recovered in invitum is not within such condition; Gerling v. Ins. Co., 39 W. Va. 689, 20 S. E. 691; but a confession of judgment is; Hench v. Ins. Co., 122 Pa. 128, 15 Atl. 671, 9 Am. St. Rep. 74; and an agreement by one heir to pay the other heirs, in instalments, for property taken under a will; Renninger v. Ins. Co., 168 Pa. 350, 31 Atl. 1083. A technical seizure where the possession is unchanged is not an avoidance; Caraher v. Ins. Co., 63 Hun 82, 17 N. Y. Supp. 858; Smith v. Ins. Co., 89 Pa. 287; 5 Ont. App. 605. A provision for forfeiture for the levy of an execution relates to personalty and not to land; Colt v. Fire Ins. Co., 54 N. Y. 595; Hammel v. Ins. Co., 54 Wis. 72, 11 N. W. 349, 41 Am. Rep. 1.

Under these conditions, a breach as to part of the insured property, which is not destroyed or injured, may not avoid the policy as to another part unaffected by the breach. Thus it was held that a recovery, under a live-stock policy, for a cow killed would not be prevented by the existence of incumbrances, in violation of a covenant in the policy, where the property actually lost was not encumbered; German Ins. Co. v. Fairbank, 32 Neb. 750, 49 N. W. 711, 29 Am. St. Rep. 459. Such contract is severable and any breach of the condition would avoid only as to such property as was covered by the incumbrance; Schuster v. Ins. Co., 102 N. Y. 260, 6 N. E. 406; Perry v. Ins. Co., 11 Fed. 478; 46 U. C. Q. B. 334; 10 Ont. 236; Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Walsh, 54 Ill. 164, 5 Am. Rep. 115. The same principle applies to the defence that the property insured was sold and conveyed; if the contract is severable, a breach as to one part does not operate as a defence with respect to property not included; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Grimes, 33 Neb. 340, 50 N. W. 168.

In insurance on manufacturing establishments it is usual to stipulate for avoidance if operations should cease without the consent of the insurer, and such provision is valid and is violated though a watchman was employed and the risk not increased; Dover Glass Works Co. v. Ins. Co., 1 Marv.

(Del.) 32, 29 Atl. 1039, 65 Am. St. Rep. 264; and the same is true of all conditions which are warranties. As to the distinction between representation and warranty and the law as to both, see those titles; and as to increase of risk, see RISKS AND PERILS.

Insurance on buildings or their contents is usually upon condition that if the former is suffered to be vacant or unoccupied, the policy will be void. In such case the forfeiture does not depend upon the insured's knowledge of the fact of vacancy; Schuermann v. Ins. Co., 161 Ill. 437, 43 N. E. 1093, 52 Am. St. Rep. 377; and a purchaser of the house and assignee of the policy is bound by the condition; Ranspach v. Ins. Co., 109 Mich. 699, 67 N. W. 967. Temporary absence of a tenant will not work a forfeiture; Huber v. Assur. Co., 92 Hun 223, 36 N. Y. Supp. 873; Burlington Ins. Co. v. Lowery, 61 Ark. 108, 32 S. W. 383, 54 Am. St. Rep. 196; nor will merely sleeping in the house occasionally and daily visits of the owner's wife to get provisions prevent forfeiture; Agricultural Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, 82 Md. 88, 33 Atl. 429, 30 L. R. A. 633, 51 Am. St. Rep. 457; or visits twice a day by an employé; Stapleton v. Ins. Co., 16 Misc. 483, 38 N. Y. Supp. 973. The insurer cannot establish a forfeiture without proving that the premises were unoccupied for any purpose; Pabst Brewing Co. v. Ins. Co., 2 Mo. App. 934. Buildings are vacant where the occupant has moved his family because of sickness with the intention of returning, and although he himself returns nearly every day; Knowlton v. Ins. Co., 100 Me. 481, 62 Atl. 289, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 517; so of the removal of a tenant, although the insured owner has no notice of such removal; Ohio Farmers' Ins. Co. v. Vogel, 166 Ind. 239, 76 N. E. 977, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 966, 117 Am. St. Rep. 382, 9 Ann. Cas. 91.

Keeping on hand certain articles is usually prohibited, either specifically or as a class. The breach of a condition against keeping inflammable substances does not prevent recovery, when the use of the particular substance was a necessary and usual incident of the subject insured; Maril v. Ins. Co., 95 Ga. 604, 23 S. E. 463, 30 L. R. A. 835, 51 Am. St. Rep. 102; as the use of gasoline, in a silverplating business, one day's supply only being brought in at once; Fraim v. Ins. Co., 170 Pa. 151, 32 Atl. 613, 50 Am. St. Rep. 753; or keeping an inflammable substance for sale as was customary where there was a clause, written in ink on the policy, containing the words "merchandise such as is usually kept in a country store;" Yoch v. Ins. Co., 111 Cal. 503, 44 Pac. 189, 34 L. R. A. 857; Faust v. Ins. Co., 91 Wis. 158, 64 N. W. 883, 30 L. R. A. 783, 51 Am. St. Rep. 876; Mascott v. Ins. Co., 68 Vt. 253, 35 Atl. 75.

The use of a gasoline torch by a painter will not avoid the policy, where the work has continued for less than the fifteen days allowed for repairs; Garrebrant v. Ins. Co., 75 N. J. L. 577, 67 Atl. 90, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 443; but the storing of seed cotton by a tenant, against a provision in the policy, even without the knowledge of the insured, will avoid it; Edwards v. Ins. Co., 128 Ga. 353, 57 S. E. 707, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 484, 119 Am. St. Rep. 385, 10 Ann. Cas. 1036; a temporary increase of hazard, which ceases before the loss, will not prevent recovery; Sumter Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Assurance Co., 76 S. C. 76, 56 S. E. 654, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 736, 121 Am. St. Rep. 941, 11 Ann. Cas. 780. Where a typewritten rider stipulated for insurance on such articles as are usually kept in a painter's shop, it prevailed against a printed condition against keeping benzine on the premises; Mascott v. Ins. Co., 68 Vt. 253, 35 Atl. 75.

As to hazardous and extra-hazardous risks, generally, see RISKS AND PERILS.

Iron Safe Clause. In order to promote the accurate adjustment of the loss, there is usually included in policies of insurance, on such property as a stock of merchandise, what is known as the "iron safe clause," which, in one form or another, provides that the books of the insured showing all business transactions, and the last inventory of the business, shall be kept in a fireproof safe at night and when the store is not opened for business. Such a clause is an express promissory warranty; Farmers' Fire Ins. Co. v. Bates, 60 Ill. App. 39; Home Ins. Co. of New Orleans v. Cary, 31 S. W. 321; but a substantial compliance only is required; Royal Ins. Co. v. Brown, 36 S. W. 591. Keeping the books in the safe at night, does not mean from sunrise to sunset, but from the close of business of the day according to custom; Jones v. Ins. Co., 38 Fed. 19; and where according to custom the door was locked but customers could get in by knocking, and the clerk who was in the store writing up books was absent for a short time when the fire occurred, the store was "opened for business" and the policy was not void; Sun Ins. Co. v. Jones, 54 Ark. 376, 15 S. W. 1034. But where the insurance was on a stock of liquor in a saloon, it did not excuse the violation of the iron safe clause that the same books were kept for a hotel and the saloon, the latter being opened night and day except Sunday, and the books being needed for constant settlements with the guests in the hotel; Southern Ins. Co. v. Parker, 61 Ark. 207, 32 S. W. 507 (distinguishing the last two cases). The clause was held not to have been violated by failure to keep a blotter, containing the record of the sales of the day before, locked in the safe; Brown v. Ins. Co., 89 Tex. 590, 35 S. W. 1060 (reversing Palatine Ins. Co. v. Brown, 34 S. W. 462); where a cash sales book covering twenty-one days before the sale was inadvertently left out of the safe and burned, and the books were kept in a primitive manner but showed purchases and credit sales, some cash sales, and an inventory, taken shortly before the fire, it was held that a finding of compliance with the policy was warranted; Western Assur. Co. v. Redding, 68 Fed. 708, 15 C. C. A. 619; in another case it was said not to be an excuse for violation that through oversight the books were not put in the safe the night before the fire; Goldman v. Ins. Co., 48 La. Ann. 223, 19 South. 132.

Where the bookkeeper, fearing the safe would not stand, took out the books to remove them to a safe place, and some of them fell and were burned, it was held that the covenant was not broken unless he was negligent; East Texas Fire Ins. Co. v. Harris, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 647, 25 S. W. 720.

Where the application showed in answer to inquiry that the books were kept in a dwelling at night a breach of the condition was not enforced; Sprott v. Ins. Ass'n, 53 Ark. 215, 13 S. W. 799.

The insurer must prove that the fire occurred at a time mentioned in the stipulation; Allemania Fire Ins. Co. v. Fred, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 311, 32 S. W. 243.

The character of the safe is not warranted; Sneed v. Assurance Co., 73 Miss. 279, 18 South. 928; and it is sufficient if it be one of a kind ordinarily known as fireproof; Knoxville Fire Ins. Co. v. Hird, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 82, 23 S. W. 393.

The stipulation in such a clause, that a set of books should be kept, including a record of all business transactions, does not require a book known as a "cash book," or any particular system of bookkeeping; Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Ellington, 94 Ga. 785, 21 S. E. 1006. The lost inventory of the business, within this clause, means the lost inventory of the goods insured; Manchester Fire Ins. Co. v. Simmons, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 607, 35 S. W. 722. The clause is complied with, by an inventory made, and books kept from the date of the policy, but an invoice is not an inventory; Home Ins. Co. of New York v. Bank, 71 Miss. 608, 15 South. 932. The question whether there was reasonable time between the issue of the policy and the fire to make an inventory is for the jury unless the evidence is undisputed; Allen v. Ins. Co., 106 Mich. 204, 64 N. W. 15. Where the inventory was shown to the adjuster after the fire, and afterwards lost, there was a performance of the condition; Pelican Ins. Co. v. Wilkerson, 53 Ark. 353, 13 S. W. 1103. But where the books do not furnish the necessary data, to verify the accounts rendered, the policy is avoided; id. The clause is not complied with where only unitemized bills are kept; Coggins v. Ins. Co., 144 N. C. 7, 56 S. E. 506, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 839, 119 Am. St. Rep. 924; a requirement to keep a set of books which clearly and plainly represent a complete record of the business is a promissory warranty; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 127 Ga. 491, 56 S. E. 643, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 667, 9 Ann. Cas. 461; and where the balances from an old set of books were carried forward into a new set and the old ones were exposed to fire and lost, there is not a compliance with the requirements of the clause; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Mount, 90 Miss. 642, 44 South. 162, 45 South. 835, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 471.

Formal policy not required. Though a policy is the usual instrument by which insurance is effected, it is not necessary; First Baptist Church v. Ins. Co., 19 N. Y. 305; New England Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 25 Ind. 536; Succession of Hearing, 26 La. Ann. 326; and it may be evidenced by a memorandum or note; Goodall v. Ins. Co., 25 N. H. 169; 76 L. T. N. S. 228; State Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Porter, 3 Grant (Pa.) 123; or a letter; Connecticut Fire Ins. Co. v. Bennett, 1 Ohio N. P. 71; 14 L. C. Jur. 219. Where the correspondence was held sufficient to create a valid contract for a policy of fire insurance, it was held that, after the property had been destroyed by fire, the insured was entitled to a decree for the amount agreed to be insured, less premium; Eames v. Ins. Co., 94 U. S. 621, 24 L. Ed. 298. In the absence of a statute forbidding it, it may be verbal; Henning v. Ins. Co., 2 Dill. 26, Fed. Cas. No. 6,366; Hamilton v. Ins. Co., 5 Pa. 339 (though this had been questioned; Smith v. Odlin, 4 Yeates [Pa.] 468); Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Farrish, 73 Ill. 166; Relief Fire Ins. Co. v. Shaw, 94 U. S. 574, 24 L. Ed. 291; Croft v. Ins. Co., 40 W. Va. 508, 21 S. E. 854, 52 Am. St. Rep. 902; Amazon Ins. Co. v. Wall, 31 Ohio St. 633, 27 Am. Rep. 533; overruling Cockerill v. Ins. Co., 16 Ohio, 148; Potter v. Ins. Co., 63 Fed. 382; and when made without specifying any date for the insurance to take effect, commences immediately; id. A usage to show a parol contract was inadmissible; 14 Ins. L. J. (Mass.) 427. In Canada it was held that to recover at law, on a contract of insurance by a corporation, there must be a sealed policy, but on a parol contract the plaintiff may sue for a breach to deliver a policy, or proceed in equity; 16 U. C. Q. B. 477. The agreement to pay a premium is sufficient to support a verbal contract; Fitton v. Ins. Ass'n, 20 Fed. 766. See generally as to verbal contracts, Biddle, Ins. § 138, where the subject is treated historically.

An offer by a newspaper in each issue to pay a sum named to the heirs of one accidentally dying within twenty-four hours from the last issue, provided that the printed slip containing the offer should be found on the person of the deceased, is a contract of insurance; Com. v. Philadelphia Inquirer, 15 Pa. C. C. R. 463.

Binding Receipt. The usual practice is for the agent, upon the payment of the premium, to issue what is termed a binding receipt, which is, in effect, an executory contract to issue a policy if the risk is accepted by the company, and, meanwhile, the insurance is in force. Such contracts are valid and will be enforced at law and in equity; Gold v. Ins. Co., 73 Cal. 216, 14 Pac. 786; Sandford v. Ins. Co., 11 Paige 547; and a charter provision requiring "all policies or contracts" to be signed by certain officers has been held not to apply to such agreements; Baile v. Ins. Co., 73 Mo. 371; Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Colt, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 560, 22 L. Ed. 423; First Baptist Church v. Ins. Co., 19 N. Y. 305; Amazon Ins. Co. v. Wall, 31 Ohio St. 633, 27 Am. Rep. 533.

Where an insurance company delivers a binding slip on certain property, a complete temporary contract of insurance exists; Smith & Wallace Co. v. Ins. Co., 68 N. J. L. 674, 54 Atl. 458; so where such slip accompanies a new agreement; Belt v. Ins. Co., 163 N. Y. 555, 57 N. E. 1104, and the company is estopped from denying the authority of its agent issuing the binding slip where there is no notice to the applicant of any limitation of authority; Starr v. Ins. Co., 41 Wash. 228, 83 Pac. 116; Schlesinger v. Ins. Co., 37 App. Div. 531, 56 N. Y. Supp. 37. The question whether the binder was considered by both parties to be temporary insurance is for the jury; Underwood v. Ins. Co., 66 App. Div. 531, 73 N. Y. Supp. 251. A memorandum on the books of the company, made by the agent and assented to by the applicant, is a sufficient binder; Queen Ins. Co. of America v. Laundry Co., 7 Ga. App. 787, 68 S. E. 310. It need not even state the premium to be paid by the insured; Jacobs v. Ins. Co., 148 Ill. App. 325. It becomes ineffective on delivery of policy to the insured; Goodhue v. Ins. Co., 184 Mass. 41, 67 N. E. 645; but there is no temporary insurance where the company declines the risk; Mohrstadt v. Ins. Co., 115 Fed. 81, 52 C. C. A. 675.

See AGREEMENT FOR INSURANCE.

Adjustment. Where a loss occurs, the ascertainment of the amount due upon the policy is termed adjustment (q. v.). Notice of the loss must be given in accordance with the terms of the condition, which is precedent to recovery; Central City Ins. Co. v. Oates, 86 Ala. 558, 6 South. 83, 11 Am. St. Rep. 67; L. R. 20 Ir. 93; Patrick v. Ins. Co., 43 N. H. 621, 80 Am. Dec. 197. This is distinct from proof of loss (q. v.), which must be also made as stipulated, or, in default of express provision, in a reasonable time; Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Brown, 128 Pa. 392, 18 Atl. 396. See Loss.

More Than One Policy. Other insurance may be taken on the same property without restriction unless there be such in the contract; Agricultural Ins. Co. v. Bemiller, 70 Md. 400, 17 Atl. 380; 14 Q. L. R. 293; Mowry v. Ins. Co., 9 R. I. 346; and no notice is required unless so stipulated; Murray v. Ins. Co., 2 Wash. C. C. 186, Fed. Cas. No. 9,961; but when the insurance is on property, only one indemnity can be collected, and there is a right of contribution among insurers; Peoria Marine & Fire Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 18 Ill. 553; Clarke v. Assur. Co., 146 Pa. 561, 23 Atl. 248, 15 L. R. A. 127, 28 Am. St. Rep. 821; but it is usual to stipulate that each insurer, if there are more than one, shall be liable only pro rata; Barnes v. Ins. Co., 9 Fed. 813.

Where there are thirty insurers and the loss is less than the total amount insured, the holder of the policy is not limited in his recovery to the proportionate share of each insurer, but may recover for the whole loss, leaving to him his remedy against his associates; Sumner v. Piza, 91 Fed. 677; where there is a promise by the insured to take out insurance to the value of eighty per cent. of the property and he fails to do so, although the loss is less than the amount of insurance, he is regarded as an insurer for the difference between the amount actually insured and the eighty per cent; and he must sustain the loss of this proportion; Stephenson v. Ins. Co., 116 Wis. 277, 93 N. W. 19; Farmers' Feed Co. of New Jersey v. Ins. Co., 173 N. Y. 241, 65 N. E. 1105. It is usual to require notice to the company when other insurance is placed upon the property in other companies; Northern Assur. Co. v. Bldg. Ass'n, 183 U. S. 308, 22 Sup. Ct. 133, 46 L. Ed. 213. An agreement that several insurers are to be liable pro rata and that a single suit shall be brought, which shall be decisive as against all, is valid; New Jersey & Pennsylvania Concentrating Works v. Ackermann, 6 App. Div. 540, 39 N. Y. Supp. 585.

As to excessive insurance on the same property, see DOUBLE INSURANCE.

Time Limit for Suit. It is usual in policies to have a time limit requiring an action to be brought within a designated period of the loss. Such condition is precedent to a recovery; Becket v. Imp. Co., 67 Ia. 338, 25 N. W. 271; 14 L. C. Jur. 256; and will apply in a forum other than that of the domicil of the insurer; Fullam v. Ins. Co., 7 Gray (Mass.) 61, 66 Am. Dec. 462. In some courts the time of the limitation is held to be computed from the date of the event which causes the loss; Johnson v. Ins. Co., 91 Ill. 92, 33 Am. Rep. 47; Steel v. Ins. Co., 47 Fed. 863; Chambers v. Ins. Co., 51 Conn. 17, 50 Am. Rep. 1; 19 Nov. Scot. Rep. 372; 18 Ont. 355; in others, from the time the loss was payable; Cooper v. Benefit Ass'n, 132 N. Y. 334, 30 N. E. 833, 16 L. R. A. 138, 28 Am. St. Rep. 581; Case v. Ins. Co., 83 Cal. 473, 23 Pac. 534, 8 L. R. A. 48; Matt v. Aid Ass'n, 81 Iowa, 135, 46 N. W. 857, 25 Am. St. Rep. 483; Spare v. Ins. Co., 17 Fed. 568.

The parties may agree to a reasonable time within which suit may be brought; six months is reasonable. It begins to run from the date of the fire, although there may be a provision making the loss payable sixty days after proofs have been received by the company; Appel v. Ins. Co., 76 Ohio St. 52, 80 N. E. 955, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 674, 10 Ann. Cas. 821.

Limiting Jurisdiction of Courts. Efforts have been made both by contract and by statute to limit the right of suit on a policy to a particular jurisdiction; such provisions in a policy or by law have been held illegal; Nute v. Ins. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 174; Amesbury v. Ins. Co., id. 596; Reichard v. Ins. Co., 31 Mo. 518; May, Ins. § 490. Statutes which attempt thus to limit the jurisdiction are strictly construed, and as they generally provide that, after a loss, the directors shall meet and adjust the loss, and if it is not paid in a given time, suit may be brought in a particular court, the limitation is in many states confined to the exact case mentioned, and it is only where the amount has been so determined that it takes effect; Nevins v. Ins. Co., 25 N. H. 22; Martin v. Ins. Co., 53 Me. 419; Arnet v. Ins. Co., 22 Wis. 516; Boynton v. Ins. Co., 4 Metc. (Mass.) 212; Indiana Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Routledge, 7 Ind. 25; but in other cases the limitation has been enforced without reference to such previous ascertainment of the loss; Dutton v. Ins. Co., 17 Vt. 369. See May, Ins. § 491.

Specifying the Law of the Contract. So, with respect to the effort to provide in the policy that the law of a certain state should determine its construction, where life policies have been issued in a state other than the same state of the company, it has been held that they are governed by statutory provisions in the state of the insured, although the policies stipulated that the contract was to be governed by the law of the same state.

A provision in a policy limiting recovery in cases of suicide is ineffectual as against a state statute declaring suicide to be no defense to an action; Whitfield v. Ins. Co., 205 U. S. 489, 27 Sup. Ct. 578, 51 L. Ed. 897.

See LEX LOCI; FOREIGN CORPORATIONS; as to the rights and remedies of and against insurance companies in countries or states other than those of their domicil, and the effect of non-compliance with statutes regulating the manner of doing business.

The business of life insurance is not commerce; a state statute regulating insurance contracts between its residents and foreign corporations, is not invalid as a regulation of interstate commerce; Cravens v. Ins. Co., 148 Mo. 583, 50 S. W. 519, 53 L. R. A. 305, 71 Am. St. Rep. 628, affirmed in 178 U. S. 389, 20 Sup. Ct. 962, 44 L. Ed. 1116; State v. Ins. Co., 71 Neb. 320, 99 N. W. 36, 100 N. W. 405, 102 N. W. 1022, 106 N. W. 767; Fisher v. Ins. Co., 136 N. C. 217, 48 S. E. 667; N. Y. Life Ins. Co. v. Deer Lodge County, 43 Mont. 243, 115 Pac. 911, affirmed 231 U. S. 595, 34 Sup. Ct. 274, 58 L. Ed. —, following Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. Ed. 357.

Subrogation. An insurer is entitled to subrogation (q. v.) in cases where such right would attach under the general principles applying to that subject; as, when payment is made for loss or damage to goods in transit, there is a subrogation to the rights of the owner against the carrier; Houston Direct Nav. Co. v. Ins. Co. (Tex.) 31 S. W. 560; Over v. R. Co., 63 Fed. 34; Stoughton v. Gas Co., 165 Pa. 428, 30 Atl. 1001; Southard v. R. Co., 60 Minn. 382, 62 N. W. 442, 619. And, on payment by the insurer of a loss which he was not legally bound to pay, he has a right of action against one through whose negligence the property was destroyed; Ry. Co. v. Fire Ass'n, 60 Ark. 325, 30 S. W. 350, 28 L. R. A. 83; he becomes entitled pro tanto, and should join the owner as plaintiff in an action for negligent burning; Wunderlich v. Ry. Co., 93 Wis. 132, 66 N. W. 1144. So, an insurer of title who paid off liens prior to a mortgage, as to which the mortgagee was indemnified by bond of the mortgagor, was subrogated to the right of action of the latter on the bond; St. Paul Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Johnson, 64 Minn. 492, 67 N. W. 543.

Since a policy of fire insurance is a contract of indemnity, the insurer is entitled to recover from the insured not merely the value of any benefit received by him by way of compensation from other sources in excess of his actual loss, but also the full value of any rights or remedies of the insured against third parties which have been renounced by him, and to which, but for that renunciation, the insurer would have a right to be subrogated; [1896] 2 Q. B. 377.

Expected profits may be insured, as crops, against hail and frost or other risks, even before they are sown, but the profits must be insured as such; 3 N. & M. 819; Putnam v. Ins. Co., 5 Metc. (Mass.) 391; Loomis v. Shaw, 2 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 36; Niblo v. Ins. Co., 1 Sandf. (N. Y.) 551; or the future profits of one to whom the insured has advanced money to pursue an enterprise; Morrell v. Ins. Co., 10 Cush. (Mass.) 282, 57 Am. Dec. 92; Miller v. Ins. Co., 2 E. D. Sm. (N. Y.) 268; or a portion of the cargo of a ship expected to arrive, even if the insured has no property in such cargo, but has only purchased, for a specified sum, the right to take such goods for a further specified sum; French v. Ins. Co., 16 Pick. (Mass.) 397; but even if the insured has an ownership in the property, if he becomes insolvent before the arrival of the cargo and the goods are intercepted by the vendor, by right of stoppage in transitu, there can be no recovery on the policy; 10 B. & C. 99.

As to reinsurance, see that title.

The several forms of insurance contracts are classified mainly with reference to the character of the perils insured against. See infra.

Life Insurance. The insurance of the life of a person is a contract by which the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium, either in a gross sum or periodical payments, undertakes to pay the person for whose benefit the insurance is made, a stipulated sum, or annuity equivalent, upon the death of the person whose life is insured, whenever this shall happen, if the insurance be for the whole life, or in case this shall happen within a certain period, if the insurance be for a limited time.

An agreement by the insurer to pay to the insured or his nominee a specified sum of money, either on the death of a designated life, or at the end of a certain period, provided the death does not occur before, in consideration of the present payment of a fixed amount, or of an annuity till the death occurs or the period of insurance is ended. Biddle, Ins. § 2. Bunyon's definition varies little, as does that of Park, but the latter elaborates the consideration which is described as "a certain sum proportioned to the age, health, profession, and other circumstances of the person whose life is the object of insurance." Park, Ins. ch. xxii. In a leading case it was said by Parke, B., to be "a mere contract to pay a certain sum of money on the death of a person, in consideration of the due payment of a certain annuity for his life, the amount of the annuity being calculated, in the first instance, according to the probable duration of the life; and when once fixed, it is constant and invariable;" 15 C. B. 365.

A mutual contract by which the insurer, on the one hand, comes under an obligation to pay a certain sum of money upon the death of the insured, who, on the other hand, becomes bound to pay certain sums, either annually or otherwise, in the name of premiums, and these obligations are counterparts of one another. 3 Can. S. C., 4th ser. 1078.

The person whose life is insured is frequently termed the "life."

The sum to be paid in case of loss depends entirely upon the stipulation in the policy, and not at all upon the amount of the pecuniary interest in the life; Bevin v. Ins. Co., 23 Conn. 244.

There must be an insurable interest (q. v.).

A large proportion of life insurance is now effected through the medium of beneficial associations (q. v.); they are generally formed under state incorporation laws and are subject to their own rules and regulations so far as they are consistent with the general or statutory law of the state. The benefits and advantages conferred by these associations are held to be insurance, and subject to regulation by the insurance laws of the state; State v. Nichols, 78 Ia. 747, 41 N. W. 4; Goodman v. Lodge No. 7, 67 Md. 117, 9 Atl. 13, 13 Atl. 627. While the rules and regulations enter into and become a part of the contract of insurance, the usage of the association will not bind courts in construing the contract, if the latter be clear and unambiguous; and words having a fixed meaning, either general or technical, will be interpreted according to that meaning as in other cases; Wiggin v. Knights of Pythias, 31 Fed. 122.

Some of the conditions of policies of life insurance are peculiar to this class of insurance. Among the most important of these are those relating to self-destruction and insanity. The risk in life insurance is the death of the insured proceeding from causes other than his voluntary act; Supreme Commandery of the Knights of the Golden Rule v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 46 Am. Rep. 332.

See SUICIDE.

Entering the military service is also usually stipulated against, but death at the hands of a roving band of thieves and robbers, while engaged as an engineer in building a bridge, under the direction of a military commander, is not within such a stipulation; Welts v. Life Ins. Co., 48 N. Y. 34, 8 Am. Rep. 518; but even an involuntary entrance will defeat a recovery; Dillard v. Ins. Co., 44 Ga. 119, 9 Am. Rep. 167.

The receipt of the premium by the insurer, after a known violation of the condition against residence abroad, is a waiver of the right to a forfeiture; Bevin v. Ins. Co., 23 Conn. 244; whether the knowledge be actual or constructive; L. R. 11 Eq. 197. Where a condition against absence from home beyond a stipulated time is violated, the insured will be excused if he be detained by reason of illness occurring within the time specified; Baldwin v. Ins. Co., 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 530; but not where the illness occurs after the limits of the stipulation; Nightingale v. Ins. Co., 5 R. I. 38. Where the contract restricts the insured to the settled limits of the United States, it covers all regions within the boundaries of the country, whether inhabited or not; Casler v. Ins. Co., 22 N. Y. 427; and a permission to travel by sea in "a first rate vessel" will cover any mode of travel whether by cabin or steerage; Taylor v. Ins. Co., 13 Gray (Mass.) 434.

Equity cannot cancel a life insurance policy for fraud, if brought after death; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Griesa, 156 Fed. 398; but if brought before the death, it does not abate on the death of the insured; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Blair, 130 Fed. 971.

Where the insured commits murder, and thereafter assigns a policy on his life and is executed for his crime, his beneficiaries cannot recover on the policy; Burt v. Ins. Co., 187 U. S. 362, 23 Sup. Ct. 139, 47 L. Ed. 216; death by legal execution for crime is not a risk contemplated by the policy; Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. McCue, 223 U. S. 234, 32 Sup. Ct. 220, 56 L. Ed. 419, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 57; Collins v. Ins. Co., 30 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 257, citing many cases; so where the assignee of a policy causes the death of the assured by felonious means; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 6 Sup. Ct. 877, 29 L. Ed. 997; where the assignee of a beneficiary has murdered the assured, a constructive trust is established for the heirs of the assured; Schmidt v. Life Ass'n, 112 Ia. 41, 83 N. W. 800, 51 L. R. A. 141, 84 Am. St. Rep. 323. Where the insured is convicted and executed for a crime of which he is in fact innocent, insurance on his life is likewise unrecoverable; Burt v. Ins. Co., 105 Fed. 419, 44 C. C. A. 548. But recovery can be had for death of the insured, slain by the husband with whose wife insured was committing adultery; Supreme Lodge K. P. v. Crenshaw, 129 Ga. 195, 58 S. E. 628, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 258, 121 Am. St. Rep. 216, 12 Ann. Cas. 307.

The weight of decision has been in favor of the view, that the contract of life insurance between citizens of different states is not dissolved, but only suspended, by a war between the states; Hamilton v. Ins. Co., 9 Blatchf. 234, Fed. Cas. No. 5,986; Semmes v. Ins. Co., 13 Wall. (U. S.) 159, 20 L. Ed. 490; but, contra, New York Life Ins. Co. v. Statham, 93 U. S. 24, 23 L. Ed. 789.

Tontine. A system of insurance which under various forms is based upon the idea of a loan or investment of property for the benefit of a number of persons, the income at first being divided among all and the shares of members who die passing not to their own legal representatives but to increase the interest of the surviving member, until, at last, after the number of members has gradually diminished by successive deaths, the last survivor takes the whole income, or, if such be the terms agreed upon, the whole principal. The system took its name from Lorenzo Tonti, an Italian of the seventeenth century, who first conceived the idea and put it in practice. Merlin, Repert.; Dalloz, Dict.; Schriber v. Rapp, 5 Watts (Pa.) 351, 30 Am. Dec. 327.

A policy of this character was the subject of litigation in the Massachusetts Supreme Court in a case in which the system is illustrated. It was to continue ten years if the insured should so long live, but in case of his death before that time, the dividends would not inure to the benefit of his estate, but be held by the company for the benefit of other policy holders and forfeited by him. The estate of the deceased received only the amount of the policy, which, however, would be forfeited for non-payment of premiums during the tontine term; policies of this character are kept in classes of ten, fifteen, or twenty years, called respectively the tontine periods, and accounts are kept with the funds of each class to ascertain the amount due upon each policy at the expiration of its tontine term, at which time the surplus profits are apportioned equitably among such policies as complete the term; Pierce v. Assurance Society, 145 Mass. 56, 12 N. E. 858, 1 Am. St. Rep. 433. Under such an insurance the failure of the company to place all dividends accruing upon a policy in a reserve fund in accordance with the terms of the policy did not excuse the non-performance of his contract by the insured, and a suit by such policy holder for an accounting by the company cannot be maintained on the ground of the failure to keep and invest the fund accruing from the dividends separately; Bogardus v. Ins. Co., 101 N. Y. 328, 4 N. E. 522. No trust relation exists between the company and the insured but it is simply one of contract measured by the terms of the policy; Cohen v. Ins. Co., 50 N. Y. 610, 10 Am. Rep. 522; Hencken v. Ins. Co., 98 N. Y. 627, affirming 11 Daly (N. Y.) 282. The situation of the parties is that of debtor and creditor merely, the amount of the debt being determined by the equitable apportionment to be made by the corporation through its officers; Pierce v. Assur. Soc., 145 Mass. 56, 12 N. E. 858, 1 Am. St. Rep. 433. The apportionment of the fund is not absolutely conclusive upon the policy holders. It is prima facie right, but may be shown to be based on erroneous principles; id.

The holder of a policy who has the option at the expiration of the tontine period to withdraw his share of the surplus is entitled to the inspection of books and papers, and a rule of court authorizing such inspection will be granted in order that he may intelligently exercise his options; Ellinger v. Assur. Soc., 132 Wis. 259, 111 N. W. 567, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1089.

Fire Insurance. A contract by which the insurer, in consideration of a certain premium received by him, either in a gross sum or by annual payments, undertakes to indemnify the insured against all loss or damage which he may sustain to a certain amount, in his property mentioned in the policy, by fire during the time agreed upon.

Fire insurance is said to be in effect a contract of indemnity against loss or damage suffered by an owner or person having an interest in the property insured. Donnell v. Donnell, 86 Me. 518, 30 Atl. 67.

The principles applying to the subject are, in general, those governing marine policies and other kinds of insurance of property against the various perils which attend its use and ownership, and therefore the point to be mainly considered, as applied to fire insurance alone, is the exact definition of the peril insured against. With respect to the nature of the contract as an indemnity, the necessity of an interest in the property, the policy and the application, the effect of warranties and representations, respectively, and the loss and its adjustment, reference should be had to the discussion of the subject generally, supra, and in the various titles referred to.

It has frequently been said that to recover under a fire policy there must be an actual fire or ignition, and that it is not sufficient that there has been an injurious increase of heat which caused damage to the insured property, while nothing had taken fire which ought not to be on fire. The authority usually relied upon, for this general statement, is the early and leading case of Austin v. Drewe, 6 Taunt. 436, but this case has been much criticised; see Scripture v. Ins. Co., 10 Cush. (Mass.) 356, 57 Am. Dec. 111; 1 Bennett, Fire Ins. Cas. 104; Case v. Ins. Co., 13 Ill. 676; May, Ins. § 402.

There can be no recovery for damage by smoke from a lighted lamp when there is no ignition outside of the lamp; Fitzgerald v. Ins. Co., 30 Misc. 72, 62 N. Y. Supp. 824; or if the smoke proceeded from a fire "out of place," it is no defense that it originated in a fire in the place intended for it; Collins v. Ins. Co., 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 576; and a furnace fire built of unsuitable material, which becomes uncontrollable and develops extraordinary and excessive heat, so as to char woodwork and furniture and generally injure personal property, is a hostile fire, although there is no ignition; O'Connor v. Ins. Co., 140 Wis. 388, 122 N. W. 1038, 1122, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 501, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1081, 17 Ann. Cas. 1118. Damage to the interior of a boiler resulting from over-heating and absence of water in the boiler is not covered by a fire policy; American Towing Co. of Baltimore v. Ins. Co., 74 Md. 25, 21 Atl. 553.

A fire in a theatre, caused by the excessive heating of its walls by a fire outside, was held to be covered by the policy; Sohier v. Ins. Co., 11 Allen (Mass.) 336; and when a building is blown up by gunpowder to prevent the spreading of fire, the insurer against fire is liable if, but for being blown up, it would have been burned; City Fire Ins. Co. v. Corlies, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 367, 34 Am. Dec. 258; Greenwald v. Ins. Co., 3 Phila. (Pa.) 323; Miller v. Ins. Co., 41 Ill. App. 395; L. R. 3 Exch. 71. These cases are distinguished from explosion, which is not fire, within a fire policy, when it occurs some distance off; 19 C. B. N. S. 126; Caballero v. Ins. Co., 15 La. Ann. 217; even though it was caused by fire; id.; and when the explosion is within the building, there must be ignition to bring it within the fire insurance; St. John v. Ins. Co., 11 N. Y. 516; but damage from fire caused by explosion on the premises is covered; Scripture v. Ins. Co., 10 Cush. (Mass.) 356, 57 Am. Dec. 111; Renshaw v. Ins. Co., 103 Mo. 595, 15 S. W. 945, 23 Am. St. Rep. 904; (unless it is expressly excepted; Greenwald v. Ins. Co., 3 Phila. [Pa.] 323); so also if the damage is from explosion caused by fire, as where a steamboat was burned as the result of an explosion of gunpowder; Waters v. Ins. Co., 11 Pet. (U. S.) 213, 9 L. Ed. 691; or when coals were thrown out of the stove; Daws v. Ins. Co., 127 Mass. 346, 34 Am. Rep. 384. In this case the policy contained the provision that "if a building shall fall, except as the result of a fire," the insurance should cease; and this was held to apply to inherent defects in the building. And when, under a similar policy "against fire originating in any case," there occurred an explosion and loss, it was held immaterial whether the fire resulted in combustion or explosion; Renshaw v. Ins. Co., 33 Mo. App. 394.

Although a fire is raging in an adjacent building and at the time of the expiration of the policy a loss is inevitable, yet if, in fact, no fire has broken out at such expiration, there can be no recovery; Rochester German Ins. Co. v. Peasler Co., 120 Ky. 752, 87 S. W. 1115, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 1155, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 364, 9 Ann. Cas. 324.

A loss by reason of fire started by an explosion caused by a fire coming in contact with escaping gas was not within a policy which excepted loss by reason of or resulting from any explosion whatever; 2 Ins. L. J. 190. When damages by explosion are excepted unless caused by fire, the insurer is held liable only for the result of fire and not of the explosion which caused it; L. R. 3 Exch. 71; or by one caused by fire in its course; id.; contra, Washburn v. Ins. Co., 2 Fed. 633; Transatlantic Fire Ins. Co. of Hamburg v. Dorsey, 56 Md. 70, 40 Am. Rep. 403.

Though a fire policy provides that there shall be no recovery for loss caused by earthquakes, the insured can recover for damage from a fire originally caused by an earthquake; Williamsburgh City Fire Ins. Co. v. Willard, 164 Fed. 404, 90 C. C. A. 392, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 103.

A fire in a chimney, caused by accidental ignition of soot, or smoke issuing from such fire, is within a policy covering all loss or damage by fire to all goods contained in the building; Way v. Ins. Co., 166 Mass. 67, 43 N. E. 1032, 32 L. R. A. 608, 55 Am. St. Rep. 379. So also a loss by spontaneous combustion was held to be within a fire policy; 9 L. C. Q. B. 448; but see a criticism of this case in Providence Washington Ins. Co. v. Adler, 65 Md. 162, 4 Atl. 121, 57 Am. Rep. 314. Where a policy insures against explosion and accident and there was an exception of explosion or loss caused by the burning of the building, a destruction of the property by an explosion caused by raising a cloud of starch dust in an endeavor to extinguish flames was held a fire loss and not within the policy; American Steam Boiler Ins. Co. v. Refining Co., 57 Fed. 294, 6 C. C. A. 336, 21 L. R. A. 572.

Fire insurance does not cover damage by lightning without combustion; Andrews v. Ins. Co., 37 Me. 256; Kenniston v. Ins. Co., 14 N. H. 341, 40 Am. Dec. 192; even when the policy covers "fire, by lightning;" Babcock v. Ins. Co., 4 N. Y. 326. It is quite usual to add to a fire policy what is known as a "lightning clause," which covers loss from that cause with or without fire; but a company authorized to take fire risks is not thereby authorized to insure against lightning; Andrews v. Ins. Co., 37 Me. 256. A policy of insurance against lightning was held to cover destruction by tornado when the former accompanied the latter; Spensley v. Ins. Co., 54 Wis. 433, 11 N. W. 894.

Under a lightning clause attached to a fire policy, on horses "contained in" a barn, the insurer was held liable for a brood mare pasturing in a field. The policy against loss by lightning was said to be a contract of insurance of a peculiar kind, which must be construed in a reasonable, common-sense view, and so as not to reduce the contract to an absurdity; Haws v. Fire Ass'n, 114 Pa. 431, 7 Atl. 159; in this case the insurance was on horses alone, and, on that ground, they were distinguished in a later case, in which the policy embraced also property kept in a barn, other than live stock, and the company was held not liable for a horse killed by lightning while in pasture; Haws v. Ins. Co., 130 Pa. 113, 15 Atl. 915, 18 Atl. 621, 2 L. R. A. 52.

Where an insurance policy excepts loss caused directly or indirectly by fire it is an accident, and not a fire, policy, and the complaint must show that the loss was not caused directly or indirectly by fire; Western Refrigerator Co. v. Ins. & Sec. Co., 51 Fed. 155.

When the insurance was against loss by "fire or storm," it did not cover damage by a freshet caused by melting snow with prevailing south winds and rain; Stover v. Ins. Co., 3 Phila. (Pa.) 38.

The exception of "loss by fire occasioned by mobs or riots," does not extend to a loss from the burning of a bridge by military authorities in time of war; Harris v. Ins. Co., 50 Pa. 341; of the risks of this class, usurped power is not an ordinary mob but a rebellious one or one having political purpose; 2 Wilson 363; it is "rebellion conducted by authority;" Lord Mansfield in Langdale v. Mason, 2 Marsh. Ins. 792; but it is not necessary that the destruction be commanded by a superior officer; Barton v. Ins. Co. of New York, 42 Mo. 156, 97 Am. Dec. 329; insurrection is "a seditious rising against the government, a rebellion, a revolt;" Spruill v. Life Ins. Co., 46 N. C. 126; and a riot is "where three or more persons actually do an unlawful act, either with or without a common cause . . . the intention with which the parties assemble, or at least act, being unlawful;" id.; but in another case it was held that the destruction of property in a riot is within the exception even if the rioters assembled originally for a lawful purpose; Dupin v. Ins. Co., 5 La. Ann. 482.

The exemption of loss "by explosion of any kind, by means of invasion," etc., means by explosion and invasion, etc., not explosion caused by invasion; Smiley v. Ins. Co., 14 W. Va. 33.

See CIVIL COMMOTION; INSURRECTION; INVASION; MOB; RIOT; USURPED POWER.

Losses caused by the effort made to prevent the destruction of property by fire must be borne by the insurers and not by the insured; Agnew v. Ins. Co., 3 Phila. (Pa.) 193; as by water; Lewis v. Ins. Co., 10 Gray (Mass.) 159; or theft; Independent Mut. Ins. Co. v. Agnew, 34 Pa. 96, 75 Am. Dec. 638; Witherell v. Ins. Co., 49 Me. 200; Newmark v. Fire & Life Ins. Co., 30 Mo. 160, 77 Am. Dec. 608; unless expressly excluded; Fernandez v. Ins. Co., 17 La. Ann. 131; or removal when required by due diligence, according to the circumstances; Brady v. Ins. Co., 11 Mich. 425; Case v. Fire Ins. Co., 13 Ill. 676; (but see Hillier v. Ins. Co., 3 Pa. 470, 45 Am. Dec. 656); or falling of walls after an interval of a day; 7 Sc. Sess. Cas., 1st ser. 52; but the fire must be the proximate cause; Nave v. Ins. Co., 37 Mo. 429, 90 Am. Dec. 394. See Lewis v. Ins. Co., 10 Gray (Mass.) 159.

Insurance against fire covers a loss by the negligence of the insured not amounting to fraud; Cumberland Val. Mut. Protection Co. v. Douglas, 58 Pa. 419, 98 Am. Dec. 298. The contract of fire insurance is to be construed with reference to the laws of the state in which the property is situated and the policy issued; King Brick Mfg. Co. v. Ins. Co., 164 Mass. 291, 41 N. E. 277; Perry v. Ins. Co., 67 N. H. 291, 33 Atl. 731, 68 Am. St. Rep. 668.

An insane person cannot be held, in setting fire to his property, to have had such a fraudulent or wrongful design as to defeat the insurance thereon, though his estate may afterwards be called upon to respond for the act; D'Autremont v. Fire Ass'n, 65 Hun 475, 20 N. Y. Supp. 344; Bindell v. Ins. Co., 128 Ky. 389, 108 S. W. 325, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 189, 129 Am. St. Rep. 303.

Marine Insurance. A contract of indemnity by which one party, for a stipulated premium, undertakes to indemnify the other, to the extent of the amount insured, against all perils of the sea, or certain enumerated perils, to which his ship, cargo, and freight, or some of them, may be exposed during a certain voyage or fixed period of time.

A contract of indemnity (not perfect but approximate; 1 H. L. Cas. 287; 4 App. Cas. 755); against all losses accruing to the subject-matter of the policy from certain perils during the adventure. This subject-matter need not be strictly a property in the ship, goods, or freight; 2 B. & P. N. R. 269; L. R. 7 Q. B. 302; any reasonable expectation of pecuniary profit from the preservation of the subject-matter is insurable as a marine risk; as, where the joint owners of a vessel and cargo engaged in a joint adventure have a lien for their several interests and for advancements, each part-owner had an insurable interest in the joint venture; International Marine Ins. Co. v. Winsmore, 124 Pa. 61, 16 Atl. 516.

The insured must have a lawful interest at the time of the loss. See INSURABLE INTEREST.

The contract is one recognized by the general law and usage of nations, and therefore either native or alien may be insured. It was settled in England after much judicial discussion (and some temporary legislation) that the insurance of enemy's property is illegal; 13 Ves. 64; see 3 Kent 254. The same rule was recognized by continental jurists; id. 255; Val. Com. ii. 32; and in this country; Griswold v. Waddington, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 438, where the subject was extensively discussed, and it is said that "it may be considered the established law of this country;" 3 Kent 256. Such contracts, made before the outbreak of war, are annulled by it; Snow, Lect. Int. L. 101.

Insurance by British underwriters of a foreign subject's treasure which is later captured by the foreign government of the insured, though war is afterwards declared between the two governments, is valid even though the seizure is made in contemplation of war and in order to support the war; [1902] A. C. 484, affirming [1901] 2 K. B. 419; [1900] 2 Q. B. 339; so where the treasure belongs to a British subject insured by British underwriters but situated in a foreign hostile country; [1901] 2 K. B. 849.

It may also be in favor of A, or whom it may concern, but those general words will only apply to a person with an interest in the subject and who was in the contemplation of the contract; Bauduy v. Ins. Co., 2 Wash. C. C. 391, Fed. Cas. No. 1,112; Hooper v. Robinson, 98 U. S. 528, 25 L. Ed. 219; Duncan v. Ins. Co., 129 N. Y. 237, 29 N. E. 76; if such person has authorized or adopted it; Sanders v. Ins. Co., 44 N. H. 238. The intention of the insurer need not have fastened upon the very person, who seeks to take the benefit; an intention covers a person who takes such relation to the insurer as brings him within the clauses of the policy; Duncan v. Ins. Co., 129 N. Y. 237, 29 N. E. 76. See Haynes v. Rowe, 40 Me. 181. The insurance "on advances" is distinct from the ship itself; Providence Washington Ins. Co. v. Bowring, 50 Fed. 613, 1 C. C. A. 583, 1 U. S. App. 183.

As to who may be insurers in a marine policy there is no special rule.

An insurance on a ship named makes the latter a part of the contract and no other can be substituted, but a cargo may be changed from one ship to another; 3 Kent 257; and the master may be changed; Walden v. Ins. Co., 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 138. An insurance on the ship includes everything appurtenant to it; Boulay-Paty iii. 379; 1 Term 611, note. An insurance on goods need not name the ship, but may be "on any ship or ships;" Emer. i. 173; 2 H. Bla. 343.

Marine policies in England and this country usually contain the words "lost or not lost," and in such case they cover losses already accrued as well as future ones; Commercial Ins. Co. v. Hallock, 27 N. J. L. 645, 72 Am. Dec. 379. It is so without the words in other foreign countries; Roccus, de Ass. n. 51; 3 Kent 259; and it was said by Story, J., that "it would be so without reference to the words"; Hammond v. Allen, 2 Summ. 397, Fed. Cas. No. 6,000.

The most perfect good faith is required in this contract with respect to representations, warranties, and concealment, as to all of which see the several titles.

The insured is required both to pay the premium, and to represent fully and fairly all the circumstances relating to his subject-matter of the insurance, which may influence the determination of the underwriters in undertaking the risk or estimating the premium. A concealment of such facts amounts to a fraud, which avoids the contract; 3 Kent 282.

Where a policy covers a loss by perils of the sea or other perils, the insured may recover for a loss occasioned by the negligence of the master or crew or other persons employed by him; Copeland v. Ins. Co., 2 Metc. (Mass.) 432; General Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sherwood, 14 How. (U. S.) 351, 14 L. Ed. 452; L. R. 4 C. P. 117; Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Transp. Co., 117 U. S. 323, 6 Sup. Ct. 1176, 29 L. Ed, 873.

Perils and Loss. Insurance on goods carried on deck of an inland river steamer, according to custom, and lost, may be recovered; [1904] 1 K. B. 252; but there can be no recovery for loss occurring as a result of pushing through dangerous ice by the master of the vessel; Standard Marine Ins. Co. v. Transp. Co., 133 Fed. 636, 67 C. C. A. 602, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1095.

As to the perils insured against generally, see PERILS OF THE SEA; RISKS AND PERILS; and as to the different kinds of marine policies, see POLICY, Loss.

If, before the termination of the adventure, the assured has parted with all interest in the subject-matter of the insurance, he cannot recover on any loss subsequent to his transfer of the property; L. R. 7 Q. B. 302; and the insurer can take nothing by subrogation but the rights of the assured; Hall v. R. Co., 13 Wall. (U. S.) 367, 20 L. Ed. 594; The Potomac, 105 U. S. 630, 26 L. Ed. 1194; Mobile & M. Ry. Co. v. Jurey, 111 U. S. 584, 4 Sup. Ct. 566, 28 L. Ed. 527.

Sue and Labor Clause. This clause, common to all marine policies, protects the assured in times of danger and allows him to incur expenses for repairs or salvage up to the value of the property saved without affecting his rights under the policy. See 22 L. Q. R. 406.

England codified marine insurance in 1906.

Accident Insurance. That form of insurance which provides for specified payments in case of an accident resulting in bodily injury or death, as distinguished from casualty insurance, which is a term applied to insurance against loss or damage to property occasioned by accident. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Merrill, 155 Mass. 404, 29 N. E. 529. A foreign corporation, although an accident insurance company, has been held authorized to issue "horse or vehicle policies," "elevator policies," "general liability policies," and "outside liability policies;" id.

Accident insurance is intended to furnish indemnity against accidents and death caused by accidental means, and the language of the policy must be construed with reference to that proposition. In case of doubt the construction should be liberal in favor of the insured; Healey v. Acc. Ass'n, 133 Ill. 556, 25 N. E. 52, 9 L. R. A. 371, 23 Am. St. Rep. 637.

Accident policies have been held to cover death from shock and physical strain resulting from being run away with in a covered carriage, where there was no mark of physical injury nor contact with any physical object; McGlinchey v. Casualty Co., 80 Me. 251, 14 Atl. 13, 6 Am. St. Rep. 190; and see [1896] 2 Q. B. 248; suicide by an insane man; Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527, 7 Sup. Ct. 685, 30 L. Ed. 740; death from drowning; 5 H. & N. 211; s. c., on appeal, 6 id. 839; falling into the water in a fit; 22 L. T. N. S. 820; 6 Q. B. Div. 42; death from inhaling illuminating gas; Paul v. Ins. Co., 112 N. Y. 472, 20 N. E. 347, 3 L. R. A. 443, 8 Am. St. Rep. 758; Fidelity & Casualty Co. of N. Y. v. Waterman, 59 Ill. App. 297; Pickett v. Ins. Co., 144 Pa. 79, 22 Atl. 871, 13 L. R. A. 661, 27 Am. St. Rep. 618; U. S. Mut. Acc. Ass'n v. Newman, 84 Va. 52, 3 S. E. 805; by taking poison; Healey v. Accident Ass'n, 133 Ill. 556, 25 N. E. 52, 9 L. R. A. 371, 22 Am. St. Rep. 637; or an overdose of medicine; Penfold v. Ins. Co., 85 N. Y. 319, 39 Am. Rep. 660; Northwestern Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hazelett, 105 Ind. 212, 4 N. E. 582, 55 Am. Rep. 192; death caused by a piece of beefsteak passing into the windpipe while eating; American Accident Co. v. Reigart, 94 Ky. 547, 23 S. W. 191, 21 L. R. A. 651, 42 Am. St. Rep. 374; death from blood-poisoning, caused by the bite of a mosquito (although poison was expressly excepted); Omberg v. Accident Ass'n, 101 Ky. 303, 40 S. W. 909, 72 Am. St. Rep. 413; falling into the water as the result of a wound; Mallory v. Ins. Co., 47 N. Y. 52, 7 Am. Rep. 410; falling on a railroad track in a fit and being run over; 7 Q. B. Div. 216; being struck by the handle of a pitchfork while making hay and having peritonitis as a result of it; North American Life & Acc. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 43, 8 Am. Rep. 212; spraining the back while lifting a heavy weight; 1 F. & F. 505; being attacked and killed by a highwayman; Hutchcraft's Ex'r v. Ins. Co., 87 Ky. 300, 8 S. W. 570, 12 Am. St. Rep. 484; accidental shooting by a deputy sheriff who did not know at whom he was shooting and did not intend to kill the assured (there being an exception of death from design either of the insured or another person); Utter v. Ins. Co., 65 Mich. 545, 32 N. W. 812, 8 Am. St. Rep. 913; hernia resulting from an accidental fall (although the policy excluded hernia); 17 C. B. N. S. 122; rupture of a blood-vessel sustained while exercising with Indian clubs; McCarthy v. Ins. Co., 8 Biss. 362, Fed. Cas. No. 8,682; falling from the cars while walking during sleep; Scheiderer v. Ins. Co., 58 Wis. 13, 16 N. W. 47, 46 Am. Rep. 618.

Stepping out of a railway carriage when it has come to a full stop at a station and slipping off the iron step, thereby sustaining injuries, is a railway accident; 10 Exch. 45; death caused by blood poisoning resulting from an accidental cut is within the provision of external violence and accidental means; Central Accident Ins. Co. v. Rembe, 220 Ill. 151, 77 N. E. 123, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 933, 110 Am. St. Rep. 235, 5 Ann. Cas. 155; or from an accidental abrasion of the skin followed by bacterial infection; Cary v. Ins. Co., 127 Wis. 67, 106 N. W. 1055, 115 Am. St. Rep. 997, 9 Ann. Cas. 484; Jones v. Casualty Co., 140 N. C. 262, 52 S. E. 578, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 932, 111 Am. St. Rep. 843; contra, where there is an exemption of liability for death resulting from poisoning; McGlother v. Accident Co., 89 Fed. 685, 32 C. C. A. 318; Hill v. Ins. Co., 22 Hun (N. Y.) 187; and so where blood poisoning results from a wound in the hand caused by assaulting another; Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York v. Stacey's Ex'rs, 143 Fed. 271, 74 C. C. A. 409, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 657, 6 Ann. Cas. 955; and death by accidental asphyxiation under an exemption from liability for death caused by gas or vapor; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Ayers, 217 Ill. 391, 75 N. E. 506, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 168; but there may be a recovery for periostitis caused by pressure on the bones of the hand during sleep; Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 165 Ind. 317, 75 N. E. 262, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 422, 112 Am. St. Rep. 232, 6 Ann. Cas. 551.

It has been strongly contended that such cases as those enumerated were not within the ordinary accident policy because there was no extraordinary injury according to the ordinary meaning of the term, but, in reply to this in a leading case of drowning, the court said: "That argument if carried to its extreme length would apply to every case where death was immediate;" 6 H. & N. 839; and in a case of death from the inhalation of gas, the court said: "We think it a sufficient answer that the gas in the atmosphere as an extraordinary cause was a violent agency in the sense that it worked on the intestate so as to cause his death; that death is the result of accident or is unnatural, imports the extraordinary and violent agency of the cause;" Paul v. Ins. Co., 112 N. Y. 472, 20 N. E. 347, 3 L. R. A. 443, 8 Am. St. Rep. 758. The view which these courts considered untenable was, however, taken by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania on a policy exactly similar. The court said: "The object of the company is to insure bodily injuries produced in a certain manner specified, that is, caused by external, violent, and accidental means; not injuries caused by any one of these means, but by all of them combined;" Pollock v. Acc. Ass'n, 102 Pa. 230, 48 Am. Rep. 204; but this language seems to be a dictum, because there was a condition in the policy excepting death or injury caused by the taking of poison, and the point of the case was that an involuntary taking of poison by mistake was within the exception; but in a New York case of death from inhaling gas there was also a proviso excepting death caused by inhaling gas, and the court construed it "to mean a voluntary and intelligent act by the assured and not an involuntary and unconscious act;" Paul v. Ins. Co., 112 N. Y. 472, 20 N. E. 347, 3 L. R. A. 443, 8 Am. St. Rep. 758. This case and the Pennsylvania case are therefore in direct opposition on the construction of the condition, and the former was decided after consideration of and with express dissent from the latter.

An exception that if the insured should die by his own hand, sane or insane, the policy should be void, "covers all conscious acts of the insured by which death by his own hand is compassed, whether he was at the time sane or insane, if the act was done for the purpose of self-destruction, it matters not that the insured had no conception of the wrong involved in its performance;" Streeter v. Acc. Soc., 65 Mich. 199, 31 N. W. 779, 8 Am. St. Rep. 882. In this case it was held that whether a fall six weeks before the insured shot himself was the cause of the killing was too conjectural to be submitted to the jury as a direct cause of the suicide. See CAUSA PROXIMA.

It has been held that death was not the result of accident within the meaning of the policy where it was occasioned by epilepsy; Tennant v. Ins. Co., 31 Fed. 322; sunstroke; 3 El. & El. 478; rupture caused by jumping from a train where nothing unforeseen happened from the time the insured left the platform to the time he alighted on the ground; Southard v. Assur. Co., 34 Conn. 574, Fed. Cas. No. 13,182; United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100, 9 Sup. Ct. 755, 33 L. Ed. 60.

Where the insured was assassinated, there could be no recovery under a policy which excepted death or injury inflicted by design of himself or another; Travellers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 8 Sup. Ct. 1360, 32 L. Ed. 308; Hutchcraft's Ex'r v. Ins. Co., 87 Ky. 300, 8 S. W. 570, 12 Am. St. Rep. 484; but where the death was the result of an accident, the fact that the negligence of the assured may have contributed to it is no defence in the absence of an express stipulation in the policy to that effect; Schneider v. Ins. Co., 24 Wis. 28, 1 Am. Rep. 157; Providence Life Ins. & Inv. Co. of Chicago v. Martin, 32 Md. 310; Champlin v. Assur. Co., 6 Lans. (N. Y.) 71.

Accident policies usually cover the risk incident to a specific occupation, a substantial change of which will, if it increase the risk, render the policy void. Such a stipulation is held to mean engaging in another employment as a usual business; Provident Life Ins. Co. v. Fennell, 49 Ill. 180; but it was not such a change for a school teacher while disengaged to be employed in building operations; id.; or for one to engage in pitching hay while visiting his grandfather; North American Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 43, 8 Am. Rep. 212; or for a locomotive engineer to climb over the tender to apply the brakes on a car; Providence Life Ins. Co. & Investment Co. of Chicago v. Martin, 32 Md. 310. In all such cases the question what is a substantial change of occupation is to be left to the jury; Stone's Adm'rs v. Casualty Co., 34 N. J. L. 371.

The expression "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger," used in stating the exceptions to the liability of an insurance company upon an accident policy, refers only to dangers of a real and substantial character which the insured recognized, but to which he, nevertheless, purposely and consciously exposed himself, intending at the same time to assume all the risks of the situation. Voluntary riding upon the platform of a rapidly moving railroad car is not, of itself and as a matter of law, a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger and presents a question of fact for the jury. Where an accident insurance policy exempts the insurer from liability for injuries received while violating rules of a corporation, the question is for the jury as to whether the insured knew of a rule of the corporation which he is alleged to have violated, and the court should charge that in order to bind insured, it must be one which the corporation enforced or used reasonable effort to enforce; Travellers' Ins. Co. v. Randolph, 78 Fed. 754, 24 C. C. A. 305; opinion by Harlan, J., considering all the cases at length; and see 7 Am. L. Rev. 590, where the question whether death from freezing while climbing Mount Blanc was or was not a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger was discussed with reference to a case in which the point was raised but not settled, the suit being compromised.

In an exception prohibiting exposure to obvious or unnecessary danger and requiring diligence on the part of the assured, there can be no recovery where death was caused by being struck by a railroad train while running along the tracks in front of it in the night-time for the purpose of getting on a train approaching in an opposite direction on a parallel track; Tuttle v. Ins. Co., 134 Mass. 175, 45 Am. Rep. 316; nor where it was caused by falling from the platform of a railroad car between eleven and twelve o'clock at night when the train was in motion; Sawtelle v. Pass. Assur. Co., 15 Blatchf. 216, Fed. Cas. No. 12,392; or from unnecessarily passing on a dark and rainy night over a trestle known to be dangerous with two packages in his hands, although it was the usual route home of the assured and many others; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Jones, 80 Ga. 541, 7 S. E. 83, 12 Am. St. Rep. 270; or where a shop hand of a railway company went on the platform when the train was in motion to leave the train when it should stop to cross over by a switch to another track (the exception not being applicable to the exposure of railway employés in the performance of their duty); Hull v. Acc. Ass'n, 41 Minn. 231, 42 N. W. 936; but where the insured by a voluntary act exposed himself to a hidden danger, the existence of which he had no reason to suspect, and thereby lost his life, his death was caused by accident and the company is liable; Burkhard v. Ins. Co., 102 Pa. 262, 48 Am. Rep. 205; a clause prohibiting voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger does not prohibit one from walking or being on a railway bridge or road-bed; Traders' & Travelers' Acc. Co. v. Wagley, 74 Fed. 457, 20 C. C. A. 588; Lehman v. Indemnity Co., 7 App. Div. 424, 39 N. Y. Supp. 912; see also where a passenger is overcome by the heat of the car, or nausea, and goes upon the platform; Marx v. Ins. Co., 39 Fed. 321; or getting from the platform at a depot upon the cars while in motion at a rate of speed less than that of a man walking; Schneider v. Ins. Co., 24 Wis. 28; going to the rescue of a shipwrecked crew, although the policy prohibited the insured from engaging in the business of wrecking; Tucker v. Ins. Co., 50 Hun 50, 4 N. Y. Supp. 505. Playing indoor baseball is not a voluntary exposure to danger; Hunt v. Accident Ass'n, 146 Mich. 521, 109 N. W. 1042, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 938, 119 Am. St. Rep. 655, 10 Ann. Cas. 449.

The exception against death or injury happening while the insured was intoxicated, or in consequence thereof, prevents a recovery, without reference to the question whether the condition was the cause of the injury or not; Standard Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Jones, 94 Ala. 434, 10 South. 530; Shader v. Assur. Co., 66 N. Y. 441, 23 Am. Rep. 65; as, where the deceased, being under the influence of liquor, was killed by a pistol shot while dining with a friend; id. To be under the influence of intoxicating liquor within the meaning of such exception means to have drunk enough to disturb the action of the mental and physical faculties so that they are no longer in their normal condition; id.; the expression is equivalent to "intoxicated"; Standard Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Jones, 94 Ala. 434, 10 South. 530.

Where the death was caused by inadvertently taking an overdose of opium which had been prescribed by a physician, it was held within the exception of any death caused wholly or in part by medical treatment for disease; Bayless v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 14 Blatchf. 143, Fed. Cas. No. 1,138.

The question frequently arises what is total disability for which the policy entitles the insured to claim indemnity. In an English case in which this question was much discussed, it was held that a solicitor who had sprained his ankle while riding on horseback and was under the care of a surgeon for six weeks, unable to leave the house or transact business which could not be attended to in the house, but could write letters, read law, and the like while lying on a couch, was not totally disabled; 5 H. & N. 546. This judgment was affirmed in Exchequer Chamber. The provision in this and similar cases is usually for a weekly allowance in case of accident causing any bodily injury of so serious a nature as wholly to disable the insured from following his business. Under such a clause total disability to labor must be shown; Rhodes v. Ins. Co., 5 Lans. (N. Y.) 71; by it is meant disability from doing substantially all kinds of the plaintiff's accustomed labor to some extent, and that the assured must be deprived of the power to do to any extent substantially all the kinds of his usual labor; 8 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 233; where the provision was for total disability there could be no recovery if the assured were able to do some parts of the accustomed work pertaining to his business or, if totally disabled in his own pursuit, he should be able to engage in some other; Lyon v. Assur. Co., 46 Ia. 631.

Where the provision was that the injured must be "wholly disabled to prevent him from the prosecution of any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation," it was held error to instruct the jury that the defendant was to pay the amount agreed, if by the accident the plaintiff had been disabled in any way from prosecuting the business in which he was engaged, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for such time as he was "rendered wholly unable to do his accustomed labor, that is, to do substantially all kinds of his accustomed labor to some extent;" Saveland v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 67 Wis. 174, 30 N. W. 237, 58 Am. Rep. 863.

It has been held that the meaning of the word accident, as used in a policy, is for the jury, as it is also to determine whether there was exposure to unnecessary danger; Travelers' Preferred Acc. Ass'n v. Stone, 50 Ill. App. 222; or whether the total loss of three fingers and a part of another on the same hand, destruction of the thumb, and a cutting of the hand is a loss of the hand causing "immediate, continuous, and total disability" within the meaning of that clause in an accident insurance policy; Lord v. Acc. Ass'n, 89 Wis. 19, 61 N. W. 293, 26 L. R. A. 741, 46 Am. St. Rep. 815; and see Sneck v. Ins. Co., 88 Hun 94, 34 N. Y. Supp. 545, where the plaintiff's hand was cut off a short distance above the knuckles, leaving nearly the whole palm and part of the second joint of the thumb, and it was held to be a loss of the entire hand within the meaning of the policy; overruling Sneck v. Ins. Co., 81 Hun 331, 30 N. Y. Supp. 881. See REPRESENTATION; ACT OF GOD.

A provision in a policy that the medical adviser of the insurer may examine the body of the insured or attend any post mortem examination which may be held, only authorizes examination of the body unburied and does not warrant exhumation and autopsy, nor does an exception of injuries of which there is no visible mark; Wehle v. Acc. Ass'n, 11 Misc. 36, 31 N. Y. Supp. 865.

Casualty Insurance. A contract by which a person is indemnified against loss or damage to property, occasioned by accident. The term is thus applied in contradistinction to accident insurance by the Massachusetts Supreme Court, in Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Merrill, 155 Mass. 404, 29 N. E. 529. The question was whether a foreign company licensed to do business in the state, but by statute restricted to one kind or class of business, was authorized to issue policies covering special classes of accidents, involving bodily injury and death. In this connection the court said: "The distinguishing feature of what is known in our legislation as 'accident insurance' is that it indemnifies against the effects of accidents resulting in bodily injury or death. Its field is not to insure against loss or damage to property, although occasioned by accident. So far as that class of insurance has been developed, it has been with reference to boilers, plate glass, and perhaps to domestic animals and injuries to property by street cars, and is known as 'casualty insurance.'"

The distinction is founded in reason and the terminology is well adapted to the subject. Its precision is in sharp contrast to the vagueness and want of definiteness which characterize the references of text writers and judges to the various forms of insurance which have come into use with the increase in number of perils to life and property.

Among the perils covered by this kind of insurance are included: the loss of horses and cattle, theft of valuables, breakage of plate glass, loss by tornadoes or force of the elements, explosion or bursting of boilers, etc. These policies usually stipulate certain exceptions against which they will not insure, as fire and lightning; but such a policy was held to cover a loss by flood; Hey v. Indemnity Co., 181 Pa. 220, 37 Atl. 402, 59 Am. St. Rep. 644. An exception against loss caused by leakage resulting from earthquakes or cyclones will cover leakage caused by a wind storm which resembles a tornado more than a cyclone; Maryland Casualty Co. v. Finch, 147 Fed. 388, 77 C. C. A. 566, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 308.

A carrier may lawfully insure against liability for loss of goods occasioned by the negligence of a servant; Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. R. Co. v. Ins. Co., 64 Minn. 61, 66 N. W. 132; in such a case the liability of the insured becomes fixed on the happening of the accident, although the amount is contingent, to the extent that the amount which the insured may be adjudged to pay has not yet been ascertained; American Casualty Ins. Company's Case, 82 Md. 535, 34 Atl. 778, 38 L. R. A. 97.

A policy against loss or damage to property, and loss of life or injury to employés of the insured or other persons, payable to the insured for the benefit of such persons or their legal representatives, is a contract of indemnity, and a person who is injured by such explosion cannot sue the insurer; Embler v. Ins. Co., 8 App. Div. 186, 40 N. Y. Supp. 450.

In a policy on live stock the insurer is estopped to deny that the sum named in the policy is the insurable value of the horse; Illinois Live Stock Ins. Co. v. Koehler, 58 Ill. App. 557. Where the policy covering "two horses" was cancelled as to one, the insured may show that it was cancelled as to a mare covered by the policy; Pfeifer v. Ins. Co., 62 Minn. 536, 64 N. W. 1018. The provision for notice to the insurer by telegram, of the sickness of an animal, did not require such notice of a sickness which lasted only ten minutes and did not recur for seven weeks; Kells v. Ins. Co., 64 Minn. 390, 67 N. W. 215, 71 N. W. 5, 58 Am. St. Rep. 541. Where the insured had given notes for the horse, and in his contract for purchase stipulated that in case of the death of the animal within a certain time the vendor should take the insurance and give up the notes, it was not a breach of the stipulation in the policy that the vendee "is the sole, absolute, and unconditional owner;" id. The insurer is not bound by the consent of his agent to kill the horse insured, although suffering from an incurable disease; Tripp v. Live-Stock Ins. Co., 91 Ia. 278, 59 N. W. 1.

Where plate glass was insured and the insurer, exercising his option, employed a person with whom he had a contract for that purpose to replace it (the policy providing that the insured should when necessary remove any woodwork, gas fixtures, or other obstruction), the negligent removal of gas pipes by the contractor and a resulting explosion causing a breakage of the new glass, did not render the insurer liable; McCauley v. Casualty Co., 16 Misc. 574, 38 N. Y. Supp. 773.

Credit Insurance. A contract by which the insured is indemnified against loss by the failure of his customers to pay for goods sold to them. It is insurance against excess loss by the insured, i. e. against a loss which is in excess of a specified percentage of gross sales. It usually limits the losses insured against to a fixed amount by reason of sales to any one person, and limits the sales, covered by the policy, to customers having at least a specified minimum commercial rating by a specified commercial agency. It usually provides for an initial loss to be borne by the insured.

The insured is frequently termed the "indemnified," and so referred to in the policy. Such contract is not a contract of suretyship, but a policy of insurance; Tebbets v. Guarantee Co., 73 Fed. 95, 19 C. C. A. 281; Shakman v. Credit Co., 92 Wis. 366, 66 N. W. 528, 32 L. R. A. 383, 53 Am. St. Rep. 920; Mercantile Credit & Guaranty Co. v. Littleford Bros., 18 Ohio Cir. Ct. 889; and to be construed most strongly against the insurer; id.

It is like any other insurance contract and is governed largely by the same rules; Wadsworth v. Jewelers Co., 132 N. Y. 540, 29 N. E. 1104; Claflin v. Credit Co., 165 Mass. 501, 43 N. E. 293, 52 Am. St. Rep. 528. The agent who solicits it is within the purview of a statute making him the agent of the insurer; Shakman v. Credit Co., 92 Wis. 366, 66 N. W. 528, 32 L. R. A. 383, 53 Am. St. Rep. 920.

There is a distinction between this loss and other kinds of insurance with respect to the value of the policy, which has been thus stated: The loss provable on a policy of insurance is ordinarily the reserve value of the policy, or the amount sufficient to re-insure the holder in a solvent company for the same amount, to be paid upon a loss happening on the same conditions and within the same time. Credit insurance is peculiar; there does not appear to be any reserve value to the policies, nor are there any general tables to show the rate of re-insurance, nor any other solvent company in which re-insurance could be obtained. When no losses occurred it may be assumed that the premium is a fair price for the risk, and the loss may be taken to be a proportionate part of the premium. When actual losses have been sustained after the insolvency and before the proof, these losses may be accepted as evidence of the value of the policy; Duryee v. Credit Co. (N. J.) 32 Atl. 690.

Under a policy of indemnity to the insured, to the extent of $10,000, against losses in excess of one-fourth of one per cent. of their annual sales, twelve per cent. additional to be deducted from the total gross losses, the claim not to exceed $7,500, by any one firm, where there was a loss with one firm of $20,000, the total gross loss from which deductions were to be made was $7,500, and the balance was the indemnity to be paid; Rice v. Ins. Co., 164 Mass. 285, 41 N. E. 276.

A policy of credit insurance was terminated by the insolvency of the insured, and the deduction to be made before the "excess" was ascertained was calculated on the amount of sales made up to the time of insolvency and not on the amount stipulated for the term of the policy; 25 Ins. L. J. 842.

A provision in such a policy that amounts realized from other security or indemnity shall be deducted before the adjustment of a loss, does not entitle the insurer to deduct the proceeds of a policy in another company which provides that it shall not cover losses insured by the first company, but shall only attach when that company's policy is exhausted; American Credit Indemnity Co. v. Wood, 73 Fed. 81, 19 C. C. A. 264. One who is the agent of the insurer for the purpose of soliciting such insurance, transmitting applications, and collecting premiums, and who receives pay therefor, has power to make an additional agreement providing that if the customer is not rated in Dun's and is rated in Bradstreet's, the latter shall be binding on the insurer; Shakman v. Credit Co., 92 Wis. 366, 66 N. W. 528, 32 L. R. A. 383, 53 Am. St. Rep. 920; and to vary details of the policy as to credit rating; id.

Employer's Liability Insurance. A contract by which the company agrees to reimburse an employer for any loss occasioned by his liability for damages to an employé, injured in his service.

The liability of the insurer becomes fixed on the happening of the accident or casualty, even though the amount of such liability is contingent, to the extent that the amount which the insured may be adjudged to pay has not been ascertained; American Casualty Ins. Co.'s Case, 82 Md. 535, 34 Atl. 778, 38 L. R. A. 97.

Under a policy of insurance against damage for which the insured may be liable under an employer's liability act (q. v.) where the workman has recovered damages for injuries in a common-law action, and not under the statute, the insurer will not be liable to reimburse the amount so recovered; 16 Can. S. C., 4th ser. 212; but where the policy contained a clause agreeing to indemnify the insured against damages sustained by the employé while engaged in operations connected with the business of iron work, it was held to cover injuries received by reason of the construction of a building for the use of such business; Hoven v. Assur. Corp., 93 Wis. 201, 67 N. W. 46, 32 L. R. A. 388.

There is no obligation on the part of the insurer which can become the subject of garnishment in proceedings by an employé to enforce a judgment against the insured; Allen v. Ins. Co., 145 Fed. 881, 76 C. C. A. 265, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 958.

A policy which provides that the employer shall not settle with an employé without the consent of the insurer, who was to assume control of litigation, is a contract of indemnity against liability, and payment by the employer of a judgment recovered against him is not a condition precedent to the insurer's liability; id.; and a person who is injured cannot sue the insurer; Embler v. Ins. Co., 8 App. Div. 186, 40 N. Y. Supp. 450. But where the insurer was prohibited from suing until after judgment against him, in which case an action might be brought within thirty days after such judgment, it was held that the contract was not one of indemnity merely, so that an action would lie after judgment was recovered against the employer, though it was paid by him, such payment not being a condition precedent to recovery; Anoka Lumber Co. v. Casualty Co., 63 Minn. 286, 65 N. W. 353, 30 L. R. A. 689; nor is a discharge of liabilities by the insured, under a clause in the policy promising to pay "all damages with which the insured may be legally charged," such a contract being not one of indemnity alone, but also a contract to pay liabilities; American Employers' Liability Ins. Co. v. Fordyce, 62 Ark. 562, 36 S. W. 1051, 54 Am. St. Rep. 305. When the insured was required to give immediate notice to the insurer upon the occurrence of an accident and notice of any claim on account of it, the notice under the condition is not required until an accident happens and the employer has received notice of a claim made on account thereof; Anoka Lumber Co. v. Casualty Co., 63 Minn. 286, 65 N. W. 353, 30 L. R. A. 689.

Such a policy is in no sense a contract between the insurer and the employé, and any sum paid by the company to the employer on account of the death of an employé, whose widow had a right of action, is not an asset of the estate of the deceased; Hawkins v. McCalla, 95 Ga. 192, 22 S. E. 141.

It is generally provided in such policies that the insurer shall have control of the defence of any suits against the employer on claims covered by the insurance, and such a condition is strictly enforced; 15 Can. L. T. 86.

Fidelity Insurance. A contract to indemnify the insured against loss by reason of the default or dishonesty of the employé.

Bonds of indemnity given by fidelity insurance companies are analogous to ordinary policies of insurance, and are governed by the same principles of interpretation; Mechanics' Savings Bank & Trust Co. v. Guarantee Co., 68 Fed. 459.

All conditions in the policy must be complied with as in other cases of insurance, and where one of them is the prosecution of the person whose action is insured against, before he can recover, against the insurer, it was held, by an equally divided court, that the insured must conform to this condition even if he thereby became liable to an action for damages; 9 Ins. L. J. 160.

A statement in the application as to the frequency of measures usually taken by the employer to secure the fidelity of the employed is a warranty the breach of which will defeat recovery; 28 Scot. L. Rep. 394; but in an application for insurance, declarations of the integrity of a clerk, in answer to questions which manifestly relate to the course of business of the employer, are mere representations and not warranties; 7 Exch. 744. Where the bond provides that answers made to questions asked in the application shall be warranties, and the answers are made on the employer's "best knowledge and belief," mere falsity of the answers is not sufficient to avoid the bond, but the company must show that they are "knowingly false;" Mechanics' Savings Bank & Trust Co. v. Guarantee Co., 68 Fed. 459; and if such answers involved no misrepresentation or concealment, the contract could not be affected by loose parol statements, or concealment of facts about which no inquiry was made, or conduct on which no reliance was placed; Supreme Council Catholic Knights of America v. Casualty Co., 63 Fed. 48, 11 C. C. A. 96.

A representation that the person whose integrity is insured "has never been in arrears or default of his accounts" covers any which may have occurred prior to the time when he entered the service of the insured; 30 U. C. C. P. 360. To charge an embezzling employé with interest on the money embezzled converts the embezzlement into a debt and the insurer is not liable therefor; Milwaukee Theater Co. v. Casualty Co., 92 Wis. 412, 66 N. W. 360.

Leaving money temporarily in an insecurely locked room when there were various means of safe-keeping available, was held a violation of a guarantee of "diligent and faithful performance of his duty," for which an insurer was liable; 6 Leg. N. (Can.) 311; 16 Can. L. J. 334. So allowing a customer to make an overdraft on a bank was held negligence in the bank's agent who permitted it, the agent and the customer being together involved in brokerage transactions; 7 Revue Légale 57; s. c. 14 L. C. Jur. 186.

Where the employer retains the employé in his service after he knows of the latter's dishonesty, and without notice to and assent of the insurer, he cannot recover; Lancashire Ins. Co. v. Callahan, 68 Minn. 277, 71 N. W. 261, 64 Am. St. Rep. 475; but this rule will not apply to mere breaches of duty or contract obligation, not involving dishonesty of the servant or fraud and concealment on the part of the master; id.

A bank cannot recover for loss occurring after it has been informed that its teller is engaged in speculation and where it has not so notified the insurer, or not made any investigation; Guarantee Co. of N. A. v. Trust Co., 183 U. S. 402, 22 Sup. Ct. 124, 46 L. Ed. 253; the employer is not bound to use diligence to discover dishonesty, but where, in the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care, he could not have failed to infer dishonesty, he may properly be charged with knowledge of such fact; National Bank of Asheville v. Casualty Co., 89 Fed. 819, 32 C. C. A. 355; and if a bank's cashier leaves without notice, taking $5,000 of its money, and the president, with knowledge of the facts, but without disclosure to the company, renews the cashier's bond and pays the premium, there can be no recovery on the bond; id.

The employé is bound to reimburse the insurer for the loss sustained through him; Fidelity & Casualty Co. of N. Y. v. Eickhoff, 63 Minn. 170, 65 N. W. 351, 30 L. R. A. 586, 56 Am. St. Rep. 464; but, upon the payment of a loss, the insurer is subrogated to the rights of the employer in the prosecution of dishonest employés; London Guar., etc., Co. v. Geddes, 22 Fed. 639. And a stipulation between the insurer and the employé that the evidence of payment by the insurer to the employer should be conclusive evidence against the employé as to the fact and extent of his liability to indemnify the insurer, is void as against public policy; id.

Where the indemnity was for one year, and it was provided that a claim under the bond or any renewal thereof should embrace only acts during its currency, it was held that each renewal was a separate contract, and the discovery, during the term of the renewal of theft committed during the running of the bond under a previous renewal, would not make the company liable therefor, when the discovery was too late to hold the insurer under the bond on the renewal in force when the thefts were committed; De Jernette v. Casualty Co., 98 Ky. 558, 33 S. W. 828; and when it was provided that any claim under the bond should cover only defaults committed during its currency, and within twelve months prior to its discovery, it was held that it did not cover a default committed more than twelve months prior to such discovery which would have occurred within the year but for the falsification of the books within the year preceding; Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Bank, 71 Fed. 116, 17 C. C. A. 641; reversing Consolidation Nat. Bank of Philadelphia v. Casualty Co., 67 Fed. 874.

In American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 72 Fed. 470, 18 C. C. A. 644, on this subject, it was held (1) Where a policy stipulates for a notification of the dishonesty of the employé as soon as practicable after the occurrence of the act, and the evidence as to when the dishonesty was discovered was conflicting, the question what is a reasonable time is for the jury. (2) It is not necessary to give notice of suspicions of dishonesty. (3) The fact that the insured corporation has passed into the hands of a receiver will not absolve the insurer from liability. (4) Where proof of loss under the bond is set forth with reasonable plainness and in a manner which a person of ordinary intelligence cannot fail to understand, a failure to explicitly aver that a loss has been caused is immaterial. (5) The fact that one member of a corporation was cognizant of an employé's dishonesty, and that fraudulent collusion existed between them, cannot make the corporation responsible for a false certificate of character issued by him without the knowledge of other directors; American Surety Co. v. Pauly, 72 Fed. 470, 18 C. C. A. 644.

Guaranty Insurance. This term has sometimes been used to express indiscriminately the classes of insurance herein entitled Credit, Fidelity, and Title Insurance. The latter designations are conceived to be better adapted to the subject-matter, and their employment is not only the better usage but undoubtedly leads to a clearer understanding of the varied subject-matter now involved in the law of insurance.

The expression "Guaranty Insurance" has, however, an extended use in England and Canada, and is there used to designate insurance of the integrity of employés, the phrase "policy of guaranty" being in frequent use by the courts; 7 Jur. N. S. 1109; 30 U. C. C. P. 360; 16 Can. L. J. 334; 14 L. C. Jur. 186.

The term is also used in a few English cases involving the guaranty of merchants against losses in business from the bankruptcy, insolvency, or assignment with preference of their customers; 7 H. & N. 5.

In an American case of a date long prior to the use of these modern forms of insurance, an action of debt was sustained upon a policy of insurance guaranteeing to the bearer the payment of a note, and it was held that there was authority to issue such a policy under charter powers such as were at that time conferred upon insurance companies generally, and it was also held that the policy passed by delivery; Ellicott v. Ins. Co., 8 G. & J. (Md.) 166.

Title Insurance. A contract to indemnify the owner or mortgagee of real estate from loss by reason of defective titles, liens, or incumbrances.

Answers to questions in applications for such policies are held to amount to a warranty and the question of materiality cannot be raised; Stensgaard v. Ins. Co., 50 Minn. 429, 52 N. W. 910, 17 L. R. A. 575.

Where a title insurance company undertook to defend the interest of insured in the premises against a lien, it was bound to protect him through all stages of the proceeding to enforce the lien, as well after as before judgment therein, or notify him that it could not do so, and furnish him necessary information of the status of the proceeding in time to enable him to protect himself; and if, after giving such notice, the company defended the proceeding, but thereafter abandoned the defence, it was necessary for it to give insured another such notice; Quigley v. Trust Co., 64 Minn. 149, 66 N. W. 364.

Where an insurer agrees to indemnify a mortgagee against loss not exceeding $2,200 by reason of incumbrances, and to defend the land against such claims, a loss occurring by reason of the negligence of the insurer is not limited to the $2,200; Quigley v. Trust Co., 60 Minn. 275, 62 N. W. 287.

Under a title insurance policy, the fact that the conveyancing was done, not by the insurer but by the conveyancer of the insured, was held no defence, and the right of the insurer to do conveyancing, draw deeds, write wills, or the like, was denied, and their action in assuming such right, unwarranted by their charter, was declared to be a usurpation on the commonwealth; Gauler v. Trust Co., 9 Pa. C. C. R. 634.

In cases of defective title, or an incumbrance requiring removal, the insured would be entitled, in an action on the policy, to recover the costs and expenses incurred in curing the defect or removing the incumbrance; but in case of total loss of title the value of the property lost is the measure of damages, and where the insured had been compelled to pay more than the amount of the policy to get a good title, judgment was entered for that sum; id.

When the title was insured under a policy to the mortgagee and the latter bought in the property at a foreclosure sale, the purchase did not cancel the mortgage so as to annul the policy, but the insurer was liable to redeem the property from a sale under prior mechanic's liens; Minnesota Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Drexel, 70 Fed. 194, 17 C. C. A. 56.

See LIEN; MORTGAGE; TITLE; WARRANTY.

Insurance against Birth of Issue. A form of insurance common in England by which the heir presumptive protects his interest against either the birth of an heir apparent or the attainment of majority, or to a particular age by an existing heir apparent. It is also and more commonly practised by tenants for life under settlements, who are entitled to reversions in fee simple subject to estates tail in their own issue by a particular marriage, and who, by this method, are enabled to mortgage their estates without burdening their life interests with premiums on life insurance. In this form of insurance the principal elements to consider are the age and the health of the party and the age at which women will cease to bear children. See Jac. Ch. 585, 586; 4 Hare 124; 5 De G. & S. 226; 10 Beav. 463; 19 id. 565.

INSURANCE AGENT. An agent for effecting insurance may be such by appointment or the recognition of his acts done as such; 2 Phill. Ins. § 1848; Perkins v. Ins. Co., 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 645. He may be agent for either of the parties to the policy, or for distinct purposes for both; People v. Imlay, 20 Barb. (N. Y.) 68.

An insurance agent's powers may be more or less extensive according to the express or implied stipulations and understandings between him and his principals. They may be for filling up and issuing policies signed in blank by his principals, for transmitting applications to his principals filled up by himself, as their agent or that of the applicant, for receiving and transmitting premiums, for adjusting and settling losses, or granting liberties and making new stipulations, or for any one or more of these purposes; First Baptist Church v. Ins. Co., 19 N. Y. 305; Bouton v. Ins. Co., 25 Conn. 542; Camphill v. Ins. Co., 37 N. H. 35, 72 Am. Dec. 324; Augusta Insurance & Banking Co. of Georgia v. Abbott, 12 Md. 348; Howard Fire Ins. Co. v. Bruner, 23 Pa. 50; New York Union Mut. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, id. 72; East Texas Fire Ins. Co. v. Brown, 82 Tex. 631, 18 S. W. 713; Hahn v. Assurance Co., 23 Or. 576, 32 Pac. 683, 37 Am. St. Rep. 709.

It is reasonable for insurance companies to insert in their policies conditions that their agents shall not have authority to alter the expressed terms of the policies; Northern Assur. Co. v. Bldg. Ass'n, 183 U. S. 308, 22 Sup. Ct. 133, 46 L. Ed. 213; or to waive any stipulation therein unless endorsed on or added to the policy; Gish v. Ins. Co., 16 Okla. 59, 87 Pac. 869, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 826. An agent cannot act so as to bind his company beyond the scope of his authority; Deming Inv. Co. v. Ins. Co., 16 Okla. 1, 83 Pac. 918, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 607; Northern Assur. Co. v. Bldg. Ass'n, 183 U. S. 308, 22 Sup. Ct. 133, 46 L. Ed. 213; contra, Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Schlink, 175 Ill. 284, 51 N. E. 795, where it was held the agent could waive a condition before delivery. A present contract of insurance is not affected by signing an application and the statement of an agent that he would take care of it and get a policy; Whitman v. Ins. Co., 128 Wis. 124, 107 N. W. 291, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 407, 116 Am. St. Rep. 25.

A general agent is one who represents the insurer in the conduct of the business generally in a particular place or territory. The powers of the general agent are thus stated by Dwight, Com., in Pitney v. Ins. Co., 65

N. Y. 6: "It is clear that a person authorized to accept risks, to agree upon and settle the terms of insurance, and carry them into effect by issuing and renewing policies, must be regarded as the general agent of the company. (Post v. Ins. Co., 43 Barb. [N. Y.] 351.) The possession of blank policies and renewal receipts, signed by the president and secretary, is evidence of a general agency. (Carroll v. Ins. Co., 40 Barb. [N. Y.] 292.) The power of such an agent of a stock company is plenary as to the amount and nature of the risk, the rate of premium, and generally as to the terms and conditions, and he may make such memoranda and indorsements, modifying the general provisions of the policy, and even inconsistent therewith, as in his discretion seems proper, before the policy is delivered, and in some cases even afterward. (May, Ins. 129.) He may also insert, by memorandum or indorsement, a description of the property inconsistent with the description of the same contained in the application, and such change will be effectual to protect the insured, although the policy itself provides that all conditions named in the application are to be fully complied with and that the application shall be a part of the policy, and a warranty on the part of the insured. (May, Ins. 129; Gloucester Mfg. Co. v. Ins. Co., 5 Gray [Mass.] 497, 66 Am. Dec. 376.)"

An agent holding a commission from an insurance company authorizing him to take risks generally, without placing any limitation thereon, either as to the kinds of risks or as to the territory within which they may be, is a general agent; and the fact that the policy provides that, in any matter relating to the insurance, no person shall be deemed the agent of the company unless authorized in writing, and that the agent's commission states that he shall be subject to the rules of the company, and to such instructions as may be given him from time to time, do not impose on one dealing with the agent a duty to ascertain his authority to issue a policy on a risk extrahazardous and located in a place other than the town in which is situated the agent's office; German Fire Ins. Co. v. Tile Co., 15 Ind. App. 623, 43 N. E. 41.

The resident agent of an insurance company having general authority to issue policies and renewals, fix rates and accept risks, collect premiums and cancel insurance, and perform all the duties of a recording agent, is a general agent for the locality; Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Orr, 56 Ill. App. 629. If the agent acts as such for both the company and the insured the contract may be avoided by either party who, at the time of the contract, did not know of such business agency for the other party or had, not knowing the facts, ratified it; British-American Assur. Co. v. Cooper, 6 Colo. App. 25, 40 Pac. 147.

When an insurance agent solicited business in an adjoining state, assumed to act with full authority, received the premium and issued the policy, he may be considered as a general agent and not a special agent without authority to make the contract; Hahn v. Guardian Assur. Co., 23 Or. 576, 32 Pac. 683, 37 Am. St. Rep. 709.

It has been held in a federal case that before the execution of a policy, the power and authority of a local and soliciting agent are co-extensive with the business intrusted to his care, and his positive knowledge as to material facts and his acts and declarations within the scope of his employment are obligatory on his principal, unless restricted by limitations well known to the other party at the time of the transaction; West End Hotel & Land Co. v. Ins. Co., 74 Fed. 114.

The powers of agents were extensively discussed by the Kansas supreme court: "The bulk of the fire insurance business of the state is done by eastern companies, who are represented here by agents." "It is a matter of no small moment therefore that the exact measure and limit of the powers of these agents be understood. All the assured knows about the company is generally through the agent. All the information as to the powers of, and limitations upon, the agent is received from him. Practically, the agent is the principal in the making of the contract. It seems to us therefore that the rule may be properly thus laid down that an agent authorized to issue policies of insurance and consummate the contract binds his principal by every act, agreement, representation, or waiver, within the ordinary scope and limit of insurance business which is not known by the insured to be beyond the authority granted to the agent;" German Ins. Co. v. Gray, 43 Kan. 497, 23 Pac. 637, 8 L. R. A. 70, 19 Am. St. Rep. 150; and it was held in that case that an insurance company might, through its agents, by a parol contract, waive provisions stated in the policy with reference to the manner of altering or waiving its terms and conditions; Westchester Fire Ins. Co. v. Earle, 33 Mich. 143; the court, in considering the question whether an agent of a company might change by parol the conditions of a policy wherein it was provided that it could only be done upon the consent of the company written thereon, held that a written bargain is of no higher legal degree than a parol one. "Either may vary or discharge the other, and there can be no more force in an agreement in writing not to agree by parol than in a parol agreement not to agree in writing. Every such agreement is ended by the new one which contradicts it;" American Central Ins. Co. v. McLanathan, 11 Kan. 533.

"Where insurance companies deal with the community through a local agency, persons having transactions with the company are entitled to assume, in the absence of knowledge as to the agent's authority, that the acts and declarations of the agent are valid as if they proceeded directly from the company;" Hardwick v. Ins. Co., 20 Or. 547, 26 Pac. 840.

An attempted restriction upon the power of the officer or agents, acting within the scope of their general authority, to waive provisions of the policy, unless such waiver is written upon the policy itself, is ineffectual; Dick v. Ins. Co., 92 Wis. 46, 65 N. W. 742.

A provision in the application or in the policy making the person procuring the application the agent of the insured and not of the company, cannot change the legal status of such person as agent of the company or the law of agency if he is in fact the agent of the company; Coles v. Ins. Co., 41 W. Va. 261, 23 S. E. 733.

A broker was held to be the agent of the company where he solicited applications which were sent by him to the agent, by whom policies were sent to the broker and the premiums were charged to the broker; in such case the finding by the jury that the broker was the duly authorized agent of the company within the meaning of the provisions in the policy requiring payments of the premiums to the company or its duly authorized agent within a certain time, will not be disturbed; Estes v. Ins. Co., 67 N. H. 462, 33 Atl. 515. In the absence of direct proof of the broker's authority to act for the insurer or insured he may establish his agency by showing that the act relied on was within the scope of his authority; American Fire Ins. Co. v. Brooks, 83 Md. 22, 34 Atl. 373. Where insurance is procured through a broker, though at his solicitation, he is the agent of the insured and his acts will not bind the company, but when his employment extends only to the procurement of the policy he ceases to be an agent of the insured on the execution and delivery; id.

A broker owes no duty of care or skill to the underwriter when he is acting on the instructions of his principal; 11 Com. Cas. 107.

A broker employed by a firm of insurance agents to solicit business on commission, having a desk in their office, is not such an agent as that notice to him by a policy holder is notice to the firm; Arff v. Ins. Co., 2 N. Y. Supp. 188, 49 Hun, 610; and one is a mere broker who only represented the company in a single transaction and whose name did not appear on the policy, though he may have told the insurer that he represented the company, collected the premiums, and delivered the policy; Gude v. Ins. Co., 53 Minn. 220, 54 N. W. 1117.

An agent has no power to delegate his authority so as to impose a liability on the company; 15 Can. L. T. 49; Dwelling House Ins. Co. v. Snyder, 59 N. J. L. 18, 34 Atl. 931. But an insurance company is bound by the acts of a clerk of its agent in accepting risks and issuing policies against the same in the performance of his duties, and one dealing with the clerk, as such, is not bound to inquire into his authority as to those matters; id. An agent's solicitor who took applications on which policies were issued has been held the agent of the company in effecting such insurance; McGonigle v. Ins. Co., 168 Pa. 1, 31 Atl. 868.

It has been held that a general agent (appointed by contract in this case) had power to waive cash payments of premiums and extend credit; Pythian Life Ass'n v. Preston, 47 Neb. 374, 66 N. W. 445; American Employers' Liability Ins. Co. v. Fordyce, 62 Ark. 562, 36 S. W. 1051, 54 Am. St. Rep. 305; to receive notice of loss; Germania Fire Ins. Co. v. Stewart, 13 Ind. App. 627, 42 N. E. 286; waive proofs of loss; Bolan v. Fire Ass'n, 2 Mo. App. Rep. 1375; Loeb v. Ins. Co., 99 Mo. 50, 12 S. W. 374; contra, Ermentrout v. Ins. Co., 63 Minn. 305, 65 N. W. 635, 30 L. R. A. 346, 56 Am. St. Rep. 481. An agent who has power to adjust losses may by parol waive formal proofs of loss; McGuire v. Ins. Co., 7 App. Div. 575, 40 N. Y. Supp. 300. He cannot waive the iron safe clause, when that authority is expressly withheld from him by the policy; Roberts, Willis & Taylor Co. v. Ins. Co., 13 Tex. Civ. App. 64, 35 S. W. 955. He can insure goods subject to chattel mortgage by indorsement on, or annexation to, the policy, though it is forbidden in the printed conditions; McGuire v. Ins. Co., 7 App. Div. 575, 40 N. Y. Supp. 300. Local agents cannot bind the company by consenting to vacancies; McLeary v. Ins. Co. (Tex.) 32 S. W. 583; or that insurance on a risk, not usually taken by the company should take effect from the application (nor will it matter that a special agent, having no power to contract, was present and approved); O'Brien v. Ins. Co., 108 Cal. 227, 41 Pac. 298.

An agent, during the continuance of his agency, may at any time, even after loss, correct a policy issued by him by inserting the property included in the contract but omitted by mistake from the policy; Taylor v. Ins. Co., 98 Ia. 521, 67 N. W. 577, 60 Am. St. Rep. 210. The agent of a company, whose authority has been revoked by the execution by it of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, has thereafter no authority to cancel policies and pay rebates or to set off rebates against a claim by the assignee for premiums collected; Franzen v. Zimmer, 90 Hun 103, 35 N. Y. Supp. 612. The agent is liable for failure to cancel policy when directed to do so; London Assur. Corp. v. Russell, 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 320; and when directed to cancel or reinsure a risk cannot reinsure in another company for which he is agent without its assent; Empire State Ins. Co. v. Ins. Co., 138 N. Y. 446, 34 N. E. 200.

Notice to an agent of matters within his commission is such to the company; 1 E. L. & Eq. 140; Capitol Ins. Co. v. Bank, 50 Kan. 449, 31 Pac. 1069; Bergeron v. Banking Co., 111 N. C. 45, 15 S. E. 883; Forward v. Ins. Co., 142 N. Y. 382, 37 N. E. 615, 25 L. R. A. 637.

The insurer has been held bound or estopped by the knowledge or action of or notice to the agent in the following cases: By his knowledge of foreclosure proceedings; Dick v. Ins. Co., 92 Wis. 46, 65 N. W. 742; of the existence of a mortgage, and his attaching a clause making the loss payable to the mortgagee; Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Stein, 72 Miss. 943, 18 South. 414; of a chattel mortgage; Robbins v. Ins. Co., 149 N. Y. 477, 44 N. E. 159; of incumbrance; German Ins. Co. v. Everett (Tex.) 36 S. W. 125; McDonald v. Fire Ass'n, 93 Wis. 348, 67 N. W. 719; Mcguire v. Ins. Co., 7 App. Div. 575, 40 N. Y. Supp. 300; where the agent is informed as to incumbrances and fills out the application, describing the property as not incumbered; Coles v. Ins. Co., 41 W. Va. 261, 23 S. E. 733; Perry v. Ins. Co., 67 N. H. 291, 33 Atl. 731, 68 Am. St. Rep. 668; where the agent, having power to issue and cancel policies, allowed a policy to remain in force after notice of an incumbrance; Phœnix Assur. Co. of London v. Coffman, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 631, 32 S. W. 810; where the application stated that no other company had refused to insure, and the agent had notice to the contrary; id.; where the agent incorrectly stated the title of the insured, after being correctly informed thereof; State Ins. Co. of Des Moines v. Du Bois, 7 Colo. App. 214, 44 Pac. 756; where the agent was acquainted with premises of the insured and could have made an accurate description through his knowledge of them, the company is estopped to avoid its obligation by showing a mis-description of the property; Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Moore, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 644, 36 S. W. 146. Where the insured makes true answers to the questions in an application, the validity of the insurance is not affected by the falsity of the answers inserted by the agent; Robinson v. Ins. Co., 1 App. Div. 269, 37 N. Y. Supp. 146; Bernard v. Ins. Ass'n, 17 Misc. 115, 39 N. Y. Supp. 356; Smith v. Ins. Co., 173 Pa. 16, 33 Atl. 567. In such case he will be regarded as the agent of the company, and not of the applicant and his knowledge of the falsity of the answer will be imputed to the company; Clubb v. Acc. Co., 97 Ga. 502, 25 S. E. 333. The company is not estopped by the agent's knowledge when that is acquired by him by virtue of his relation as attorney for the insured in a transaction with which the company was not connected; Union Nat. Bank v. Ins. Co., 71 Fed. 473, 18 C. C. A. 203; or when the knowledge of the agent is acquired after the issuance of the policy; Taylor v. Ins. Co., 98 Ia. 521, 67 N. W. 577, 60 Am. St. Rep. 210; West End Hotel & Land Co. v. Ins. Co., 74 Fed. 114. Or where the notice was to one of a firm of insurance agents, another member of which issued the policy in suit and was given several months before the policy was applied for; Queen Ins. Co. of America v. May (Tex.) 35 S. W. 829; and it was held that when the policy provided that no agent could stipulate for a modification of its provisions not brought to the knowledge of his principal officer, knowledge of the general superintendent that material statements in the application were false was not knowledge of the company; Ward v. Ins. Co., 66 Conn. 227, 33 Atl. 902, 50 Am. St. Rep. 80.

An agent's knowledge of the state of title is notice to the company; Clymer Opera Co. v. Ins. Co., 238 Pa. 137, 85 Atl. 1111; contra, Northern Assur. Co. v. Bldg. Ass'n, 183 U. S. 308, 22 Sup. Ct. 133, 46 L. Ed. 213; Gish v. Ins. Co., 16 Okl. 59, 87 Pac. 869, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 826; but the company is not estopped by the knowledge of its agents where the insured is a party to a deception in an answer in the application; Mudge v. Supreme Court, 149 Mich. 467, 112 N. W. 1130, 119 Am. St. Rep. 686, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 279. Where the agent prepares the application from former applications and tells the applicant that it is all right, the company is estopped from the defence of falsity of the answers; Roe v. Ins. Ass'n, 137 Ia. 696, 115 N. W. 500.

Mere notice to an agent by insured that he would not pay the premium does not terminate the policy; Taylor v. Assur. Soc., 134 Fed. 932.

See, generally, an extended discussion and collection of cases on the authority of insurance agents, 34 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 654; WARRANTY.

INSURANCE COMPANY. A company which issues policies of insurance,—an incorporated company, and either a stock company, a mutual one, or a mixture of the two. In a stock company, the members or stockholders pay in a certain capital which is liable for the contracts of the company. In a mutual company, the members are themselves the parties insured; in other words, all the members contribute premiums to the fund, which is liable for indemnity to each member for loss, according to the terms of the contract. In the mixed class, certain members, who may or may not be insured, contribute a certain amount of the capital, for which they hold certificates of shares, and are entitled to interest on the same at a stipulated rate, or to an agreed share of the surplus receipts, after the payment of losses and expenses, to be estimated at certain periods.

There are in some states companies formed upon the plan combining a stock capital with mutual insurance and issuing both bonds of mutual insurance and stock policies based upon the capital.

In New York it has been held that, under the statutes then in force regulating the formation of insurance companies and their organization, they could not be organized upon this plan so as to accept premium notes from some customers and cash premiums from others and assess the premium notes to pay losses in either branch of the business; Hart v. Achilles, 28 Barb. (N. Y.) 576. See also White v. Haight, 16 N. Y. 310.

Beneficial societies are sometimes held to be insurance companies within the meaning of the statutes regulating such companies; Berry v. Indemnity Co., 46 Fed. 439; and see State v. Benevolent Society, 72 Mo. 146; Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149; State v. Critchett, 37 Minn. 13, 32 N. W. 787; Golden Rule v. People, 118 Ill. 492, 9 N. E. 342. Where the main purpose of an order is that of life insurance, and insurance against sickness and disability, whatever purposes it may have, it is amenable to the laws of that state relating to insurance companies; it therefore must comply with the requirements of the statutes of that state (if the order is organized under the laws of another state), as to foreign insurance companies, before it can do business in that state; State v. Nichols, 78 Ia. 747, 41 N. W. 4. But in Wisconsin an association incorporated for the purpose of fraternal benevolent insurance upon the cooperative or assessment plan was a charitable and benevolent order within the meaning of the statute which, in line with the defined policy of the state, was exempted from the general laws relating to life insurance; State v. Whitmore, 75 Wis. 332, 43 N. W. 1133. In Pennsylvania a foreign mutual aid association of the same character was held not liable for violation of the laws regulating insurance companies; Com. v. Mutual Aid Ass'n, 94 Pa. 481; and the same association was held not to be a mutual insurance company in Ohio, the state of its incorporation; State v. Mutual Ass'n, 26 Ohio St. 19; so in many other states such associations are held not to be insurance companies within the purview of the general insurance laws of the state; State v. Ass'n, 35 Kan. 51, 9 Pac. 956; Sherman v. Com., 82 Ky. 102; State v. Aid Ass'n, 59 Ia. 125, 12 N. W. 782; Commercial League Ass'n of America v. People, 90 Ill. 166; Supreme Council of Order of Chosen Friends v. Fairman, 62 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 386; Elsey v. Relief Ass'n, 142 Mass. 224, 7 N. E. 844; Barbaro v. Occidental Grove, 4 Mo. App. 429; Rensenhouse v. Seeley, 72 Mich. 603, 40 N. W. 765; State v. Investment Co., 48 Minn. 110, 50 N. W. 1028. In Pennsylvania it was explicitly decided that an association organized not to do business for profit or gain but to aid pecuniarily the widows, orphans, heirs, and devisees of its members, is not an insurance company; Northwestern Masonic Aid Ass'n v. Jones, 154 Pa. 99, 26 Atl. 253, 35 Am. St. Rep. 810.

A physicians' defense company which contracts to pay the expenses of defending physicians against civil malpractice suits is an insurance company; Physicians' Defense Co. v. Cooper, 199 Fed. 576, 118 C. C. A. 50; Physicians' Defense Co. v. O'Brien, 100 Minn. 490, 111 N. W. 396; contra, Vredenburgh v. Defense Co., 126 Ill. App. 509; State v. Laylin, 73 Ohio St. 90, 76 N. E. 567.

A state has power to prohibit foreign insurance companies from doing business within its limits. It may impose such conditions as it pleases; Swing v. Lumber Co., 205 U. S. 275, 27 Sup. Ct. 497, 51 L. Ed. 799; Whitfield v. Ins. Co., 205 U. S. 489, 27 Sup. Ct. 578, 51 L. Ed. 895; Carroll v. Ins. Co., 199 U. S. 401, 26 Sup. Ct. 66, 50 L. Ed. 246.

Membership in a mutual company does not necessarily imply liability to assessment; Given v. Rettew, 162 Pa. 638, 29 Atl. 703. A surplus of such a company belongs equitably to the policy holders in the proportion in which they contributed to it and the directorate has no option to declare dividends; U. S. Life Ins. Co. v. Spinks, 96 S. W. 889, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 960, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1053; contra, Greeff v. Assurance Society, 160 N. Y. 19, 54 N. E. 712, 46 L. R. A. 288, 73 Am. St. Rep. 659.

Dividends of a mutual life company returned to policy holders are not income and are not taxable as such; Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co. v. Herold, 198 Fed. 199; Fuller v. Ins. Co., 70 Conn. 647, 41 Atl. 4; L. R. 14 A. C. 381.

INSURANCE POLICY. See POLICY.

INSURED. A person whose life or property interest is covered by a policy of insurance. See INSURANCE.

INSURER. The underwriter in a policy of insurance; the party agreeing to make compensation to the other. Sometimes, applied improperly to denote the party insured. See INSURANCE.

INSURGENTS. Rebels contending in arms against the government of their country who have not been recognized by other countries as belligerents. Insurgents have no standing in international law until recognized as belligerents. When recognized as belligerents the rules relating to contraband and other rules of war apply to them, but until so recognized their acts are merely the acts of individuals which may be piracy or any other crime according to the circumstances. The United States and other countries have statutes regulating dealings with insurgents in other countries and filibustering expeditions, as they are called, and expeditions to supply insurgents with arms and ammunition are forbidden; Snow, Lect. Int. Law 132.

In general insurgents have no belligerent rights. Their war vessels are not received in foreign ports, they cannot establish blockades which third powers will respect, and they must not interfere with the commerce of other nations. In the older books on international law they were usually treated as pirates. Their hostilities are never regarded as legal war. As late as 1885 in The Ambrose Light, 25 Fed. 408, this subject was discussed and the authorities fully reviewed, and it was held that the liability of a vessel to seizure as piratical, turned wholly on the question whether the insurgents had obtained any previous recognition of belligerent rights, either from their own or any other government. The court only refrained from entering a decree of forfeiture of the vessel, as a pirate, because of an implied recognition of the insurgents as belligerents, contained in a letter of the secretary of state of the date of the seizure. In recent years, however, a certain amount of recognition has been accorded to insurgents. In 1894, when insurgents were bombarding Rio Janeiro, Admiral Benham took the position that American merchant vessels, moving about the harbor and discharging cargoes, did so at their own risk. But any attempt on the part of the insurgents to prevent legitimate movements of our merchant vessels at other times was not to be permitted. Of this official action it has been said: "This establishment of this point, which seemed to be the logical outcome of recent practice, almost recognizes an imperfect status, or right of action afloat, for insurgents;" Snow, Lect. Int. L. 25.

In U. S. v. Trumbull, 48 Fed. 99, it was held that insurgents may purchase arms in the United States without violating U. S. R. S. § 5283, provided the arms are not designed to constitute any part of the furnishings or fittings of the vessel which carries them. This case was a prosecution in connection with the Itata which was also libelled for forfeiture by the United States. There was much discussion as to the meaning of the word "people" as used in the statute. It had been previously said to be one of the denominations of a foreign power; U. S. v. Quincy, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 467, 8 L. Ed. 458; and that a vessel could not be said to be in the service of a foreign people, etc., unless they had received recognition as belligerents; The Carondelet, 37 Fed. 800; the case of The Salvador, L. R. 3 C. P. 218, cited to the contrary, is distinguishable as resting on the broader provisions of the English foreign enlistment act; but in the Itata case the question was not raised by the facts, and it was simply held that the neutrality laws did not cover the case of a vessel which receives arms and munitions of war, in this country, with intent to carry them to a party of insurgents in a foreign country, but not with intent that they shall constitute any part of the fittings or furnishings of the vessel herself; and that she could not be condemned as piratical on the ground that she is in the employ of an insurgent party which has not been recognized by our government as having belligerent rights; The Itata, 56 Fed. 505, 5 C. C. A. 608. See also U. S. v. Weed, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 62, 18 L. Ed. 531; The Watchful, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 91, 18 L. Ed. 763; Snow, Lect. Int. L. 135.

In The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, 17 Sup. Ct. 495, 41 L. Ed. 987, the vessel was seized for a violation of U. S. R. S. § 5283, and was released by the district court upon the ground, inter alia, that the libel did not show that the vessel was fitted out and armed with intent that it should "be employed in the service of a foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace." The libel was amended so as to read "in the service of a certain people, to wit, certain people then engaged in armed resistance to the government of the King of Spain, in the island of Cuba." The district court held that the word "people" was used in an individual and personal sense and not as an organized and recognized political power in any way corresponding to a state, prince, colony, or district. The supreme court reversed the decree, holding that the vessel had been improvidently released, and that the word "people" in the statute covers any insurgent or insurrectionary body conducting hostilities, although its belligerency has not been recognized; and although the political department of the government had not recognized the existence of a de facto belligerent power engaged in hostility with Spain, it had recognized the existence of insurrectionary warfare, and the case sharply illustrated the distinction between recognition of belligerency, and of a condition of political revolt. See BELLIGERENCY.

INSURRECTION. A rebellion of citizens or subjects of a country or state against its government.

Any open and active opposition of a number of persons to the execution of the laws of the United States, of so formidable a character as to defy, for the time being, the authority of the government, constitutes an insurrection, even though not accompanied by bloodshed and not of sufficient magnitude to make success possible; In re Charge to Grand Jury, 62 Fed. 828.

As to the distinctions involved in the different words used to express organized resistance to governmental authority, see REBELLION.

The constitution of the United States, art. 1, § 8, gives power to congress "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

Whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion, from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the state, or states, most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders, for that purpose, to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper. And in case of an insurrection in any state against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States, on application of the legislature of such state, or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened), to call forth such number of the militia of any other state or states, as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection; U. S. R. S. pp. 287, 1029.

Whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any state, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States to call forth the militia of such state, or of any other state or states, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the next session of congress.

Whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the president, to use the military force hereby directed to be called forth, the president shall forthwith, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse, and retire peaceably to their respective abodes, within a limited time; U. S. R. S. § 5300.

The president may declare by proclamation whenever the inhabitants of any state or part thereof are found by him to be in a state of insurrection, that such inhabitants are in a state of insurrection against the United States and thereupon all commercial intercourse between them and the citizens of the United States shall be unlawful and shall cease so long as such condition of hostility continues, and all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise coming from such state or section into other parts of the United States or proceeding from other parts of the United States to such state or section together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same shall be forfeited to the United States; but commercial intercourse may, in the discretion of the president, be permitted and licensed with loyal persons residing in such insurrectionary section, so far as to supply such persons with necessaries; U. S. R. S. §§ 5300–5304.

Capital cases for insurrection by a citizen of the United States against the government of any foreign countries having treaties with the United States may be tried before the minister of the United States in such country; id. § 4090. See INSURGENTS.

INTAKERS. In English Law. The name given to receivers of goods stolen in Scotland, who take them to England. 9 Hen. V. c. 27.

INTEGER (Lat.). Whole; untouched. Res integra means a question which is new and undecided. 2 Kent 177.

INTEMPERATE. If the habit is to drink to intoxication whenever occasion offers, and sobriety or abstinence is the exception, then the charge of intemperate habits is established, and it is not necessary that this custom should be an everyday rule; Tatum v. State, 63 Ala. 152. See Mullinix v. People, 76 Ill. 213. See HABITUAL DRUNKARD; DRUNKENNESS.

INTENDANT. One who has the charge, management, or direction of some office, department, or public business.

INTENDED TO BE RECORDED. This phrase is frequently used in conveyancing, in deeds which recite other deeds which have not been recorded. In Pennsylvania, it has been construed to be a covenant, on the part of the grantor, to procure the deed to be recorded in a reasonable time; Penn. v. Preston, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 14.

INTENDENTE. In Spanish Law. The immediate agent of the minister of finance, or the chief and principal director of the different branches of the revenue, appointed in the various departments in each of the provinces of the Spanish monarchy. See Escriche, Intendente.

INTENDMENT OF LAW. The true meaning, the correct understanding, or intention, of the law; a presumption or inference made by the courts. Co. Litt. 78.

It is an intendment of law that every man is innocent until he is proved to be guilty; see PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE; that every one will act for his own advantage; that every officer acts in his office with fidelity; that the children of a married woman, born during the coverture, are the children of the husband. See BASTARDY. Many things are intended after verdict, in order to support a judgment; but intendment cannot supply the want of certainty in a charge in an indictment for a crime; 5 Cro. 121. See Com. Dig. Pleader (C 25), (S 31); Dane, Abr. Index; 14 Viner, Abr. 449; Westcott v. Garrison, 6 N. J. L. 132.

INTENT. See COMMON INTENT; INTENTION.

INTENTIO (Lat.). In Civil law. The formal complaint or claim of a plaintiff before the prætor. "Reus exceptionem velut intentionem implet:" id est, reus in exceptione actor est. The defendant makes up his plea as if it were a declaration; i. e. the defendant is plaintiff in the plea.

In Old English Law. A count or declaration in a real action (narratio). Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 2, c. 2; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 7; Du Cange.

INTENTION, INTENT. A design, resolve, or determination of the mind.

In Criminal Law. To render an act criminal, a wrongful intent must exist; 7 C. & P. 428; U. S. v. Pearce, 2 McLean 14, Fed. Cas. No. 16,020; State v. Berkshire, 2 Ind. 207; State v. Bartlett, 30 Me. 132; Smith v. Kinne, 19 Vt. 564; State v. Voight, 90 N. C. 741. And with this must be combined a wrongful act; as mere intent is not punishable; 9 Co. 81 a; 2 C. & P. 414; Com. v. Morse, 2 Mass. 138; Ross v. Com., 2 B. Monr. (Ky.) 417;

Torrey v. Field, 10 Vt. 353; U. S. v. Riddle, 5 Cra. (U. S.) 311, 8 L. Ed. 110; but see R. & R. 308; 1 Lew. Cr. Cas. 42; and generally, perhaps always, the intent and act must concur in point of time; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 207; Cl. Cr. L. 45, 238, 265; but a wrongful intent may render criminal an act otherwise innocent; 1 C. & K. 600; Com. v. Hersey, 2 Allen (Mass.) 181; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 255; Ransom v. State, 22 Conn. 153.

In considering whether a defendant charged with doing a criminal act did it with criminal intent, his prior and accompanying acts are all to be considered, and the rule in civil cases as to the existence of a fraudulent intent may be invoked: State v. Musick, 101 Mo. 260, 14 S. W. 212.

Where a transaction on its face is as consistent with honesty as with fraud, it will be presumed that the intent was lawful; State v. Gritzner, 134 Mo. 512, 36 S. W. 39.

Courts must judge the intent a man has in doing an act by the means he employs and the thing to be accomplished. If they all be lawful, courts cannot impute malice or unlawful motives to the actor; Barton v. Rogers, 21 Idaho, 609, 123 Pac. 478, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 681.

Generally, where any wrongful act is committed, the law will infer conclusively that it was intentionally committed; Hill v. Com., 2 Gratt. (Va.) 594; Taylor v. State, 4 Ga. 14; Com. v. Hersey, 2 Allen (Mass.) 179; as the intent to take life may b einferred from the character of the assault, the use of a deadly weapon and the attendant circumstances; Jackson v. State, 94 Ala. 85, 10 South. 509; Winn v. State, 82 Wis. 571, 52 N. W. 775; and also that the natural, necessary, and even probable consequences were intended; 5 C. & P. 538; People v. Herrick, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 87; Com. v. Blanding, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 304, 15 Am. Dec. 214; Hill v. Com., 2 Gratt. (Va.) 594; State v. Fuller, 1 Bay (S. C.) 245, 1 Am. Dec. 610; West v. State, 9 Humphr. (Tenn.) 66.

Generally speaking, when a statute makes an act indictable, irrespective of guilty knowledge, ignorance of fact is no defence; Com. v. Wentworth, 118 Mass. 441; L. R. 2 C. C. 154; Beckham v. Nacke, 56 Mo. 546; see Halsted v. State, 41 N. J. L. 552, 32 Am. Rep. 247; contra, Farrell v. State, 32 Ohio St. 456, 30 Am. Rep. 614, where the subject is fully treated. See IGNORANCE.

Intent is in a certain sense essential to the commission of a crime and in some classes of cases it is necessary to show moral turpitude; but there is a class of cases where purposely doing a thing prohibited by statute may amount to an offence though the act does not involve moral wrong, for instance where shippers pay a rate under the honest belief that it is the lawful rate when it is not; Armour Packing Co. v. U. S., 209 U. S. 85, 28 Sup. Ct. 428, 52 L. Ed. 681; a mistake of law as to the right to ship under the contract after the change of rate is unavailing; id.

When by the common law, or by the provision of a statute, a particular intention is essential to an offence, or a criminal act is attempted but not accomplished, and the evil intent only can be punished, it is necessary to allege the intent with distinctness and precision, and to support the allegations with proof. On the other hand, if the offence does not rest merely in tendency, or in an attempt to do a certain act with a wicked purpose, but consists in doing an unlawful or criminal act, the evil intention will be presumed, and need not be alleged, or, if alleged, it is a mere formal averment, which need not be proved; Com. v. Hersey, 2 Allen (Mass.) 180; 6 East 474; Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 306, 52 Am. Dec. 711; State v. Smith, 93 N. C. 516.

This proof may be of external and visible acts and conduct from which the jury may infer the fact; 8 Co. 146; or it may be by proof of an act committed, as, in case of burglary with intent to steal, proof of burglary and stealing is conclusive; 5 C. & P. 510; 2 Mood. & R. 40. When a man intending one wrong fails, and accidentally commits another, he will, except where the particular intent is a substantive part of the crime, be held to have intended the act he did commit; People v. Enoch, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 159, 27 Am. Dec. 197; Com. v. Call, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 515; U. S. v. Ross, 1 Gall. 624, Fed. Cas. No. 16,196; 1 C. & K. 746.

Where intent is a material ingredient of the crime it is necessary to be averred, but it may always be averred in general terms; Evans v. U. S., 153 U. S. 584, 14 Sup. Ct. 934, 38 L. Ed. 830; 153 U. S. 608, 14 Sup. Ct. 939, 38 L. Ed. 839.

As to when a party can prove his intent under various circumstances, see note in 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 367.

As to the distinction between intention and motive, see Pollock's First Book of Jurispr. 144, where he defines intention as the wish or desire accompanying an act and having regard not only to the act itself, but to the consequences to be produced; and as including will, but including much more than is commonly understood by will.

As to "motive," external or internal, he points out that external motive is a particular inducement to a course of action, but that motive can also mean internal motive, the general moral quality or disposition of the agent which is a constant element as compared with particular inducements, and gives weight in his deliberation to this or that inducement. The effect of general moral quality or disposition in the process of deliberation or choice is for many purposes more important than the average or objective value of things reputed desirable; this he deems to be the meaning of motive according to the best modern authors.

In Contracts. An intention to enter into the contracts is necessary: hence the person must have sufficient mind to enable him to intend.

In Wills. The intention of the testator governs unless the thing to be done be opposed to some unbending rule of law; 6 Cruise, Dig. 295; Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 68, 8 L. Ed. 322. This intention is to be gathered from the instrument, and from every part of it; 3 Ves. 105; Brown v. Bartlett, 58 N. H. 511; Hinton v. Milburn's Ex'rs, 23 W. Va. 166; Metcalf v. First Parish in Framingham, 128 Mass. 374; Banks v. Jones, 60 Ala. 605; Mather v. Mather, 103 Ill. 607; and from a later clause in preference to an earlier; Woodbury v. Woodbury, 74 Me. 413; Murfitt v. Jessop, 94 Ill. 158; Hemphill v. Moody, 62 Ala. 510.

See INTERPRETATION; CONSTRUCTION; STATUTES; WILLS.

INTENTIONE. A writ that lay against him who entered into lands after the death of a tenant in dower, or for life, etc., and held out to him in reversion or remainder. Fitz. N. B. 203.

INTER ALIA (Lat.). Among other things: as, "the said premises, which, inter alia, Titius granted to Caius."

INTER ALIOS (Lat.). Between other parties, who are strangers to the proceeding in question.

INTER APICES JURIS. See APEX JURIS.

INTER CÆTEROS. Among others; in a general clause; not by name (nominatim). A term applied in the civil law to clauses of disinheritance in a will. Inst. 2, 13, 1; id. 2, 13, 3.

INTER CANEM ET LUPUM (Lat. between the dog and the wolf). The twilight; because then the dog seeks his rest, and the wolf his prey. Co. 3d Inst. 63.

INTER PARTES (Lat. between the parties). A phrase signifying an agreement professing in the outset, and before any stipulations are introduced, to be made between such and such persons: as, for example, "This indenture, made the —— day of ——, 1848, between A B of the one part, and C D of the other." It is true that every contract is in one sense inter partes, because to be valid there must be two parties at least; but the technical sense of this expression is as above mentioned; Addison, Contr. 9.

This being a solemn declaration, the effect of such introduction is to make all the covenants comprised in a deed to be covenants between the parties and none others: so that should a stipulation be found in the body of a deed by which "the said A B covenants with E F to pay him one hundred dollars," the words "with E F" are inoperative, unless they have been used to denote for whose benefit the stipulation may have been made, being in direct contradiction with what was previously declared, and C D alone can sue for the non-payment; it being a maxim that where two opposite intentions are expressed in a contract, the first in order shall prevail; 7 M. & W. 63. But this rule does not apply to simple contracts inter partes; 2 D. & R. 277.

When there are more than two sides to a contract inter partes, for example, a deed, as, when it is made between A B of the first part, C D of the second, and E F of the third, there is no objection to one covenanting with another in exclusion of the third. See 5 Co. 182; 4 Q. B. 207.

INTER SE, INTER SESE (Lat.). Among themselves. Story, Partn. § 405.

INTER-STATE LAW. See EXTRADITION; FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE; COMMERCE; INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

INTER VIVOS (Lat.). Between living persons; as a gift inter vivos, which is a gift made by one living person to another. It is a rule that a fee cannot pass by grant or transfer inter vivos, without appropriate words of inheritance. 2 Pres. Est. 64. See DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA; GIFTS.

INTERCALARE. In the Civil Law. To introduce or insert among or between others; to introduce a day or month into the calendar; to intercalate. Dig. 50, 16, 98, pr.

INTERCEDERE. In the Civil Law. To become bound for another's debt.

INTERCHANGEABLY. By way of exchange or interchange. This term properly denotes the method of signing deeds, leases, contracts, etc., executed in duplicate, where each party signs the copy he delivers to the others.

INTERCOMMON. To enjoy a right of common mutually with the inhabitants of a contiguous town, vill, or manor. When the commons of two adjacent manors join, and the inhabitants of both have immemorially fed their cattle promiscuously on each other's common, this is called intercommoning. 2 Bla. Com. 33; Termes de la Ley.

INTERDICT. In Civil Law. The formula according to which the prætor ordered or forbade anything to be done in a cause concerning true or quasi possession until it should be decided definitely who had a right to it. But in modern civil law it is an extraordinary action, by which a summary decision is had in questions of possession or quasi possession. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 1287. Interdicts are either prohibitory, restitutory, or exhibitory; the first being a prohibition, the second a decree for restoring possession lost by force, the third a decree for the exhibiting of accounts, etc.; id. 1290; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 252; Dig. 4, 15, 2. It is said by the writers of the Institutes that some (including Gaius) thought that from the true etymology of the word interdict, it should be applied only to prohibitory orders, and that those which were restitutory or exhibitory were properly decreta, but that "the usage has obtained of calling them all interdicts as they are pronounced between two parties, inter duos dicuntur;" id. Interdicts were decided by the prætor without the intervention of a judex, differing in this from actions (actiones).

According to Isidorus, however, the derivation is from quod interim dicitur. See Voc. Jur. Utr.; Sand. Just. 489; Mackeldey, Civ. Law §§ 258–64. In the formulary procedure the interdict was preliminary and conservative, and afterwards made final or not according to the result of the litigation. After the disappearance of this procedure "no doubt the remedies remained by the forms of action which succeeded. Some of the most important of these were really injunctions, either prohibitory or mandatory." Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 253. Like an injunction, the interdict was merely personal in its effects; and it had also another similarity to it, by being temporary or perpetual. Dig. 43. 1. 1, 3, 4. This similitude prompts the suggestion by the author last quoted, that "it is easy to perceive how they may have been adopted from the Roman and Canon law into the equity practice of England, and thence into that of America;" Howe. Stud. Civ. L. 254. See Story, Eq. Jur. § 865; Halifax, Anal. ch. 6. See INJUNCTION.

In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical censure, by which divine services are prohibited either to particular persons or particular places. These tyrannical edicts, issued by ecclesiastical powers, have been abolished in England since the reformation, and were never known in the United States. See 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 340. Baptism was allowed during an interdict; but the eucharist was denied, except in the article of death, and burial in consecrated ground was denied, unless without sacred offices. For the ancient form of an interdict, see Tomlin's L. Dict. h. t.

INTERDICTION. A prohibition of commercial intercourse between the citizens or subjects of the country enacting or proclaiming it and some other specified country or port.

By act of March 1, 1809, congress interdicted commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, and in a case arising under this act, the United States supreme court held that the term interdiction means an entire cessation, for the time being, of all trade whatever.

It has been held in England and in this country that interdiction of commerce with the port of destination is not a loss within a policy of marine insurance; 11 East 22; Smith v. Ins. Co., 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 176, 5 L. Ed. 235; Andrews v. Ins. Co., 3 Mas. 6, Fed. Cas. No. 374; contra, 9 East 283; Olivera v. Ins. Co., 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 183, 4 L. Ed. 365; Thompson v. Read, 12 S. & R. (Pa.) 440; Simonds v. Ins. Co., 1 Wash. C. C. 382, 4 Dall. 417, Fed. Cas. No. 12,875. See 3 Kent 293.

In Civil Law. A judicial decree, by which a person is deprived of the exercise of his civil rights.

The condition of the party who labors under this incapacity.

There can be no voluntary interdiction, as erroneously stated by some writers: the status of every person is regulated by the law, and can in no case be affected by contract.

Interdiction is the civil law proceeding by which, as by inquisition in lunacy (q. v.) under English and American law, a person is found to be incapable of the management of himself and his estate. It is devised for the special protection of the rights and persons of those who are unable to administer them themselves, and although the person interdicted is not permitted to exercise his legal rights, he is by no means deprived of their enjoyment. These rights are exercised for his benefit by a curator, who is held to a strict accountability, and the fidelity of whose administration is secured, in most cases, by a bond of security, and always by a tacit mortgage on all his property.

By the law of the twelve tables, prodigals alone could be interdicted. Curators were appointed for those afflicted with mental aberration, idiocy, or incurable diseases, qui perpetuo morbo laborant; but no decree of interdiction was pronounced against them. By the modern civil law, prodigality and profligacy are not sufficient reasons for interdiction; but whenever a person is prostrated, either by mental or physical disease, to such a degree as to be permanently disabled from administering his estate, he may be interdicted.

A decree of interdiction can be pronounced only by the court having jurisdiction of the domicil of the person to be affected. The causes assigned are imbecility, insanity, and madness.

The application may be by any relative, or wife or husband; or, in case of madness, the public law officer must apply, or in case of imbecility or insanity he may do so. The proceeding is by petition; the acts relied on are stated in writing; and the opinion of the family council is taken, the petitioners not participating. The judgment must be given at a public sitting, and, pending the proceedings, temporary administration may be provided for. Even if the application is rejected, the person against whom the proceedings are taken may be forbidden to go to law, compromise, borrow, receive payment of capital or give discharges, conveyances, or mortgages without advice of counsel appointed by the same judgment.

An appeal is provided, and there may be another examination. The decree must be duly served and recorded, and posted in the tribunal of birth. From the day of judgment all acts are void, and it may have a retroactive effect, by which previous acts are annulled.

After death a person's sanity can only be attacked if he has been interdicted, unless the insanity result from the act questioned.

A guardian or curator is appointed, as in case of minors, to which it is by statute assimilated; the husband for his wife, as of right; the wife may be appointed for her husband, in which case the family council regulate the manner of administration.

No one is compelled to act as guardian for more than ten years. The income must be used primarily to better the condition of the interdicted person. If his child marry, the family council fix the dowry. Interdiction ceases with the causes which made it necessary, and it may be withdrawn by proceedings similar to those by which it was obtained.

Such are substantially the rules on the subject of interdiction found in the law of Louisiana and the French Code. They are substantially the same in all the modern codes having the civil law for their basis.

In Louisiana it has been held that mental weakness is not sufficient unless interdiction be necessary for protection of person or property; Interdiction of Watson, 31 La. Ann. 757; the motives of the party applying should be fully investigated; Francke v. His Wife, 29 La. Ann. 302; trial by jury cannot be demanded and judgment may be at chambers; In re Ross, 38 La. Ann. 523; a nonresident cannot be interdicted; Interdiction of Dumas, 32 La. Ann. 679; testimony of experts does not control the court and is of little weight when they had seen defendant only once; Interdiction of Watson, 31 La. Ann. 757; and opinions of non-experts are of little weight; they should state facts; Eloi v. Eloi, 36 La. Ann. 563; costs of proceeding to interdict a wife, include fees of her lawyers, and are a debt of the community; Breaux v. Francke, 30 La. Ann. 336.

A judge may in the exercise of a sound legal discretion, without a special statutory authority, exclude relations from a family meeting to recommend a curator, and he is not restricted to a narrow construction of the term "conflicting interest" in the statute disqualifying persons, having such an interest, for participating in the family meeting; Interdiction of Bothick, 44 La. Ann. 1037, 11 South. 712. In the selection of a curator the family meeting is not limited to applicants, nor to persons suggested by relations of the interdict; id.

In Scotch Law. A legal restraint laid upon persons liable to be imposed upon, though having, to some extent, the exercise of reason, to prevent them from signing any deed affecting heritage, to their own prejudice, without the consent of their curators or interdictors. It is nearly superseded in practice by voluntary trusts. In cases where a trust cannot be obtained, the law relating to unconscionable bargains and to facility and circumvention is usually sufficient protection.

INTERDICTION OF FIRE AND WATER. Banishment by an order forbidding all persons to supply the person banished with fire or water, they being considered the two necessaries of life.

INTERDICTUM SALVIANUM (Lat). In Roman Law. The Salvian interdict. A process which lay for the owner of a farm to obtain possession of the goods from his tenant who had pledged them to him for the rent of the land. Inst. 4, 15, 3.

INTERESSE (Lat.). Interest. The interest of money; also an interest in lands.

INTERESSE TERMINI (Lat.). An interest in the term. The demise of a term in land does not vest any estate in the lessee, but gives him a mere right of entry on the land, which right is called his interest in the term, or interesse termini. See Co. Litt. 46; 2 Bla. Com. 144; 10 Viner, Abr. 348; Dane, Abr. Index; 1 Washb. R. P.

A lessee for years who has never obtained seisin, was, unless he entered and took actual possession, deemed to have no estate, but merely a contractual interesse termini. This entry is still essential to the recovery of the land in specie; Jenks, Mod. Land L., 77, 344. If the lessee dies before entry, his executors can enter; Co. Litt. 46 b.

INTEREST (Lat. it concerns; it is of advantage).

In Contracts. The right of property which a man has in a thing. See INSURABLE INTEREST.

On Debts. The compensation which is paid by the borrower of money to the lender for its use, and, generally, by a debtor to his creditor in recompense for his detention of the debt.

The compensation allowed by law or fixed by the parties to a contract for the use or forbearance or detention of money. Fisher v. Hoover, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 81, 21 S. W. 930.

A consideration paid for the use of money or for forbearance in demanding it when due. Maryland Casualty Co. v. Power Co., 157 Fed. 514, 85 C. C. A. 106.

Legal interest is the rate of interest established by the law of the country, which will prevail in the absence of express stipulation; conventional interest is a certain rate agreed upon by the parties. Fowler v. Smith, 2 Cal. 568.

Interest is a matter of local regulation and the decisions of state courts are binding on the courts of the United States; Bond v. John V. Farwell Co., 172 Fed. 58, 96 C. C. A. 546; where a judgment is rendered prior to the passage of an act reducing the rate of interest, it draws interest only at the reduced rate after the act takes effect; O'Brien v. Young, 95 N. Y. 428, 47 Am. Rep. 64.

It has been said that at common law interest was not allowed; it can be secured only by statute; Pacific Coast S. S. Co. v.

U. S., 33 Ct. Cl. 36; Sanderson v. Read, 75 Ill. App. 190. On the other hand, a party liable for a principal sum is liable for interest; it is an incident of the debt; Tidball v. Bank, 100 Va. 741, 42 S. E. 867.

Who is bound to pay interest. The party to a contract who has expressly or impliedly undertaken to pay interest is, of course, bound to do so.

Where interest is recoverable, not as a part of the contract, but by way of damages, if the plaintiff has been guilty of laches in unreasonably delaying the prosecution of his claim, it may be properly withheld; U. S. v. Sanborn, 135 U. S. 271, 10 Sup. Ct. 812, 34 L. Ed. 112. Interest allowed for non-payment of a judgment is in the nature of statutory damages; Morley v. R. Co., 146 U. S. 162, 13 Sup. Ct. 54, 36 L. Ed. 925.

On legacies. On specific legacies it has been held that interest is to be calculated from the date of the death of the testator; 2 Ves. Sen. 563; Shobe's Ex'rs v. Carr, 3 Munf. (Va.) 10; so on a gift of a fund in trust to pay the income to a sister for life; In re Hilyard's Estate, 5 W. & S. (Pa.) 30.

A general legacy, when the time of payment is not named by the testator, is not payable till the end of one year after testator's death, at which time the interest commences to run; 1 Sch. & L. 10; Eyre v. Golding, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 475; Wood v. Hammond, 16 R. I. 98, 17 Atl. 324, 18 Atl. 198; Couch v. Eastham, 29 W. Va. 784, 3 S. E. 23; and this is so whether the will has been proved during the year or not; Ogden v. Pattee, 149 Mass. 82, 21 N. E. 227, 14 Am. St. Rep. 401. Where only the interest is given, no payment will be due till the end of the second year; 7 Ves. 89. As a general rule pecuniary legacies do not bear interest till they are payable (one year after testator's death); Appeal of Townsend, 106 Pa. 268, 51 Am. Rep. 523.

Where a general legacy is given, and the time of payment is named by the testator interest is not allowed before the arrival of the appointed period of payment, and that notwithstanding the legacies are vested; Prec. in Ch. 337. But when that period arrives, the legatee will be entitled although the legacy be charged upon a dry reversion; 2 Atk. 108. See, also, 1 Cox, Ch. 133. When the executor can pay a legacy without any possible inconvenience to the estate, it has been held that interest begins to run at once; Van Rensselaer v. Van Rensselaer, 113 N. Y. 207, 21 N. E. 75. When a legacy is given payable at a future day with interest, and the legatee dies before it becomes payable, the arrears of the interest up to the time of his death must be paid to his personal representatives; McClel. 141. And a bequest of a sum to be paid annually for life bears interest from the death of testator; Eyre v. Golding, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 475; Flickwir's Estate, 26 W. N. C. (Pa.) 374; and so also for a legacy of income for the support and maintenance of the legatee: Appeal of Townsend, 106 Pa. 268, 51 Am. Rep. 523; especially is this so when the legacy is to be paid by the executors transferring to the trustees for the legatee interest-bearing securities belonging to the testator's estate; id.

Where the legatee is a child of the testator, or one towards whom he has placed himself in loco parentis, the legacy bears interest from the testator's death, whether it be particular or residuary, vested but payable at a future time, or contingent if the child have no maintenance. In that case the court will do what in common presumption the father would have done—provide necessaries for the child; 2 P. Wms. 31; 1 Dick. Ch. 310; 2 Brown, Ch. 59; Davison v. Rake, 44 N. J. Eq. 506, 16 Atl. 227. In case of a child en ventre sa mère at the time of the father's death, interest is allowed only from its birth; 2 Cox, Ch. 425. Where maintenance or interest is given by the will, and the rate specified, the legatee will not, in general, be entitled to claim more than the maintenance or rate specified; 3 Atk. 697, 716; 3 Ves. 286, n. And see further, as to interest in cases of legacies to children; 15 Ves. 363; 4 Madd. 275; 1 P. Wms. 783; 3 V. & B. 183.

Interest is not allowed by way of maintenance to any other person than the legitimate children of the testator; 3 Ves. 10; 4 id. 1; unless the testator has put himself in loco parentis; 1 Sch. & L. 5, 6. A wife; 15 Ves. 301; a niece; 3 Ves. 10; a grandchild; 1 Cox, Ch. 133; are, therefore, not entitled to interest by way of maintenance. See 2 Wms. Exec. 743. Nor is a legitimate child entitled to such interest if he have a maintenance, although it may be less than the amount of the interest of the legacy; 1 Sch. & L. 5; 3 Ves. 17. But see In re Bostwick, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 103; 2 Roper, Leg. 202; Appeal of Townsend, 106 Pa. 268, 51 Am. Rep. 523, cited above.

Where an intention, though not expressed, is fairly inferable from the will, interest will be allowed; 1 Swanst. 561, n.

Interest is not allowed for maintenance, although given by immediate bequest for maintenance, if the parent of the legatee, who is under moral obligation to provide for him, be of sufficient ability: so that the interest will accumulate for the child's benefit until the principal becomes payable; 3 Atk. 399; 1 Brown, Ch. 386; 3 id. 60, 416. But to this rule there are some exceptions; 3 Ves. 730; 4 Brown, Ch. 223; 4 Madd. 275, 289.

Where a fund, particular or residuary, is given upon a contingency, the intermediate interest undisposed of—that is to say, the intermediate interest between the testator's death, if there be no previous legatee for life, or, if there be, between the death of the previous taker and the happening of the contingency—will sink into the residue for the benefit of the next of kin, or executor of the testator, if not bequeathed by him; but if not disposed of, for the benefit of his residuary legatee; 1 Brown, Ch. 57; 2 Atk. 329.

Where a legacy is given by immediate bequest, whether such legacy be particular or residuary, and there is a condition to divest it upon the death of the legatee under twenty-one, or upon the happening of some other event, with a limitation over, and the legatee dies before twenty-one, or before such other event happens, which nevertheless does take place, yet, as the legacy was payable at the end of the year after the testator's death, the legatee's representatives, and not the legatee over, will be entitled to the interest which accrued during the legatee's life, until the happening of the event which was to divest the legacy; 1 P. Wms. 501; 5 Ves. 335, 522.

Where a residue is given, so as to be vested, but not payable at the end of the year from the testator's death, but upon the legatee's attaining twenty-one, or upon any other contingency, and with a bequest over divesting the legacy, upon the legatee's dying under age, or upon the happening of the contingency, then the legatee's representatives in the former case, and the legatee himself in the latter, shall be entitled to the interest that became due during the legatee's life or until the happening of the contingency; 2 P. Wms. 419; 1 Brown, Ch. 81, 335; 3 Mer. 335.

Where a residue of personal estate is given, generally, to one for life with remainder over, and no mention is made by the testator respecting the interest, nor any intention to the contrary to be collected from the will, the rule appears to be settled that the person taking for life is entitled to interest from the death of the testator, on such part of the residue bearing interest as is not necessary for the payment of debts. And it is immaterial whether the residue is only given generally, or directed to be laid out, with all convenient speed, in funds or securities, or to be laid out in lands. See 6 Ves. 520; 9 id. 89, 549, 553. Interest, in case of a remainder in an estate in money, does not run until the death of the life tenant; McCook v. Harp, 81 Ga. 229, 7 S. E. 174.

But where a residue is directed to be laid out in land, to be settled on one for life, with the remainder over, and the testator directs the interest to accumulate in the mean time until the money is laid out in land, or otherwise invested on security, the accumulation shall cease at the end of one year from the testator's death, and from that period the tenant for life shall be entitled to the interest; 6 Ves. 520; 2 S. & S. 396. Where a gift is made of the residue of the testator's estate to one person for life, and the principal is given over to another one at the death of the life tenant, the legatee is entitled to interest from the testator's death; Davison v. Rake, 44 N. J. Eq. 506, 16 Atl. 227.

Where no time of payment is mentioned by the testator, annuities are considered as commencing from the death of the testator; and, consequently, the first payment will be due at the end of the year from that event; if, therefore, it be not made then, interest, in those cases wherein it is allowed at all, must be computed from that period; Eyre v. Golding, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 475. See Saunderson v. Stearns, 6 Mass. 37; 1 Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 356.

How much interest is to be allowed. As to time. In actions for money had and received, interest is allowed from the date of service of the writ; Hunt v. Nevers, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 500, 26 Am. Dec. 616; McIlvaine v. Wilkins, 12 N. H. 474. See U. S. v. Curtis, 100 U. S. 119, 25 L. Ed. 571. On debts payable on demand, interest is payable only from the demand; Hunt v. Nevers, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 500, 26 Am. Dec. 616; Wells v. Abernethy, 5 Conn. 222; Pope v. Barrett, 1 Mas. 117, Fed. Cas. No. 11,273. The words "with interest for the same" carry interest from date; 1 Stark. 452, 507; Horn v. Hansen, 56 Minn. 43, 57 N. W. 315, 22 L. R. A. 617. Interest upon a quantum meruit for services rendered, does not begin to run until a demand is made; Farr v. Semple, 81 Wis. 230, 51 N. W. 319. It is allowed on the amount found as damages for breach of contract, from the date they accrued; Gulf, Colorado & S. F. Ry. Co. v. McCarty, 82 Tex. 608, 18 S. W. 716. Interest coupons bear interest from maturity of the coupons; Town of Solon v. Bank, 114 N. Y. 122, 21 N. E. 168; Cairo v. Zane, 149 U. S. 122, 13 Sup. Ct. 803, 37 L. Ed. 673; Scotland County v. Hill, 132 U. S. 107, 10 Sup. Ct. 26, 33 L. Ed. 261.

See COUPONS.

Interest on a dividend declared by a receiver should be allowed from the time it was declared and ought to have been paid; Armstrong v. Bank, 133 U. S. 433, 10 Sup. Ct. 450, 33 L. Ed. 747. Interest runs on liability of shareholders to creditors of a national bank from the time it goes into liquidation; Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 27, 7 Sup. Ct. 788, 30 L. Ed. 864.

Interest may be computed from the commencement of an action for the balance due on a general account and the enforcement of lien; North v. La Flesh, 73 Wis. 520, 41 N. W. 633; Tootle v. Wells, 39 Kan. 452, 18 Pac. 692.

The general rule is that interest is not payable until the principal is due, unless the parties contract otherwise; Hutchins v. Dixon, 11 Md. 32. On a note payable on or before three years after date with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, the interest is to be paid at maturity; Ramsdell v. Hulett, 50 Kan. 440, 31 Pac. 1092; Tanner v. Investment Co., 12 Fed. 646; Koehring v. Muemminghoff, 61 Mo. 403, 21 Am. Rep. 402; contra, Cook v. Wiles, 42 Mich. 439, 4 N. W. 169, where the interest was held to be payable each year.

The mere circumstance of war existing between two nations is not a sufficient reason for abating interest on debts due by the subjects of one belligerent to another; American Ins. Co. v. Canten, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 524, 7 L. Ed. 242; Paul v. Christie, 4 H. & McH. (Md.) 161. But a prohibition of all intercourse with an enemy during war furnishes a sound reason for the abatement of interest until the return of peace; Hoare v. Allen, 2 Dall. (Pa.) 102, 1 L. Ed. 307; Foxcraft v. Nagle, 2 Dall. (Pa.) 132, 1 L. Ed. 319; Denniston v. Imbrie, 3 Wash. C. C. 396, Fed. Cas. No. 3,802; Sims v. Willing, 8 S. & R. (Pa.) 1108; Bean v. Chapman, 62 Ala. 58. See infra.

A debt barred by the statute of limitations and revived by an acknowledgment bears interest for the whole time; Williams v. Finney, 16 Vt. 297.

As to the allowance of simple and compound interest. Interest upon interest is not allowed, except in special cases; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 287; Birchard v. Knapp's Estate, 31 Vt. 679; Stokely v. Thompson, 34 Pa. 210; and the uniform current of decisions is against it, as being a hard, oppressive exaction, and tending to usury; Connecticut v. Jackson, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 14, 7 Am. Dec. 471; Kennon v. Dickins, 1 N. C. 522, 2 Am. Dec. 642; Wheelock v. Moulton, 13 Vt. 430; Levens v. Briggs, 21 Or. 333, 28 Pac. 15, 14 L. R. A. 188; but interest on interest may be allowed if agreed upon after the interest becomes due; Barbour v. Tompkins, 31 W. Va. 410, 7 S. E. 1; Merck v. Mortgage Co., 79 Ga. 213, 7 S. E. 265; Sanford v. Lundquist, 80 Neb. 414, 118 N. W. 129; though both interest on the principal and on the interest are computed at the maximum rate allowed by law; id.

By the civil law, interest could not be demanded beyond the principal sum, and payments exceeding that amount were applied to the extinguishment of the principal; Ridley's Views of the Civil, etc., Law 84.

Where a partner has overdrawn the partnership funds, and refuses, when called upon to account, to disclose the profits, recourse would be had to compound interest as a substitute for the profits he might reasonably be supposed to have made; Stoughton v. Lynch, 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 213.

When executors, administrators, or trustees convert the trust-money to their own use, or employ it in business or trade, or fail to invest, they have been charged with compound interest; Fay v. Howe, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 528; Schieffelin v. Stewart, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 620, 7 Am. Dec. 507. Nothing but very culpable conduct will justify the compounding of interest against an administrator; Alvis v. Oglesby, 87 Tenn. 172, 10 S. W. 313; Cranson v. Wilsey, 71 Mich. 356, 39 N. W. 9. Interest cannot ordinarily be compounded against a guardian; In re Ward's Estate, 73 Mich. 220, 41 N. W. 431; Peelle v. State, 118 Ind. 512, 21 N. E. 288; but it may be in some cases; Latham v. Wilcox, 99 N. C. 367, 6 S. E. 711.

In actions for negligence, interest cannot be allowed by the jury as such, but they may, in computing their verdict, consider the lapse of time since the cause of action arose; Plymouth Tp. v. Graver, 125 Pa. 24, 17 Atl. 249, 11 Am. St. Rep. 867. The question of allowances of interest on damages for tort is for the jury. They should not be directed to allow it; Brent v. Thornton, 106 Fed. 35, 45 C. C. A. 214. Interest may be recovered for the wrongful conversion of personal property, computed from the time of the conversion; Drumm-Flato Commission Co. v. Edmisson, 208 U. S. 534, 28 Sup. Ct. 367, 52 L. Ed. 606.

In an action to recover the annual interest due on a promissory note, interest will be allowed on each year's interest until paid; Greenleaf v. Kellogg, 2 Mass. 568; Catlin v. Lyman, 16 Vt. 45; Talliaferro's Ex'rs v. King's Adm'r, 9 Dana (Ky.) 331, 35 Am. Dec. 140; Gibbes v. Chisolm, 2 N. & McC. (S. C.) 38, 10 Am. Dec. 560; Bledsoe v. Nixon, 69 N. C. 89, 12 Am. Rep. 642; Cramer v. Lepper, 26 Ohio St. 59, 20 Am. Rep. 756; Calhoun v. Marshall, 61 Ga. 275, 34 Am. Rep. 101; contra, Hastings v. Wiswall, 8 Mass. 455; Ferry v. Ferry, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 92; Sparks v. Garrigues, 1 Binn. (Pa.) 152, 165; Young v. Hill, 67 N. Y. 162, 23 Am. Rep. 99.

A note which provides for a rate of interest, but omits to provide for the rate of interest after maturity, draws the legal rate; Brewster v. Wakefield. 22 How. (U. S.) 118, 16 L. Ed. 301; Holden v. Trust Co., 100 U. S. 72, 25 L. Ed. 567; Burns v. Anderson, 68 Ind. 202, 34 Am. Rep. 250; 42 L. J. Rep. N. S. 666; Holbrook v. Sims, 39 Minn. 122, 39 N. W. 74, 140; Everett v. Dilley, 39 Kan. 73, 17 Pac. 661; Ferris v. Hard, 135 N. Y. 354, 32 N. E. 129; but a different view has been held; Brannon v. Hursell, 112 Mass. 63; Mayor & Aldermen of Jersey City v. O'Callaghan, 41 N. J. L. 349. See, as to charging compound interest, Barrow v. Rhinelander, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 550; Sparks v. Garrigues, 1 Binn. (Pa.) 165; Brown v. Brent, 1 Hen. & M. (Pa.) 4; Lewis's Ex'r v. Bacon's Legatee, 3 Hen. & M. (Va.) 89; 1 Viner, Abr. 457, Interest (C); Com. Dig. Chancery (3 S 3); 1 Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 371. An infant's contract to pay interest on interest after it has accrued will be binding upon him when the contract is for his benefit; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 286; 1 Atk. 489; 3 id. 613. The including in a note payable a year after date with a certain rate of interest, until paid, of a year's interest, is not compounding interest; Foard v. Grinter's Ex'rs (Ky.) 18 S. W. 1034. As to interest on interest coupons, see infra.

As limited by the penalty of a bond. It is a general rule that the penalty of a bond limits the amount of the recovery; 2 Term 388. But in some cases the interest is recoverable beyond the amount of the penalty; U. S. v. Gurney, 4 Cra. (U. S.) 333, 2 L. Ed. 638; Fake v. Eddy's Ex'r, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 76; Lewis v. Dwight, 10 Conn. 95; Bank of U. S. v. Magill, Paine, 661, Fed. Cas. No. 929; Potter v. Webb, 6 Greenl. (Me.) 14; Judge of Probate v. Heydock, 8 N. H. 491. The recovery depends on principles of law, and not on the arbitrary discretion of a jury; Smedes v. Hooghtaling, 3 Caines (N. Y.) 49, 2 Am. Dec. 250.

The exceptions are—where the bond is to account for moneys to be received; 2 Term 388; where the plaintiff is kept out of his money by writs of error; 2 Burr. 1094; or delayed by injunction; 1 Vern. 349; 16 Viner, Abr. 303; if the recovery of the debt be delayed by the obligor; 6 Ves. 92; 1 Vern. 349; if extraordinary emoluments are derived from holding the money; 2 Bro. P. C. 251; or the bond is taken only as a collateral security; 2 Bro. P. C. 333; or the action be on a judgment recovered on a bond; 1 East 436. See, also, Carter v. Carter, 4 Day (Conn.) 30, 4 Am. Dec. 177; Smedes v. Hooghtaling, 3 Caines (N. Y.) 49, 2 Am. Dec. 250; Harris v. Clap, 1 Mass. 308, 2 Am. Dec. 27; Com. Dig. Chancery (3 S 2); Viner, Abr. Interest (E).

But these exceptions do not obtain in the administration of the debtor's assets where his other creditors might be injured by allowing the bond to be rated beyond the penalty; 5 Ves. 329. See Viner, Abr. Interest (C 5).

Interest may be added to the amount of recovery on a bond although the total sum exceeds the penalty thereof; American Surety Co. v. Surety Co., 81 Conn. 252, 70 Atl. 584, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 83.

Upon a bond given to appear in a United States court to answer to an indictment, no interest can be recovered; U. S. v. Broadhead, 127 U. S. 212, 8 Sup. Ct. 1191, 32 L. Ed. 147.

As to the allowance of foreign interest. The rate of interest of the place of performance is to be allowed, where such place is specified; De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. (U. S.) 367, 6 L. Ed. 343; Scofield v. Day, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 102; Braynard v. Marshall, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 194; Hawley v. Sloo, 12 La. Ann. 815; Thomas v. Beckman, 1 B. Monr. (Ky.) 29; Archer v. Dunn, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 327; Austin v. Imus, 23 Vt. 286; Vinson v. Platt, 21 Ga. 135; Whitlock v. Castro, 22 Tex. 108; Davis v. Coleman, 29 N. C. 424; 5 C. & F. 1; otherwise, of the place of making the contract; 11 Ves. 314; Winthrop v. Carleton, 12 Mass. 4; Ingraham v. Arnold, 1 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 406; Arrington v. Gee, 27 N. C. 590; Fanning v. Consequa, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 511, 8 Am. Dec. 442; Lapice v. Smith, 13 La. 91, 33 Am. Dec. 555; Smith v. Mead, 3 Conn. 253, 8 Am. Dec. 183; Hill v. George, 5 Tex. 87; Wheeler v. Pope, id. 262. But the rate of interest of either place may be reserved; and this provision will govern, if an honest transaction and not a cover for usury; Mullen v. Morris, 2 Pa. 85; Peck v. Mayo, 14 Vt. 33, 39 Am. Dec. 205; Depau v. Humphreys, 8 Mart. N. S. (La.) 1; Van Schaick v. Edwards, 2 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 355; De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. (U. S.) 367, 6 L. Ed. 343. Coupons, after their maturity, bear interest at the rate fixed by the law of the place where they are payable, where there is no stipulation as to the rate after maturity; Cairo v. Zane, 149 U. S. 122, 13 Sup. Ct. 803, 37 L. Ed. 673; Scotland County v. Hill, 132 U. S. 107, 10 Sup. Ct. 26, 33 L. Ed. 261. See also Dicey, Confl. L., Moore's ed. 616, 625.

How computed. In casting interest on notes, bonds, etc., upon which partial payments have been made, every payment is to be first applied to keep down the interest; but the interest is never allowed to form a part of the principal so as to carry interest; Smith v. Shaw, 2 Wash. C. C. 167, Fed. Cas. No. 13,107; Meredith v. Banks, 6 N. J. L. 408; Anonymous, 3 N. C. 17; Dean v. Williams, 17 Mass. 417; Treat v. Stanton, 14 Conn. 445; Woodward v. Jewell, 140 U. S. 247, 11 Sup. Ct. 784, 35 L. Ed. 478.

When a partial payment exceeds the amount of interest due when it is made, it is correct to compute the interest to the time of the first payment, add it to the principal, subtract the payment, cast interest on the remainder to the time of the second payment, add it to the remainder, and subtract the second payment, and in like manner from one payment to another, until the time of judgment; Perl. Int. 168; Fay v. Bradley, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 194; Lightfoot v. Price, 4 Hen. & M. (Va.) 431; Com. v. Vanderslice, 8 S. & R. (Pa.) 458; Smith v. Shaw, 2 Wash. (C. C.) 167; Fed. Cas. No. 13,107. See Williams v. Houghtaling, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 86. The same rule applies to judgments; Hodgdon v. Hodgdon, 2 N. H. 169; Com. v. Vanderslice, 8 S. & R. (Pa.) 452.

Where a partial payment is made before the debt is due, it cannot be apportioned part to the debt and part to the interest. As, if there be a bond for one hundred dollars, payable in one year, and at the expiration of six months fifty dollars be paid in, this payment shall not be apportioned part to the principal and part to the interest, but at the end of the year, interest shall be charged on the whole sum, and the obligor shall receive credit for the interest of fifty dollars for six months; Tracy v. Wikoff, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 124, 1 L. Ed. 65.

A secured creditor of a bankrupt, selling his securities after the filing of the petition, must apply the proceeds, other than interest and dividends accrued since the filing, first to pay the debt with interest to date of petition, and not first to pay interest accrued since the petition. Interest and dividends accrued after the filing can be applied to interest on the debt accrued after the filing. This is also the English rule; Sexton v. Dreyfus, 219 U. S. 339, 31 Sup. Ct. 256, 55 L. Ed. 244.

When interest will be barred. When the money due is tendered to the person entitled to it, and he refuses to receive it, the interest ceases; 3 Campb. 296; Loomis v. Knox, 60 Conn. 343, 22 Atl. 771; Riley v. McNamara, 83 Tex. 11, 18 S. W. 141. See Cheney v. Libby, 134 U. S. 68, 10 Sup. Ct. 498, 33 L. Ed. 818. A tender by a junior mortgagee to a senior mortgagee of the amount due on the senior mortgage, with accrued costs of foreclosure, does not, unless kept good, prevent the running of interest; Nelson v. Loder, 132 N. Y. 288, 30 N. E. 369.

Where the plaintiff was absent in foreign parts beyond seas, evidence of that fact may be given in evidence to the jury on the plea of payment, in order to extinguish the interest during such absence; McCall v. Turner, 1 Call. (Va.) 133; Blake's Ex'rs v. Quash's Ex'rs, 3 McCord (S. C.) 340; Borland v. Sharp, 1 Root (Conn.) 178. But see Schaeffer's Estate, 9 S. & R. (Pa.) 263.

Whenever the law prohibits the payment of the principal, interest during the prohibition is not demandable; Hoare v. Allen, 2 Dall. (Pa.) 102, 1 L. Ed. 307; Foxcraft v. Nagle, 2 Dall. (Pa.) 132, 1 L. Ed. 319; Crawford v. Willing, 4 Dall. (Pa.) 286, 1 L. Ed. 836. Where payment has been prevented by war, interest cannot be recovered; Selden v. Preston, 11 Bush (Ky.) 191. See supra.

If the plaintiff has accepted the principal, he cannot recover the interest in a separate action; 1 Esp. 110; Tillotson v. Preston, 3

Johns. (N. Y.) 229. See Kellogg v. Richards, 14 Wend. 116.

For or against Government or State. Interest is not to be awarded against a sovereign government, unless its consent has been manifested by an act of its legislature or by a lawful contract of its executive officers; U. S. v. North Carolina, 136 U. S. 211, 10 Sup. Ct. 920, 34 L. Ed. 336. The U. S. is not liable to pay interest or claims against it, in the absence of express statutory provision therefor; U. S. v. Bayard, 127 U. S. 251, 8 Sup. Ct. 1156, 32 L. Ed. 159; Wightman v. U. S., 23 Ct. Cl. 144; U. S. v. Verdier, 164 U. S. 213, 17 Sup. Ct. 42, 41 L. Ed. 407; but this does not apply to subordinate governmental agencies (The National Home); National Volunteer Home v. Parrish, 229 U. S. 494, 33 Sup. Ct. 944, 57 L. Ed. 1296; interest must be allowed to the United States under U. S. R. S. § 966; id. A city is not liable for interest on its loans, after maturity, if it has provided funds to pay them; Friend v. City of Pittsburgh, 131 Pa. 305, 18 Atl. 1060, 6 L. R. A. 636, 17 Am. St. Rep. 811.

A general interest statute cannot be applied as against a county, and in an action to recover taxes wrongfully exacted, interest cannot be recovered; Jackson County Com'rs v. Kaul, 77 Kan. 715, 96 Pac. 45, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 552.

For exceeding the legal rates of interest the penalty is variously fixed by the different states. See USURY.

In Practice. Concern; advantage; benefit.

Such a relation to the matter in issue as creates a liability to pecuniary gain or loss from the event of the suit. Inhabitants of Northampton v. Smith, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 395, 396.

When used as a criterion of the proper parties to a suit it means interest in the object, not interest in the subject-matter; Penn v. Bahnson, 89 Va. 253, 15 S. E. 586.

A person may be disqualified to act as a judge, juror, or witness in a cause by reason of an interest in the subject-matter in dispute. As to the disqualifying interest of judges, see JUDGE; as to the disqualifying interest of jurors, see CHALLENGE.

The old rule that interest disqualifies a witness has been abolished here and in England by statute. The only question now is one of credibility with the jury. A few cases may be given for historical reasons.

An interest disqualifying a witness must be legal, as contradistinguished from mere prejudice or bias arising from relationship, friendship, or any of the numerous motives by which a witness may be supposed to be influenced; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 46, s. 25; must be present; Gilkinson v. The Scotland, 14 La. Ann. 417; Paxton v. Paxton, 38 W. Va. 616, 18 S. E. 765; must be certain, vested, and not uncertain and contingent; 2 P. Wms. 287; Ely v. Forward, 7 Mass. 25; Edwards v. McKinnon, 25 Ga. 337; Millett v. Parker, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 608; Dundas v. Muhlenberg's Ex'rs, 35 Pa. 351; must be an interest in the event of the cause, or the verdict must be lawful evidence for or against him in another suit, or the record must be an instrument of evidence for or against him; Bass v. Peevey, 22 Tex. 295; Van Nuys v. Terhune, 3 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 83. But an interest in the question does not disqualify the witness; People v. Howell, 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 302; Miles v. O'Hara, 1 S. & R. (Pa.) 32; Baring v. Reeder, 1 Hen. & M. (Va.) 165, 168; or the fact that he has a case of the same kind pending; Warren v. McGill, 103 Cal. 153, 37 Pac. 144.

An attorney will under most circumstances be permitted to testify in behalf of his client; but the courts do not look with favor upon the practice; Follansbee v. Walker, 72 Pa. 229, 13 Am. Rep. 671. See Mealer v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 102, 22 S. W. 142. Probably the test would lie in his withdrawal from the case.

The magnitude of the interest is altogether immaterial; a liability for costs is sufficient; 5 Term 174; Butler v. Warren, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 57.

Interest will not disqualify a person as a witness if he has an equal interest on both sides; 7 Term. 480; Wright v. Nichols, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 298; Cushman v. Loker, 2 Mass. 108; Cameron v. Paul, 6 Pa. 322; Hidell v. Dwinell, 89 Ga. 532, 16 S. E. 79.

INTEREST, MARITIME. See MARITIME INTEREST.

INTEREST OR NO INTEREST. A provision in a policy of insurance, which imports that the policy is to be good though the insured have no insurable interest in the subject-matter. This constitutes a wager policy, which is bad by statute 19 Geo. II. c. 37, and generally, from the policy of the law; 2 Par. Mar. Law 89, note. See INSURABLE INTEREST; POLICY.

INTERFERENCE. See PATENTS.

INTERIM (Lat.). In the mean time; meanwhile. An assignee ad interim is one appointed between the time of bankruptcy and appointment of the regular assignee. 2 Bell, Com. 355.

INTERIM CURATOR. A person appointed by justices of the peace to take care of the property of a felon convict until the appointment by the Crown of an administrator or administrators for the same purpose. Moz. & W.

INTERIM ORDER. An order to take effect provisionally, or until further directions. The expression is used especially with reference to orders given pending an appeal. Usually, ad interim.

INTERLAQUEARE. In Old Practice. To link together, or interchangeably. Writs were called interlaqueata where several were issued against several parties residing in different counties, each party being summoned by a separate writ to warrant the tenant, together with the other warrantors. Fleta, lib. 5, c. 4, § 2.

INTERLINEATION. Writing between two lines.

Interlineations are made either before or after the execution of an instrument. Those made before should be noted previously to its execution; those made after are made either by the party in whose favor they are, or by strangers.

When made by the party himself, whether the interlineation be material or immaterial, they render the deed void; Cutts v. U. S., 1 Gall. 71, Fed. Cas. No. 3,522; Hunt v. Gray, 35 N. J. L. 227, 10 Am. Rep. 232; unless made with the consent of the opposite party. See 11 Co. 27 a; Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Mass. 307, 6 Am. Dec. 67; Jackson v. Malin, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 293; President and Directors of Cumberland Bank v. Hall, 6 N. J. L. 215. But see Wicke's Lessee v. Caulk, 5 H. & J. (Md.) 41; McMicken v. Beauchamp, 2 La. 290; 4 Bingh. 123; Arrison v. Harmstead, 2 Pa. 191. See Express Pub. Co. v. Aldine Press, 126 Pa. 347, 17 Atl. 608.

When the interlineation is made by a stranger to an instrument in the hands of the promisee, though without his knowledge, if it be immaterial, it will not vitiate the instrument, but if it be material, it will, in general, avoid it; 11 Co. 27 a; L. R. 10 Ex. 330; see Murray v. Peterson, 6 Wash. 418, 33 Pac. 969; otherwise if the instrument be not then in the possession of a party; 6 East 309. If made while in the possession of an agent of the promisee, it avoids the instrument; L. R. 10 Ex. 330; contra, Hunt v. Gray, 35 N. J. L. 227, 10 Am. Rep. 232. The insertion of the words "or order" without the consent of the maker constitutes a material alteration which avoids the note; Taylor v. Moore (Tex.) 20 S. W. 53. An interlineation made in a bond, after its execution, by an agent of the obligee, without authority, will not invalidate it, but is only an act of spoliation; White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Dakin, 86 Mich. 581, 49 N. W. 583, 13 L. R. A. 313.

The decisions vary as to the effect of interlineations, when an instrument is put in evidence. In a late case the rule is stated thus: If the interlineation is in itself suspicious, as, if it appears to be contrary to the probable meaning of the instrument as it stood before the insertion of the interlined words; or if it is in a handwriting different from the body of the instrument, or appears to have been written with different ink, in all such cases, if the court considers the interlineation suspicious on its face, the presumption will be that it was an unauthorized alteration after execution. On the other hand, if the interlineation appears in the same handwriting with the original instrument, and bears no evidence on its face of having been made subsequent to the execution of the instrument, and especially if it only makes clear what was the evident intention of the parties, the law will presume that it was made in good faith, and before execution; Cox v. Palmer, 3 Fed. 16. See Zimmerman v. Camp, 155 Pa. 152, 25 Atl. 1086. Where interlineations in a deed are in the handwriting of the officer who attested it officially, the presumption is that they were made at or before the execution of the instrument; Bedgood v. McLain, 89 Ga. 793, 15 S. E. 670; but it has been held that an alteration appearing on the face of a deed is presumed to have been made after its execution, and the burden is upon the party presenting it to explain the alteration; Sisson v. Pearson, 44 Ill. App. 81.

If an instrument appears to have been altered, it is incumbent on the party offering it to explain its appearance. Generally speaking, if nothing appears to the contrary, the alteration will be presumed to be contemporaneous with the execution of the instrument; but if there is ground of suspicion, the law presumes nothing, but leaves the questions of the time when, the person by whom, and the intent with which it was done, to the jury, upon proofs to be adduced by the party offering the instrument; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 564; Stillwell v. Patton, 108 Mo. 352, 18 S. W. 1075; Martin v. Kline, 157 Pa. 473, 27 Atl. 753; Houston v. Jordan, 82 Tex. 352, 18 S. W. 702. See De Long v. Soucie, 45 Ill. App. 234. In cases of negotiable instruments, the holder is held to clearer proof than in cases of deeds; 2 Dan. Neg. Instr. § 1417. See Wilson v. Hayes, 40 Minn. 531, 42 N. W. 467, 4 L. R. A. 196, 12 Am. St. Rep. 754. In a carefully considered case, Beaman's Adm'rs v. Russell, 20 Vt. 205, 49 Am. Dec. 775, the court adopt what it calls the old common-law rule that an alteration of an instrument, if nothing appear to the contrary, should be presumed to have been made at the time of the execution. So, also, 1 Shepl. 386; Rankin v. Blackwell, 2 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 198; contra, Hills v. Barnes, 11 N. H. 395; Cochran v. Nebeker, 48 Ind. 459. It has been held, when a place of payment was inserted, that it was a question for the jury, but that it lay on the plaintiff to account for the alteration, etc.; 6 C. & P. 273; Davis v. Carlisle, 6 Ala. 707; such an insertion after delivery is a material alteration; Winter v. Pool, 100 Ala. 503, 14 South. 411; Gwin v. Anderson, 91 Ga. 827, 18 S. E. 43. But in Hayden v. Goodnow, 39 Conn. 164, it was held that the burden of proof of accounting for an alteration is not necessarily on the party producing the instrument. See Sisson v. Pearson, 44 Ill. App. 81.

In Neil v. Case, 25 Kan. 510, 37 Am. Rep. 259, it was held that a negotiable note offered in evidence, bearing on its face an apparent material alteration, is admissible in evidence, and the question as to the time of alteration is for the jury. The court said: If there is neither extrinsic nor intrinsic evidence as to when the alteration was made, it is to be presumed that it was made before or at the time of the execution. Perhaps there might be cases where the alteration is attended with such manifest circumstances of suspicion that the court might refuse to allow the note to go to the jury without some explanation, etc. This title is fully treated in a note in 37 Am. Rep. 260. As to alteration of negotiable instruments, see 7 Harv. Law Rev. 1. See ALTERATION; ERASURE.

INTERLOCUTOR. Properly means a judgment or judicial order pronounced in the course of a suit, which does not finally determine the cause. But in Scotch practice, the term is extended to the judgments of the Court of Session or the Lord Ordinary, which exhaust the point at issue, and which if not appealed against will have the effect of finally deciding the case. Bell; Moz. & W.

INTERLOCUTORY. Something which is done between the commencement and the end of a suit or action which decides some point or matter, which, however, is not a final decision of the matter in issue: as, interlocutory judgments, or decrees, or orders. The term seems to have originated with Lord Ellesmere; 1 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 213.

See DECREE; JUDGMENT; ORDER; INJUNCTION.

INTERLOPERS. Persons who interrupt the trade of a company of merchants, by pursuing the same business with them in the same place, without lawful authority.

INTERNAL REVENUE. See REVENUE; TAXATION.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION. Arbitration may be defined in the words of the First Hague Conference as "the settlement of differences between states by judges of their own choice, and on the basis of respect for law." Arbitration thus differs from mediation, which is an interposition by a third party in the endeavor to reconcile opposing claims. On the other hand, arbitration differs from a judicial decision rendered by a court imposed upon the parties, as in the case of municipal courts in relation to the citizens of the state. It is essential to arbitration that the judges of the dispute in question be freely chosen by the parties, and that the parties shall have obligated themselves to accept the decision rendered. At the First Hague Conference, which met in 1899, a Permanent Court of Arbitration was established. This court is permanent only in the sense that it is composed of a list of judges, nominated by the signatory powers, from among whom the arbitrators in each individual case are to be selected by the parties to the dispute. See HAGUE TRIBUNAL.

At the Second Hague Conference, which met in 1907, a voeu was expressed calling the attention of the powers to the advisability of adopting an annexed Draft Convention for the Establishment of a Court of Arbitral Justice. This court, in the words of the Convention, is to be "freely and easily accessible, composed of judges representing the various judicial systems of the world, and capable of insuring continuity in arbitral jurisprudence." It is to consist of judges and deputy judges chosen for a period of twelve years. The difficulty of reaching an agreement as to the method of selecting the judges and the constitution of the court prevented the establishment of the court. Inasmuch as the judges are to form a permanent staff, the court is to that extent judicial rather than arbitral in character.

While a decision based upon the principles of law is generally desired by the parties to a dispute, it is not inconsistent with the arbitration that the arbitrator should compromise conflicting claims which it is impossible otherwise to adjust, provided, however, that the powers of the arbitrator have not been limited by the parties to a strictly legal decision.

Arbitration was not unknown among the ancients, and many instances of its application occurred between the city-states of Greece; for example, in the time of Solon five Spartans were chosen to arbitrate between Athens and Megara as to the possession of the island of Salamis. II Philipson, 127–165. While the refusal of Imperial Rome to recognize other nations as on a footing of equality made impossible the existence of arbitration between Rome and other states, it frequently happened that Rome intervened as arbitrator between her more or less subject nations.

In the Middle Ages the position of dominance held by the Holy Roman Empire among the states of Europe likewise militated against a system of arbitration, though there are instances in which the Emperor arbitrated between feudal lords. Moreover, the exercise by the papacy of spiritual dominion over the states of the Christian world made it possible for the Pope to exercise the rôle of mediator or arbitrator between Christian princes. The upheaval brought about by the religious wars of the 16th and 17th centuries caused the practice of arbitration to become practically obsolete, but in the closing years of the 18th century the practice was revived under the influence of the United States.

There are two general classes of arbitration treaties; those entered into for the settlement, by arbitration, of a specific dispute which has arisen between two nations, and those which are entered into with the object of submitting to arbitration disputes which may arise in the future. The former are called Special Arbitration Treaties or Compromis; the latter are called General Arbitration Treaties. Since the First Hague Conference General Arbitration Treaties have been universally adopted. These treaties usually provide for the settlement of all disputes of a legal nature with the exception of differences which affect the vital interests, the independence or the honor of the two contracting parties. An early case of an agreement to arbitrate future disputes is to be found in the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo entered into between the United States and Mexico on February 2, 1848. Under this treaty the two nations agreed to "endeavor, in the most sincere and earnest manner, to settle the differences so arising, and to preserve the state of peace and friendship in which the two countries are now placing themselves, using, for this end, mutual representations and pacific negotiations." In case of failure, a resort shall not be had to reprisals or hostility of any kind "until the government of that which deems itself aggrieved shall have maturely considered, in the spirit of peace and good neighborship, whether it would not be better that such difference should be settled by the arbitration of commissioners appointed on each side, or by that of a friendly nation. And should such course be proposed by either party, it shall be acceded to by the other, unless deemed by it altogether incompatible with the nature of the difference, or the circumstances of the case."

The first arbitral agreement entered into by the United States was that with Great Britain under the Treaty of 1794, commonly called the Jay Treaty, which provided for three mixed commissions. One commission met in 1798 to determine what was the St. Croix River contemplated by the Treaty of Peace of 1783 as the boundary of the two countries. Another commission met in Philadelphia in 1797 to determine the compensation due British subjects in consequence of impediments which certain states of the United States had, in violation of the provisions of the Treaty of Peace, interposed to the collection of debts by British creditors. No decision was reached and the claims were afterwards adjusted by the Treaty of January 8, 1802. The third commission, which finished its report in 1804, passed upon claims of citizens of the United States arising from losses and damages sustained "by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property" during the war between Great Britain and France; and also upon claims of British subjects for losses sustained from captures made within the territorial waters of the United States or by French privateers armed within the United States.

The Treaty of Ghent, December 24, 1814, provided for three arbitral commissions. One related to the ownership of certain islands in Passamaquoddy Bay. The award divided ownership, assigning the larger number to Great Britain. The second commission undertook to decide the boundary line from the source of the River St. Croix to the St. Lawrence River. No decision was rendered, and the question was referred to the arbitration of the King of the Netherlands in 1827. His award, however, was not satisfactory, and the matter was finally settled by the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1842. The third commission, which undertook to determine the northeastern boundary through the Great Lakes, likewise failed to reach an agreement, and the question was finally settled by the Treaty of 1842.

After the Treaty of Ghent a controversy arose as to the compensation due to citizens of the United States for slaves who were in the territory in possession of the British at the time of the treaty. By the Convention of October 20, 1818, the question was referred to the arbitration of the Emperor of Russia, who rendered an award in favor of the United States without, however, fixing the amount of the indemnity, which was decided by a mixed commission under the Convention of July 12, 1822.

On February 8, 1853, there was a convention at London for a general settlement of all claims pending between the United States and Great Britain. On July 1, 1863, a convention was concluded between the two countries to determine the compensation due to the Hudson's Bay Company and the Puget's Sound Agricultural Company on claims for damages, as well as for the transfer to the United States of all their property and rights in territory acknowledged by the Treaty of 1846 to be under the sovereignty of the United States. The commission rendered an award of $650,000 in favor of the British claimants.

The Treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, provided for four distinct arbitrations, the principal of which was that held at Geneva with the object of settling the claims brought by the United States against Great Britain for losses and damages sustained by the depredations of the Alabama and other Confederate cruisers fitted out and armed in British ports.

The arbitrators declined to recognize the claims of the United States for the indemnity for the loss in the transfer of the American merchant marine to the British flag; for enhanced payment of marine insurance; for expenses incurred in pursuit of the Confederate cruisers; and for the prolongation of the war and the increased expenditures for the suppression of the rebellion. But they awarded, in compensation for the direct loss growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes, the sum of $15,500,000. The arbitral commission sat from December 15, 1871, to September 14, 1872.

The dispute as to the San Juan water boundary was referred to the German Emperor, who, on October 21, 1872, made an award in favor of the United States. Claims of British subjects against the United States, and of citizens of the United States against Great Britain (excepting the Alabama claims) arising out of injuries during the Civil War, were referred to a mixed commission appointed by the United States, Great Britain and Spain.

The fourth arbitration under the Treaty of Washington was to determine the compensation due to Great Britain for privileges accorded by that treaty to the United States in connection with the fisheries along the northeastern coast of Canada. The arbitral commission rendered an award in 1877 in favor of Great Britain to the amount of $5,500,000.

Under the Treaty of February 29, 1892, the United States and Great Britain submitted certain questions relating to the protection of the fur seals in Behring Sea to a tribunal of arbitration which sat in Paris. An award was rendered denying the ownership of the United States of seals outside of its maritime jurisdiction, but recognizing the necessity of imposing restrictions upon the killing of seals on the high seas. Claims of British subjects for the seizure and detention of their vessels engaged in the seal fisheries of Behring Sea were settled by a mixed commission appointed in 1896.

In 1903 a joint commission was appointed to determine the boundary between Alaska and the Dominion of Canada, and an award was rendered in the same year largely in favor of the United States. In 1909 a special agreement was signed submitting to arbitration questions relating to the proper interpretation of the fishery rights granted to United States citizens by the Treaty of 1818. See FISHERIES ARBITRATION.

INTERNATIONAL LAW. Nature and Sources. International law is the law governing the relations between states. It is sometimes called Public International Law to distinguish it from Private International Law or, as the latter should more properly be called, the Conflict of Laws (q. v.). Private international law is the law which is applied when citizens of different nations are parties to a suit or other legal proceeding. Since it does not involve nations themselves, but only their citizens, it has no claim to the name "international." See PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW.

International law was not altogether unknown among the ancients, and many instances occur of its application by the Greek city-states, and by the Italian tribal states before the establishment of the Roman Empire; but the development of international law into the definite and well-recognized state in which it exists today did not begin until modern times.

In 1625 Hugo van Groot, better known as Grotius, published his treatise entitled De jure belli ac pacis, which marks an era in the growth of international law. Grotius bases his system, first, upon the law of nature, and secondly, upon the customs in existence between nations. He first deduces from the law of nature the principles which should properly govern the conduct of states, and he thus establishes a priori certain rules of international law. But since the law of nature is illustrated in the practices which are universally observed by mankind, Grotius found it possible to establish the rules of international law by arguing a posteriori from the customs of nations. His system has, therefore, a double foundation.

After Grotius, certain writers, led by Pufendorf, built up a system of international law based chiefly upon the law of nature, while another school, the Positivists, laid stress upon the positive character of international law as evidenced by the customs actually in existence between nations. Between these two schools there developed later a third school called the Grotian school, which takes account both of the law of nature as the basis of international law, and of the customs of nations as the embodiment of a positive system. The standpoint of the Grotian school has found greater favor among the Latin states of the continent of Europe, while the Positivist school is represented by English, American and German writers, though in each case with notable exceptions.

As a positive science international law may be defined as the collection of those generally accepted rules of conduct which nations consider so far binding upon themselves in their relations with one another as to lead them actually to abide by them in their general practice. Much discussion has attended the question as to how far these rules can properly lay claim to the title of "law." The Austinian school, which restricts law to the category of commands imposed by a political superior upon a political inferior, refuses to recognize the so-called international law as anything more than international morality, since it lacks the elements of law-giver, command, and sanction. On the other hand, the school of historical jurisprudence, of which Savigny may be regarded as the founder, taking law as the expression of the common will of a political community, maintains that international law possesses the character of true law inasmuch as it consists of rules adopted by the common consent of nations and enforced largely by the moral sanction of public opinion. Lord Russell of Killowen, in an address before the American Bar Association in 1896, considered Austin's definition as applying rather to the later development of arbitrary power than to that body of customary law which, in earlier stages of society, precedes law strictly so called, and which is made up of rules and customs which are laws in every real sense of the word, as, for example, the law merchant. And he continued: "In stages later still, as government becomes more frankly democratic, resting broadly on the popular will, laws bear less and less the character of commands imposed by a coercive authority and acquire more and more the character of customary law founded on consent."

Since international law is a body of rules actually accepted by nations as regulating their mutual relations, it follows that the test of the existence of a given rule is to be found in the consent of nations to abide by that rule. Now this consent is evidenced chiefly by the usages and customs of nations, which form therefore the principal source of international law. To ascertain what these usages and customs are it has been common to turn to the writings of publicists and to the decisions of state courts. The Habana, 175 U. S. 677, 20 Sup. Ct. 290, 44 L. Ed. 320.

But while usage is the older and original source of international law, treaties are a later source of increasing importance. Until recently these treaties generally had their international effect only when the rule contained in them came to be gradually adopted by other nations and thus became part of the customary law, as, for example, the Declaration of Paris of 1856; but with the establishment of The Hague Conferences there have come into existence conventions of a law-making character, in that they are signed and ratified by the nations as a body.

State Sovereignty and Its Corollaries. The subjects of international law are sovereign states. The fundamental principles recognized by international law are that these states are independent each of the others in all that regards their domestic affairs, that they possess certain territory over which they have complete jurisdiction, and that they are all legally equal. Under these three principles it will be found convenient to group the chief rules of international law.

As a consequence of the sovereignty and independence of the states which form the family of nations, each state has a right to enter into such treaties and alliances with other states as it may find necessary or convenient. In order to maintain their independence the states of Europe have found it necessary from time to time to enter into alliances by which they have sought to maintain a balance of power. These alliances are an expression of the danger to the independence of states which might arise if any one of them should acquire a position of dominance. This necessity of maintaining a balance of power has led to the practice of intervention (q. v.) by which states have at times interfered in the affairs of other states. Intervention is ultimately based upon the principle of self-preservation, as the first law of international relations as of nature.

The principle of the equality of states is illustrated in the whole history of international relations from the time of the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648. Switzerland and Belgium, for example, have been recognized as having equal rights with Great Britain and Russia. But, while this legal equality is recognized, there is no denial of the fact that certain of the Great Powers have exercised a predominating influence in international relations.

Over the territory within their boundaries as well as over the persons residing in that territory, states have complete jurisdiction. State territory may be acquired in several ways: by discovery followed by occupation; by military conquest followed by subjugation; by prescription; and by accretion. It is recognized that a maritime belt, traditionally measured by a marine league from the shore, is part of the territory of the state which it surrounds. See TERRITORIAL WATERS. When the boundary between two states is marked by a river, the river takes on an international character, and apart from special cases determined by treaty, the mid-channel of the river constitutes the dividing line between the two countries. A river is likewise recognized as being international in character when it flows through two or more countries, though this is for purposes of commerce and does not exclude the jurisdiction of each state over that portion of the river within its domains. See RIVERS. Moreover, when a narrow body of water forms a passage way between two portions of the open sea or between the open sea and a bay or gulf open to the commerce of the world, the canal or strait assumes an international character and is open to the commerce of the world, subject to the purely administrative restrictions or tolls imposed by the power controlling the canal or strait.

After many struggles between maritime powers with conflicting interests, the open sea has come to be regarded as insusceptible of appropriation by any single state and as possessing, therefore, a purely international character. No state can exercise jurisdiction over the vessels of another state sailing the high seas, nor assume any exclusive right of fishing in certain waters not within the three-mile belt. See SEA.

The jurisdiction of a state over the persons residing within its domains gives rise to rules of international law when such persons happen to be citizens of another state. For many years it was held that a man could not, of his own accord, throw off his allegiance to one country and adopt the citizenship of another. While the United States courts recognized this principle, the Executive Department made constant efforts to obtain from European powers an acknowledgment of the right of Expatriation (q. v.), and in 1868 Congress passed an act in which the right was declared to be a "natural and inherent" one, but many foreign governments still exact military service of persons who, being born within their jurisdiction, have become the naturalized citizens of another state. See NATIONALITY; NATURALIZATION.

It has now become the general practice of nations to deliver up fugitive criminals which escape from one state and take refuge in another. This practice of extradition is still based upon treaties between individual nations defining the precise crimes for the commission of which a fugitive will be delivered up. See EXTRADITION; ASYLUM; FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

The needs of international intercourse have given rise to a class of diplomatic agents (q. v.) whose position has now come to be definite in character. These agents are not only the channel of communication between the government which sends them and the government to which they are sent, but they are also the personal representatives of their government at the foreign court. See AMBASSADOR; MINISTER; CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES.

Treaties are the contracts entered into by states for the purpose of creating special relations between them. Good faith in the observance of these treaties has come to be a recognized principle of international law. When a difficulty arises as to their meaning, practically the same rules of interpretation are applied as those of municipal law in the case of contracts between individuals. See TREATY.

It is inevitable that disputes should arise between nations. International law recognizes three ways in which these disputes may be settled,—by amicable methods, by forcible methods falling short of war, and by war. When negotiations between the foreign offices of the two states have failed to settle a dispute it is not uncommon for the states to have recourse to arbitration. The practice of arbitration has come to be more and more general during the past one hundred years, and it is significant of the growth of international law, both in definiteness and in comprehension, that nations have been willing to submit questions of the highest importance to a decision based upon its principles. The Hague Tribunal (q. v.) represents a permanent court for the settlement, by arbitration, of disputes between nations. See INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

When friendly negotiations between states have failed to settle a dispute between two states, international law recognizes that a third state may offer its good offices and mediation. Special rules were laid down at The Hague Conference of 1907 defining the conditions of such mediation. See MEDIATION.

Apart from these amicable methods of settling international disputes, there are certain measures, such as retorsion (q. v.), reprisals (q. v.), embargo (q. v.), and pacific blockade (q. v.), by which one state endeavors to exercise compulsion over another state without having recourse to actual war.

War is the status of armed conflict between two or more states. However improper a means of settling international disputes it may be from the standpoint of morality and justice, it is recognized by international law as a legal means of coercing an alleged offender. In the course of centuries certain rules have developed defining the rights of the belligerent parties and the limits within which armed forces may be employed, as well as the relations between belligerent powers and third parties not involved in the war.

At the First Hague Conference a Convention concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land was adopted in which definite rules are laid down concerning the qualifications of belligerents, prisoners of war, the sick and wounded, the means of injuring the enemy, sieges and bombardments, spies, flags of truce, capitulations, armistices, military authority over the territory of the hostile state, and the internment of belligerents and the care of the wounded in neutral countries. A convention was also adopted providing for the adaptation of the principles of the Geneva Convention to maritime war. At the Second Hague Peace Conference, held in 1907, other conventions were adopted dealing with the commencement of hostilities, the status of enemy merchant-ships at the outbreak of hostilities, the conversion of merchant-ships into war-ships, the laying of automatic submarine contact mines, bombardment by naval forces in time of war, restrictions on the exercise of the right of capture in maritime war, and the establishment of an International Prize Court. Besides these conventions certain declarations were adopted prohibiting the discharge of projectiles, etc., from balloons, the use of asphyxiating gases, and the use of bullets with a hard envelope. See WAR.

In recognizing that the state of war confers certain rights and imposes certain restrictions upon the belligerent parties, international law at the same time recognizes the existence of new rules governing the relations between the belligerents and other states not parties to the conflict. The principle upon which these rules are based is that the successful prosecution of war makes it necessary for the belligerents to impose certain restrictions, such as the establishment of blockades (q. v.) and the prohibition of traffic in contraband (q. v.), upon the intercourse between neutral states and the enemy. These restrictions are imposed in virtue of the rights of belligerents as against neutrals. On the other hand, if third parties wish to remain neutral in a contest between two or more states, it is incumbent upon them to abstain absolutely from all participation in the conflict. This abstention imposes both active and passive duties. The passive duties are fulfilled if the nation refrains, in its corporate capacity, from giving either direct or indirect assistance to either belligerent. The active duties require the neutral state to prevent any use of its territory for the purposes of either belligerent, whether such use be made by the belligerents themselves or by citizens of the neutral state in the interest of the belligerents.

But there are limits to the extent to which belligerents may interfere with the intercourse of neutral states with the enemy. These limits mark what may be called the rights of neutrals. For a detailed statement of the rights and duties of belligerents and neutrals, see NEUTRALITY.

It has been suggested within recent years that certain rules of international law need to be modified when applied to the states of the American Continent. These modified rules may be said to constitute American International Law. On January 4, 1909, the First Pan American Scientific Congress held "that on this Continent there are problems sui generis or of a distinctly American character and that the states of this hemisphere, by means of agreements more or less general, have regulated matters which are of sole concern to them, or which, if of universal interest, have not yet been susceptible of universal agreement—thus incorporating in international law principles of American origin."

The codification of international law has been much discussed within recent years. The idea was first suggested by Bentham, whose fondness for ideal codes, not based upon the facts of international and national life, is well known. In 1863, at the request of President Lincoln, a code of the laws of war was drawn up by Francis Lieber for the use of the Federal armies, a large portion of which is embodied in the Convention concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land, adopted by the Second Hague Conference. More elaborate and comprehensive codes are those of Bluntschli, published in 1868, of David Dudley Field, published in 1872, and of Pasquale Fiore, published in 1890. The conventions of the two Hague Conferences, together with the Declaration of London (q. v.), represent an attempt to codify international law upon certain specific heads. How far codification can be successfully carried has been much discussed. Certain parts of international law are still in an undeveloped state, and it might perhaps be unwise to define rules which may soon be outgrown. Besides, it is clear, from the obstinate position taken by the powers at the Hague Conferences, that they are not yet ready for an agreement which will be in conflict with principles which they have long considered essential to their welfare and prosperity. While it is generally recognized by nations that the principles of international law should, in point of justice and morality, come up to the standard of the municipal law of individual states, at the same time the conflicting commercial interests of the Great Powers, and the increasingly intense national spirit manifested by them, make it difficult for them to reach an agreement upon any subject in which national interests are intimately involved. For a critical bibliography of the principal writers on international law, see 1 Opp. 83–103; also Hershey, Essentials of Int. Pub. Law 86–91.

International law is said by Sir F. Pollock to be a true branch of law notwithstanding all that may be said about its want of sovereign power and a tribunal. Its doctrines are founded on legal, not simply on ethical, ideas. They are not merely prevalent opinions as to what is really right and proper, but something as closely analogous to civil laws as the nature of the case will admit. They have been discussed by the methods appropriate to jurisprudence and not by those of moral philosophy. They appeal not to the general feelings of moral rightness, but to precedents, to treaties and to the opinion of specialists. They assume the existence among statesmen and publicists of a sense of legal as distinguished from moral obligation in the affairs of nations. Oxford Lectures 18. See also Westlake, Intern. Law.

INTERNMENT. Used of foreign troops of a belligerent coming into neutral territory. Hague Treaty, 1907. See TROOPS, FOREIGN.

INTERNUNCIO. A Papal minister of the second order, accredited to minor states where there is no nuncio (q. v.).

INTERPELLATE. To address with a question, especially when formal and public; originally used with respect to proceedings in the French legislature; used in reference to questions by the court to counsel during an argument.

INTERPLEADER. A proceeding in the action of detinue, by which the defendant states the fact that the thing sued for is in his hands, and that it is claimed by a third person, and that whether such person or the plaintiff is entitled to it is unknown to the defendant, and thereupon the defendant prays that a process of garnishment may be issued to compel such third person so claiming to become defendant in his stead. 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law, c. 23; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 141; Story, Eq. Jur. § 800. Interpleader is allowed to avoid inconvenience; for two parties claiming adversely to each other cannot be entitled to the same thing; Brooke, Abr. Interpleader 4; hence the rule which requires the defendant to allege that different parties demand the same thing.

If two persons sue the same person in detinue for the thing, and both actions are depending in the same court at the same time, the defendant may plead that fact, produce the thing (e. g. a deed or charter) in court, and aver his readiness to deliver it to either as the court shall adjudge, and thereupon pray that they may interplead. In such a case it has been settled that the plaintiff whose writ bears the earliest teste has the right to begin the interpleading, and the other will be compelled to answer; Brooke, Abr. Interpleader, 2.

Under the Pennsylvania practice, when goods levied upon by the sheriff are claimed by a third party, the sheriff takes a rule of interpleader on the parties, upon which, when made absolute, a feigned issue is framed, and the title to the goods is tested. The goods, pending the proceedings, remain in the custody of the defendant upon the execution of a forthcoming bond.

See 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 748, note; BILL OF INTERPLEADER.

INTERPOLATION. In Civil Law. The act by which, in consequence of an agreement, the party bound declares that he will not be bound beyond a certain time. Wolff, Inst. Nat. § 752.

In the case of a lease from year to year, or to continue as long as both parties please, a notice given by one of them to the other of a determination to put an end to the contract would bear the name of interpolation.

INTERPRETATION. The discovery and representation of the true meaning of any signs used to convey ideas. Lieber, Leg. and Pol. Hermeneutics.

The "true meaning" of any signs is that meaning which those who used them were desirous of expressing. A person adopting or sanctioning them "uses" them as well as their immediate author. Both parties to an agreement equally make use of the signs declaratory of that agreement, though one only is the originator, and the other may be entirely passive. The most common signs used to convey ideas are words. When there is a contradiction in signs intended to agree, resort must be had to construction,—that is, the drawing of conclusions from the given signs, respecting ideas which they do not express. Interpretation is the art of finding out what the author intended to convey; construction is resorted to in comparing two different writings or statutes. Construction is usually confounded with interpretation; but in common use, is generally employed in a sense that is properly covered by both when each is used in a sense strictly and technically correct; Cooley, Const. Lim. 70. Quoting this passage, it is said in U. S. v. Keitel, 211 U. S. 370, 29 Sup. Ct. 123, 53 L. Ed. 230, that while, abstractly, there may be a difference between the two words, yet in "common usage" they have "the same significance." A distinction between the two, first made in the Legal and Political Hermeneutics, has been adopted by Greenleaf and other American and European jurists. Hermeneutics includes both.

Close interpretation (interpretatio restricta) is adopted if just reasons, connected with the formation and character of the text, induce us to take the words in their narrowest meaning. This species of interpretation has generally been called literal, but the term is inadmissible. Lieber, Herm. 66.

Extensive interpretation (interpretatio extensiva, called, also, liberal interpretation) adopts a more comprehensive signification of the word.

Extravagant interpretation (interpretatio excedens) is that which substitutes a meaning evidently beyond the true one: it is, therefore, not genuine interpretation.

Free or unrestricted interpretation (interpretatio soluta) proceeds simply on the general principles of interpretation in good faith, not bound by any specific or superior principle.

Limited or restricted interpretation (interpretatio limitata) is when we are influenced by other principles than the strictly hermeneutic ones. Ernesti, Institutio Interpretis.

Predestined interpretation (interpretatio predestinata) takes place if the interpreter, laboring under a strong bias of mind, makes the text subservient to his preconceived views or desires. This includes artful interpretation (interpretatio vafer), by which the interpreter seeks to give a meaning to the text other than the one he knows to have been intended.

The civilians divide interpretation into:—

Authentic (interpretatio authentica), which proceeds from the author himself; i. e. of a law, by the legislature.

Usual (interpretatio usualis), when the interpretation is on the ground of usage.

Doctrinal (interpretatio doctrinalis), when made agreeably to rules of science. Doctrinal interpretation is subdivided into extensive, restrictive, and declaratory: extensive, whenever the reason of a proposition has a broader sense than its terms, and it is consequently applied to a case which had not been explained; restrictive, when the expressions have a greater latitude than the reasons; and declaratory, when the reasons and terms agree, but it is necessary to settle the meaning of some term or terms to make the sense complete. See Holland, Jurispr. 344.

There can be no sound interpretation without good faith and common sense. The object of all interpretation and construction is to ascertain the intention of the authors, even so far as to control the literal signification of the words; for verba ita sunt intelligenda ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Words are, therefore, to be taken as those who used them intended, which must be presumed to be in their popular and ordinary signification; unless there is some good reason for supposing otherwise, as where technical terms are used; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 188, 6 L. Ed. 23; Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 678; Settle v. Van Evrea, 49 N. Y. 281; Weill v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111; quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas, ibi nulla expositio contra verba fienda est. When words have two senses, of which one only is agreeable to the law, that one must prevail; Cowp. 714; Washington & I. R. Co. v. Nav. Co., 160 U. S. 77, 16 Sup. Ct. 231, 40 L. Ed. 346; when they are inconsistent with the evident intention, they will be rejected; 2 Atk. 32; when words are inadvertently omitted, and the meaning is obvious, they will be supplied by inference from the context, see Gran v. Spangenberg, 53 Minn. 42, 54 N. W. 933; a superfluous negative may be omitted when the meaning is apparent; Waters Pierce Oil Co. v. Deselms, 212 U. S. 159, 29 Sup. Ct. 270, 53 L. Ed. 453. When language is susceptible of two meanings, one of which would work a forfeiture, while the other would not, the latter must prevail; Jacobs v. Spalding, 71 Wis. 177, 36 N. W. 608.

In Constitutions. The object of construction is to give effect to the intent of the people in adopting it; this intent is to be found in the instrument itself; Miller, Const. U. S. 100; People v. Purdy, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 35. The whole is to be examined with a view to arriving at the true intention of each part; it is not to be supposed that any words have been employed without occasion, or without intent that they should have effect as part of the law; if different portions should seem to conflict, the courts should harmonize them, if practicable, and should lean in favor of a construction which will render every word operative, rather than one which may make some idle and nugatory; Wheeling Gas Co. v. City of Wheeling, 8 W. Va. 320; Ogden v. Strong, 2 Paine 584, Fed. Cas. No. 10,460. It must be presumed that words have been employed in their natural and ordinary meaning; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 1, 188, 6 L. Ed. 23; as understood when the instrument was framed; Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. (U. S.) 393, 15 L. Ed. 691; technical words are presumed to have been employed in their technical sense. Where two provisions of a constitution are irreconcilably repugnant, that which is last in order of time and local position will prevail; Quick v. Whitewater Township, 7 Ind. 570.

It is to be borne in mind that in the construction of the federal and state constitutions a different and indeed an opposite rule is applied. The former, being the framework of a government of delegated powers, is subject to the general rule that a power to be lawfully exercised under an act of congress must be either expressly conferred or necessarily implied from some power granted. On the other hand, the state constitutions are not grants of power, but limitations on the residuum of absolute sovereign power which remains after subtracting that portion of it surrendered to the federal government. Accordingly, in construing a state constitution to ascertain whether a legislative act is valid, the only questions are whether that which it directs or authorizes is forbidden or whether it is included in the powers vested in the federal government.

The first resort is to the natural signification of the words in their order and grammatical arrangement; if they embody a definite meaning which involves no absurdity and no contradiction between different parts of the same instrument, there is no room for construction. This rule is said to apply to contracts, statutes and constitutions; Newell v. People, 7 N. Y. 9; Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 662, 9 Sup. Ct. 651, 32 L. Ed. 1060. See Manthey v. Vincent, 145 Mich. 327, 108 N. W. 667. If there is an ambiguity, the whole instrument is to be examined in order to determine the meaning of any part; State v. Hostetter, 137 Mo. 636, 39 S. W. 270, 38 L. R. A. 208, 59 Am. St. Rep. 515; People v. Metz, 193 N. Y. 148, 85 N. E. 1070, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 201.

When a constitution gives a general power or enjoins a duty, it also gives by implication every particular power necessary for the exercise of the one by the performance of the other; Field v. People, 2 Scam. (3 Ill.) 79, 83; Parks v. West, 102 Tex. 11, 111 S. W. 726.

The object for which a constitutional grant of power was given will have great influence in the construction; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 1, 6 L. Ed. 23.

The safest rule is to look to the nature and objects of the particular powers, duties and rights, with all the lights and aids of contemporaneous history; and to give to each word just such force, consistent with its legitimate meaning, as will fairly secure and attain the ends proposed; Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 539, 10 L. Ed. 1060; the subject or context and the intention of the framers in inserting a word in the federal constitution are all to be considered; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 316, 4 L. Ed. 579; the mischief to be prevented, as disclosed in the history of the country, will be considered; Craig v. Missouri, 4 Pet. (U. S.) 410, 7 L. Ed. 903. Every word must have due force and appropriate meaning; Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet. (U. S.) 540, 614, 10 L. Ed. 579; but the same words have not necessarily the same meaning when found in different parts of the same instrument; their meaning is controlled by the context; Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 1, 8 L. Ed. 25.

As aids to construction, the courts may refer to historical circumstances attending the framing and adoption of the constitution and the consequences attendant upon one construction or the other; Pollock v. Trust Co. (income tax cases) 157 U. S. 429, 15 Sup. Ct. 673, 39 L. Ed. 759; they may look to the history of the times; id. Interpretation must be in the light of the common law; U. S. v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S. 649, 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 42 L. Ed. 890; a clause stricken from the draft may be referred to as an aid in the construction of the remaining clauses; Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cra. (U. S.) 87, 3 L. Ed. 162.

Provisions of the constitution of the United States are not mathematical formulas having their essence in their form, but are organic living institutions transplanted from English soil. Their significance is not to be gathered simply from the words and a dictionary, but by considering their origin and the line of their growth; Gompers v. U. S., 233 U. S. 604, 34 Sup. Ct. 693, 58 L. Ed. ——.

An act passed just after a constitution is adopted is a contemporary interpretation of the latter, entitled to much weight; Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 727, 5 Sup. Ct. 739, 28 L. Ed. 1137.

See CONSTITUTIONALITY.

In Statutes. Where a law is expressed in plain and unambiguous terms, whether those terms are general or limited, the legislature should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and consequently no room is left for construction; Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 671, 9 Sup. Ct. 651, 32 L. Ed. 1060. Statutes should receive a sensible construction, such as will effectuate the legislative intention, and, if possible, so as to avoid an unjust or absurd conclusion; Lau Ow Bew v. U. S., 144 U. S. 47, 12 Sup. Ct. 517, 36 L. Ed. 340. They should be so construed, if practicable, that one section will not destroy another, but explain and support it; Bernier v. Bernier, 147 U. S. 242, 13 Sup. Ct. 244, 37 L. Ed. 152.

"Such a construction ought to be put upon a statute as will best answer the intention which the makers had in view, for qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice. In Bacon's Abridgement, Statutes 1, 5; Puffendorf, Book 5, chapter 12; Rutherford, 422, 527; and in Smith's Commentaries, 814, many cases were mentioned where it was held that matters embraced in the general words of the statutes, nevertheless were not within the statutes, because it could not have been the intention of the lawmakers that they should be included. They were taken out of the statutes by an equitable construction. . . . . In some cases the letter of a legislative act is restrained by an equitable construction; in others it is enlarged; in others the construction is contrary to the letter. The equitable construction which restrains the letter of a statute is defined by Aristotle, as frequently quoted in this manner: 'Æquitas est correctio legis generaliter latæ qua parti deficit.'" Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 510, 22 N. E. 188, 5 L. R. A. 340, 12 Am. St. Rep. 819, opinion by Earl, J.

"All laws should receive a sensible construction. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice, oppression or an absurd consequence. It will always, therefore, be presumed that the legislature intended exceptions to its language, which would avoid results of this character. The reason of the law in such cases should prevail over its letter. The common sense of man approves the judgment mentioned by Puffendorf, that the Bolognian law which enacted 'that whoever drew blood in the streets should be punished with the utmost severity,' did not extend to the surgeon who opened the vein of a person that fell down in the street in a fit. The same common sense accepts the ruling, cited by Plowden, that the statute of 1 Edward II, which enacts that a prisoner who breaks prison shall be guilty of felony, does not extend to a prisoner who breaks out when the prison is on fire—'for he is not to be hanged because he would not stay to be burnt.'" U. S. v. Kirby, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 482, 19 L. Ed. 278, quoted in Church of Holy Trinity v. U. S., 143 U. S. 461, 12 Sup. Ct. 511, 36 L. Ed. 226.

The objects and purposes of a statute and the conditions of the enactment must be borne in mind so as to effectuate, rather than to destroy, the spirit of the intent. The purpose of the copyright statute is not so much to protect the thing as to protect the right of reproduction, and the statute should be construed in the character of the property to be protected; American Tobacco Co. v. Werckmeister, 207 U. S. 284, 28 Sup. Ct. 72, 52 L. Ed. 208, 12 Ann. Cas. 595.

"All laws should receive a sensible construction. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice, oppression or absurd consequence. It will always, therefore, be presumed that the legislature intended exceptions to its language which would avoid results of that character. The reason of the law in such cases should prevail over its letter;" Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 39, 25 Sup. Ct. 358, 49 L. Ed. 643, 3 Ann. Cas. 765, citing U. S. v. Kirby, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 482, 19 L. Ed. 278; Lau Ow Bew v. U. S., 144 U. S. 47, 12 Sup. Ct. 517, 36 L. Ed. 340.

"It is a dangerous assumption to suppose that the legislature foresees every possible result that may ensue from the unguarded use of a single word, or that the language used in statutes is so precisely accurate that you can pick out from various acts this and that expression and, skilfully piecing them together, lay a safe foundation for some remote inference. Your Lordships are aware that from early times courts of law have been continuously obliged, in endeavoring to carry out loyally the intentions of parliament, to observe a series of familiar precautions for interpreting statutes, so imperfect and obscure as they often are. Learned volumes have been written on this single subject." Lord Loreburn, L. C., in Nairn v. University of St. Andrews [1909] L. R. 147, A. C.

"No statute is completely intelligible as an isolated enactment. Every statute is a chapter, or a fragment of a chapter, of a body of law;" Ilbert, Legisl. Meth. & Forms 254.

Reference may be had to the title of an act; Church of Holy Trinity v. U. S., 143 U. S. 457, 12 Sup. Ct. 511, 36 L. Ed. 226.

In construing a tariff act, when it is claimed that the commercial use of a word differs from its ordinary significance, in order that the former may prevail over the latter it must appear that the commercial designation is the result of established usage which was definite, uniform, and general at the time of the passage of the act; Sonn v. Magone, 159 U. S. 418, 16 Sup. Ct. 67, 40 L. Ed. 203.

Statutes, if penal, are to be strictly, and if remedial, liberally construed; Bish. Writ. L. 193; Dwarris, Stat. 246; that penal statutes should be strictly construed, see U. S. v. R. Co., 222 U. S. 8, 32 Sup. Ct. 6, 56 L. Ed. 68; but the rule that penal statutes are to be strictly construed is not violated by allowing their words to have full meaning, or even the more extended of two meanings, where such construction best harmonizes with the context, and most fully promotes the policy and objects of the legislature; U. S. v. Hartwell, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 386, 18 L. Ed. 830. The apparent object of the legislature is to be sought for as disclosed by the act itself, the preamble in some cases, similar statutes relating to the same subject, the consideration of the mischiefs of the old law, and perhaps some other circumstances; Wilberforce, Stat. Law 99; and the court must be controlled by the power manifested by the act and not by the motive which initiated it; Berryman v. Board of Trustees, 222 U. S. 334, 32 Sup. Ct. 147, 56 L. Ed. 225; but the known policy of congress in regard to the subject will be considered; Richardson v. Harmon, 222 U. S. 96, 32 Sup. Ct. 27, 56 L. Ed. 110. Such statutes are to be reasonably construed with a view to effecting their purpose; U. S. v. R. Co., 212 U. S. 509, 29 Sup. Ct. 313, 53 L. Ed. 629.

All statutes are to be construed with reference to the provisions of the common law, and provisions in derogation of the common law are held strictly; Durham v. State, 117 Ind. 477, 19 N. E. 327; Brown v. Fifield, 4 Mich. 322; Powell v. Sims, 5 W. Va. 1, 13 Am. Rep. 629. But statutes in derogation of the common law are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of congress; Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., 196 U. S. 1, 25 Sup. Ct. 158, 49 L. Ed. 363. Statutes extending the jurisdiction of the court of claims will be strictly construed; Blackfeather v. U. S., 190 U. S. 368, 23 Sup. Ct. 772, 47 L. Ed. 1099.

Acts of incorporation and those granting franchises and special benefits to corporations are to be construed strictly; nothing passes by implication; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. (U. S.) 544, 9 L. Ed. 773; Bank of Pennsylvania v. Com., 19 Pa. 144; so of a municipal grant to an electric railway; Cleveland Electric Ry. Co. v. Ry. Co., 204 U. S. 116, 27 Sup. Ct. 202, 51 L. Ed. 399.

A provision of a statute copied from that of another state is construed upon the interpretation placed upon the statute by such other state; Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Cheatwood's Adm'x, 103 Va. 356, 49 S. E. 489; James v. Appel, 192 U. S. 129, 24 Sup. Ct. 222, 48 L. Ed. 377; Mann v. Carter, 74 N. H. 345, 68 Atl. 130, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 150; but this does not necessarily include subsequent variations of construction by such courts; Cathcart v. Robinson, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 280, 8 L. Ed. 120; when lower federal courts and the highest court of a foreign country construe like acts, the failure of congress to remedy that part of the act may be regarded as an acquiescence by congress in such judicial construction; White-Smith Music Pub. Co. v. Apollo Co., 209 U. S. 1, 28 Sup. Ct. 319, 52 L. Ed. 655, 14 Ann. Cas. 628.

An amended act is to be construed as if it had read from the beginning as it does with the amendment added to it; Black, Interpr. 357. The old act, so far as re-enacted, stands from its original date and the new stands from the date of the amendment. All of the old which is omitted in the new is repealed; id. 358.

A re-enacted statute receives the same interpretation as the former act; Copper Queen Consol. Min. Co. v. Board of Equalization, 206 U. S. 474, 27 Sup. Ct. 695, 51 L. Ed. 1143. When congress in enacting revised statutes adopts language that has been construed by the courts, they adopt that construction; Sessions v. Romadka, 145 U. S. 29, 12 Sup. Ct. 799, 36 L. Ed. 609.

When two sections of the revised statutes taken together are not free from ambiguity and cannot be harmoniously applied, recourse must be had to legislation prior to the revised statutes from which those sections were drawn; Merchants' Nat. Bank of Baltimore v. U. S., 214 U. S. 33, 29 Sup. Ct. 593, 53 L. Ed. 899. In a general code a later section does not nullify an earlier one; Iglehart v. Iglehart, 204 U. S. 478, 27 Sup. Ct. 329, 51 L. Ed. 575; in the case of a codifying statute, the first step should be to interpret the language; and appeal to earlier decisions can only be made upon some special ground; [1891] L. R. 145, A. C. In the U. S. Revised Statutes, the change of arrangement from earlier statutes will not be regarded as changing their scope and purpose, unless an intent to change the prior law is clearly expressed; Anderson v. S. S. Co., 225 U. S. 187, 32 Sup. Ct. 626, 56 L. Ed. 1047.

Language in a statute which has a well known meaning, sanctioned by decisions, is presumed to be used in that sense; Kepner v. U. S., 195 U. S. 100, 124, 24 Sup. Ct. 797, 49 L. Ed. 114, 1 Ann. Cas. 655. The presence of a provision in one part of a statute and its absence in another is an argument against reading it as implied where omitted; U. S. v. R. Co., 220 U. S. 37, 31 Sup. Ct. 362, 55 L. Ed. 361.

To change the phraseology creates a presumption of a change in intent; Crawford v. Burke, 195 U. S. 176, 25 Sup. Ct. 9, 49 L. Ed. 147; words defined in a prior statute will be understood in the same sense in substitute statutes unless the contrary appears; Purtell v. Coal & Iron Co., 256 Ill. 110, 99 N. E. 899, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 193.

When several acts relate to the same subject matter, a subsequent act may be considered upon the interpretation of prior legislation; Tiger v. Inv. Co., 221 U. S. 286, 31 Sup. Ct. 578, 55 L. Ed. 738; Swigart v. Baker, 229 U. S. 187, 33 Sup. Ct. 645, 57 L. Ed. 1143.

Where one statute relates to a subject generally and another deals with it more specifically, if they cannot be harmonized, the specific statute should control; Stadler v. Helena, 46 Mont. 128, 127 Pac. 454; Gardner v. School Dist., 34 Okl. 716, 126 Pac. 1018; usually a general intent in an act controls a particular intent. Where there is an earlier special and a later general statute (which is broad enough to include the former), the general will not be taken to repeal the special, unless the repeal is express or there is a manifest inconsistency; Rodgers v. U. S., 185 U. S. 83, 22 Sup. Ct. 582, 46 L. Ed. 816. But there will be a repeal where a later statute is a complete revision of the subject to which a former statute applied; U. S. v. Ranlett, 172 U. S. 133, 19 Sup. Ct. 114, 43 L. Ed. 393.

The rule known as the ejusdem generis rule (see that title) does not overrule all other rules. When the particular words exhaust the genus, general words must refer to words outside of those particularized; U. S. v. Mescall, 215 U. S. 26, 30 Sup. Ct. 19, 54 L. Ed. 77, following National Bank of Commerce v. Ripley, 161 Mo. 126, 61 S. W. 587; Gillock v. People, 171 Ill. 307, 49 N. E. 712; Winters v. Duluth, 82 Minn. 127, 84 N. W. 788.

Contemporaneous construction by a department of government is a rule of interpretation, but not an absolute one; it does not preclude inquiry as to its original correctness; Houghton v. Payne, 194 U. S. 88, 24 Sup. Ct. 596, 48 L. Ed. 888; so of a tariff act; Komada & Co. v. U. S., 215 U. S. 392, 30 Sup. Ct. 136, 54 L. Ed. 249; courts will be guided by the construction adopted by officers appointed to enforce an act; Deming v. McClaughry, 113 Fed. 640, 51 C. C. A. 349; in case of doubt, the interpretation of the proper department has great weight; Allemania Fire Ins. Co. of Pittsburg v. Ins. Co., 209 U. S. 327, 28 Sup. Ct. 544, 52 L. Ed. 815, 14 Ann. Cas. 948; any continued executive construction will be adopted; Solomon v. Commissioners of Cartersville, 41 Ga. 157; Wright v. Forrestal, 65 Wis. 341, 27 N. W. 52; but it must be long continued; Mackall v. Casilear, 137 U. S. 562, 11 Sup. Ct. 178, 34 L. Ed. 776.

Debates in congress are not appropriate sources of information as to the meaning of a statute, but reports of legislative committees may be referred to in order to throw light on its intent; Binns v. U. S., 194 U. S. 486, 24 Sup. Ct. 816, 48 L. Ed. 1087, approving Briggs v. U. S., 143 U. S. 357, 12 Sup. Ct. 391, 36 L. Ed. 180; recourse cannot be had to discussions in Parliament which precede the passing of an act; [1906] 2 K. B. 716. Such resort was had in Edger v. Board of Com'rs, 70 Ind. 331; and in Blake v. Bank, 23 Wall. (U. S.) 307, 23 L. Ed. 119, a badly expressed and apparently contradictory revenue act was interpreted by reference to the journals of congress, where it appeared that the peculiar phraseology was the result of an amendment made without due reference to the language in the original bill. The statements of individual members cannot be referred to; 3 Q. B. D. 707; Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 387; County of Cumberland v. Boyd, 113 Pa. 52, 4 Atl. 346.

Such debates may show the conditions existing at the time the legislation was enacted; Standard Oil Co. v. U. S., 221 U. S. 1, 31 Sup. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 734. In case of ambiguity, resort may be had to the report of the senate committee where the provision originated, which can be a guide to a true interpretation; Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U. S. 320, 333, 29 Sup. Ct. 671, 53 L. Ed. 1013, following Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 24 Sup. Ct. 349, 48 L. Ed. 525. Resort may be had to the history of the times when the act was passed, but cannot be had to the speeches of members when it was adopted; U. S. v. Freight Ass'n, 166 U. S. 290, 17 Sup. Ct. 540, 41 L. Ed. 1007. But it was held by Lord Bramwell, 8 App. Cas. 501, that the courts cannot look at the history of an act, but only at its language. It was, however, said by Halsbury, L. C., that "it is quite legitimate to refer to the history" of a period "to understand what was the subject matter with which the legislature was then dealing"; [1896] A. C. 504. A court may place itself in the position of the authors of the words to be interpreted at the time they were written; [1906] 2 K. B. 716.

The duty of the court in construing a statute which is reasonably susceptible of two constructions to adopt that which saves its constitutionality, includes the duty of avoiding a construction which raises grave and doubtful constitutional questions, if it can be avoided; U. S. v. Delaware & Hudson Co., 213 U. S. 366, 29 Sup. Ct. 527, 53 L. Ed. 836.

Prof. Roscoe Pound (1912 Tenn. Bar Ass'n) quotes Prof. John C. Gray as "putting the matter very well thus: 'A fundamental misconception prevails and pervades all the books as to the dealing of the courts with statutes. Interpretation is generally spoken of as if its chief function was to discover what the meaning of the legislature really was. But when the legislature has had a real intention, one way or another on a point, it is not once in a hundred times that any doubt arises as to what its intention was. If that were all that the judge had to do with the statute, interpretation of the statutes, instead of being one of the most difficult of a judge's duties would be extremely easy. The fact is that the difficulties of so-called interpretation arise when the legislature has had no meaning at all; when the question which is raised on the statute never occurred to it; when what the judges have to do is, not to determine what the legislature did mean on a point which was present to its mind, but to guess what it would have intended on a point not present to its mind had the point been present.'"

The change of conditions as well as of the meaning of words in their ordinary use frequently creates difficulties in the application of statutes which in England led to the passage in 1889 of the General Interpretation Act, intended to cover the whole subject of statutory interpretation. A synopsis of its provisions, together with an instructive collation of words having a marked difference in their ordinary and judicial meaning, will be found in Ordronaux, Const. Leg. c. xi. In this country the subject has not been so comprehensively treated, but there will usually be found in the general statutes of each state a chapter defining the meaning of certain words as used in the statutes.

As to acts declaring the meaning of a prior act, see STATUTE.

In Contracts. There must always be reference to the surrounding circumstances and the object the parties intended to accomplish; New York, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. R. Co., 116 Ind. 60, 18 N. E. 182; Illges v. Dexter, 77 Ga. 36; Words may be understood in a technical or peculiar sense when such meaning has been stamped upon them by the usage of the trade or place in which the contract occurs. When words are manifestly inconsistent with the declared purpose and object of the contract, they may be rejected; 2 Atk. 32. When words are omitted so as to defeat the effect of the contract, they will be supplied by the obvious sense and inference from the context. When words admit of two senses, that which gives effect to the design of the parties is preferred to that which destroys it; Add. Contr. 45; Cowp. 714.

Impossible things cannot be required. The subject-matter and nature of the context, or its objects, causes, effects, consequences, or precedents, or the situation of the parties, must often be consulted in order to arrive at their intention, as when words have, when literally construed, either no meaning at all or a very absurd one. The whole of an instrument must be viewed together and not each part taken separately; and effect must be given to every part, if possible; Lindley v. Groff, 37 Minn. 338, 34 N. W. 26. Assistance must be sought from the more near before proceeding to the remote. When one part is totally repugnant to the rest, it will be stricken out; but if it is only explanatory, it will operate as a limitation. As to the interpretation of a deed where the granting and habendum clauses are repugnant, see 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) note, 956. Reference to the lex loci or the usage of a particular place or trade is frequently necessary in order to explain the meaning; 2 B. & P. 164; 3 Stark. Ev. 1036; Gracy v. Bailee, 16 S. & R. (Pa.) 126. A court should read a written contract according to the obvious intention of the parties, in spite of clerical errors or omissions which can be corrected by perusing the whole instrument; Monmouth Park Ass'n v. Wallis Iron Works, 55 N. J. L. 132, 26 Atl. 140, 19 L. R. A. 456, 39 Am. St. Rep. 626; Chrisman v. Ins. Co., 16 Or. 283, 18 Pac. 466.

Words, however general, may be limited to the subject-matter in connection with which they are used; general words may be restricted to the same general genus as the words which preceded them; and where for many years words have received a judicial construction, it is reasonable to suppose that the parties so used them, and the courts would resort to such sense in reaching the meaning of the parties; 12 App. Cas. 484.

The enumeration of certain powers in respect to particular subjects in a written instrument is a negation of all other analogous powers with respect to the same subject-matter; Tucker v. Alexandroff, 183 U. S. 437, 22 Sup. Ct. 195, 46 L. Ed. 264.

When the language of the contract is ambiguous, the interpretation of it by the parties is entitled to great, if not controlling, influence; Topliff v. Topliff, 122 U. S. 121, 7 Sup. Ct. 1057, 30 L. Ed. 1110; Old Colony Trust Co. v. Omaha, 230 U. S. 100, 33 Sup. Ct. 967, 57 L. Ed. 1410 (a municipality); as shown by subsequent acts; New York v. Board of Tax Com'rs, 199 U. S. 1, 25 Sup. Ct. 705, 50 L. Ed. 65, 4 Ann. Cas. 381; before any controversy has arisen; Fitzgerald v. Bank, 114 Fed. 474, 52 C. C. A. 276; even if at variance with the literal meaning of the contract; District of Columbia v. Gallaher, 124 U. S. 505, 8 Sup. Ct. 585, 31 L. Ed. 526. Such construction is of more importance than the absolute meaning of the phraseology; Smith v. Crane, 169 Mo. App. 695, 154 S. W. 857; and will be accepted as the proper one; McMillin v. Titus, 222 Pa. 500, 72 Atl. 240; but it is said that this rule does not apply if the contract is free from ambiguity; Sternbergh v. Brock, 225 Pa. 279, 74 Atl. 166, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1078, 133 Am. St. Rep. 877; In re Myers' Estate, 238 Pa. 195, 86 Atl. 89; Russell v. Young, 94 Fed. 45, 36 C. C. A. 71; in such case it cannot be affected by voluntary payments by one party to the other, through mistake, clearly not required by its terms and not demanded by the other party; Sharp v. Behr, 117 Fed. 864.

In Central R. R. Co. v. Jersey City, 209 U. S. 480, 28 Sup. Ct. 592, 52 L. Ed. 896, the interpretation placed by the court upon even a compact between two states, was said to have "the very powerful sanction of the conduct of the parties and of the existing condition of things."

Where a seller agreed to deliver a large quantity of cement "in car load lots f. o. b.," and it had uniformly provided the cars, it was held that this was a practical construction of the contract imposing that duty on the seller; Davis v. Cement Co., 134 Fed. 274 affirmed 142 Fed. 74, 73 C. C. A. 388.

In case of doubt, a party will be held to that meaning which he knew the other party believed the words to bear, if this can be done without making a new contract; Brent v. Chas. H. Lilly Co., 174 Fed. 877.

Words spoken cannot vary the terms of a written agreement; they may overthrow it. Words spoken at the time of the making of a written agreement are merged in the writing; 5 Co. 26; 2 B. & C. 634; parties cannot testify as to their intention or the meaning of a written contract; Gardt v. Brown, 113 Ill. 475, 55 Am. Rep. 434.

No representation, promise or agreement made, or opinion expressed in previous parol negotiations as to the terms or legal effect of the resulting written agreement can be permitted to prevail over the just interpretation of the contract, in the absence of some artifice which concealed its terms and prevented the complainant from reading it; New York Life Ins. Co. v. McMaster, 87 Fed. 63, 30 C. C. A. 532, per Sanborn, C. J. But where a writing is ambiguous or there are repugnant clauses, it is proper to consider all the negotiations leading to the contract, the subject-matter, the purpose to be effected, the consideration passing between the parties and all the surrounding circumstances when the contract was made; McMillin v. Titus, 222 Pa. 500, 72 Atl. 240; and prior negotiations, though merged in the contract, may be resorted to to determine whether the parties intended stipulations for delay as a penalty or liquidated damages; U. S. v. Bethlehem Steel Co., 205 U. S. 105, 27 Sup. Ct. 450, 51 L. Ed. 731.

Where there is a latent ambiguity which arises only in the application and does not appear upon the face of the instrument, it may be supplied by other proof; ambiguitas verborum latens verificatione suppletur; McDermott v. Ins. Co., 3 S. & R. (Pa.) 609.

Usages of the trade or place of making the contract are presumed to be incorporated, unless a contrary stipulation occurs. See LEX LOCI.

The rule that an agreement is to be construed most strongly against the party benefited can only be applied in doubtful cases; Hannibal & St. Joseph R. Co. v. Packet Co., 125 U. S. 260, 8 Sup. Ct. 874, 31 L. Ed. 731; and when other rules of interpretation fail; Patterson v. Gage, 11 Colo. 50, 16 Pac. 560. The more the text partakes of a solemn compact, the stricter should be its construction.

Jessel, M. R., in 6 Ch. D. 270, said: "The meaning of a contract must be ascertained according to the ordinary and proper rules of construction. If we can thus find out its meaning we do not want the maxim [that construction is more strongly against the one who used the words]. If we cannot find out its meaning, then the instrument is void and in that case it may be said to be construed in favor of the grantor, for the grant is annulled." If the intent of a contract cannot be ascertained, it will be held void for uncertainty; Gould v. Gunn (Ia.) 140 N. W. 380.

General expressions used in a contract are controlled by the special provisions therein. When there are two repugnant clauses in a deed, which cannot stand together, the first prevails. With a will the reverse is the case. In all instruments the written part controls the printed, if the two are inconsistent; Hutt v. Zimmer, 78 Hun 23, 28 N. Y. Supp. 1014; Schenck v. Saunders, 13 Gray (Mass.) 37; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Graddy, 25 Neb. 849, 41 N. W. 809; Mansfield Machine Works v. Common Council of Lowell, 62 Mich. 546, 29 N. W. 105; Thornton v. R. Co., 84 Ala. 109, 4 South. 197, 5 Am. St. Rep. 337; Thomas v. Taggart, 209 U. S. 385, 28 Sup. Ct. 519, 52 L. Ed. 845; Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Jacobs, 56 Tex. 366; a special manuscript addition to a general printed form must govern if there is a repugnancy between them; Moore v. Lichtenberger, 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 268; when a contract is embodied in several instruments, its true meaning is to be ascertained from a consideration of all the instruments and their effect upon each other; Howard v. R. Co., 24 Fla. 560, 5 South. 356; Smith v. Theobald, 86 Ky. 141, 5 S. W. 394; Phelps & Bigelow Windmill Co. v. Piercy, 41 Kan. 763, 21 Pac. 793.

If part of a contract is good, and part, being in restraint of trade, is bad, the former may stand; U. S. Consol. Seeded Raisin Co. v. Griffin & Skelley Co., 126 Fed. 364, 61 C. C. A. 334. Different contracts made between the same parties on the same date as to the same matter were construed together in Stadler v. Power Co., 139 Fed. 305, 71 C. C. A. 435.

Dictionaries are not to be taken as authoritative exponents of the meaning of words in an act, but words should be taken in their ordinary sense, and we are therefore sent for instruction to these books (Johnson and Webster); 16 Q. B. D. 641.

A sealed contract to pay a debt whenever, in the debtor's opinion, his circumstances would enable him to do so, is not enforceable; Nelson v. Von Bonnhorst, 29 Pa. 352; but a contract to pay when able is generally held to impose an obligation; Denney v. Wheelwright, 60 Miss. 733; some cases consider it a contract to pay within a reasonable time; Nunez v. Dautel, 19 Wall. (U. S.) 562, 22 L. Ed. 161; Noland v. Bull, 24 Or. 479, 33 Pac. 983; De Wolfe v. French, 51 Me. 420; or to pay at once; Kincaid v. Higgins, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 396. When the debtor has once become able to pay, the right of action vests, though later he becomes unable to pay; Denney v. Wheelwright, 60 Miss. 733.

Where no period is fixed, either party may ordinarily withdraw on reasonable notice; Kenderdine Hydro Carbon Fuel Co. v. Plumb, 182 Pa. 463, 38 Atl. 480; so in contracts of hiring or partnership; L. R. 7 H. L. 550. But a contract between a telegraph company and a railroad company for a railroad telegraph line and service along its right of way was held perpetual in its obligation; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 129 Fed. 849, 64 C. C. A. 285, 68 L. R. A. 968, following L. R. 7 H. L. 550; Franklin Telegraph Co. v. Harrison, 145 U. S. 459, 12 Sup. Ct. 900, 36 L. Ed. 776, which was a contract between a manufacturing company and a telegraph company for a private wire to New York. These cases went upon the ground that the inherent nature of the contract showed that it must have continuing effect, unless, by its terms one or either party could terminate it.

In addition to the above rules, there are many presumptions of law relating to agreements, such as, that the parties to a simple contract intend to bind their personal representatives; that where several parties contract without words of severalty, they are presumed to bind themselves jointly; that every grant carries with it whatever is necessary to its enjoyment; when no time is mentioned, a reasonable time is meant; and other presumptions arising out of the nature of the case.

It is the duty of the court to interpret all written instruments; see Middlesex Turnpike Corporation v. Swan, 10 Mass. 384, 6 Am. Dec. 139; Levy v. Gadsky, 3 Cra. (U. S.) 180, 2 L. Ed. 404; Hassett v. McArdle, 7 Misc. 710, 28 N. Y. Supp. 48; Fidelity Title & Trust Co. v. Gas Co., 150 Pa. 8, 24 Atl. 339; written evidence; McCoy v. Lightner, 2 Watts (Pa.) 347; and foreign laws; Duffie v. Black, 1 Pa. 388; and where the terms of a parol agreement are shown without any conflict of evidence; Brannock v. Elmore, 114 Mo. 55, 21 S. W. 451; Elliott v. Wanamaker, 155 Pa. 67, 25 Atl. 826; or where a contract is contained in letters, no matter how voluminous they may be; Cincinnati Punch & Shear Co. v. Thompson, 80 Kan. 467, 102 Pac. 848.

Whether a written contract, to be performed in case a consolidation was effected between two corporations, is limited to one resulting from then pending negotiations, or whether it referred to a consolidation under a renewal of negotiations a year later, extrinsic evidence of the circumstances and the acts and declarations of the parties is admissible, and where that is conflicting, the construction of the contract is for the jury; Donner v. Alford, 136 Fed. 750, 69 C. C. A. 402.

Contracts are to be construed liberally in favor of the public, when the subject-matter concerns the interests of the public; Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 11 Sup. Ct. 243, 34 L. Ed. 843.

INTERPRETATION CLAUSE. A clause frequently inserted in Acts of Parliament, declaring the sense in which certain words used therein are to be understood.

INTERPRETER. One employed to make a translation.

An interpreter should be sworn before he translates the testimony of a witness; In re Norberg, 4 Mass. 81.

A person employed between an attorney and a client to act as interpreter is considered merely as the organ between them, and is not bound to testify as to what he has acquired in those confidential communications; Andrews v. Solomon, Pet. C. C. 356, Fed. Cas. No. 378; Jackson v. French, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 337, 20 Am. Dec. 699.

Communications made to an interpreter are not hearsay when he translates and communicates what has been said to him, and the party to whom it is made may testify to it; Miller v. Lathrop, 50 Minn. 91, 52 N. W. 274. Conversations carried on through an interpreter may be shown by either party thereto or a third person who hears it, its weight only and not its competency being affected thereby; Com. v. Vose, 157 Mass. 393, 32 N. E. 355, 17 L. R. A. 813.

INTERREGNUM (Lat.). The period, in case of an established government, which elapses between the death of a sovereign and the accession of another. The vacancy which occurs when there is no government. See CORONATION.

INTERROGATOIRE. In French Law. An act, or instrument, which contains the interrogatories made by the judge to the person accused, on the facts which are the object of the accusation, and the answers of the accused. Pothier, Proc. Crim. s. 4, art. 2, § 1.

INTERROGATORIES. Material and pertinent questions in writing, to necessary points, exhibited for the examination of witnesses or persons who are to give testimony in the cause.

They are either original and direct on the part of him who produces the witnesses, or cross and counter, on behalf of the adverse party, to examine witnesses produced on the other side. Either party, plaintiff or defendant, may exhibit original or cross interrogatories.

The form which interrogatories assume is as various as the minds of the persons who propound them. They should be as distinct as possible, and capable of a definite answer; and they should leave no loop-holes for evasion to an unwilling witness. Care must be observed to put no leading questions in original interrogatories, for these always lead to inconvenience; and for scandal or impertinence interrogatories will, under certain circumstances, be suppressed. See Willis, Int. passim; Gresl. Eq. Ev. pt. 1, c. 3, s. 1; Viner, Abr.; Daniell, Ch. Pr.

INTERRUPTION. The effect of some act or circumstance which stops the course of a prescription or act of limitations. 3 Bligh, N. S. 444; 4 M. & W. 497.

Civil interruption is that which takes place by some judicial act.

Natural interruption is an interruption in fact. Tyler v. Wilkinson, 4 Mas. 404, Fed. Cas. No. 14,312; 2 Y. & J. 285. See EASEMENTS; LIMITATIONS; PRESCRIPTION.

INTERSECTION. The point of intersection of two roads is the point where their middle lines intersect. Pittsburg v. Cluley, 74 Pa. 259.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE. See COMMERCE.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION. A commission of five persons appointed by the president under the act of February 4, 1887, to carry out the purposof the act. It sits usually in Washington, but can hold sittings at such other places as it may choose. By act of June 29, 1906, it was increased to seven members with terms of seven years. "It is not a court; it is a special tribunal continually engaged in an administrative and semi-judicial capacity in investigating railroad rates and practices"; Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. v. S. P. Co., 6 I. C. C. Rep. 508. Except the rulings of the Supreme Court and the directions of the district court in the particular case, it does not feel itself bound to follow all the decisions of the federal courts; 1 Drinker, Interst. Com. Act, § 262.

The functions of the Commission are to hear complaints as to violations of the Interstate Commerce Act and also to investigate of its own motion any violations which may come to its notice. It may not of itself institute criminal proceedings, but may and frequently does recommend such to the attorney general's department.

Since 1906, it has power not merely to find that a violation of the act has been caused, and to award damages to the injured party, but to prescribe a reasonable rate or regulation for that found to be improper. It may also prescribe joint through routes between connecting carriers, with through rates applicable thereto.

In actions before the Commission to recover damages for violations of the act, the statute of limitations is two years from the accrual of the cause of action. This period begins to run when the freight was payable and not when it was actually paid; Arkansas Fertilizer Co. v. U. S., 193 Fed. 667.

A letter to the Commission, setting out the facts and praying relief, is, however, sufficient to toll the running of the statute; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Dickerson, 191 Fed. 705, 112 C. C. A. 295.

The Commission has exclusive jurisdiction to question the reasonableness or legality of a tariff rate or regulation, filed in the manner prescribed by section 6 of the act. Until the Commission has declared such a rate illegal, no court, state or federal, has power to dispute its validity. Nor can the parties themselves contract for a different rate.

Practice before the Commission is informal compared with that in the courts. The Commission has no power to enforce its own orders, but the provision in the act by which the disobedience of a lawful order of the Commission subjects the offender to a fine of $5,000 for each day's continuance, makes such orders effective. This provision does not apply to orders for the payment of damages, as to which, under its constitutional right, the carrier may insist on a jury trial in the district court.

The usual method of contesting the validity of its orders is by application for an injunction to the proper district court, with appeal to the Supreme Court in the manner provided by the act.

The Constitution of the United States, Art. I, Sec. 8, gives to Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes." The Interstate Commerce Act was passed on February 4, and took effect on April 5, 1887. It was amended March 2, 1889, February 10, 1891, and February 8, 1895; supplementary acts were passed February 11, 1893, March 2, 1893, Feb. 19, 1903, June 29, 1906, April 13, 1908, June 18, 1910, and October 22, 1913.

It applies to all carriers engaged in the transportation of oil or other commodity, except water and natural or artificial gas, by means of pipe lines, or partly by pipe lines and partly by railroad, or partly by pipe lines and partly by water, and to telegraph, telephone and cable companies (whether wire or wireless) engaged in sending messages from one state, territory, or district of the United States to any other state, territory, or district, or to any foreign country, and to any carrier engaged in the transportation of passengers and property wholly by railroad (or partly by railroad and partly by water when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment), from one state or territory or the District of Columbia, or from one place in a territory to another place in the same territory, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States, and also to the transportation in like manner of property shipped from any place in the United States to a foreign country and carried from such place to a port of transhipment, or shipped from a foreign country to any place in the United States and carried to such place from a port of entry either in the United States or an adjacent foreign country.

It does not apply to the transportation of persons or property, etc., wholly within a state and not to or from a foreign country. It also extends to bridges and ferries used in connection with any railroad and to express and sleeping car companies. It declares that all charges for services rendered in connection therewith shall be reasonable and just and prohibits all unjust and unreasonable charges.

The charging of any greater or less compensation for any service rendered any shipper or person than is charged or collected from another for a like and contemporaneous service, etc., is declared to be unlawful.

The act provides that if any carrier shall fail to install and operate switch connections, and furnish cars to the best of its ability, without discrimination, the Commission may, on complaint filed, make an order directing the carrier to comply with the act.

Free passes and transportation prohibited except in certain specified cases.

It forbids the giving any undue or unreasonable preference to one person, etc., or locality over another person or place, or to one description of traffic over another, and prohibits the carrier from subjecting any shipper, locality, or traffic to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage. It imposes a duty to afford reasonable, proper, and equal facilities to connecting carriers, for the interchange of business, without discrimination.

It prohibits charging any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of persons or of like kind of property for a shorter than is charged for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, except by authority of the Commission.

It prohibits railroad companies transporting any article or commodity other than timber, which it may own, in whole or in part, or in which it has any interest, except such commodities as may be necessary and intended for its own use in its business as a common carrier.

It prohibits any agreement between carriers for the pooling of freights of competing railroads or for dividing their joint earnings.

It provides that the carriers shall print schedules of their rates, duly classified, and file copies with the Commission and post copies in all their stations and offices for public inspection. These must specify terminal charges and any rules affecting the rates. These rates can only be advanced thirty days after public notice and an amendment of the schedules accordingly; nor can they be reduced except after three days' similar notice and the like amendment. Copies of all agreements between two or more carriers for making a line of through transportation are also required to be filed with the Commission. If joint tariffs of rates are provided for, copies of these tariffs must be filed with the Commission. Such publicity is to be given to these joint tariffs as the Commission may direct. This section contains the same requirement as to thirty days' notice of any advance and three days' notice of any reduction in the joint rates, as is prescribed respecting the rates of the individual carrier.

It is the duty of carrier to furnish written statement of rate on request and to keep posted name of agent to whom application for rate may be made.

It prohibits any scheme between carriers to prevent the continuous transportation of property without change of cars. No breaking of bulk, etc., unless necessary, shall be considered as breaking the continuous passage.

It provides that any carrier committing a breach of this act shall be liable in damages to the person injured, including a counsel fee to be taxed as costs.

Any person aggrieved may complain before the Commission or bring suit in a federal court having jurisdiction, for damages. In the latter cases the court may compel all officers, etc., to appear and testify and to produce the books of the company; but no evidence which they may give shall be used against them in any criminal proceeding.

Any carrier, or, if a corporation, any officer, etc., thereof, guilty of an infraction of the act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine of not to exceed $5,000, or if the offence is an unlawful discrimination in rates, to imprisonment for not to exceed two years, or both in the discretion of the court. False billing, classification etc., of goods is made a misdemeanor, whether by the carrier or its officer, or by the shipper, and so is the act of inducing a common carrier to discriminate unjustly.

It creates the Commission, who have authority, by sec. 12 to inquire into the management of the business of common carriers and to enforce the act; they may institute proceedings for that purpose and for the punishment of violations of the act; they may require the production of all necessary books, contracts, etc.

The Commission has power to establish through routes and joint rates, shipper to have right to designate route; it is unlawful for carriers to disclose information as to shipments. The Commission is empowered to determine maximum allowances to shippers for transportation services and to determine if any party is entitled to an award of damages.

Any person, corporation, association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any body politic or municipal organization or State Railroad Commission may complain before the Commission of any infraction of the act, and the Commission itself may institute any inquiry on its own motion.

If the Commission find that the act has been contravened, it shall notify the carrier thereof.

If any carrier refuses to obey an order of the Commission, the latter or any party interested may apply to the federal court where such carrier has its principal office. Such court shall hear the case speedily, without formal pleadings; the findings of fact of the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the matter therein stated. If it appear that any lawful order of the Commission has been disobeyed, the court shall enjoin further disobedience thereof. If the matter in dispute is $2,000 or more, either party may appeal to the Supreme Court.

Common carriers are required to make annual reports to the Commission, and the latter may prescribe a uniform system of keeping accounts.

The act expressly excepts the carriage of property free, or at reduced rates, for the United States, state, or municipal governments, or for charitable purposes, or to and from expositions, etc., or the free carriage of destitute persons transported by charitable societies; or the issuance of mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets; or giving reduced rates to ministers of religion; or to certain indigent persons; or the exchange of passes between the officers of railroad companies for their officers and employés.

The initial carrier is liable for damage to the holder of a bill of lading in spite of a contract to the contrary, but the initial carrier has recourse to the carrier responsible.

The provisions of the act are declared to be in addition to all remedies by common law or by statute.

By the act of March 2, 1889, the United States courts are given jurisdiction to issue writs of peremptory mandamus commanding the movement of interstate traffic or the furnishing of cars and other transportation facilities.

Under the Hepburn Act (1906) the Commission may require the carrier to furnish cars and shipping facilities; it may determine, on hearing, what are reasonable rates and enforce them (but not order an increase); it may fix through routes and rates and compel connecting lines to enter into through traffic agreements; but only where the public interest appears to require it.

The primary purpose of the act is to regulate the interstate business of carriers, and the secondary purpose (for which the Commission was established) was to enforce the regulations of the act. This power is not extended by any amendatory acts to mere investigations in regard to annual reports of carriers or of the Commission, or for the purpose of recommending legislation. Quære, whether Congress has power to compel testimony in regard to subjects which do not concern direct breaches of law, and whether it can delegate such power; Harriman v. Commission, 211 U. S. 407, 29 Sup. Ct. 115, 53 L. Ed. 253.

The Commission has no powers except those conferred by Congress; it cannot allow special privileges or relieve hardships, nor prevent anticipated violations of the act, except as therein provided. It will not assume an advisory jurisdiction. It cannot compel a carrier to stop reckless expenditure, nor award damages for defective service, nor require a carrier to adopt a particular form of ticket or bill of lading; 1 Drinker, Interst. Com. Act.

The Act of 1910 created the Commerce Court with jurisdiction to enjoin, set aside or suspend in whole or in part any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The proceedings of this court may be reviewed by the Supreme Court.

By Act of Oct. 22, 1913, the commerce court was abolished (from and after Dec. 31, 1913) and its jurisdiction was transferred to the district court. Cases must be heard by three judges (one at least to be a circuit judge) and at least two judges must concur. An appeal lies direct to the Supreme Court from any order granting or denying an interlocutory injunction. Such appeal must be taken in thirty days. An appeal from a final order must be taken in sixty days.

The Elkins Act of Feb. 19, 1903, provides that a carrier corporation is liable to conviction as well as its officers, agents, etc., for willful failure to file and observe tariffs. Discriminations and concessions from tariff charges are forbidden. Rates filed, published or participated in are conclusively deemed the legal rates, as against the carrier. For the acceptance of a rebate the person or firm so accepting shall, in addition to any penalty, forfeit to the United States, three times the amount of money so received and three times the value of any other consideration accepted. The Interstate Commerce Commission will enjoin discrimination and departure from tariff rates through a federal court sitting in equity having jurisdiction and the district attorney must prosecute such proceedings.

The Expedition Act of Feb. 11, 1903, provides for the expediting of causes arising under the Commerce Act, when the cause is of general public importance, by giving it precedence over others.

The Commission is made a body corporate, with legal capacity to be a party plaintiff or defendant in the federal courts, by reason of the provision in the act that it "shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed," and that making it lawful for it to apply by petition for the enforcement of its orders; Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S. 197, 16 Sup. Ct. 666, 40 L. Ed. 940.

The Commission has exclusive original jurisdiction to determine whether a regulation or a practice affecting rates or matters sought to be regulated by the act is unjust or unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, preferential or prejudicial, and this although the regulation or practice complained of has ceased; Mitchell C. & C. Co. v. R. Co., 230 U. S. 247, 33 Sup. Ct. 916, 57 L. Ed. 1472.

The object of the Commerce Act is to compel the establishment of reasonable rates and their universal application. A guarantee to a shipper of a particular train is a discrimination, if not open to all; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Kirby, 225 U. S. 155, 32 Sup. Ct. 648, 56 L. Ed. 1033, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 501.

The orders of the Commission are final unless (1) beyond the power which it could constitutionally exercise; or (2) beyond its statutory power; or (3) based upon a mistake of law. But questions of fact may be involved in the determination of questions of law, so that an order regular on its face may be set aside if it appears that (4) the rate is so low as to be confiscatory and in violation of the constitutional prohibition against the taking property without due process of law; or (5) if the Commission acted so arbitrarily and unjustly as to fix rates contrary to evidence or without evidence to support it; or (6) if the authority therein involved has been exercised in such an unreasonable manner as to cause it to be within the elementary rule that the substance and not the shadow determines the validity of the exercise of the power; Int. Com. Com. v. R. Co., 222 U. S. 541, 32 Sup. Ct. 108, 56 L. Ed. 308, citing Int. Com. Com. v. R. Co., 215 U. S. 452, 30 Sup. Ct. 155, 54 L. Ed. 280; Southern Pac. Co. v. Commission, 219 U. S. 433, 31 Sup. Ct. 288, 55 L. Ed. 283; Int. Com. Com. v. R. Co., 216 U. S. 538, 30 Sup. Ct. 417, 54 L. Ed. 608.

Subject to the two leading prohibitions that their charges shall not be unreasonable or unjust, and that they shall not unjustly discriminate, so as to give undue preference to persons or traffic similarly circumstanced, the act leaves common carriers as they were at common law, free to make special contracts, to classify their traffic, to adjust and apportion their rates, and generally, to manage their important interests upon the same principles which are regarded as sound in other pursuits; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 162 U. S. 184, 16 Sup. Ct. 700, 40 L. Ed. 935; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Grain Co., 222 U. S. 215, 32 Sup. Ct. 39, 56 L. Ed. 171. The act was not designed to prevent competition between different roads, or to interfere with the customary arrangements made by railway companies for reduced fares in consideration of increased mileage, where such reduction does not operate as an unjust discrimination. It is not all discriminations that are prohibited, but only those that are unjust and unreasonable; Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 145 U. S. 263, 12 Sup. Ct. 844, 36 L. Ed. 699, affirming 43 Fed. 37. The act is not to be construed so as to abridge or take away the common-law right of the carrier to make contracts and adopt proper business methods, further than its terms and recognized purposes require; a railroad company may lawfully charge low rates on coal in the summer months, if its rates are equal to all persons; Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 5 I. C. Rep. 656 (C. C., M. D. of Tenn.).

Interpretation. The act was intended to be an effective means for redressing wrongs resulting from unjust discrimination and undue preference, and this must be so whether persons or places suffer; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Ry. Co., 218 U. S. 88, 30 Sup. Ct. 651, 54 L. Ed. 959. The words "railway" and "railroad" are completely synonymous; West End Improvement Club v. Ry. & Bridge Co., 17 I. C. C. 239, 244. Section 15 is the dominating and controlling expression of the real object and meaning of the act. It makes of the Commission a special expert body to deal with rates, and not to supplant the courts; Joynes v. R. Co., 17 I. C. C. 361, 369. Carriers are left free to initiate their own rates, rules and regulations; Traer v. R. Co., 14 I. C. C. 165, 169.

The provisions of the Hepburn Act, as amended by the Carmack Amendment, and the Elkins Act forbidding carriers to evade the collection or payment of fixed tariff rates are not intended to extend the jurisdiction in matters outside of its province as a common carrier, nor are they intended to limit and prescribe the use which shall be made of the rates which the carrier puts into effect; California Commercial Ass'n v. Wells-Fargo & Co., 14 I. C. C. 422, 428.

The law stands for what it means from the date when it takes effect and not from the date when it is construed by the Commission. Ordinarily the date of the announcement by the Commission of its interpretation of a particular provision is therefore of little real importance; Liberty Mills v. R. Co., 23 I. C. C. 182, 185.

The act does not apply to the carriage of property by rail or otherwise wholly within a state; Ex parte Koehler, 30 Fed. 867; when the carrier issues no bills of lading to points beyond its line, receives no freight on through bills of lading, and has no arrangement with other roads for a conventional division of charges or a common management; Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 77 Fed. 942; but if a railroad company, whose line is entirely within one state, issues through bills of lading to points in other states, it is within the act; In re Annapolis, W. & B. R. Co., 1 I. C. Rep. 315. Receivers of railroad companies are common carriers and subject to the act; Independent Refiners' Ass'n of Titusville, Pa., v. R. Co., 6 I. C. Rep. 379. The appointment of a receiver of a part of an interstate road lying within a state does not interfere with interstate commerce; McKinney v. Gas Co., 206 Fed. 772. A carrier subject to the act cannot, by leasing its road, free itself from liability for practices illegal under the act, nor after the termination of the lease escape liability for damages for injuries sustained during the lease; Independent Refiners' Ass'n of Titusville, Pa., v. R. Co., 6 I. C. Rep. 378.

The act does not come within the constitutional prohibition as to impairing the obligation of contracts, although its effect may be to prevent the literal enforcement of pre-existing contracts; Kentucky & I. Bridge Co. v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 102; id., 2 I. C. C. R. 162; 45 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. (Mont.) 234.

The mere circumstance that there is in a given case a preference does not, of itself, show that such preference is unreasonable; Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 5 I. C. Rep. 685 (C. C. of A.); id., 74 Fed. 715, 21 C. C. A. 51.

One of the most satisfactory tests of the reasonableness of the rates of one carrier is a comparison with the rates of other carriers operating in the same territory under the same general conditions; Chamber of Commerce of City of Milwaukee v. R. Co., 15 I. C. C. 460, 466. The rates in different directions on the same line between the same points need not be identical; Wilburine Oil Works v. R. Co., 18 I. C. C. 548. Each case must be decided upon its own merits, and in arriving at a conclusion in respect to the rates here involved, the decisions in another case against carriers operating in a different territory under essentially dissimilar circumstances and conditions affords no proper criterion therefor; Chicago Lumber & Coal Co. v. R. Co., 16 I. C. C. 323, 328.

Evidence that the rates on a certain commodity are higher in certain cases than certain other rates, and that they produce a large revenue to the carrier, does not make a prima facie case that they are unreasonable. The reasonableness must be determined by an examination of the whole subject; Howell v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 162. The fact that a road earns little more than operating expenses is not to be overlooked in fixing rates, but it cannot be made to justify grossly excessive rates. Wherever there are more roads than the business, at fair rates, will remunerate, they must rely upon future earnings for the return on investments and profits; New Orleans Cotton Exchange v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 289.

The relative fairness of a rate is not determined alone by its being low. Low rates to one place may not be just if still lower rates are given to another place; In re Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 137. The legitimate interests of carrying companies, as well as of traders and shippers, should be considered in determining the lawfulness of rates under the act. Ocean competition may constitute a dissimilar condition, and conditions which exist beyond the seaboard of the United States can be legitimately regarded for the purpose of justifying a difference in rates charged by railroads between import and domestic traffic; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 5 I. C. Rep. 405; id., 162 U. S. 197, 16 Sup. Ct. 666, 40 L. Ed. 940; City of Spokane v. R. Co., 15 I. C. C. 376.

Trade centres are not, as a matter of right, entitled to have more favorable rates than the smaller towns for which they form distributive centres; and carriers may give the smaller places rates as favorable as the larger ones; when the rates are impartial in themselves as between large and small towns, the fact that one large centre may have an advantage over another in the business of the small places does not make out a case of undue preference. Impartial rates are not rendered illegal by their effect upon the business of localities; Martin v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 32; that rates should be fixed in inverse proportion to the natural advantages of competing towns with the view of equalizing "commercial conditions" is at variance with justice; Eau Claire Board of Trade v. R. Co., 4 I. C. Rep. 65; Freight Bureau of Cincinnati v. R. Co., 7 id. 180. A through rate does not unjustly discriminate against an intermediate point because less proportionally than the rate from such point to the common destination; Milwaukee Chamber of Commerce v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 393.

A railroad company is under special obligation to give reasonable rates for its local business. It may accept business from other carriers on through rates which, when divided between them, will give to any one of them for its division less than its own local rates; Lippman & Co. v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 414.

Through transportation over connecting lines is favored by the act, and the rate is correctly adjusted upon the distance through, and not upon the shorter distances over, the several lines; Coxe Brothers & Co. v. R. Co., 3 I. C. Rep. 460. While the question of distance is important in establishing rates, it is not an absolute and unconditional right from which a departure may not be justified by other considerations. The public benefits, the greater volume of business warranting lower rates to all, and the force of competition may furnish reasons that outweigh a claim of right founded merely on geographical considerations; Imperial Coal Co. v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 436. See McMorran v. R. Co., id. 604.

When rates are on their face disproportionate or relatively unequal, the burden is on the carrier to justify them; McMorran v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 604. At any hearing involving a rate increased after Jan. 1, 1910, or sought to be increased after this act, the burden of proving that the increase is just and reasonable is on the carrier.

In determining rates on a short local line, where the cost of service is great, owing to steep grades, sparse population, and light traffic, such circumstances should have much controlling weight. This rule was applied where a road existing under such conditions was charged with unjust rates in transporting oil, as compared with the cost of piping it to the same point; Rice, Robinson & Witherop v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 298.

Ordinarily there is no better measure of railroad service in carrying goods than distance, though it is not always controlling. And where the rates for carrying freight from a certain territory over one road are considerably greater than the rates charged by another road from neighboring territory to the same place, the higher rates will be held excessive; James & Abbott v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 609. Greater compensation in the aggregate for the shorter, than for the longer, haul over a direct line is unlawful; Cordele Machine Shop v. R. Co., 6 I. C. Rep. 361.

Mileage, while a circumstance to be considered with the conditions in fixing rates, is by no means controlling or the most important; Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 5 I. C. Rep. 656 (C. C., M. D. of Tenn.).

A through rate is not necessarily reasonable because it does not exceed the aggregate of two reasonable local rates; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 186 U. S. 257, 22 Sup. Ct. 900, 46 L. Ed. 1151.

There may be cases in which a carrier legitimately engaged in serving some territory is compelled by some new and aggressive competition to reduce normal and reasonable rates, to retain business on its line, and where corresponding reductions at points not affected, or less affected, by such competition, might be unreasonable. But when a carrier voluntarily enters a field of competition where, by reason of a disadvantageous route, or the rigor of the competitive conditions, remunerative rates cannot be charged, and its service to a portion of its patrons is unprofitable, it accepts the legal obligation that its service shall be impartial to all who sustain similar relations to the traffic, and for whom the service itself is not substantially dissimilar; Manufacturers & Jobbers' Union of Mankato v. R. Co., 3 I. C. Rep. 115. Where there has been a consolidation of competing lines that have formerly served the same territory in competitive traffic to the same market, the consolidated lines cannot deprive the public of fair competition, nor give oppressive discrimination with a view to its own interest; Rice, Robinson & Witherop v. R. Co., 3 I. C. Rep. 162.

In fixing reasonable rates on such articles as food products, the operating expenses, bonded debt, fixed charges, dividends on the stock and other necessary expenses are all to be considered, but the claim that any particular rate is to be measured by these as a fixed standard, below which the rate cannot lawfully be reduced, is subject to some qualifications, one of which is that these obligations must be actual and in good faith; Kentucky & I. Bridge Co. v. R. Co., 37 Fed. 567, 2 L. R. A. 289; nor, on the other hand, can these rates be so limited that the shipper may, in all cases, realize actual cost of production; In re Alleged Excessive Freight Rates & Charges on Food Products, 3 I. C. Rep. 93; id., 4 I. C. C. R. 48; in the carriage of great staples which supply an enormous business, and which in market value and actual cost of transportation are among the cheapest articles of commerce, rates yielding only moderate profit to the carrier are both necessary and justifiable; id.

The fact that one company controls parallel lines affords no warrant for giving superior advantages to the patrons of one line and denying similar advantages to those of the other line; Boards of Trade Union v. R. Co., 1 I. C. Rep. 608.

A carrier cannot give a railroad company a lower rate on the same commodity than it gives to others; Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 225 U. S. 326, 32 Sup. Ct. 742, 56 L. Ed. 1107, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 504.

Ordinarily no adequate reason exists for a difference in rates for a solid carload of one kind of freight from one consignor and a like carload from the same point to the same destination consisting of freight from more than one consignor to one consignee, etc., and such difference is not justified by the difference in the cost of handling; Thurber v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 742.

The carrier cannot look beyond the transportation to the ownership of the shipment as the basis for determining the applicability of its rates, and the rules of the official classifications, providing that carriers should collect a greater compensation for carload shipments when made by forwarding agents of different shippers, were unjustly discriminatory and unreasonable; Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 220 U. S. 235, 31 Sup. Ct. 392, 55 L. Ed. 448.

The expense of carrying fruit, etc., from Jersey City, the railroad terminal, to New York, may be added to the rate charged to the latter place; Truck Farmers' Ass'n v. R. Co., 6 I. C. Rep. 295. As to the effect of free cartage at terminals, see Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 167 U. S. 633, 17 Sup. Ct. 986, 42 L. Ed. 306.

Party-rate tickets are not commutation tickets, and when party rates are lower than the fare for single passengers they are illegal; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 729. A sale of mileage tickets to commercial travellers, and a refusal to sell to other passengers except at a higher rate, is unjust discrimination within the act; and the fact that the former release the carrier from liability, or that they may influence business in favor of the road, does not justify such discrimination; Larrison v. R. Co., 1 I. C. Rep. 369. The placing of passenger tickets in the hands of ticket brokers to be disposed of at reduced rates, under the pretence of paying a commission, is a violation of the act; In re Passenger Tariffs & Rate Wars, 2 I. C. Rep. 340. A passenger rate war in which rates are repeatedly reduced by carriers without filing tariffs or reducing intermediate rates, is unlawful; id.; granting free transportation to city officials is unjust discrimination within the act; Harvey v. R. Co., 3 I. C. Rep. 793.

Where the established rate for single passengers is three cents a mile, it is not unlawful to issue what are termed "party-rate tickets" for not less than ten persons, at two cents a mile, which is less than the established rate for single passengers, where such tickets are offered to the public generally; Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 145 U. S. 263, 12 Sup. Ct. 844, 36 L. Ed. 699. See In re Passenger Tariffs, 2 I. C. Rep. 445, where the Commission held that party rates and passenger carload rates lower than for single passengers are illegal.

The provision that nothing in the act shall apply "to the issuance of mileage passenger tickets" applies only to the issuing of such tickets; the terms upon which they are issued must be in accordance with the general provisions of the act; Larrison v. R. Co., 1 I. C. Rep. 369.

If a reduction in passenger rates be made between competing points, the rates must also be reduced between intermediate points; In re Passenger Tariffs & Rate Wars, 2 I. C. Rep. 340.

The possibility of competition arising at a particular point does not render freight rates to that point, though higher than those to a longer haul to a point where competition prevails, obnoxious to the act, against a greater charge for a shorter than for longer haul under substantially similar circumstances; Int. Com. Com. v. R. Co., 190 U. S. 273, 23 Sup. Ct. 687, 47 L. Ed. 1047.

Section 4, as amended June 18, 1910, makes it unlawful to charge any greater compensation for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, but in special instances on application to the Commission the same may be allowed.

The fact that a railroad company makes an unreasonably low rate does not authorize a rival, extending between the same points, to make greater charges for the shorter haul to intermediate points than it does to the terminal; In re Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 137.

Where a road makes the same charge to one point that it does to another which is only from a third to two-thirds of the same distance, the charge to the shorter point is presumptively illegal; In re Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 137. Actual water competition of controlling force relating to traffic important in amount, may justify a lower charge for a longer distance than for a shorter distance included therein; Lehmann, Higginson & Co. v. R. Co., 3 I. C. Rep. 80; but disturbance of rates, secret or open, will not; In re Alleged Violations of the Fourth Section, 7 I. C. Rep. 61; nor will competition between markets or between carriers subject to the act; Brewer & Hanleiter v. R. Co., 7 I. C. Rep. 224; nor possible water competition; San Bernardino Board of Trade v. R. Co., 3 I. C. Rep. 138. Water competition must be such that the freight would go to its destination by water, if the lower rate were not given; James & Mayer Buggy Co. v. R. Co., 3 I. C. Rep. 682; id., 4 I. C. C. R. 744.

When rail rates are advanced with the disappearance of water competition, no inference adverse to the railroad can be drawn, but when the old rates had been maintained for several years after such disappearance, there is a presumption, if the rates are raised, that the advance is made for other reasons; Int. Com. Com. v. R. Co., 227 U. S. 88, 33 Sup. Ct. 185, 57 L. Ed. 431.

On the ground that "through failure of crops" the people of long distance localities were without necessary food for themselves and animals, a temporary order was made in In re Application of Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co., 6 I. C. Rep. 293, authorizing a carrier to charge less for a longer distance than they were authorized to charge for a shorter distance. And the need of additional facilities for passengers travelling to Chicago during the World's Fair was considered a ground for the same relief; In re Petition of Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co., 6 I. C. Rep. 323.

Under section 4, as amended June 18, 1910, the Commission has power to make an order (such as the one there involved) permitting a lower rate for the longer haul, but only on terms stated in the order, establishing zones for the intermediate points and relative percentages upon which proportionate zones should be based; Intermountain Rate Cases, 234 U. S. 476, 34 Sup. Ct. 986, 58 L. Ed. ——.

An intermediate local rate should never exceed the through rate plus the local rate back to the intermediate place; Martin v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 1.

The classification of freight is expressly recognized by the act; Thurber v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 742. But in classifying freights the carrier must respect the interests of the shipper on the basis of relative equality and justice; Thurber v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 742. Common carriers should be held responsible for the correctness of the weight and classification of freight received. The publication of a commodity rate takes the commodity upon which such rate applies out of the classification, so that all shipments of that commodity moving from and to points between which such commodity rate is in effect must be charged for on the basis of the commodity rate and carload minimum. In allowing carload rates, the carrier may properly stipulate for a minimum carload, the more approved method being to charge a given rate per 100 pounds for any excess, rather than to allow the shipper to load as much as he chooses in the car at a stated rate per car; Leonard v. R. Co., 3 I. C. C. 241.

A carload rate and minimum weight specified in a lawful tariff hold out a definite offer to the shipping public to move merchandise on those terms and Commissioner Harlan stated, in Kaye & Carter Lumber Co. v. R. Co., 17 I. C. C. 209, 211, that there should be a rule in all tariffs to the effect that when a carrier, for its own convenience, supplies a larger car than the one ordered, it will do so on the basis of the published rate and minimum weight applicable to the length of car so ordered by the shipper, in all cases where the shipment actually moved could have been loaded into the car ordered. In one case, the Commission held that, even though the shipper had not ordered a car of a particular size, the carrier could collect freight only on the actual weight, the car furnished being larger than required for the shipment tendered; Peerless Agencies Co. v. R. Co., 17 I. C. C. 218.

Lower rates on carload lots than on less quantities are not unlawful; but if the difference be so wide as to destroy competition between large and small dealers, especially upon articles that are of general and necessary use, and that furnish a large volume of business, the act is violated; Thurber v. R. Co., 2 I. C. Rep. 742.

When an article moves in sufficient volume and the demands of commerce will be better served, it is reasonable to give a lower classification for carloads than that which applies to less than carload quantities, but the difference in such classification should not be so wide as to be destructive to competition between large and small dealers; Brownell v. R. Co., 4 I. C. Rep. 285.

It is the duty of a carrier to equip its road with suitable cars for its traffic and to furnish them alike to all who have occasion for their use; Rice, Robinson & Witherop v. R. Co., 3 I. C. Rep. 162. The public must be justly and equally served in furnishing cars; if in a time of special pressure, some one must wait, regular customers of the road are not entitled to preference; Riddle, Dean & Co. v. R. Co., 1 I. C. Rep. 787.

As a general rule, in the movement of passengers and freight, passengers get a preference, then live stock, perishable goods and common freight receive preference in the order named. This rule is of no avail in time of an emergency.

Railroad companies are not required to furnish competing connecting carriers with equal facilities, for the interchange of traffic, when this involves the use of its tracks by such carriers; it may permit such use by one carrier to the exclusion of others; Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. R. Co., 59 Fed. 400; nor is the clause violated by receiving and forwarding without prepayment of freight or car mileage, cars of other companies, containing goods coming from one locality and under like circumstances, refusing goods from a different locality; Oregon Short-Line & U. N. R. Co. v. R. Co., 61 Fed. 158, 9 C. C. A. 409.

A state constitution prohibiting discrimination in charges and facilities does not require a company to make provision for joint business with a new line crossing it, similar to those already made with a rival line at another near point; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. R. Co., 110 U. S. 667, 4 Sup. Ct. 185, 28 L. Ed. 291; but railroad companies may be required to furnish facilities, and prevented from abandoning, stations already established; State v. R. Co., 37 Conn. 153; New Haven & N. R. Co. v. Hamersley, 104 U. S. 1, 26 L. Ed. 629; R. R. Commissioners v. R. Co., 63 Me. 269, 18 Am. Rep. 208; Commonwealth

v. R. Co., 103 Mass. 254, 4 Am. Rep. 555; State v. R. Co., 19 Neb. 476, 27 N. W. 434.

The power of the Commission to regulate accessorial facilities is held to be confined to mere regulation, and cannot be used to invade rights of property by entering the domain of deprivation, construction, and reconstruction of properties to carry out the proposed regulations; Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 74 Fed. 803, 21 C. C. A. 103.

A carrier is not justified in refusing less desirable freights because more money can be made by using its cars in carrying another kind; Riddle, Dean & Co. v. R. Co., 1 I. C. Rep. 787.

In an action for unjust discrimination in freight charges, under sec. 2, it is sufficient to set out the rates charged plaintiff and another shipper, and the circumstances and conditions under which plaintiff's shipment was made, with an allegation that the smaller charges made the other shipper were for like services, under substantially the same circumstances and conditions, without setting out such circumstances and conditions; Kinnavey v. R. Ass'n, 81 Fed. 802.

It is the duty of a carrier of live stock to provide proper facilities for receiving and discharging live stock free from all charges except the regular transportation charges; and it cannot receive and discharge such live stock at a depot, access to which must be purchased; Keith v. R. Co., 1 I. C. Rep. 601.

Carriers may properly refuse refrigeration on less than carload shipments or may require twenty-four hours' advance notice by shippers of the need of refrigerator cars; they may also charge for refrigeration on cars iced by them and not loaded by the shipper; Asparagus Growers' Ass'n v. R. Co., 17 I. C. C. 423.

In enacting the Hepburn act, amending § 20 of the act to regulate commerce, Congress recognized the essential distinctions between property accounts and operating accounts, and between capital and earnings and while prior to that time the practice of different carriers varied, uniformity in regard to the keeping of accounts was essential in the future for proper supervision and regulation; Kansas City Ry. Co. v. U. S., 231 U. S. 423, 34 Sup. Ct. 125, 58 L. Ed. ——.

The Hepburn act, requiring pipe line companies to become common carriers and subject to the act is not unconstitutional; Pipe Line Cases, 234 U. S. 548, 34 Sup. Ct. 956, 58 L. Ed. ——.

The Act of 1887, and its amendment (Act of 1906), do not apply to street railway companies operating lines between cities in different states; Omaha & C. B. St. R. Co. v. Commission, 179 Fed. 243, affirmed Omaha & C. B. St. R. Co. v. Interst. Com. Com'n, 230 U. S. 324, 33 Sup. Ct. 890, 57 L. Ed. 1501, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 385.

Demurrage. A carrier has the right to establish and maintain demurrage regulations under which a reasonable charge will accrue for detention of cars beyond a reasonable period. One of the primary reasons for demurrage is to release equipment and again place it in the transportation service, and also to enable all of its patrons to use its tracks and terminals; Peale, Peacock & Kerr v. R. Co., 18 I. C. C. 25, 35.

Under the statute shippers are not to be put in a position of subserviency to common carriers, and are not required to ask for rates, but are entitled to equal and open rates at all times; In re Tariffs of the Transcontinental Lines, 2 I. C. Rep. 203; but a tariff of rates of which schedules have been filed by a carrier with the Commission and also with its freight agents is in force and operative although the copies thereof may not have been posted at the carrier's depot as required by the act; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Oil Mill, 204 U. S. 449, 27 Sup. Ct. 358, 51 L. Ed. 562.

Complaints, though brought by an individual, may challenge the entire schedule of rates to competing points; Daniels v. R. Co., 6 I. C. Rep. 458.

The Commission can rehear a particular case and amend its original order therein, although the federal court may have refused to enforce such original order; Page v. R. Co., 6 I. C. Rep. 548.

In proceedings before the Commission, all offending carriers need not be made parties defendant, but the case may proceed only against the carrier whose lines the complainant uses; Page v. R. Co., 6 I. C. Rep. 548.

The right asserted by a petitioner in the federal court under the act arises and is claimed under a law of the United States which relates to a subject over which congress has exclusive control; and this is sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction; Kentucky & I. Bridge Co. v. R. Co., 37 Fed. 567, 2 L. R. A. 289. A state court has no jurisdiction; Copp v. R. Co., 43 La. Ann. 511, 9 South. 441, 12 L. R. A. 725, 26 Am. St. Rep. 198.

It is not necessary that a person making a complaint before the Commission should have a pecuniary interest in the violation of the statute complained of; it is sufficient if a responsible party complains of a matter which amounts to a public grievance; Boston & A. R. R. Co. v. R. Co., 1 I. C. Rep. 571; Milk Producers' Protective Ass'n v. R. Co., 7 I. C. Rep. 92.

It is not proper for railroad companies to withhold the larger part of their evidence from the Commission, and first adduce it in the federal court in proceedings by the Commission to enforce its order; the purposes of the act call for a full inquiry by the Commission in the first instance; Cincinnati, New Orleans & T. P. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 5 I. C. Rep. 391; id., 162 U. S. 184, 16 Sup. Ct. 700, 40 L. Ed. 935. It is not necessary to file with a petition for the enforcement of an order of the Commission the transcript of the evidence taken before it, under the provision of the statute making the findings of the fact of the Commission prima facie evidence of the matter stated, but either party may use as evidence any competent testimony taken before the Commission; Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 5 I. C. Rep. 131; id., 64 Fed. 981. Where the Commission applies for an injunction to restrain a railroad company from disobeying an order of the Commission, a preliminary injunction will not be granted when the company's answer denies the facts upon which the order was based; Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 49 Fed. 177. A preliminary injunction will not be granted where the question involved is a new one; or where the injury to the defendant is likely to be greater than the benefit to the plaintiff; Shinkle, Wilson & Kreis Co. v. R. Co., 62 Fed. 690; id., 5 I. C. Rep. 287. An action against the carrier for a violation of the act in making unlawful discriminations may be maintained in the name of the United States by the district attorney; U. S. v. R. Co., 5 I. C. Rep. 106 (U. S. C. C., D. of Kans.).

Under the 5th amendment to the constitution of the United States, which declares that "no person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," a person under examination by a grand jury, in an investigation into certain alleged violations of the act and its amendments, is not obliged to answer questions where he states that his answers might tend to criminate him; although section 860 of the Revised Statutes provides that no evidence given by him shall in any manner be used against him in any court of the United States in any criminal proceedings. The object of this constitutional provision is to insure that a person shall not be compelled, when acting as a witness in any investigation, to give testimony which may tend to show that he himself has committed a crime; Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 Sup. Ct. 195, 35 L. Ed. 1110.

The provision in the act of February 11, 1893, "that no person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, etc., before the" Commission, on the ground that the testimony may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but that no such person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture on account of any matter concerning which he may testify or produce such evidence, affords absolute immunity against prosecution and deprives the witness of his constitutional right to refuse to answer; Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 16 Sup. Ct. 644, 40 L. Ed. 819; id., 5 I. C. Rep. 369. This act is said to have been passed in view of the decision in Counselman v. Hitchcock, supra; see Brown v. Walker, supra.

By the act of June 30, 1906, supra, immunity shall extend only to a natural person testifying or producing documentary evidence.

See INCRIMINATION; PRODUCTION OF BOOK; GRAND JURY.

The Commodities Clause. (1906.) This clause, as construed in U. S. v. Delaware & Hudson Co., 213 U. S. 366, 29 Sup. Ct. 527, 53 L. Ed. 836, prohibits an interstate carrier from transporting in such commerce articles or commodities under the following circumstances and conditions: 1. Where the commodity has been manufactured, mined or produced by a carrier under its authority, and, at the time of transportation, the carrier has not in good faith before the act of transportation dissociated itself from such article or commodity; 2. Where the carrier owns the article or commodity to be transported in whole or in part; 3. Where the carrier has, at the time of transportation, an interest, direct or indirect, in a legal or equitable sense, in the commodity, not including commodities manufactured, mined, produced or owned, etc., by a bona fide corporation in which the railroad company is a stockholder.

As a result of this decision the coal railroad companies have organized coal companies to take over their coal lands. See COMMODITIES CLAUSE; HOLDING COMPANIES.

The act of February 4, 1887, is not inconsistent with the act of July 2, 1890. "To protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies;" U. S. v. Freight Ass'n, 166 U. S. 290, 17 Sup. Ct. 540, 41 L. Ed. 1007.

So far as congress adopted the language of the English Traffic Act, it is to be presumed that it had in mind the construction given by the English courts to the adopted language; and intended to incorporate it into the statute; Interstate Commerce Commission v. R. Co., 145 U. S. 263, 12 Sup. Ct. 844, 36 L. Ed. 699.

By act of March 1, 1913, the Commission is directed to make an inventory and appraisement of all the property of common carriers.

INTERSTATE RENDITION. See FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE.

INTERVENING DAMAGES. Damages suffered by an appellee from delay caused by the appeal. Peasely v. Buckminster, 1 Tyler (Vt.) 267.

INTERVENOR. One not originally a party who, by leave of the court, interposes in a suit and becomes a party thereto to protect a right or interest in the subject-matter.

A person who intervenes in a suit, either on his own behalf or on the behalf of the public. See INTERVENTION.

INTERVENTION (Lat. intervenio, to come between or among). The admission, by leave of the court, of a person not an original party to pending legal proceedings, by which such person becomes a party thereto for the protection of some right or interest alleged by him to be affected by such proceedings.

Persons who are not parties to a suit cannot in general file a petition therein for a stay of proceedings or any other cause; the remedy is by original bill. Exceptions are: where the pleadings contain scandal against a stranger, or where a stranger purchases the subject of litigation pending the suit, and the like; creditors are allowed to prove debts and persons belonging to a class on whose behalf the suit is brought are regarded as quasi parties and, of course, may have a standing in court; per Bradley, J., in Anderson v. R. Co., 2 Woods 628, Fed. Cas. No. 358. Third persons may be driven to intervene for their rights in equity if those rights are to be affected, and if at the hearing the court would be compelled to notice their absence and order the case to stand over until they were brought in; Carter v. City of New Orleans, 19 Fed. 659. See 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 287; Story, Eq. Pl. § 220. It is not necessary to the right of intervention, in order to participate in a trust fund in the custody of the law, that the intervenor should first obtain judgment at law or should have any lien upon the fund. Intervention will be granted, after a foreclosure decree against a railroad company, to unsecured noteholders who pray to have their debts established as equitable liens upon the property and funds of the company paramount to the lien of the mortgage; Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. R. Co., 21 Fed. 264. A holder of railroad bonds secured by a mortgage under foreclosure has an interest in the amount of the trustee's compensation, which entitles him to intervene and to contest it and to appeal from an adverse decision; Williams v. Morgan, 111 U. S. 684, 4 Sup. Ct. 638, 28 L. Ed. 559. Where a part of a canal was sold and the fund brought into court, it was held that the contractor who built the canal could intervene for the protection of his rights either upon the fund or against the purchaser; French v. Gapen, 105 U. S. 509, 26 L. Ed. 951. Bondholders in a foreclosure suit brought by the trustee of the mortgage are quasi parties and may be heard for the protection of their interests; Fidelity Trust & Safety-Vault Co. v. R. Co., 53 Fed. 850.

If one who is a necessary party to a case in a state court is wrongfully excluded and denied leave to file a proper cross bill and answer and to present a motion for removal to the federal court, he will be treated by the latter court as if a party; Hack v. R. Co., 23 Fed. 356. The case of Iowa Homestead Co. v. R. Co., 8 Fed. 97, was based on special facts.

Where a suit in equity was properly instituted against a railroad company by a stockholder, a bondholder, and the trustees for the bondholders named in the land grant mortgages of the company, and the bill charged that the officers of the company were squandering its property, and the purpose of the suit was the preservation and administration of the assets of the company, and a decree pro confesso had been entered and a receiver appointed, individual stockholders were not permitted to intervene and file a cross bill on a general charge of fraud and collusion on the part of the receiver and erroneous judgment on the part of the court in making the order referred to. In such a suit, it is not the proper practice to allow individual stockholders to intervene to set aside the proceedings or to interpose obstacles to the progress of the suit. Such stockholders may come in to take the benefit of the proceedings and decree, but not to oppose and nullify them. Rival creditors by proceedings before the master may fix the priority of their respective liens, and creditors or stockholders may contest the validity of the claims of other creditors and stockholders, but all in subordination to the general object of the suit, to obtain an administration of the company's assets and property. Persons will not be allowed to intervene as general defendants unless they show that they have an interest in the results as stockholders, and are also able to show fraud and collusion between the plaintiff in the suit and the officers of the company; per Bradley, J., in Forbes v. R. Co., 2 Wood, 323, Fed. Cas. No. 4,926. In Skiddy v. R. Co., 3 Hughes, 320, Fed. Cas. No. 12,922, the Amsterdam Bondholders' Committee, representing a very large number of bonds, filed a petition setting out the grounds for disapproving their trustees' management of the foreclosure suit, and praying intervention, but leave to intervene was denied; Clyde v. R. Co., 55 Fed. 448.

Where the holder of a large amount of bonds, on which foreclosure proceedings were pending, asked leave to intervene, and it appeared that the mortgage trustee was already a party and there was no allegation that it was not acting properly for the interests of all bondholders, leave to intervene was refused (even for the mere purpose of requiring notice to such bondholder of successive steps in the proceedings), on the ground of excessive inconvenience in the administration of the cause; Dallas, J., in the Reading Railroad foreclosure, U. S. C. C., E. D. of Pa.

The practice in respect of intervention in ordinary railroad foreclosure cases probably differs somewhat in different circuits, and varies considerably in different cases. The question of the right to intervene by members of a class already represented on the record appears to be rather a matter of discretion, in view of what is deemed best for the due conduct of the cause. Probably the right to be heard will not ordinarily be refused in any case.

There would seem to be a distinction between the intervention of parties for the purpose of sharing in a fund and the intervention of parties in the course of the administration of a railroad property, during receivership. In the latter class of cases, it would appear, from the authorities, that unless good cause be shown for the intervention of new members of a class already represented on the record, they will not be allowed to come in, upon the ground stated by Dallas, C. J., in the Reading foreclosure,—the excessive inconvenience in the administration of the cause.

In a suit to foreclose a railroad mortgage, certain persons prayed leave to intervene, alleging that the defendant company was made up by an illegal consolidation of three other companies, of one of which they were stockholders, that they never consented to the consolidation and were not bound by it nor by the mortgage, that the original company had no officers to defend for them, and that the consolidated company declined to set up the defence which they desired to make; leave to intervene was refused as there was no charge of fraud or collusion, and the proper remedy was by an independent suit; Central Trust Co. v. R. Co., 48 Fed. 14.

A purchaser at a foreclosure sale may be admitted as a party to the record and allowed to appeal; Blossom v. R. Co., 1 Wall. (U. S.) 655, 17 L. Ed. 673; upon failure to ask leave to come in, the court should compel him to become a party of record; Fitzgerald v. Evans, 49 Fed. 426, 1 C. C. A. 307. The purchaser at a foreclosure sale under a junior mortgage who takes subject to a prior mortgage, will be made a party to proceedings to foreclose such prior mortgage; Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. R. Co., 44 Fed. 115. Parties given leave to intervene in an equity suit after a decree pro confesso, have a right of appeal from a decree affecting their rights, and the supreme court will enforce this right by a mandamus; Ex parte Jordan, 94 U. S. 248, 24 L. Ed. 123. See Williams v. Morgan, 111 U. S. 684, 4 Sup. Ct. 638, 28 L. Ed. 559.

When a creditor's bill in equity is properly removed from a state court to a federal court on the ground of diverse citizenship, the jurisdiction of the latter is not ousted by admitting in the circuit court as co-plaintiffs other creditors who are citizens of the same state as the defendants; Stewart v. Dunham, 115 U. S. 61, 5 Sup. Ct. 1163, 29 L. Ed. 329.

A court of the United States sitting as a court of law, has an equitable power over its own process to prevent abuse, oppression and injustice; which power may be invoked by a stranger to the litigation as incident to the jurisdiction already vested, and without regard to his own citizenship; Gumbel v. Pitkin, 124 U. S. 131, 8 Sup. Ct. 379, 31 L. Ed. 374.

When property in the possession of a third person claiming ownership, is attached on mesne process issuing out of the United States circuit court, as the property of a defendant and citizen of the same state as the person claiming it, such person may seek redress in the circuit court by ancillary proceedings; as, for instance, if the original proceeding is in equity, by a petition pro interesse suo, or by ancillary bill, or by summary motion, according to circumstances; or, if it is at common law, by a summary motion or by a proceeding in the nature of an interpleader; or, if proceedings authorized by statutes of the state afford an adequate remedy, by adopting them as part of the practice of the court; Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276, 4 Sup. Ct. 27, 28 L. Ed. 145. Where, in equity, an execution is issued and a levy and sale made of certain lands, a third party claiming to be the real owner cannot intervene for the purpose of moving to set aside the execution when there is no privity of estate between him and the defendant in the execution; Ex parte Mensing, 55 Fed. 17.

On a creditors' bill, judgment creditors who choose to intervene may share ratably with complainants in the proceeds of a sale of the property, even if some do not intervene until after the decree of sale; George v. Ry. Co., 44 Fed. 117. The practice of permitting judgment creditors to come in and make themselves parties to a creditors' bill is well settled; Myers v. Fenn, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 205, 18 L. Ed. 604.

Stockholders of a corporation who have been allowed to put in answers in the name of the corporation cannot be regarded as answering for the corporation itself. In a special case, however, where there is an allegation that the directors fraudulently refused to attend to the interests of the corporation, equity may allow a stockholder to become a party defendant for the protection of his own interest and that of such other stockholders as may join him in the defence; Bronson v. R. Co., 2 Wall. (U. S.) 283, 17 L. Ed. 725. Where any fraud has been perpetrated by the directors of a company by which the interests of the stockholders are affected, the stockholders have a right to come in as parties to a suit against the company and ask that their property shall be relieved from the effect of such fraud; Bayliss v. Ry. Co., 8 Biss. 193, Fed. Cas. No. 1,140.

The state can intervene in proceedings to foreclose a railroad mortgage only where it is entitled as a bond or lien holder to share in the proceeds of a sale, or where public interests are at stake which are seriously threatened by the proposed disposition of the property. An intervening petition filed by a state in railroad foreclosure proceedings alleging that bonds and the mortgage securing them were void, and that the railroad company, by collusion and neglect to defend, was about to allow judgment to go against it by default, that the company in consideration of large land grants from the state had agreed to maintain low rates of transportation, which, by foreclosure, would be increased, gives no right of intervention, especially where neither the charter of the company nor any subsquent legislation showed any such contract as the one alleged; State v. Trust Co., 81 Tex. 530, 17 S. W. 60. Permission will not be granted to a state to intervene for the stay of the sale of a railroad under foreclosure proceedings; Anderson v. R. Co., 2 Woods 628, Fed. Cas. No. 358.

In a controversy between two states in relation to the boundary line between them, the attorney-general of the United States may appear on behalf of the United States and adduce evidence, though he does not thereby become a party in the technical sense of the word, and no judgment will be entered for or against the United States; Florida v. Georgia, 17 How. (U. S.) 478, 15 L. Ed. 181.

A petition to intervene need not be as formal as a bill of complaint, yet it should exhibit all the material facts relied on, embodying so much of the record in the original suit as is essential, and proceedings taken therein which would fortify the right of the intervener should be incorporated in the petition by amendment, and if this is not done, such proceedings cannot be noticed on a demurrer to the petition; Empire Distilling Co. v. McNulta, 77 Fed. 700, 23 C. C. A. 415.

In bills brought on behalf of a class, an intervening member of the class will ordinarily be joined as a plaintiff and this will not generally deprive the court of jurisdiction; Stewart v. Dunham, 115 U. S. 61, 5 Sup. Ct. 1163, 29 L. Ed. 329. If there should be any danger that it would, he may be joined as a defendant or, if he intends to act in hostility to the original complainant, the court may make him a defendant; 1 Fost. Fed. Prac. § 201; Brown v. Steamship Co., 5 Blatchf. 525, Fed. Cas. No. 2,025; Forbes v. R. Co., 2 Woods 323, Fed. Cas. No. 4,920.

A person claiming a right to share in a fund or claiming a right to property in the hands of a receiver is generally allowed to intervene pro interesse suo; 1 Fost. Fed. Pr. § 201.

One who, in an action at law, has been denied the right to intervene, because of his status, cannot afterwards maintain a bill in equity in the same court to enjoin the proceedings and to be permitted to intervene; McDonald v. Seligman, 81 Fed. 753. But where leave to intervene in an equity case is asked and refused, it is not a determination of the merits, but the petitioner is at full liberty to assert his rights in any other appropriate form of proceedings; Credits Commutation Co. v. U. S., 177 U. S. 311, 20 Sup. Ct. 636, 44 L. Ed. 782.

In a treaty relating to the administration by consuls of estates of foreigners dying in a state, "intervene in the possession and administration of the deceased" means that the consul may "temporarily possess the estate for the purpose of protecting it before it comes under the jurisdiction of the laws of the country, or protect the interest of his national in an administration instituted otherwise than by him"; Rocca v. Thompson, 223 U. S. 317, 32 Sup. Ct. 207, 56 L. Ed. 453.

Under Codes. There are provisions in the codes of several of the states, which appear to have been originally adopted from Louisiana, permitting any person who has an interest in any matter in litigation to intervene by rule of court. This interest must be of such a direct and important character that the intervenor will either gain or lose by the direct effect of the judgment; the interest must be that created by a claim in suit or a lien upon the property, or some part thereof, in suit, or a claim to or lien upon the property or some part thereof which is the subject of litigation; Horn v. Water Co., 13 Cal. 62, 73 Am. Dec. 569, per Field, J. See Smith v. Gale, 144 U. S. 518, 12 Sup. Ct. 674, 36 L. Ed. 521.

In Patent Law. Where a third party asked to be made a party defendant, alleging that it was the manufacturer of machines claimed to infringe; that the defendant was its vendee; that it desired to settle the question as to whether or not the machines did infringe, both the complainant and the third party being non-residents, the petitioner was allowed to become a party defendant; Curran v. Car Co., 32 Fed. 835. So of the owner of cars, in a patent suit brought against the user; Standard Oil Co. v. Southern Pac. Co., 54 Fed. 521, 4 C. C. A. 491.

In Admiralty. Any person may intervene in a suit in rem for his interest and he may do so notwithstanding the res has been delivered to a claimant on a stipulation in a certain sum to abide by and perform the decree, the stipulation as far as it goes standing for the res; The Oregon, 45 Fed. 62. An administrator may intervene in a suit in rem to recover the damages allowed by a law of the state for the death of his intestate, caused by the wrongful act or omission of the person in charge of the res; The S. S. Oregon, 42 Fed. 78. When a vessel libelled by a material man has been taken possession of by the court, other material men may intervene by libel praying warrants of arrest in order to retain the property in case security be given for its release; The Julia, 57 Fed. 233. See Admiralty Rule 43.

In International Law. Intervention is the interference of one state in the affairs of another state or states, without the consent of the foreign state. It is essentially a violation of the right belonging to every nation to be sovereign within its own borders and to be independent of foreign control in the administration of its home affairs and in the conduct of its foreign policy. There are, however, certain circumstances which are recognized in international law as justifying intervention. The two forms of intervention best recognized in international law are intervention in the interest of self-protection and intervention in the interest of the balance of power. The fundamental right of a state to preserve its own existence has often been alleged in justification of the violation of the territory of a foreign state, whether for the sake of anticipating an attack on the part of that state or for the sake of preventing such state from being made the basis of operations by a third party. The necessity of maintaining a balance of power between the great powers, and even between the lesser ones, has frequently been alleged in justification of an attack by one or more states upon a third state which, by its aggressive policy and its military preparations, threatens the existence or independence of other states. Intervention has sometimes been exercised in the interests of humanity, when the subjects of a foreign state were being subjected to such treatment as to call forth a protest from the civilized world. Such an intervention took place in 1827 when Great Britain, France and Russia intervened in the war between Greece and Turkey, because of the general horror created by the cruelties committed in the war. Moreover, intervention would be justified in punishment of a state which had deliberately violated the recognized rules of international law.

The United States, being outside the circle of the great European powers, has felt that it could maintain a position of isolation with regard to the questions of European diplomacy. Under the Monroe Doctrine (q. v.) the United States has rather taken an attitude of preventing intervention on the part of the European powers in the affairs of the Central and South American states, than felt called upon itself to intervene. As early as 1782 John Adams expressed his conviction that it should be the rule of the colonies not to meddle in the affairs of Europe. In his Farewell Address of 1796, Washington stated clearly the policy of the new republic. "It must be unwise in us," he said, "to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her [Europe's] politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities. Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course." The same principles were enunciated by Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, J. Q. Adams, and succeeding Presidents and Secretaries of State. The acts of the United States have been in accordance with her avowed policy. Efforts were made in 1793 by French agents to force the United States to take sides with France against Great Britain, but Washington steadily refused to be influenced by them. In the wars between Spain and her American colonies, the United States maintained an attitude of neutrality and non-intervention. Again in 1822–27, when efforts were made to have the United States intervene between Greece and Turkey, the government refused to take action. Similar efforts were made by Hungarian patriots in 1848, but were alike without success.

The most striking instance of direct intervention on the part of the United States is in connection with the island of Cuba. For many years conditions upon that neighboring island had been a source of great annoyance to the United States, both because of the general horror created by the character of the more or less continuous warfare between the island and Spain, as well as because of the obligation imposed upon the United States of preventing its territory from being made the starting point of hostile expeditions against the Spanish government of that island. The joint resolution of April 20, 1898, which was accepted by Spain as practically amounting to a declaration of war, states that in view of the "abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the island of Cuba" the United States felt that it was its duty to demand that Spain relinquish its authority over the island of Cuba. The President was in consequence authorized to use the land and naval forces of the United States to carry out the resolution. At the same time the United States distinctly disclaimed any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty over the island. For further cases of political intervention see MONROE DOCTRINE.

Intervention is said to be non-political in character when a government does not forcibly interfere in the affairs of another state, but merely enters into diplomatic negotiations with the government of that state for the purpose of making it reverse its conduct in the treatment of subjects of the first state which happened to be transiently or permanently resident in the second state. This form of intervention is resorted to to protect citizens of the state against wrong or injustice in a foreign state, whether as a result of the positive action of the foreign government or of its omission to extend due protection to the alien. The general rule is that a government will not intervene in favor of its citizens until they have had recourse to the ordinary tribunals of the foreign country and have been refused justice. For intervention by a state to collect debts owed to its citizens by a foreign state, see CALVO DOCTRINE; DRAGO DOCTRINE. A nation ordinarily will not intervene in matters of business between its citizens and a foreign country. It will, however, interpose its good offices for the alleviation of the punishment of its citizens who are convicted of political offences in a foreign country. Likewise it will endeavor to secure full protection for its citizens who go as foreign missionaries to pagan countries. This does not mean that the United States would assume a protectorship of Christian communities in such countries. On several occasions resolutions have been offered in the United States congress protesting against the cruel treatment of Jews in certain foreign countries. See Moore, VI, §§ 897–926.

The doctrine has been thus spoken of by a distinguished writer, "Historicus": "Its essence is illegality and its justification is its success."

In Civil Law. The act by which a third party becomes a party in a suit pending between other persons.

The intervention is made either to be joined to the plaintiff, and to claim the same thing he does, or some other thing connected with it; or to join the defendant, and with him to oppose the claim of the plaintiff, which it is his interest to defeat. Pothier, Proc. Civ. 1ère part, ch. 2, s. 6, § 3.

In English Ecclesiastical Law. The proceeding of a third person, who, not being originally a party to the suit or proceeding, but claiming an interest in the subject-matter in dispute, in order the better to protect such interest, interposes his claim. 2 Chitty, Pr. 492; 2 Hagg. Cons. 137; 3 Phill. Eccl. 586; Dunlop, Adm. Pr. 74. The intervenor may come in at any stage of the cause, and even after judgment, if an appeal can be allowed on such judgment; 2 Hagg. Cons. 137.

Intervention is allowed in certain cases, especially in suits for divorce and nullity of marriage, by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 144, and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 31, where it is usual for the queen's proctor to intervene, where collusion is suspected.

Intervention in the possession and administration of the property of an alien dying in the United States, as used in a treaty, is defined in Rocca v. Thompson, 223 U. S. 317, 32 Sup. Ct. 207, 56 L. Ed. 453, quoting from this title at length.

See AMICUS CURIÆ; EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

INTESTABILIS. A witness incompetent to testify. Calv. Lex.

INTESTABLE. One who cannot lawfully make a testament.

An infant, an insane person, or one civilly dead, cannot make a will, for want of capacity or understanding; a married woman cannot make such a will without some special authority, because she is under the power of her husband. They are all intestable.

INTESTACY. The state or condition of dying without a will.

See Gross, Mediæval Law of Intestacy, 3 Sel. Essays in Anglo-Amer. L. H. 723 (18 Harv. L. Rev. 120).

INTESTATE. Without a will. A person who dies, having made no will, or one which is defective in form. In that case, he is said to die intestate, and his estate descends to his heirs at law or next of kin. See Kohny v. Dunbar, 21 Idaho 258, 121 Pac. 544, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1107, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 492.

This term comes from the Latin intestatus. Formerly, it was used in France indiscriminately with de-confesse; that is, without confession. It was regarded as a crime, on account of the omission of the deceased person to give something to the church, and was punished by privation of burial in consecrated ground. This omission, according to Fournel, Hist. des Avocats, vol. 1, p. 116, could be repaired by making an ampliative testament in the name of the deceased. See Vely, tom. 6, page 145; Henrion de Pansey, Autorité judiciaire 129, and note. See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; WILL.

The Roman horror of intestacy was equalled or surpassed among early Englishmen, the reason being the danger to the intestate's soul if he died without having assigned a fitting part of his estate to pious uses. Pollock's note to Maine's Anc. L. 230.

INTESTATE SUCCESSION. A succession is called intestate when the deceased has left no will, or when his will has been revoked, or annulled as irregular. Therefore the heirs to whom a succession has fallen by the effects of the law only are called "heirs ab intestato." Civil Code La. art. 1096.

INTESTATO. In the Civil Law. Intestate; without a will. Calv. Lex.

INTESTATUS. In the Civil and Old English Law. An intestate. One who dies without a will. Dig. 50, 17, 7.

INTIMACY. As generally applied to persons, it is understood to mean a proper, friendly relation of the parties, but it is frequently used to convey the idea of an improper relation; an intimacy at least disreputable and degrading. Collins v. Pub. Co., 152 Pa. 187, 25 Atl. 546, 34 Am. St. Rep. 636. See McCarty v. Coffin, 157 Mass. 478, 32 N. E. 649.

INTIMATION. In Civil Law. The name of any judicial act by which a notice of a legal proceeding is given to some one; but it is more usually understood to mean the notice or summons which an appellant causes to be given to the opposite party, that the sentence will be reviewed by the superior judge.

INTIMIDATION. The act of intimidating or making fearful; the state of being intimidated.

In Old English Law. By the stat. 38 and 39 Vict. c. 86, 7, every person commits a misdemeanor, who wrongfully uses violence to, or intimidates, any other person, or his wife or children, with a view to compel him to abstain from doing, or to do, any act which he has a legal right to do or abstain from doing. See DURESS.

INTIMIDATION OF VOTERS. Statutes have been enacted in some states to punish the intimidation of voters. Under an early Pennsylvania act, it was held that to constitute the offence of intimidation of voters, there must be a preconceived intention for the purpose of intimidating the officers or interrupting the election; Respublica v. Gibbs, 3 Yeates (Pa.) 429.

INTOL AND UTTOL. Toll or custom paid for things imported, or exported, or brought in and sold out. Tom.; Calv. Lex.

INTOXICATING DRINKS. See LIQUOR LAWS.

INTOXICATION. See DRUNKENNESS.

INTRASTATE COMMERCE. See COMMERCE; INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

INTRA VIRES. An act is said to be intra vires ("within the power") of a person or corporation when it is within the scope of his or its powers or authority. It is the opposite of ultra vires (q. v.).

INTRINSECUM SERVITIUM. Common and ordinary duties with the lord's court. Kenn. Glos. See FORINSEC.

INTRINSIC. The intrinsic value of a thing is its true, inherent, and essential value, not depending upon accident, place, or person, but the same everywhere and to every one. Bank of State of North Carolina v. Ford, 27 N. C. 698.

INTRODUCTION. That part of a writing in which are detailed those facts which elucidate the subject.

INTROMISSION. Dealing with stocks, goods, or cash of a principal coming into the hands of his agent, to be accounted for by the agent to his principal. 29 Eng. Law & Eq. 391. See AGENT.

INTRONISATION. In French Ecclesiastical Law. The installation of a bishop in his episcopal see. Clef des Lois Rom.; André.

INTRUDER. One who, on the death of the ancestor, enters on the land, unlawfully, before the heir can enter.

INTRUSION. The entry of a stranger after the determination of a particular estate of freehold, before the entry of him in reversion or remainder.

This entry and interposition of the stranger differs from an abatement in this, that an abatement is always to the prejudice of an heir or immediate devisee; an intrusion is always to the prejudice of him in remainder or reversion. 3 Bla. Com. 169; Fitzh. N. B. 203; Archb. Civ. Pl. 12; Dane, Abr. Index; 3 Steph. Com. 443.

The name of a writ brought by the owner of a fee simple, etc., against an intruder. New Nat. Brev. 453. Abolished by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 57.

INUNDATION. The overflow of waters by coming out of their bed.

Inundations may arise from three causes: from public necessity, as in defence of a place it may be necessary to dam the current of a stream, which will cause an inundation to the upper lands; they may be occasioned by an invincible force, as by the accidental fall of a rock in the stream, or by a natural flood or freshet; or they may result from the erection of works on the stream. In the first case, the injury caused by the inundation is to be compensated as other injuries done in war; in the second, as there was no fault of any one, the loss is to be borne by the unfortunate owner of the estate; in the last, when the riparian proprietor is injured by such works as alter the level of the water where it enters or where it leaves the property on which they are erected, the person injured may recover damages for the injury thus caused to his property by the inundation; 9 Co. 59; 1 B. & Ald. 258; Sumner v. Tileston, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 198; Bailey v. City of New York, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 531, 38 Am. Dec. 669; Tillotson v. Smith, 32 N. H. 90, 64 Am. Dec. 355; Merritt v. Parker, 1 N. J. L. 460; Williams v. Gale, 3 H. & J. (Md.) 231; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Nuetzel, 43 Ill. App. 108. See DAM; BACKWATER; IRRIGATION; WATERS; WATER COURSE.

INURE. To take effect; to result. See ENURE.

INUREMENT. Use; user; service to the use or benefit of a person; Dickerson v. Colgrove, 100 U. S. 583, 25 L. Ed. 618.

INVADIARE. To mortgage lands. Toml.

INVADIATIO (L. Lat.). A pledge or mortgage.

INVADIATUS. One who is under pledge; one who has had sureties or pledges given for him. Spel. Glos.

INVADING A JUDGE. Assaulting a judge. Patterson.

INVALID. Not valid; of no binding force.

INVASION. The entry of a country by a public enemy, making war. See INSURRECTION.

INVASIONES. The inquisition of serjeanties and knights' fees. Cowell; Calv. Lex.

INVECTA ET ILLATA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Things carried and brought in. Things brought into a building hired (œdes), or into a hired estate in the city (prædium urbanum), which are held by a tacit mortgage for the rent. Voc. Jur. Utr.; Domat, Civ. Law.

INVENTIO. In the Civil Law. Finding; one of the modes of acquiring title to property by occupancy. Heinecc. lib. 2, tit. 1, 350.

In Old English Law. A thing found; as goods, or treasure-trove. Cowell. The plural, "inventiones," is also used.

INVENTION. See PATENT.

INVENTIONES. A word used in some ancient English charters to signify treasure-trove.

INVENTOR. One who contrives or produces a thing which did not before exist. One who makes an invention. The word is generally used to denote the author of such contrivances as are by law patentable. See PATENT.

INVENTORY. A list, schedule, or enumeration in writing, containing, article by article, the goods and chattels, rights and credits, and, in some cases, the land and tenements, of a person or persons. A conservatory act, which is made to ascertain the situation of an intestate's estate, the estate of an insolvent, and the like, for the purpose of securing it to those entitled to it.

When the inventory is made of goods and estates assigned or conveyed in trust, it must include all the property conveyed. It is prima facie evidence of the value as against the administrator; In re Childs, 5 Misc. 560, 26 N. Y. Supp. 721; In re Mullon, 74 Hun 358, 26 N. Y. Supp. 683.

In case of intestate estates, it is required to contain only the personal property, or that to which the administrator is entitled. The claims due to the estate ought to be separated; those which are desperate or bad ought to be so returned. The articles ought to be set down separately, as already mentioned, and separately valued. It is not the duty of an administrator to inventory property which was conveyed by his intestate in fraud of creditors; Gardner v. Gardner, 17 R. I. 751, 24 Atl. 785. The duty of having an appraisal and inventory made of a testator's estate, rests on the executor and not on the adult legatees; In re Curry's Will, 19 N. Y. Supp. 728. An item inserted in the inventory by mistake may be stricken out after it is sworn to; In re Payne, 78 Hun 292, 28 N. Y. Supp. 911.

The inventory is to be made in the presence of at least two of the creditors of the deceased, or legatees, or next of kin, or of two honest persons. The appraisers must sign it, and make oath or affirmation that the appraisement is just to the best of their knowledge. See, generally, 14 Vin. Abr. 465; Bac. Abr. Executors, etc. (E 11); Ayl. Par. 305; Com. Dig. Administration (B 7); 2 Add. Eccl. 319; Shoul. Ex. & Ad. 230; 2 Bla. Com. 514; Com. v. Bryan, 8 S. & R. (Pa.) 128.

INVEST (Lat. investire, to clothe). To put in possession of a field upon taking the oath of fealty or fidelity to the prince or superior lord. Also, to lay out capital in some permanent form so as to produce an income.

The term would hardly apply to an active capital employed in banking; People v. Ins. Co., 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 358, 8 Am. Dec. 243. It would cover the loaning of money; Shoemaker v. Smith, 37 Ind. 122. Whenever a sum is represented by anything but money, it is invested; People v. Commissioners of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 242.

INVESTITURE. The act of giving possession of lands by actual seisin. The ceremonial introduction to some office of dignity.

When livery of seisin was made to a person by the common law, he was invested with the whole fee; this the foreign feudists, and sometimes our own law-writers, call investiture; but generally speaking, it is termed by the common-law writers the seisin of the fee. 2 Bla. Com. 209, 313; Fearne, Rem. 223, n. (z).

By the canon law, investiture was made per baculum et annulum, by the ring and crosier, which were regarded as symbols of the episcopal jurisdiction. Ecclesiastical and secular fiefs were governed by the same rule in this respect,—that previously to investiture neither a bishop, abbot, nor lay lord could take possession of a fief conferred upon him by the prince.

Pope Gregory VI. first disputed the right of sovereigns to give investiture of ecclesiastical fiefs, A. D. 1045; but Pope Gregory VII. carried on the dispute with much more vigor, A. D. 1073. He excommunicated the emperor Henry IV. The popes Victor III., Urban II., and Paul II. continued the contest. This dispute, it is said, cost Christendom sixty-three battles, and the lives of many millions of men. De Pradt.

INVESTIVE FACT. The fact by means of which a right comes into existence; e. g. a grant of a monopoly, the death of one's ancestor. Holland, Jur. 151.

INVESTMENT. A sum of money left for safekeeping, subject to order, and payable not in the specific money deposited, but in an equal sum; it may or may not bear interest, according to the agreement. In re Law's Estate, 144 Pa. 499, 22 Atl. 831, 14 L. R. A. 103; State v. McFetridge, 84 Wis. 473, 54 N. W. 11, 998, 20 L. R. A. 223.

As to investment of trust funds, see TRUSTEE.

INVIOLABILITY. That which is not to be violated. The persons of ambassadors are inviolable. See AMBASSADOR; TELEGRAM.

INVITO. Against, or without the assent or consent; unwilling.

INVITO DEBITORE. Against the will of the debtor.

INVITO DOMINO (Lat.). In Criminal Law. Without the consent of the owner. In order to constitute larceny, the property stolen must be taken invito domino; this is the very essence of the crime. Cases of considerable difficulty arise when the owner has, for the purpose of detecting thieves, by himself or his agents, delivered the property taken, as to whether they are larcenies or not: the distinction seems to be this, that when the owner procures the property to be taken, it is not larceny; and when he merely leaves it in the power of the defendant to execute his original purpose of taking it, in the latter case it will be considered as taken invito domino; 2 Russ. Cr. 66, 105; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 666; Bac. Abr. Felony (C); 2 B. & P. 508. See LARCENY.

INVOICE. An account of goods or merchandise sent by merchants to their correspondents at home or abroad, in which the marks of each package, with other particulars, are set forth. Marsh. Ins. 408; Dane, Abr. Index. An invoice ought to contain a detailed statement, which should indicate the nature, quantity, quality, and prices of the things sold, deposited, etc.; 1 Pard. n. 248. See Graham v. Ins. Co., 2 Wash. C. C. 113, Fed. Cas. No. 5,674; Field v. Moulson, 2 Wash. C. C. 155, Fed. Cas. No. 4,770. Invoice carries no necessary implication of ownership, but accompanies goods consigned to a factor for sale, as well as in the case of a purchaser; Rolker v. Ins. Co., 4 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 76. See BILL OF LADING. Invoice Price. The prime cost, or invoice of the cost. Le Roy v. Ins. Co., 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 343.

An invoice is not evidence of a sale; it is a mere statement of the nature, quantity and cost or price of the things invoiced and is as appropriate to a bailment as to a sale; Dows v. Bank, 91 U. S. 618, 23 L. Ed. 214; In re Smith & Nixon Piano Co., 149 Fed. 113, 79 C. C. A. 53.

INVOLUNTARY. An involuntary act is that which is performed with constraint (q. v.), or with repugnance, or without the will to do it. An action is involuntary which is performed under duress. Wolffius, Inst. § 5.

INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER. See MANSLAUGHTER; HOMICIDE.

INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE. These words, used in the 13th amendment of the United States constitution, have a larger meaning than slavery; Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 31 Sup. Ct. 145, 55 L. Ed. 191. See SLAVERY; PEONAGE; 11 Col. L. Rev. 363.

I. O. U. See at beginning of letter I.

IOWA (an Indian word denoting "the place or final resting place"). The name of one of the states of the United States, being the sixteenth admitted to the Union.

This state was admitted to the Union by an act of congress approved December 28, 1846.

IPSISSIMIS VERBIS (Lat.). In the identical words: opposed to substantially. Townsend v. Jemison, 7 How. (U. S.) 719, 12 L. Ed. 880; Summons v. State, 5 Ohio St. 346.

IPSO FACTO (Lat.). By the fact itself. By the mere fact. A proceeding ipso facto void is one which has not prima facie validity, but is void ab initio.

IPSO JURE (Lat.). By the operation of law. By mere law.

IPSWICH, DOMESDAY OF. The earliest extant record of any borough court with elective officers sitting regularly and administering a customary law of the sea. Black Book of Admiralty, Vol. II. It was abolished by 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76. Its twelve "capital portmen" were elected from the most fit, wealthy and discreet of the judges.

IRADE. A decree of the Sultan.

IRELAND. See UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

IRON SAFE CLAUSE. See INSURANCE.

IRRECUSABLE. A term used to indicate a certain class of contractual obligations recognized by the law which are imposed upon a person without his consent and without regard to any act of his own. They are distinguished from recusable obligations which are the result of a voluntary act on the part of a person on whom they are imposed by law. A clear example of an irrecusable obligation is the obligation imposed on every man not to strike another without some lawful excuse. A recusable obligation is based upon some act of a person bound, which is a condition precedent to the genesis of the obligation. These terms were first suggested by Prof. Wigmore in 8 Harv. Law Rev. 200. See Harr. Contr. 6, where this classification is very fully discussed. See CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATION.

IRREGULARITY. The doing or not doing that in the conduct of a suit at law, which, conformably with the practice of the court, ought or ought not to be done. Doe v. Harter, 2 Ind. 252. The term is usually applied to such informality as does not render invalid the act done; thus an irregular distress for rent due is not illegal ab initio.

A party entitled to complain of irregularity should except to it previously to taking any step by him in the cause; Lofft 323, 333; because the taking of any such step is a waiver of any irregularity; 1 B. & P. 342. See ABATEMENT.

The court will, on motion, set aside proceedings for irregularity. On setting aside a judgment and execution for irregularity, they have power to impose terms on the defendant, and will restrain him from bringing an action of trespass, unless a strong case of damage appears. 1 Chitty, Bail. 133, n. And see Baldw. 246.

IRRELEVANCY. The quality or state of being inapplicable or impertinent to a fact or argument.

Irrelevancy, in an answer, consists in statements which are not material to the decision of the case; such as do not form or tender any material issue. People v. McCumber, 18 N. Y. 315, 321, 72 Am. Dec. 515.

IRRELEVANT EVIDENCE. That which does not support the issue, and which, of course, must be excluded. See EVIDENCE.

IRREMOVABILITY. The status of a pauper in England, who cannot be legally removed from the parish or union in which he is receiving relief, notwithstanding that he has not acquired a settlement there. Thus a pauper who has resided in a parish during the whole of the preceding year is irremovable. Stat. 28 and 29 Vict. c. 79, § 8.

IRREPARABLE INJURY. As a ground for injunction, it is that which cannot be repaired, retrieved, put back again, atoned for. Indian River Steamboat Co. v. Trans. Co., 28 Fla. 387, 10 South. 480, 29 Am. St. Rep. 258; it does not necessarily mean that the injury is beyond the possibility of compensation in damages, nor that it must be very great; Newell v. Sass, 142 Ill. 104, 31 N. E. 176. See INJUNCTION.

IRREPLEVIABLE. That cannot be replevied or delivered on sureties. Spelled, also, irreplevisable. Co. Litt. 145; 13 Edw. I. c. 2.

IRRESISTIBLE FORCE. A term applied to such an interposition of human agency as is, from its nature and power, absolutely uncontrollable; as, the inroads of a hostile army. Story, Bailm. § 25; Lois des Batim. pt. 2, c. 2, § 1. See INEVITABLE ACCIDENT.

IRRESISTIBLE IMPULSE. See INSANITY.

IRREVOCABLE. Which cannot be revoked or recalled. A power of attorney in which the attorney has an interest granted for consideration is irrevocable. See WILL; POWER OF ATTORNEY.

IRRIGATION. The operation of watering lands or causing water to flow over lands by artificial means for agricultural purposes.

"The word irrigation, in its primary sense, means a sprinkling or watering; but the best lexicographers give it an agricultural or special signification, thus: 'The watering of lands by drains or channels' (Worcester); 'The operation of causing water to flow over lands for nourishing plants' (Webster). The term irrigation as used in Colorado, in the constitution and statutes and judicial opinions, in view of the climate and soil, is in its special sense, to wit: 'The application of water to lands for the raising of agricultural crops and other products of the soil.'" Platte Water Co. v. Irrigation Co., 12 Colo. 529, 21 Pac. 711.

At common law the right of the riparian proprietor to divert the water of a stream for the purposes of irrigation was well recognized, and it was described as an artificial use of the water and not a natural use like taking the water for drinking, domestic purposes, and watering cattle, which would allow the use of all the water in the stream. A riparian owner could use for domestic purposes and watering cattle as much of the water of the stream as he chose, and if he found it necessary, take all the water in the stream, but in using the water for irrigation he was allowed to take only a reasonable amount of it and could not diminish the flow of the stream, so as to cause loss to other riparian owners; Gould, Waters 217; Kinney, Irrig. § 66; Tolle v. Correth, 31 Tex. 362, 98 Am. Dec. 543 and note; Fleming v. Davis, 37 Tex. 173; Tyler v. Wilkinson, 4 Mas. 400, Fed. Cas. No. 14,312; Ingraham v. Hutchinson, 2 Conn. 584.

This doctrine of the common law was sufficient for any irrigation that had been found necessary in England or in the United States east of the Mississippi River. But in what was once known as the Great American Desert and is now called the Arid Region west of the Mississippi, "there has grown up or evolved out of the necessities of the people and the exigencies of the communities interested, a great body of law, custom, regulation, and judicial interpretation. These statutes in general form the principle of prior appropriation as wrought out by the earlier miners, and embodied in federal law, and then by the states and territories, being steadily sustained by the courts, with a few exceptions, as the common law of an arid region such as ours. The development of the beneficial use of water has of course modified the practice of prior appropriations to a first or prior pro rata share of the natural waters, when taken from bed or source for industrial purposes;" Senate Report on Irrigation, 1890.

After the discovery of gold in California had brought great numbers of people to that region, the miners developed a sort of code of their own, called the Mining Customs, which in 1851 were recognized by the legislature of California and made a part of the law of the state. By these customs a new principle in water rights was developed, called the Law of Priority of Appropriation, by which the person who first uses the water of a stream is by virtue of priority of occupation entitled to hold the same, and may use all the water in the stream for the purpose of carrying on his mining operations; Kinney, Irrig. § 104; Geertson v. Barrack, 3 Idaho, 344, 29 Pac. 42. This doctrine beginning in the Mining Customs and sanctioned by the legislature of California and the supreme court of that state, was afterwards approved by the supreme court of the United States, and congress not only passed acts which sanctioned the doctrine as regarded mines, but extended it to all other beneficial uses or purposes for which water may be essential, as irrigation for the purposes of argiculture and horticulture and to milling, manufacturing, and municipal purposes, in the Arid Region.

The rights of a riparian owner to the use of the water flowing by his land are not the same in the arid states of the west as they are in the eastern states. These rights have been altered by many of the western states by their conditions and laws because of the totally different circumstances in which their inhabitants are placed; Clark v. Nash, 198 U. S. 361, 25 Sup. Ct. 676, 49 L. Ed. 1085, 4 Ann. Cas. 1171.

In order to make an appropriation of water valid under the Arid Region doctrine, there must be a bona fide intention to use the water for some beneficial purpose; Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 33, 91 Am. Dec. 554; Woolman v. Garringer, 1 Mont. 543; Dick v. Caldwell, 14 Nev. 167; Munroe v. Ivie, 2 Utah 535; Ft. Morgan Land & Canal Co. v. Ditch Co., 18 Colo. 1, 30 Pac. 1032, 36 Am. St. Rep. 259. The intention to appropriate must be shown by the work and labor usual in such enterprises to accomplish the end. If there is no actual intention to appropriate the water for a beneficial purpose, or if there is unnecessary delay in the completion of the works for the appropriation of the water, a subsequent appropriator who diverts and applies the water for a beneficial purpose has the superior right; Ball v. Kehl, 87 Cal. 505, 25 Pac. 679; Feliz v. Los Angeles, 58 Cal. 80; Basey v. Gallagher, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 682, 22 L. Ed. 452; Jennison v. Kirk, 98 U. S. 453, 25 L. Ed. 240. A ditch or canal company may appropriate or divert water and then sell it to other persons, provided the water is all applied to beneficial purposes by the persons to whom it is sold; Combs v. Ditch Co., 17 Colo. 146, 28 Pac. 966, 31 Am. St. Rep. 275. It is also necessary to the validity of an appropriation that the water be used continuously. If allowed to run to waste for any length of time it will be treated as abandoned and open for a fresh appropriation. But water once lawfully appropriated is not lost by a change in its use; Hill v. Smith, 27 Cal. 476; Sims v. Smith, 7 Cal. 148, 68 Am. Dec. 233.

All persons in the Arid Region competent to hold lands have also the right to appropriate water; Lobdell v. Hall, 3 Nev. 507; Quigley v. Birdseye, 11 Mont. 439, 28 Pac. 741. But under the Arid Region doctrine an appropriator need not necessarily be a riparian owner of land. The right to appropriate is not an incident of the soil, but is simply a possessory right acquired by valid appropriation; Strickler v. City of Colorado Springs, 16 Colo. 61, 26 Pac. 13, 25 Am. St. Rep. 245; Bloom v. West, 3 Colo. App. 212, 32 Pac. 846; Barnes v. Sabron, 10 Nev. 217; Basey v. Gallagher, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 670, 22 L. Ed. 452; Broder v. Min. Co., 101 U. S. 276, 25 L. Ed. 790; Titcomb v. Kirk, 51 Cal. 288; Kinney, Irrig. § 156.

A provision that no land shall be included in an irrigation district, except such as may be benefited by the system of irrigation used in that district, means that the land must be such that it may be substantially benefited. It is not sufficient that such irrigation creates an opportunity thereafter to use the land for a new kind of crop, while not substantially benefiting it for the cultivation of the old kind, which it has produced in reasonable quantities, and with ordinary certainty, without the aid of irrigation; Fallbrook Irrigation Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369.

In order to make an appropriation valid there must be sufficient notice to the public of the intention to appropriate; and the notice may be in any form which gives the name of the appropriator and a description of the stream and of the purposes for which the water is to be taken; Osgood v. Min. Co., 56 Cal. 571.

In Krall v. U. S., 79 Fed. 241, 24 C. C. A. 543, it was held that the previous establishment of a government reservation below the point of appropriation does not affect the right, except so far as the waters of the stream have been previously appropriated for the use of such reservation. But Gilbert, J., dissented on the authority of Sturr v. Beck, 133 U. S. 541, 10 Sup. Ct. 350, 33 L. Ed. 761, which held that a homestead entryman on land over which the waters of a creek flowed had the right to the natural flow of the water as against a subsequent appropriation.

The rights of an appropriator of water for irrigating purposes are not interfered with by a subsequent appropriation for mining purposes at a point further up the stream, unless the use for the latter purpose impairs the value of the water for the purpose of irrigation; Wyatt v. Irr. Co., 1 Colo. App. 480, 29 Pac. 906; but the mine user is liable to the lower user for injury to the land by debris discharged from the mill; Montana Co. v. Gehring, 75 Fed. 384, 21 C. C. A. 414.

The liability of an irrigation company for failing to supply a certain volume of water to the holders of water rights, according to contract, cannot be determined on the theory that the company is a common carrier; Wyatt v. Irrigation Co., 1 Colo. App. 480, 29 Pac. 906.

Although in the Arid Region the doctrine of appropriation generally prevails, the old common-law doctrine of the reasonable use of water by a riparian owner for irrigation is not entirely abolished in all the jurisdictions. In some states the common-law doctrine has been entirely abolished, but in others it exists side by side with the doctrine of appropriation, and is applied usually in the case of riparian owners who, making no claim to an appropriation, wish to use some of the waters of a stream for irrigation; Kinney, Irrig. 273.

By statute in many of the arid and semi-arid states the construction of reservoirs is directly encouraged, and the federal government has constructed numerous reservoirs. Early customs required merely the taking of the water and its application to a beneficial use. Early legislation required the posting of an official notice at the point of reversion and the recording of the same with the county clerk. Now a state engineer has general supervision over the waters of the state. No appropriation can be made except under a permit issued by him, and the applicant must file a map. The states are divided into irrigation divisions embracing the entire branch of a given stream. Each division is divided into districts for administrative purposes. They generally embrace some particular tributary of the main stream. The states in the exercise of their police power have assumed the entire control of the distribution. The amount of water to which an appropriator is entitled, and the order in which he shall be served are governed by the courts and the boards. The measurement of water is one of the most complicated subjects, since modern science has not yet satisfactorily solved the problem. From the nature of the business of transporting water many ditch companies have been formed; they rarely have competition, and in order that their rates may not be confiscatory, it is generally provided that they shall be fixed by some governing board to insure reasonableness.

The magnitude of many irrigation enterprises places them beyond the ability of individuals as well as of the average corporation, and this led to the adoption in California in 1887 of what is known as the Wright Act, which has been followed in several of the other states. Its purpose is the organization of irrigation districts; as such it is a public corporation organized for the purpose of constructing and operating improvements that are for the public welfare; its officers are public officials; Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369. By the United States Reclamation Act of June 17, 1902, irrigation was greatly aided; it provided that all money received from the sale of public land in the arid and semi-arid states, except Texas, should be used in the construction of irrigation works.

In developing irrigation projects in connection with which there is a considerable proportion of land in private ownership, it has been found necessary to provide some means of dealing with the private owners as a body; the secretary of the interior has therefore required that the settlers who will ultimately receive water from the projected system shall form an incorporated association. Hence laws have been passed in several of the states providing for the incorporation of water users' associations; Col. Sessions 1905; Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 46, 27 Sup. Ct. 655, 51 L. Ed. 956.

For the rights of priority to take water from natural streams, see Colorado Acts, 1881, and Wyoming Acts, 1891, which have furnished the basis of the two systems generally followed.

See Mills, Irrigation Manual.

On a bill filed by Kansas to restrain Colorado and certain corporations organized under its laws from diverting the waters of the Arkansas river for the irrigation of lands in Colorado, thereby preventing the customary flow of its waters into and through Kansas (to which a demurrer was filed), it was held that it would not be unreasonable to enforce against Colorado its own local rule as to the use of flowing water for irrigation, yet as it did not appear that the detriment to Kansas, while substantial, was so great as to make the appropriation by Colorado an inequitable apportionment between the two states, the bill was dismissed, without prejudice to the right of Kansas to begin new proceedings whenever it shall appear that the substantial interests of Kansas are being injured to the extent of destroying the equitable apportionment of benefits between the two states; Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 46, 27 Sup. Ct. 655, 51 L. Ed. 956.

ISLAND. A piece of land surrounded by water.

When new islands arise in the open sea, they belong to the first occupant; but when they are newly formed so near the shore as to be within the boundary of some state, they belong to that state.

Islands which arise in rivers when in the middle of the stream belong in equal parts to the riparian proprietors. When they arise mostly on one side, they belong to the riparian owners up to the middle of the stream.

The owner in fee of the bed of a river or other submerged land is the owner of any bar, island, or dry land which may be subsequently formed thereon; St. Louis v. Rutz, 138 U. S. 226, 11 Sup. Ct. 337, 34 L. Ed. 941.

Where an island springs up in a navigable river, and by accretion to the shores of the island and the mainland, they are united, the owner of the mainland is not entitled to the island, but only to such accretion as formed on his land; Cooley v. Golden, 117 Mo. 33, 23 S. W. 100, 21 L. R. A. 300.

If an island springs up in a navigable stream it belongs to the sovereign, and not to the owner of the land on either of the banks of the stream: Glassell v. Hansen, 135 Cal. 547, 67 Pac. 964; if there be an accretion to plaintiff's land which gradually extends to the island, the owner of the land would acquire the island with the accretions; id. A mussel bed over which the water flows at every tide is not an island, but should be denominated flats; King v. Young, 76 Me. 76, 49 Am. Rep. 596. In many states lands totally or partially submerged are made the subject of grant by the sovereign in order that they may be reclaimed for useful purposes.

An island that arises in the bed of a stream usually first presents itself as a sand bar; Cox v. Arnold, 129 Mo. 337, 31 S. W. 592, 50 Am. St. Rep. 450; Glassell v. Hansen, 135 Cal. 547, 67 Pac. 964; Holman v. Hodges, 112 Ia. 714, 84 N. W. 950, 58 L. R. A. 673, 84 Am. St. Rep. 367; a bar, before it will support vegetation of any kind, may become valuable for fishing, hunting, as a shooting park, for the harvest of ice, for pumping sand, etc. If further deposits of alluvion upon it would make it more valuable, the law of accretion should still apply; Fowler v. Wood, 73 Kan. 511, 85 Pac. 763, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 162, 117 Am. St. Rep. 534.

See ACCESSION; ACCRETION; BOUNDARY.

ISSINT (Norm. Fr. thus, so). A term formerly used to introduce a statement that special matter already pleaded amounts to a denial.

In actions founded on deeds, the defendant may, instead of pleading non est factum in the common form, allege any special matter which admits the execution of the writing in question, but which, nevertheless, shows that it is not in law his deed, and may conclude with, "and so it is not his deed;" as, that the writing was delivered to A B as an escrow, to be delivered over on certain conditions, which have not been complied with, "and so it is not his act," or that at the time of making the writing the defendant was a feme covert, "and so it is not her act;" Bac. Abr. Pleas (H 3), (I 2); Gould, Pl. § 64.

An example of this form of plea, which is sometimes called the special general issue, occurs in Bauer v. Roth, 4 Rawle (Pa.) 83.

ISSUABLE. In Practice. Leading or tending to an issue. An issuable plea is one upon which the plaintiff can take issue and proceed to trial.

ISSUABLE TERMS. Hilary and Trinity Terms were so called from the making up of the issues, during those terms, for the assizes, that they might be tried by the judges, who generally went on circuit to try such issues after these two terms. But for town causes all four terms were issuable. 3 Bla. Com. 350; 1 Tidd, Pr. 121. Since the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875 this distinction has become obsolete.

ISSUE. In Realty Law. Descendants. All persons who have descended from a common ancestor. 3 Ves. Ch. 257; 19 id. 547; 1 Roper, Leg. 90.

In a will it may be held to have a more restricted meaning, to carry out the testator's intention; 7 Ves. Ch. 522; 1 Roper, Leg. 90. 2 Wills. Exec. 386, n.; but it has been held that a devise to "issue" means prima facie legitimate issue, and an intention to include illegitimates must appear from the will itself without resort to extrinsic evidence; Flora v. Anderson, 67 Fed. 182. See Bac. Abr. Curtesy (D), Legatee.

If the term be used in the sense of heirs, that is, as comprehending a class to take by inheritance, it is to be interpreted as a term of limitation, and brings the case within the Rule in Shelley's case; and this is the interpretation that prima facie will be given it; Robins v. Quinliven, 79 Pa. 333. It means, prima facie, "heirs of the body"; Stayman v. Paxson, 221 Pa. 446, 70 Atl. 803; but if the context indicate a different intention, it will be sustained as a word of purchase; 2 Wms. R. P. 603. In a deed it is always taken as a word of purchase; Taylor v. Taylor, 63 Pa. 483, 3 Am. Rep. 565; 4 Term R. 299; 2 Ves. Sr. 681; 2 Wms. R. P. 604.

In Pleading. A single, certain, and material point, deduced by the pleadings of the parties, which is affirmed on the one side and denied on the other.

The entry of the pleadings. 1 Chitty, Pl. 630.

Several connected matters of fact may go to make up the point in issue.

An actual issue is one formed in an action brought in the regular manner, for the purpose of trying a question of right between the parties.

A collateral issue is one framed upon some matter not directly in the line of the pleadings; as, for example, upon the identity of one who pleads diversity in bar of execution. 4 Bla. Com. 396.

A common issue is that which is formed upon the plea of non est factum to an action of covenant broken.

This is so called because it denies the deed only, and not the breach, and does not put the whole declaration in issue, and because there is no general issue to this form of action. 1 Chitty, Pl. 482; Gould, Pl. c. 6, pt. 1, § 7.

An issue in fact is one in which the truth of some fact is affirmed or denied.

In general, it consists of a direct affirmative allegation on one side and a direct negative on the other. Co. Litt. 126 a; Bac. Abr. Pleas (G 1); 2 W. Bla. 1312; Simonton v. Winter, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 149, 8 L. Ed. 75. But an affirmative allegation which completely excludes the truth of the preceding may be sufficient; 1 Wils. 6. Thus, the general issue in a writ of right (called the mise) is formed by two affirmatives; the demandant claiming a greater right than the tenant, and the tenant a greater than the demandant. 3 Bla. Com. 195, 305. And in an action of dower the count merely demands the third part of [ ] acres of land, etc., as the dower of the demandant of the endowment of A B, heretofore the husband, etc., and the general issue is that A B was not seised of such estate, etc., and that he could not endow the demandant thereof, etc.; which mode of denial, being argumentative, would not, in general, be allowed. 2 Saund. 329.

A feigned issue is one formed in a fictitious action, under direction of the court, for the purpose of trying before a jury some question of fact.

Such issues are generally ordered by a court of equity, to ascertain the truth of a disputed fact. They are also frequently used in courts of law, by the consent of the parties, to determine some disputed rights without the formality of pleading; and by this practice much time and expense are saved in the decision of a cause; 3 Bla. Com. 452. Suppose, for example, it is desirable to settle a question of the validity of a will in a court of equity.

For this purpose an action is brought, in which the plaintiff by a fiction declares that he laid a wager for a sum of money with the defendant, for example, that a certain paper is the last will and testament of A, then avers it is his will, and therefore demands the money; the defendant admits the wager, but avers that it is not the will of A; and thereupon that issue is joined, which is directed out of chancery, to be tried; and thus the verdict of the jurors at law determines the fact in the court of equity. A feigned issue is also formed for trial by a jury in certain interpleader proceedings; as in proceedings to test the title to goods levied upon by the sheriff and claimed by a third party.

The name is a misnomer, inasmuch as the issue itself is upon a real, material point in question between the parties, and the circumstances only are fictitious. It is a contempt of the court in which the action is brought to bring such an action, except under the direction of some court; 4 Term 402.

A formal issue is one which is framed according to the rules required by law, in an artificial and proper manner.

A general issue is one which denies in direct terms the whole declaration: as, for example, where the defendant pleads nil debet (that he owes the plaintiff nothing), or nul disseisin (no disseisin committed). 3 Greenl. Ev. § 9; Steph. Pl. 220; 3 Bla. Com. 305. See GENERAL ISSUE.

An immaterial issue is one formed on some immaterial matter, which, though found by the verdict, will not determine the merits of the cause, and will leave the court at a loss how to give judgment. 2 Wms. Saund. 319, n. 6. See IMMATERIAL ISSUE.

An informal issue is one which arises when a material allegation is traversed in an improper or inartificial manner. Bac. Abr. Pleas (G 2), (N 5); 2 Wms. Saund. 319 a, n. 7. The defect is cured by verdict, by the statute 32 Hen. VIII. c. 30.

A material issue is one properly formed on some material point which will, when decided, settle the question between the parties.

A special issue is one formed by the defendant's selecting any one substantial point and resting the weight of his cause upon that. It is contrasted with the general issue. Comyns, Dig. Pleader (R 1, 2).

ISSUE ROLL. In English Law. The name of a record which contained an entry of issue as soon as it was found. It was abolished by the rules of Hilary Term, 1834. Moz. & W. Dict.

ISSUES. In English Law. The goods and profits of the lands of a defendant against whom a writ of distringas or distress infinite has been issued, taken by virtue of such writ, are called issues. 3 Bla. Com. 280; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law 351.

ISSUES ON SHERIFFS. Fines and amercements inflicted on sheriffs for neglects and defaults, levied out of the issues and profits of their lands. Toml.

ISTIMRAR. Continuance; perpetuity; especially a farm or lease granted in perpetuity by government or a zemindar (q. v.). Wilson's Gloss. Ind.

ISTIMRARDAR. The holder of a perpetual lease. Moz. & W.

ITA EST (Lat.). So it is.

Among the civilians, when a notary dies, leaving his register, an officer who is authorized to make official copies of his notarial acts writes, instead of the deceased notary's name, which is required when he is living, ita est.

ITA QUOD (Lat.). The name or condition in a submission, which is usually introduced by these words, "so as the award be made of and upon the premises," which, from the first words, is called the ita quod.

When the submission is with an ita quod, the arbitrator must make an award of all matters submitted to him of which he had notice, or the award will be entirely void; Cro. Jac. 200; 2 Vern. Ch. 109; Rolle, Abr. Arbitrament (L, 9).

ITALY. A constitutional monarchy of Europe in which the executive power belongs exclusively to the sovereign. He is irresponsible. He appoints his ministers, who are responsible. The signature of one of them is necessary to the validity of royal decrees. The king shares the legislative power with the parliament, which consists of two chambers, the senate and the chamber of deputies. The senate consists of princes of the blood and an unlimited number of senators over forty years of age who are qualified under twenty-one different categories, for instance, having held high office, attained celebrity in science, literature, etc., and are nominated by the king for life. Their number now exceeds three hundred. It is the highest court of justice in the trial of political offences and the impeachment of ministers. The chamber of deputies consists of five hundred and eight members, who are elected for five years in single-member constituencies by manhood suffrage with certain educational and property tests.

The judiciary system is modeled on that of France (see COURTS OF FRANCE) with Courts of Cassation in five principal cities, twenty appeal court districts, and one hundred and sixty tribunal districts etc. In thirteen principal towns there are Pretóri having exclusive penal jurisdiction. Encycl. Br.

ITEM (Lat.). Also; likewise; in like manner; again; a second time. These are the various meanings of this Latin adverb.

It is used to introduce a new paragraph, or chapter, or division; also to denote a particular in an account. It is used when any article or clause is added to a former, as if there were here a new beginning. Du Cange. Hence the rule that a clause in a will introduced by item shall not influence or be influenced by what precedes or follows, if it be sensible, taken independently; 1 Salk. 239; or if there is no plain intent that it should be taken in connection, in which cases it may be construed conjunctively, in the sense of and, or also, in such a manner as to connect sentences. If, therefore, a testator bequeath a legacy to Peter, payable out of a particular fund or charged upon a particular estate, item a legacy to James, James's legacy as well as Peter's will be a charge upon the same property; 1 Bro. C. C. 482; Cro. Car. 368.

ITER (Lat.). In Civil Law. A way; a right of way belonging as a servitude to an estate in the country (prædium rusticum). The right of way was of three kinds: 1, iter, a right to walk, or ride on horseback, or in a litter; 2, actus, a right to drive a beast or vehicle; 3, via, a full right of way, comprising right to walk or ride, or drive beast or carriage. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 408. Or, as some think, they were distinguished by the width of the objects which could be rightfully carried over the way; e. g. via, 8 feet; actus, 4 feet, etc. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 290; Bracton 232; 4 Bell, H. L. 390.

In Old English Law. A journey, especially a circuit made by a justice in eyre, or itinerant justice, to try causes according to his own mission. Du Cange; Bracton, lib. 3, c. 11; Britton, c. 2; Cowell. See EYRE.

ITINERANT. Wandering; travelling; those who make circuits. See EYRE.

J

JACENS. In abeyance. Toml.

JACENS HÆREDITAS. See HÆREDITAS JACENS.

JACET IN ORE. It lies in the mouth. Fleta, lib. 5, c. 5, § 49.

JACOBUS. A gold coin an inch and three-eighths in diameter, in value about twenty-five shillings, so called from James I., in whose reign it was first coined.

It was also called broad, laurel, and broad-piece. Its value is sometimes put at twenty-four shillings, but Macaulay speaks of a salary of eight thousand Jacobuses as equivalent to ten thousand pounds sterling. Hist. Eng. ch. xv. A cut of this coin showing both sides will be found in the Century Dictionary, sub v. broad.

JACTITATION. Boasting of something which is challenged by another. Moz. & W.

The word is used principally with reference to jactitation of marriage, which title see. In Louisiana, it is the name used as an action for slander of title to land.

Jactitation of right to a seat in a church appears to be the boasting by a man that he has a right or title to a pew or sitting in a church to which he has legally no title.

Jactitation of tithes is the boasting by a man that he is entitled to certain tithes, to which he has legally no title. See Rog. Ecc. L. 482.

JACTITATION OF MARRIAGE. In English Ecclesiastical Law. The untruthful boasting by an individual that he or she has married another, from which it may happen that they will acquire the reputation of being married to each other. 3 Bla. Com. 93. It was held that the boasting must be malicious as well as false; 2 Hagg. 220, 280.

The ecclesiastical courts formerly might in such cases entertain a libel by the party injured, and on proof of the facts enjoin the wrong-doer to perpetual silence, and, as a punishment, make him pay the costs; 3 Bla. Com. 93; 2 Hagg. Cons. 423, 285; 2 Chitty, Pr. 459.

The jurisdiction of such a suit would now be in the Probate, Divorce, and Matrimonial Division, but the remedy is now rarely resorted to, as, in general, since Lord Hardwicke's act (1766), there is sufficient certainty in the forms of legal marriage in England to prevent any one being in ignorance whether he or she is really married or not—a reproach which, however, was often made against the law of Scotland. The Scotch suit of a declarator of putting to silence, which is equivalent to jactitation of marriage, is often resorted to, a notorious instance of its use being that in the Yelverton marriage case; 1 Sc. Sess. Cas. 3d ser. 161.

JACTURA (Lat. jaceo, to throw). A jettison (q. v.).

JACTUS (Lat.). A throwing goods overboard to lighten or save the vessel, in which case the goods so sacrificed are a proper subject for general average. Dig. 14. 2, de lege Rhodia de jactu; 1 Pardessus, Collec. des Lois marit. 104; Kuricke, Inst. Marit. Hanseat. tit. 8; 1 Par. Mar. Law 288.

JACTUS LAPILLI (Lat. the throwing down of a stone). In Civil Law. A method of preventing the acquisition of title by prescription by interrupting the possession. The real owner of land on which another was building, and thereby acquiring title by usucapion (q. v.), could challenge the intrusion and interrupt the prescription by throwing down a stone from the building before witnesses called upon to note the transaction.

JAIL. See GAOL; PRISON.

JAMMUNDLING, JAMUNDILINGI. Freemen who delivered themselves and property to the protection of a more powerful person, in order to avoid military service and other burdens. Spelman, Gloss. Also, a species of serfs among the Germans. Du Cange. The same as commendati.

JANITOR. A person employed to take charge of rooms or buildings, to see that they are kept clean and in order, to lock and unlock them, and generally to care for them. Fagan v. City of New York, 84 N. Y. 352. See FLAT.

Formerly, a door-keeper, Fleta, lib. 2, c. 24.

JAPAN. An empire of Asia, consisting of four islands lying in the Pacific Ocean east of China, Korea, and Siberia. The government is a monarchy administered by an emperor, and what may be termed a cabinet and privy council. The constitution was promulgated in 1889. There is an imperial parliament consisting of two houses.

The house of peers consists of princes and marquises (hereditary); counts, viscounts and barons elected by their respective orders in the maximum ratio of one to every five; men of education or distinguished service nominated by the emperor; and representatives of the highest tax payers, elected one for each election district by their own class. The lower house is elected by the people, partly by incorporated cities, and partly by the forty-three election districts. A general election for the upper house occurs every seven years, and for the lower house every four years. The great council or cabinet consists of ten members, the nine ministers who are heads of departments and the minister president of state who presides over them. These constitute the cabinet.

Between them and the crown is a small body of men known as the "Elder Statesmen," survivors of those who raised Japan to her present high position among nations. There is also a council of a variable number of distinguished men, who debate and advise upon matters referred to them by the crown.

For an extended review of the "Administration of Justice in Japan," see a series of articles by Professor John H. Wigmore, 36 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 437, 491, 571, 628.

JEOFAILE (L. Fr.). I have failed; I am in error.

Certain statutes are called statutes of amendments and jeofailes, because, where a pleader perceives any slip in the form of his proceedings, and acknowledges the error (jeofaile), he is at liberty, by those statutes, to amend it. The amendment, however, is seldom made; but the benefit is attained by the court's overlooking the exception; 3 Bla. Com. 407; 1 Saund. 228, n. 1; Doct. Pl. 297; Dane, Abr. These statutes do not apply to indictments.

JEOPARDY. The situation of a prisoner when a trial jury is sworn and impanelled to try his case upon a valid indictment, and such jury has been charged with his deliverance. State v. McKee, 1 Bail. (S. C.) 655, 21 Am. Dec. 499; Weinzorpflin v. State, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 191; McFadden v. Com., 23 Pa. 12, 62 Am. Dec. 308.

It is the peril in which a prisoner is put when he is regularly charged with a crime before a tribunal properly organized and competent to try him. Com. v. Fitzpatrick, 121 Pa. 109, 15 Atl. 466, 1 L. R. A. 451, 6 Am. St. Rep. 757.

This is the sense in which the term is used in the United States constitution: "no person . . . shall be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb," U. S. Const. art. V. Amend., and in the statutes or constitutions of most if not all of the states.

As commonly used it must be distinguished from former acquittal and former conviction. Obviously it includes the rules governed by those two terms, but there may be a former jeopardy without a previous acquittal or conviction, and this was intended by the court in Com. v. Fitzpatrick, 121 Pa. 109, 15 Atl. 466, 1 L. R. A. 451, 6 Am. St. Rep. 757, where it was said: "The plea of former jeopardy stands on narrower, more technical, and less substantial grounds. It alleges only that there might have been a conviction or acquittal if the judge trying the case had not made a mistake of law, which prevented a verdict." It might be said that former jeopardy is the genus. See 10 Va. L. Reg. 410, and note.

This provision in the constitution of the United States binds only the United States; Fox v. Ohio, 5 How. (U. S.) 410, 12 L. Ed. 213; State v. Shirer, 20 S. C. 392; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 981. At one time it was not uniformly so considered, and it was held contra, Com. v. Purchase, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 521, 13 Am. Dec. 452; People v. Goodwin, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 187, 9 Am. Dec. 203; State v. Moor, Walker (Miss.) 134, 12 Am. Dec. 541. This was the same fluctuation of judicial opinion as to the effect of the early constitutional amendments which affected other questions. See EMINENT DOMAIN. In this country this rule depends in most cases on constitutional provisions. In England it is said to be one of the universal maxims of the common law; 4 Bla. Com. 335; and Stephen in repeating the expression adds in a note that although Blackstone uses the term "jeopardy of his life," it is not confined to capital offences, and extends to misdemeanors; 4 Steph. Com. 384; 3 B. & C. 502. In a leading case where the question was considered whether the rule applied when a jury had been discharged for want of agreement it was held that the court had authority in its discretion to discharge the jury in such a case, and that such action did not operate as an acquittal. This is also the prevailing opinion in this country. See infra. In the English case referred to, it was said by Cockburn, C. J., that in considering the question of the right to discharge a jury in such case they were not dealing with one of those principles which lie at the foundation of the law, but with a matter of practice, which has fluctuated at various times, and "even at the present day may perhaps be considered as not finally settled;" L. R. 1 Q. B. 289. This would seem to be a more reasonable construction of the language of Lord Cockburn than that sometimes put upon it. See 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 982. That which he characterized as a mere matter of practice was not the existence of the doctrine of jeopardy, but whether it was applicable.

The constitutional provision, which refers to "life or limb," properly interpreted, extends only to treason and felonies, but it has usually been extended to misdemeanors; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 990; McCauley v. State, 26 Ala. 135; but not to proceedings for the recovery of penalties, nor to applications for sureties of the peace; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 990.

A person is in legal jeopardy when he is put upon trial, before a court of competent jurisdiction, upon indictment or information which is sufficient in form and substance to sustain a conviction, and a jury has been charged with his deliverance; Cooley, Const. Lim., 4th ed. 404; approved in O'Brian v. Com., 9 Bush (Ky.) 333, 15 Am. Rep. 715; Ex parte Fenton, 77 Cal. 183, 19 Pac. 267.

The discharge of a competent jury before rendering verdict without defendant's consent, express or implied, or without sufficient cause, operates as an acquittal; Ex parte Ulrich, 42 Fed. 587; People v. Warden of City Prison, 202 N. Y. 188, 95 N. E. 729; Com.

v. Hart, 149 Mass. 7, 20 N. E. 310; Com. v. Fitzpatrick, 121 Pa. 109, 15 Atl. 466, 1 L. R. A. 451, 6 Am. St. Rep. 757; State v. Kinghorn, 56 Wash. 131, 105 Pac. 234, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 136; People v. Taylor, 117 Mich. 583, 76 N. W. 158; Jones v. State, 97 Ala. 77, 12 South. 274, 38 Am. St. Rep. 150; State v. Frisbie, 8 Okl. Cr. 406, 127 Pac. 1091.

The serious illness or insanity of the defendant, the illness, insanity, or death of the judge or a juror, engaged in the trial, the death of a juror's mother, misconduct of a juror, and upon judicial inquiry a finding that a juror is prejudiced, have been held to create a sufficient cause for the withdrawal of a juror and a postponement; State v. Richardson, 47 S. C. 166, 25 S. E. 220, 35 L. R. A. 238; Fails v. State, 60 Fla. 8, 53 South. 612, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1146; State v. Hansford, 76 Kan. 678, 92 Pac. 551, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 548; People v. Sharp, 163 Mich. 79, 127 N. W. 758; Hedger v. State, 144 Wis. 279, 128 N. W. 80.

The absence of a witness for the state is not sufficient, unless by consent of the accused, and his consent is not established by the mere fact that, being without counsel, he does not object to a postponement; State v. Richardson, 47 S. C. 166, 25 S. E. 220, 35 L. R. A. 238; nor does a prisoner's failure to object to the discharge of the jury operate as a consent to it; Ex parte Glenn, 111 Fed. 257; but where no express consent was given and the accused allowed a new trial and made no objection to the discharge until after verdict therein, he will be considered as consenting and plea of former jeopardy is bad; Morgan v. State, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 475. A jury may be discharged from rendering a verdict whenever the court is of the opinion that there is a manifest necessity for the act, or that the needs of public justice would otherwise be defeated, or is satisfied that the jurors are unable to reach an agreement, and the same will be no bar to a second trial; Dreyer v. Illinois, 187 U. S. 71, 23 Sup. Ct. 28, 47 L. Ed. 79; State v. Whitson, 111 N. C. 695, 16 S. E. 332; Com. v. Cody, 165 Mass. 133, 42 N. E. 575; State v. Barnes, 54 Wash. 493, 103 Pac. 792, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 932; People v. Horn, 70 Cal. 17, 11 Pac. 470; there are statutory provisions to the same effect: N. Y. Code Cr. Pr. § 430; Ala. Acts 1907, § 7314; Kan. Cr. Code § 208; Ohio R. S. § 7313; and Idaho R. S. § 7905.

Trial of the accused with his consent by a jury of more or less members than is legally required amounts to a nullity and on a new trial the plea of former jeopardy is bad; Cancemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 129; State v. Hudkins, 35 W. Va. 250, 13 S. E. 367.

Where, by statute, the state, with the permission of the presiding judge, is allowed an appeal it may take the same after a verdict of acquittal, upon the ground that it is a matter of procedure and that jeopardy has not yet attached; State v. Lee, 65 Conn. 265, 30 Atl. 1110, 27 L. R. A. 498, 48 Am. St. Rep. 202.

The discharge of a competent jury without defendant's consent, express or implied, without sufficient cause, operates as an acquittal; People v. Gardner, 62 Mich. 307, 29 N. W. 19; People v. Curtis, 76 Cal. 57, 17 Pac. 941; Gunter v. State, 83 Ala. 96, 3 South. 600.

But where the indictment was good and the judgment erroneously arrested, the verdict was held to be a bar; State v. Norvell, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 24, 24 Am. Dec. 458.

After a jury has been impanelled and sworn in a criminal case, the trial cannot stop short of a verdict without the defendant's consent except for imperative reasons, such as the illness of a juror, the judge, or the defendant, the absence of a juror, or a disagreement. The absence of a witness for the state is not sufficient unless by consent of the accused, and his consent is not established by the mere fact that, being without counsel, he does not object to a postponement; State v. Richardson, 47 S. C. 166, 25 S. E. 220, 35 L. R. A. 238. The discharge of a jury on the last day of the term after they have for five days failed to agree upon a verdict, made against the objection of the defendant, bars another trial for the same offence; Com. v. Fitzpatrick, 121 Pa. 109, 15 Atl. 466, 1 L. R. A. 451, 6 Am. St. Rep. 757; contra, State v. Whitson, 111 N. C. 695, 16 S. E. 332; Ex parte Brown, 102 Ala. 179, 15 South. 602.

Where one of the jurors is discharged because of the death of his mother, and the court declared a mistrial, a plea of former jeopardy is not good; Stocks v. State, 91 Ga. 831, 18 S. E. 847.

An order of an examining magistrate, either committing or discharging the accused, is not a bar to a second hearing on the same charge; Ex parte Robinson, 108 Ala. 161, 18 South. 729.

Where a jury in a criminal case is discharged during the trial and the defendant subsequently put on trial before another jury, he is not twice put in jeopardy within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the United States Constitution; Simmons v. U. S., 142 U. S. 148, 12 Sup. Ct. 171, 35 L. Ed. 968; and in a later case it is said that a jury may be discharged from giving any verdict, whenever the court is of opinion that there is a manifest necessity for the act, or that the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated, and may also order a trial before another jury, and a defendant is not thereby twice put in jeopardy; Thompson v. U. S., 155 U. S. 271, 15 Sup. Ct. 73, 39 L. Ed. 146. This case is quite in accord with an English decision made upon much consideration; L. R. 1 Q. B. 289; and Bishop, as the result of a very extended examination and citation of authorities, concludes: "But in England and Ireland, at present, and in most of our states, when a reasonable time for discussion and reflection has been given the jury, and they have in open court declared themselves unable to agree, and the judge is satisfied of the truth of the declaration, they may be discharged and the prisoner held to be tried anew. And this doctrine is applied as well in felony as in misdemeanor." Bish. Cr. L. § 1033. See JURY.

It has been held that the accused was not in jeopardy, and may be again put upon trial, if the court had no jurisdiction of the cause; People v. Tyler, 7 Mich. 161, 74 Am. Dec. 703; or one of its members is related to the prisoner and under a statute the conviction is void; People v. Connor, 142 N. Y. 130, 36 N. E. 807; or if the indictment was so defective that no valid judgment could be rendered upon it; Black v. State, 36 Ga. 447, 91 Am. Dec. 772; Shoener v. Pennsylvania, 207 U. S. 188, 28 Sup. Ct. 110, 52 L. Ed. 163, affirming Com. v. Shoener, 216 Pa. 71, 64 Atl. 890; Com. v. Bakeman, 105 Mass. 53; or if by any overruling necessity the jury are discharged without a verdict; U. S. v. Perez, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 579, 6 L. Ed. 165; State v. Hansford, 76 Kan. 678, 92 Pac. 551, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 548; State v. Wiseman, 68 N. C. 203; or if the term of the court comes to an end before the trial is finished; Wright v. State, 5 Ind. 290, 61 Am. Dec. 90; or the jury are discharged with the consent of the defendant, express or implied; Com. v. Stowell, 9 Metc. (Mass.) 572; or where the jury has been discharged, upon ascertainment that a prejudice exists within that body; In re Ascher, 130 Mich. 540, 90 N. W. 418, 57 L. R. A. 806; Com. v. McCormick, 130 Mass. 61, 39 Am. Dec. 423; or if after verdict against the accused it has been set aside on his motion for a new trial or on writ of error, or the judgment thereon has been arrested; People v. Casborus, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 351; State v. McCord, 8 Kan. 232, 12 Am. Rep. 469, n.; Territory v. Hart, 7 Mont. 489, 17 Pac. 718; Gannon v. People, 127 Ill. 507, 21 N. E. 525, 11 Am. St. Rep. 147; State v. Brecht, 41 Minn. 50, 42 N. W. 602; State v. Whitson, 111 N. C. 695, 16 S. E. 332; People v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 260, 30 Pac. 814; Lovett v. State, 33 Fla. 389, 14 South, 837, n.; or where there is any irregularity of verdict which will compel a reversal upon the application of the accused; Gunter v. State, 83 Ala. 96, 3 South. 600; People v. Carty, 77 Cal. 213, 19 Pac. 490; or where there was a variance and the verdict was set aside; Leath v. Com., 32 Gratt. (Va.) 876.

See Cooley, Const. Lim., 4th ed. 404; Von Holst, Const. L. 260; Story, Const. § 1787.

Where a prisoner during his trial fled the jurisdiction, and the jury was discharged, he was never in jeopardy; People v. Higgins, 59 Cal. 357.

If the judgment of conviction be reversed on the prisoner's own appeal, it is not a bar; U. S. v. Ball, 163 U. S. 662, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1192, 41 L. Ed. 300. The constitutional provision was never intended to, and properly construed does not, cover the case of a judgment which has been annulled at the request of the accused; Trono v. U. S., 199 U. S. 521, 26 Sup. Ct. 121, 50 L. Ed. 292, 4 Ann. Cas. 773; In re Somers, 31 Nev. 531, 103 Pac. 1073, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 504, 135 Am. St. Rep. 700; Waller v. State, 104 Ga. 505, 30 S. E. 835; State v. Billings, 140 Mo. 205, 41 S. W. 778; Com. v. Murphy, 174 Mass. 369, 54 N. E. 860, 48 L. R. A. 393, 75 Am. St. Rep. 353.

The constitutional guaranty is against two trials for the same offence, and the decisions as to what constitutes identity of the offences are not uniform. They are collected in 1 N. Cr. L. § 1048, by Bishop, who lays down the following rules as sustained by just principle: "They are not the same when (1) the two indictments are so diverse as to preclude the same evidence from maintaining both; or when (2) the evidence to the first and that to the second relate to different transactions, whatever be the words of the respective allegations; or when (3) each indictment sets out an offence differing in all its elements from that in the other, though both relate to one transaction,—a proposition of which the exact limits are difficult to define; or when (4) some technical variance precludes a conviction on the first indictment, but does not appear on the second. On the other side, (5) the offences are the same whenever evidence adequate to the one indictment will equally sustain the other. Moreover, (6) if the two indictments set out like offences and relate to one transaction, yet if one contain more of criminal charge than the other, but upon it there could be a conviction for what was embraced in the other, the offences, though of different names, are, within our constitutional guaranty, the same." The author considers the test to be, "whether if what is set out in the second indictment had been proved under the first, there could have been a conviction; when there could, the second cannot be maintained; when there could not, it can be;" id. § 1052.

Where the accused kept a gambling room for a continuous period of time and two indictments were found against him, covering different periods of that time, it was held that a conviction on one indictment was a bar to a prosecution on the other; Cawein v. Com., 110 Ky. 273, 61 S. W. 275; contra, Com. v. Connors, 116 Mass. 35; People v. Sinell, 131 N. Y. 571, 30 N. E. 47.

Where the greater offence includes a lesser one, a verdict on an indictment for the lesser offence only is a bar to a trial on an indictment for the greater offence, and the same principle applies if the jury are out in the first case when the second is called; Com. v. Arner, 149 Pa. 35, 24 Atl. 83.

There is some difference of opinion, however, in the application of this rule in homicide cases. If a prisoner is put on trial for murder and convicted of manslaughter and that verdict is set aside on defendant's application for a new trial or on his appeal, he cannot again be tried for murder; State v. Tweedy, 11 Ia. 350; Barnett v. People, 54 Ill. 325; State v. Dunn, 41 La. Ann. 610, 6 South. 176; Huntington v. Superior Court, 5 Cal. App. 288, 90 Pac. 141. On this principle it has been held that if a prisoner has been indicted for murder, convicted of murder in the second degree, and afterwards granted a new trial on his own motion, he cannot, on the second trial, be convicted of a higher crime than murder in the second degree; State v. Belden, 33 Wis. 121, 14 Am. Rep. 748, n.; State v. Kattlemann, 35 Mo. 105; State v. Helm, 92 Ia. 540, 61 N. W. 246; Golding v. State, 31 Fla. 262, 12 South. 525; Sylvester v. State, 72 Ala. 201 (see People v. Gordon, 99 Cal. 227, 33 Pac. 901); contra, State v Behimer, 20 Ohio St. 572; State v. McCord, 8 Kan. 232, 12 Am. Rep. 469, n; Trono v. U. S., 199 U. S. 521, 26 Sup. Ct. 121, 50 L. Ed. 292, 4 Ann. Cas. 773.

But when a conviction for the lesser crime is reversed upon the voluntary appeal of the accused, he thereby waives the acquittal upon the higher charge and, upon the conviction being set aside, is placed in the same position as if no trial had been had; Trono v. U. S., 199 U. S. 521, 26 Sup. Ct. 121, 50 L. Ed. 292, 4 Ann. Cas. 773; State v. Ash, 68 Wash. 194, 122 Pac. 995, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 611; Com. v. Arnold, 83 Ky. 1, 4 Am. St. Rep. 114; State v. Kessler, 15 Utah 142, 49 Pac. 293, 62 Am. St. Rep. 911; Bohanan v. State, 18 Neb. 57, 24 N. W. 390, 53 Am. Rep. 791; State v. Behimer, 20 Ohio St. 572; State v. Bradley, 67 Vt. 465, 32 Atl. 238; State v. Gillis, 73 S. C. 318, 53 S. E. 487, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 571, 114 Am. St. Rep. 95, 6 Ann. Cas. 993; State v. Matthews, 142 N. C. 621, 55 S. E. 342; In re Somers, 31 Nev. 531, 103 Pac. 1073, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 504, 135 Am. St. Rep. 700. In a number of states there are constitutional or statutory provisions to the same effect: N. Y. Code Cr. Pr. sec. 464; Okla. Stat., 1893; Va. Acts, 1877-8; Kan. Cr. Code, secs. 273, 274; Ga. Civil Code, 1895; Ind. 2 R. S., 1876; Mo. Const., 1875, and possibly others.

The contrary line of decisions is based on the theory that the accused's request for a correction of the verdict is only for so much of it as convicts him of guilt and not for that which acquits him, the waiver being construed to extend to the precise portion as to which relief is sought; Com. v. Deitrick, 221 Pa. 7, 70 Atl. 275; West v. State, 55 Fla. 200, 46 South. 93; Texas, Code of Crim. Pr. 1895.

A conviction of felonious assault at a time when the victim is still alive is no bar to a subsequent prosecution for murder in case he dies; Com. v. Ramunno, 219 Pa. 204, 68 Atl. 184, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 209, 123 Am. St. Rep. 653, 12 Ann. Cas. 818; so in case of assault and battery with intent to kill; Com. v. Ramunno, 219 Pa. 204, 68 Atl. 184, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 209, 123 Am. St. Rep. 653, 12 Ann. Cas. 818; Diaz v. U. S., 223 U. S. 442, 32 Sup. Ct. 250, 56 L. Ed. 500, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1138; Com. v. Roby, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 496.

A distinction has been made in some cases based upon the theory that the two lower grades of homicide do not bear the same relation to the offence charged. Manslaughter is clearly a different crime from that charged, and a conviction of that offence is therefore an acquittal of the graver one. But it has been said that the division of murder into two degrees does not make two offences and the same rule should not apply; People v. Keefer, 65 Cal. 232, 3 Pac. 818; State v. Bradley, 67 Vt. 465, 32 Atl. 238. Indeed the whole theory is that, when the defendant obtains a reversal, the conviction of the lesser crime is an acquittal of the graver one, so that another trial would be within the prohibition against putting the accused twice in jeopardy; State v. Behimer, 20 Ohio St. 572; State v. McCord, 8 Kan. 232, 12 Am. Rep. 469; Veatch v. State, 60 Ind. 291; Com. v. Arnold, 83 Ky. 1, 4 Am. St. Rep. 114; State v. Kring, 11 Mo. App. 92. But it is said that "the weight of authority is that securing a new trial only operates to set aside conviction and not the verdict so far as it operates as an acquittal;" 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 390; State v. Martin, 30 Wis. 216, 11 Am. Rep. 567; Jones v. State, 13 Tex. 168, 62 Am. Dec. 550. If it is an acquittal pro tanto nothing less than constitutional amendment can remove the effect of the general provision as to jeopardy; Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 2 Sup. Ct. 443, 27 L. Ed. 506. In some state constitutions, as those of Arkansas, Colorado, Georgia, and Missouri, the usual declaration securing a person from being put twice in jeopardy is modified by a further provision that if the jury disagree, or if the judgment be arrested after verdict or reversed for error in law, the accused shall not be deemed to have been in jeopardy.

Statutes which provide for a severer punishment when a criminal is convicted of a second or third offence are not in violation of the constitutional provision that no one shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence. The doctrine is that the subsequent punishment is not imposed for the first offence, but for persistence in crime; In re Ross, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 165; Sturtevant v. Com., 158 Mass. 598, 33 N. E. 648; Kelly v. People, 115 Ill. 583, 4 N. E. 644, 56 Am.

Rep. 184; Ingalls v. State, 48 Wis. 647, 4 N. W. 785; People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 113, 17 Am. Rep. 401; Moore v. Missouri, 159 U. S. 673, 16 Sup. Ct. 179, 40 L. Ed. 301, affirming State v. Moore, 121 Mo. 514, 26 S. W. 345, 42 Am. St. Rep. 542; McDonald v. Massachusetts, 180 U. S. 311, 21 Sup. Ct. 389, 45 L. Ed. 542; People v. Coleman, 145 Cal. 609, 79 Pac. 283; so as to habitual criminals; State v. Le Pitre, 54 Wash. 166, 103 Pac. 27, 18 Ann. Cas. 922. See HABITUAL CRIMINAL.

The question of former jeopardy cannot be passed upon by the supreme court on habeas corpus proceedings, but is a proper plea in bar, to be tried by the lower court; Steiner v. Nerton, 6 Wash. 23, 32 Pac. 1063.

Whether an offence is one against the laws of the state or against the United States, and whether the same act may be an offence against both, punishable by each, without infringing upon the constitutional guaranty against being twice put in jeopardy for the same offence, are questions which a state court of original jurisdiction is competent to decide in the first instance, and the proper time to invoke the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States is after the highest state court has passed upon the question adversely to the accused; New York v. Eno, 155 U. S. 89, 15 Sup. Ct. 30, 39 L. Ed. 80.

One acquitted by a military court of competent jurisdiction of the crime of homicide as defined by the penal code of the Philippine Islands cannot be tried a second time in a civil court of those islands for the same offence; Grafton v. U. S., 206 U. S. 333, 27 Sup. Ct. 749, 51 L. Ed. 1084, 11 Ann. Cas. 640.

Where two distinct offences grew out of the same transaction, a person is not twice in jeopardy by a sentence of an army court-martial imposing both fine and imprisonment, even if the penalty is fine or imprisonment in the alternative; Carter v. McClaughry, 183 U. S. 365, 22 Sup. Ct. 181, 46 L. Ed. 236.

See NON BIS IN IDEM; AUTREFOIS ACQUIT; JURY.

The word is used in the act establishing and regulating the post office department (3 Story Laws 1992) in the sense of peril, danger; see U. S. v. Wilson, Baldwin 93, Fed. Cas. No. 16,730.

JERGUER. In English Law. An officer of the custom-house, who oversees the waiters. Techn. Dict.

JET. In French Law. Jettison (q. v.).

JETTISON, JETSAM. The casting out of a vessel, from necessity, a part of the lading. The thing so cast out.

It differs from flotsam in this, that in the latter the goods float, while in the former they sink, and remain under water. It differs also from ligan.

The jettison must be made for sufficient cause, and not for groundless timidity; Brauer v. Campania Navigacion La Flecha, 66 Fed. 776, 14 C. C. A. 88; The Hugo, 57 Fed. 403. It must be made in a case of extremity, when the ship is in danger of perishing by the fury of a storm, or is laboring upon rocks or shallows, or is closely pursued by pirates or enemies.

If the residue of the cargo be saved by such sacrifice, the property saved is bound to pay a proportion of the loss. In ascertaining such average loss, the goods lost and saved are both to be valued at the price they would have brought at the place of delivery on the ship's arrival there, freight, duties, and other charges being deducted; Marsh. Ins. 246; 3 Kent 185; Park. Ins. 123; Pothier, Charte-partie, n. 108; Boulay-Paty, Dr. Com. tit. 13; Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 734; The Nimrod, 1 Ware 9, Fed. Cas. No. 10,267. The owner of a cargo jettisoned has a maritime lien on the vessel for the contributory share from the vessel on an adjustment of the average, which may be enforced by a proceeding in venue in the admiralty; Dupont de Nemours & Co. v. Vance, 19 How. (U. S.) 162, 15 L. Ed. 584; 2 Pars. Marit. Law, 373. See Abbott; Kay, Shipping; AVERAGE; ADJUSTMENT; DERELICT.

JEU DE BOURSE. In French Law. A kind of gambling or speculation, which consists of sales and purchases which bind neither of the parties to deliver the things which are the object of the sale, and which are settled by paying the difference in the value of the things sold between the day of the sale and that appointed for delivery of such things. 1 Pardessus, Droit Com. n. 162.

JEWEL. A precious stone; a gem; a personal ornament, consisting more or less of precious stones. An ornament intended to be worn on the person.

The precise meaning of the word was discussed by Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Stephens, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 370. He said: "The question is whether plain gold earrings and knobs, without any precious stone, pearl, or other gem set in them, constitute jewelry." "Jewelry is not found in any English dictionary, and is probably an Americanism. It is defined in Webster to be jewels in general. He defines 'jewel' to be 'an ornament worn by ladies,' 'a pendant in the ear.' It is manifest, however, that these are put by way of instances, and not intended as strict definitions. The term 'bijou,' which seems to be nearly analogous to it in the French language, is defined to be 'a little work of ornament, valuable (précieux) for its workmanship or by its material. Cette femme a des beaux bijoux.' Dict. de l'Acad. The counsel on both sides cited passages of Scripture to show, on the one side, that the translators of the common version included ornaments of gold under the name of jewels, and on the other, to show that by a distinct enumeration they excluded them. These instances do little more than show that, though the argument founded on them is at first view plausible, it would be entirely unsafe to rely upon it as a ground of legal construction. Nor can much more reliance be placed upon lexicographers; they are necessarily confined, in a considerable degree, to generalities, and cannot ordinarily go into minute and very accurate distinctions. On the best consideration we have been able to give the subject, we are satisfied that the legislature, in the use of the word 'jewelry,' intended to employ it as a generic term, of the largest import, including all articles under the genus. Without attempting to define the term used in the statute, we are all of opinion that earrings and ear-knobs are included under the term jewelry, as it was used in the statute."

The meaning of the word is most frequently drawn into question in cases involving the construction of statutes limiting the liability of innkeepers for money, jewelry, or valuables not deposited in the safe. In such a case it was said, "The watch, and pen and pencil case are certainly valuables, and perhaps might be called jewels, but I think should be considered a part of the traveller's personal clothing or apparel. Gile v. Libby, 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 70; Ramaley v. Leland, 43 N. Y. 539, 3 Am. Rep. 728; Bernstein v. Sweeny, 33 N. Y. Super. Ct. 271; but under a similar statute specifying money, jewelry, and articles of gold and silver manufacture, a gold watch was held to be included as an article of gold manufacture; Stewart v. Parsons, 24 Wis. 241.

The meaning of the word is also frequently involved in cases arising under the tariff laws, which usually contain also the term "imitation jewelry." In such a case Lacombe, J., said: "The word jewelry is generally used as including articles of personal adornment, and the word further imports that the articles are of value in the community where they are used. . . . The articles of value used for personal adornment in our civilization are, and for centuries have been, the precious metals gold and silver, to which, I think, platina is now generally added, and what are known as the precious stones, the diamond, sapphire, ruby, etc." "There is such a thing as imitation jewelry. . . . If by a pleasing combination of appropriate materials, by an attractive arrangement of parts, an article is produced bearing a general resemblance to real jewelry ornaments, and suitable for similar uses, it may fairly be called imitation jewelry." Robbins v. Robertson, 33 Fed. 709.

Where a jeweller claimed an exemption as tools of a debtor, of those which he himself worked with on watches as well as of those which his apprentice worked with on jewelry, and it being found by the jury that the principal business was that of jeweller, both were held to be exempt. The court said that the circumstance that he was also engaged in the business of repairing watches did not make him a watchmaker in distinction to a jeweller; . . . "this is rather part of the employment of a jeweller, as exercised in this country, than a distinct and separate occupation by himself." Howard v. Williams, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 80.

Family jewels constitute one of the kinds of personal property for the unlawful detention of which the remedy at law is considered inadequate and equitable relief is sustained; Ad. Eq., 8th ed. 91.

They are also included in paraphernalia, and "even the jewels of a peeress have been held such;" 2 Bla. Com. 436.

Jewels of the wife, though given by her husband's will to her for life, were decreed to her absolutely, as her paraphernalia (q. v.), as against creditors who sought to have them sold to pay debts charged on real estate in aid of the testator's personal estate; 1 Bro. C. C. *576.

JEWS. The name given to the descendants of the patriarch Abraham.

The Jews were exceedingly oppressed during the middle ages throughout Christendom. In France, a Jew was a serf, and his person and goods belonged to the baron on whose demesnes he lived. He could not change his domicile without permission of the baron, who could pursue him as a fugitive even on the domains of the king. Like an article of commerce, he might be lent or hired for a time, or mortgaged. If he became a Christian, his conversion was considered a larceny of the lord, and his property and goods were confiscated. They were allowed to utter their prayers only in a low voice and without chanting. They were not allowed to appear in public without some badge or mark of distinction. Christians were forbidden to employ Jews of either sex as domestics, physicians, or surgeons. Admission to the bar was forbidden to Jews. They were obliged to appear in court in person when they demanded justice for a wrong done them; and it was deemed disgraceful to an advocate to undertake the cause of a Jew. If a Jew appeared in court against a Christian, he was obliged to swear by the ten names of God and invoke a thousand imprecations against himself if he spoke not the truth. Sexual intercourse between a Christian man and a Jewess was deemed a crime against nature, and was punishable with death by burning. Quia est rem habere cum cane, rem habere a Christiano cum Judæa quæ CANIS reputatur; sic comburi debet; 1 Fournel, Hist. des Avocats, 108, 110. See Merlin, Répert. Juifs.

Under the Roman law the Jews were the subject of severe restrictive laws and were classed in the enactments of the Christian emperors with apostates, heretics, and heathens; Mack. Rom. L. § 152. Marriage with them was forbidden; id. § 555; and a Jew could not be the tutor of a Christian; id. § 616.

In the fifth book of the Decretals it is provided that if a Jew have a servant that desireth to be a Christian, the Jew shall be compelled to sell him to a Christian for twelve-pence; that it shall not be lawful for them to take any Christian to be their servant; that they may repair their old synagogues, but not build new; that it shall not be lawful for them to open their doors or windows on Good Friday; that their wives shall neither have Christian nurses, nor themselves be nurses to Christian women; that they wear different apparel from the Christians, whereby they may be known, etc. See Ridley's View of the Civ. and Eccl. Law, part 1, chap. 5, sect. 7; Madox, Hist. of Exch.

In England, the Jew could have nothing that was his own, for whatever he acquired he acquired not for himself but for the king; Bract. f. 386 b. For about a century and a half they were important elements in English history, as their greatest privilege was to be allowed to do things that were forbidden to Christians, notably, to take interest on money. This money-lending business required some governmental regulation, the king having a deep interest in it, for what was potentially owed to the Jew was owed to the king, and this matter could hardly be left to the English tribunals as they would do but scant justice to the Jew, and therefore but scant justice to the king who stood behind the Jew. In 1194, an edict was issued about the Jewish loans. In every town in which the Jews lived an office was established for the registration of their deeds. All loans and payments of loans were to be made under the eye of certain officers, some of them Christians, some of them Jews, and a copy or part of every deed was to be deposited in an ark or chest under official custody. A few years later a department of the royal exchequer—the exchequer of the Jews—was organized for the supervision of this business. At its head were a few "Justices of the Jews." This exchequer was, like the great exchequer, both a financial bureau and a judicial tribunal. It managed all the king's transactions—and there were many—with the Jews, saw to the exaction of tallages, reliefs, escheats, and forfeitures, and also acted judicially, not merely as between king and Jew, but also as between king and gentile, when, as often happened, the king had for some cause or another seized into his hand the debts due to one of his Jews by Christian debtors. Also it heard and determined all manner of disputes between Jew and Christian. 1 Pol. & M. 451.

This system could not work well; it oppressed both Jew and Englishman, and from the middle of the thirteenth century the king was compelled to rob them of their privileges, to forbid them to hold lands, and some efforts were made to induce them to give up their profession of usury, as was also done in France and elsewhere during the same period, but the fact is, that they were so heavily taxed by the sovereigns or governments of Christendom, and at the same time debarred from almost every other trade or occupation—partly by special decrees, partly by the vulgar prejudice—that they could not afford to prosecute ordinary vocations. In 1253 the Jews—no longer able to withstand the constant hardships to which they were subjected in person and property—begged of their own accord to be allowed to leave the country. Richard of Cornwall, however, persuaded them to stay. Ultimately, in 1290 A. D., they were driven from the shores of England, pursued by the execrations of the infuriated rabble, and leaving in the hands of the king all their property, debts, obligations, and mortgages, they emigrated for the most part to France and Germany.

Practically, the only disabilities to which Jews are now subject in England are, incompetence to fill certain high offices in the state (e. g. that of lord chancellor, lord chancellor of Ireland, lord lieutenant of Ireland, any office in the ecclesiastical court, or any position at the universities, colleges or schools), and inability to present to an ecclesiastical benefice attached to an office in her majesty's gift. 3 Steph. Com. 83. The present Chief Justice of England is a Jew.

JOB. The whole of a thing which is to be done. In this sense it is employed in the Civil Code of Louisiana, art. 2727: "To build by plot, or to work by the job," says that article, "is to undertake a building for a certain stipulated price." See Duranton, du Contr. de Louage, liv. 3, t. 8, nn. 248, 263; Pothier, Contr. de Louage, nn. 392, 394. See DEVIATION.

JOBBER. In Commercial Law. One who buys and sells articles in bulk and resells them to dealers. Stock-jobbers are those who buy and sell stocks for others. This term is also applied to those who speculate in stocks on their own account.

JOCALIA (Lat.). Jewels (q. v.). This term was formerly more properly applied to those ornaments which women, although married, call their own. When these jocalia are not suitable to her degree, they are assets for the payment of debts; 1 Rolle, Abr. 911.

JOCKEY CLUB. An association of persons for the purpose of regulating all matters connected with horse racing.

Such a club is a private and not a quasi-public corporation, and may refuse to allow certain persons to enter horses for its races; Corrigan v. Jockey Club, 2 Misc. 512, 22 N. Y. Supp. 394. A grant by the state to such a corporation to make and register bets and sell pools on the result of its races is not a grant of state aid, but is merely a removal of the statutory prohibition against the exercise of a right existing at common law; id.

JOHN DOE. A fictitious name frequently used to indicate a person for the purpose of argument or illustration, or in the course of enforcing a fiction in the law. See BILL OF MIDDLESEX; RICHARD ROE.

JOINDER. In Pleading. Union; concurrence.

Of Actions. IN CIVIL CASES. The union of two or more causes of action in the same declaration.

At common law, to allow a joinder, the form of actions must be such that the same plea may be pleaded and the same judgment given on all the counts of the declaration, or, the counts being of the same nature, that the same judgment may be given on all; 2 Saund. 177 c; Com. Dig. Actions (G); Secor v. Sturgis, 16 N. Y. 548; Lamphier v. R. Co., 33 N. H. 495. And all the causes of action must have accrued to the plaintiff or against the defendant; Coussy v. Vivant, 12 La. Ann. 44; in the same right, though it may have been by different titles. Thus, a plaintiff cannot join a demand in his own right to one as representative of another person, or against the defendant himself to one against him in a representative capacity; 2 Viner, Abr. 62; Bacon, Abr. Action in General (C); Lucas v. R. Co., 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 245; Whitney v. Fairbanks, 54 Fed. 985. Nor can a cause of action in tort and in contract be joined; Hannahs v. Hammond, 10 N. Y. Supp. 883; nor a tort with a claim for money had and received; Teem v. Town of Ellijay, 89 Ga. 154, 15 S. E. 33.

In real actions there can be but one count.

In mixed actions joinder occurs, though but infrequently; 8 Co. 876; Cro. Eliz. 290.

In personal actions joinder is frequent.

By statutes, in many of the states, joinder of actions is allowed and required to a greater extent than at common law.

IN CRIMINAL CASES. Different offences of the same general nature may be joined in the same indictment; Johnson v. State, 29 Ala. 62, 65 Am. Dec. 383; Sarah v. State, 28 Miss. 267, 61 Am. Dec. 544; Bailey v. State, 4 Ohio St. 440; U. S. v. O'Callahan, 6 McLean 596, Fed. Cas. No. 15,910; People v. Hulbut, 4 Denio (N. Y.) 133, 47 Am. Dec. 244; Baker v. State, 4 Ark. 56; Benson v. Com., 158 Mass. 164, 33 N. E. 384; Burrell v State, 25 Neb. 581, 41 N. W. 399; and it is no cause of arrest of judgment that they have been so joined; 29 E. L. & Eq. 536; State v. Fowler, 28 N. H. 184; Stephen v. State, 11 Ga. 225; U. S. v. Stetson, 3 W. & M. 164, Fed. Cas. No. 16,390; but not in the same count; Kenney v. State, 5 R. I. 385; State v. Bridges, 24 Mo. 353; Greenlow v State, 4 Humphr. (Tenn.) 25; see 9 L. R. A. 182, note; and an indictment may be quashed, in the discretion of the court, where the counts are joined in such manner as will confound the evidence; State v. Jackson, 17 Mo. 544, 59 Am. Dec. 281.

No court, it is said, will, however, permit a prisoner to be tried upon one indictment for two distinct and separate crimes; Steph. Cr. Proc. 154; State v. Fowler, 28 N. H. 184. See Withers v. Com., 5 S. & R. (Pa.) 59; Com. v. Hills, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 530.

Where, out of precaution to meet every aspect of a single offence, an indictment charges distinct crimes, and no attempt is made to convict accused of disconnected offences, the state will not be compelled to elect on which he shall be tried; Butler v. State, 91 Ala. 87, 9 South. 191. Three separate offences, but not more, against the provisions of U. S. R. S. § 5480, prohibiting the use of the mails with intent to defraud, when committed within the same six calendar months, may be joined, and when so joined there is to be a single sentence for all, but this does not prevent other indictments for other offences under the same statute committed within the same six calendar months; In re Henry, 123 U. S. 372, 8 Sup. Ct. 142, 31 L. Ed. 174.

In Demurrer. The answer made to a demurrer. Co. Litt. 71 b. The act of making such answer is merely a matter of form, but must be made within a reasonable time; Thompson v. Goudelock, 10 Rich. (S. C.) 49.

Of Issue. The act by which the parties to a cause arrive at that stage of it in their pleadings, that one asserts a fact to be so, and the other denies it. For example, when one party denies the fact pleaded by his antagonist, who has tendered the issue thus, "And this he prays may be inquired of by the country," or, "and of this he puts himself upon the country," the party denying the fact may immediately subjoin, "And the said A B does the like;" when the issue is said to be joined.

Of Parties. IN CIVIL CASES. IN EQUITY. All parties materially interested in the subject of a suit in equity should be made parties, however numerous; Mitf. Eq. Plead. 144; Mechanics' Bank v. Seton, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 299, 7 L. Ed. 152; Northern Indiana R. Co. v. R. Co., 5 McLean 444, Fed. Cas. No. 10,321; Hussey v. Dole, 24 Me. 20; Crocker v. Higgins, 7 Conn. 342; Oliver v. Palmer, 11 Gill & J. (Md) 426; Vanhorn v. Duckworth, 42 N. C. 261; either as plaintiffs or defendants, so that there may be a complete decree which shall bind them all; Christian v. R. Co., 133 U. S. 233, 10 Sup. Ct. 260, 33 L. Ed. 589; Gregory v. Stetson, 133 U. S. 579, 10 Sup. Ct. 422, 33 L. Ed. 792. But, where the parties are very numerous, and sue in the same right, a portion may in some cases appear for all in the same situation; 16 Ves. 321; New-London Bank v. Lee, 11 Conn. 112, 27 Am. Dec. 713; Dennis v. Kennedy, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 517. See Hills v. Putnam, 152 Mass. 123, 25 N. E. 40.

Mere possible or contingent interest does not render its possessor a necessary party; Kerr v. Watts, 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 550, 5 L. Ed. 328; Townsend v. Auger, 3 Conn. 354; Reid v. Vanderheyden, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 719. Contingent remaindermen are not necessary parties to a suit to set aside the deed creating the remainder; Temple v. Scott, 143 Ill. 290, 32 N. E. 366; nor a residuary legatee to a bill filed by a legatee or creditor to assert a claim against the estate of a testator; Melick v. Melick, 17 N. J. Eq. 156.

There need be no connection but community of interest; Brooks v. Harrison, 2 Ala. 209. It is not indispensable that all the parties to a suit should have an interest in all the matters contained in the suit, but it will be sufficient if each party has an interest in same material matters in the suit, and they are connected with the others; Brown v. Safe Deposit Co., 128 U. S. 403, 9 Sup. Ct. 127, 32 L. Ed. 468.

A court of equity, even after final hearing on the merits and on appeal to the court of last resort, will compel the joinder of necessary parties; O'Fallon v. Clopton, 89 Mo. 284, 1 S. W. 302.

PLAINTIFFS. All persons having a unity of interest in the subject-matter; Alston v. Jones, 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 397; Brooks v. Harrison, 2 Ala. 209; and in the object to be attained; Gartside v. Gartside, 113 Mo. 348, 20 S. W. 669; Bosher v. Land Co., 89 Va. 455, 16 S. E. 360, 37 Am. St. Rep. 879; who are entitled to relief; Wilkins v. Judge, 14

Ala. 135; may join as plaintiffs. The rights claimed must not arise under different contracts; Yeaton v. Lenox, 8 Pet. (U. S.) 123, 8 L. Ed. 889; Finley v. Harrison, 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 154; or be vested in the same person in different capacities; May v. Smith, 45 N. C. 196, 59 Am. Dec. 594. And see Edmeston v. Lyde, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 637, 19 Am. Dec. 454; Ingraham v. Dunnell, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 118. Persons representing antagonistic interests cannot be joined as complainants; Smith v. Smith, 102 Ala. 516, 14 South. 765.

Assignor and assignee. The assignor of a contract for the sale of lands should be joined in a suit by the assignee for specific performance; Voorhees v. De Myer, 3 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 614; and the assignor of part of his interest in a patent in a suit by assignee for violation; Morgan v. Tipton, 3 McLean 350, Fed. Cas. No. 9,809.

But he should not be joined where he has parted with all his legal and beneficial interest; Miller v. Whittier, 32 Me. 203; Moor v. Veazie, 32 Me. 343, 52 Am. Dec. 655; Leacock v. Hall, 13 B. Monr. (Ky.) 210. The assignee of a mere chose in action may sue in his own name, in equity; Barribeau v. Brant, 17 How. (U. S.) 43, 15 L. Ed. 34; Cottrell v. Giltner, 5 Wis. 270.

Corporations. Two or more may join if their interest is joint; 8 Ves. 706. A corporation may join with its individual members to establish an exemption on their behalf; 3 Anstr. 738. Corporations themselves are indispensable parties to a bill which affects their corporate rights or liabilities; Swan Land & Cattle Co. v. Frank, 148 U. S. 603, 13 Sup. Ct. 691, 37 L. Ed. 577.

Husband and wife must join where the husband asserts an interest in behalf of his wife; Schuyler v. Hoyle, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 196; as, for a legacy; Schuyler v. Hoyle, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 196; or for property devised or descended to her during coverture; Griffith v. Coleman, 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 600; or where he applies for an injunction to restrain a suit at law against both, affecting her interest; Green v. Hicks, 1 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 313. Where a widow sues to set aside a deed executed by herself and husband on the ground that it was procured by fraud, the administrator of the husband is not a necessary party; Keenan v. Keenan, 58 Hun 605, 12 N. Y. Supp. 747.

Under modern statutes for the enlargement of the rights and remedies of married women, it is in many cases unnecessary to join the husband in suits to which he was formerly a necessary party. See MARRIED WOMAN.

Idiots and lunatics may be joined or not in bills by their committees, at the election of the committee, to set aside acts done by them whilst under imbecility; Ortley v. Messere, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 139. They must be joined in suits brought for the partition of real estate; Gorham v. Gorham, 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 24. In England it seems to be the custom to join; 2 Vern. 678. See Story, Eq. Pl. § 64; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1336.

Infants. Several may join in the same bill for an account of the rents and profits of their estate; Townshend v. Duncan, 2 Bland. (Md.) 68.

Trustee and cestui que trust should, it is held, join in a bill to recover the trust fund; Jennings' Ex'rs v. Davis, 5 Dana (Ky.) 128; but need not to foreclose a mortgage; Heirs of Pugh v. Currie, 5 Ala. 447; nor to redeem one made by the trustee; Boyden v. Partridge, 2 Gray (Mass.) 190. And see Schenck v. Ellingwood, 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 175; Hitchcock's Heirs v. Bank, 7 Ala. 386.

An appeal may be prosecuted by one party to the record, as against another, without joining other parties who are in no way interested in the controversy; Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. Vane, 80 Fed. 961, 26 C. C. A. 342.

DEFENDANTS. In general, all persons interested in the subject-matter of a suit who cannot be made plaintiffs should be made defendants. They may claim under different rights if they possess an interest centering in the point in issue; Fellows v. Fellows, 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 682, 15 Am. Dec. 412. In order to obtain the rescission of a contract of sale, all of the parties interested in the property involved must be brought before the court; Constant v. Lehman, 52 Kan. 227, 34 Pac. 745.

Bills for discovery need not contain all the parties interested as defendants; Trescot v. Smyth, 1 McCord, Ch. (S. C.) 301; and a person may be joined merely as defendant in such bill; Bank of Mobile v. Huggins, 3 Ala. 214. A person should not be joined as a party to such bill who may be called as a witness on trial; Yates v. Monroe, 13 Ill. 212.

Assignor and assignee. An assignor who retains even the slightest interest in the subject-matter must be made a party; Bruen v. Crane, 2 N. J. Eq. 347; Ward v. Van Bokkelen, 2 Paige (N. Y.) 289; Montague v. Lobdell, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 111; as a covenantee in a suit by a remote assignee; Wickliffe v. Clay, 1 Dana (Ky.) 585; or an assignee in insolvency, who must be made a party; Movan v. Hays, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 339; or the original plaintiff in a creditor's bill by the assignee of a judgment; Cooper v. Gunn, 4 B. Monr. (Ky.) 594.

A fraudulent assignee need not be joined in a bill by a creditor to obtain satisfaction out of a fund so transferred; Edmeston v. Lyde, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 637, 19 Am. Dec. 454. The assignee of a judgment must be a party in a suit to stay proceedings; Mumford v. Sprague, 11 Paige (N. Y.) 438.

Corporations and associations. A corporation charged with a duty should be joined with the trustees it has appointed, in a suit for a breach; Tibballs v. Bidwell, 1 Gray (Mass.) 399; Lawyer v. Cipperly, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 281. Where the legal title is in part of the members of an association, no others need be joined; Martin v. Dryden, 1 Gilm. (Ill.) 187. The directors of a corporation may be included as parties defendant in a bill against the corporation for infringement of a trade-mark; Armstrong v. Soap Works, 53 Fed. 124. But see INFRINGEMENT. When discovery is sought, the officer from whom the information is to be obtained should be made a co-defendant with the corporation; Virginia & A. Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Hale & Co., 93 Ala. 542, 9 South. 256.

Officers and agents may be made parties merely for discovery; Many v. Iron Co., 9 Paige (N. Y.) 188.

See Dicey, Parties; Steph. Pl.; PARTIES; JOINT TORT FEASORS.

As to the effect of Misjoinder and Nonjoinder, and how and when advantage should be taken of either, see those titles.

JOINT. Joined together; united; shared by two or more. The term is used to express a common property interest enjoyed or a common liability incurred by two or more persons; as applied to real estate it involves the idea of survivorship. See JOINT TENANTS; ESTATE IN COMMON.

With respect to the ownership of choses in action, the term implies that the interest and right of action are united so that all the owners must be joined in a suit to enforce the obligation jointly held. See JOINT AND SEVERAL.

A joint liability on choses in action implies that though each person subject to it is liable for the whole, they are all treated in law as together constituting one legal entity and must be sued together or a release to one will operate in favor of all. One who pays the debt is entitled to contribution (q. v.).

JOINT ACTION. An action brought by two or more as plaintiffs or against two or more as defendants. See JOINT AND SEVERAL; ACTIONS; JOINDER.

JOINT ADMINISTRATORS. See ADMINISTRATOR.

JOINT AND SEVERAL. A liability is said to be joint and several when the creditor may sue one or more of the parties to such liability separately, or all of them together at his option. Dicey, Parties 230. Where one is compelled to pay the whole debt or more than his proper share, he is entitled to contribution (q. v.). In case of the death of one his liability remains against his estate; Wms. Pers. Prop. 363. As a general rule all the contracts of partners are said to be joint and several. See PARTNERSHIP.

As to joint and several debtors, Lord Mansfield said in Rice v. Shute, 5 Burr. 2611, that "all contracts with partners were joint and several, and every partner was liable to pay the whole." But it was remarked by Spencer, C. J., that "it would be straining Lord Mansfield's opinion unreasonably to say, that he meant technically that all contracts with partners were joint and several, for, then, the non-joinder of any of the partners never could be pleaded in abatement, which all the court expressly decided. In equity they are joint and several; and so they were as regarded that suit, the defendant having neglected to avail himself of the objection in a legal manner. Surely it cannot be said that in a legal sense, when there are a plurality of debtors, that their contract is joint and several, when they have engaged jointly to pay the debt. Each debtor is bound for the whole, until the debt is paid; but as regards the remedy to coerce payment, there is a material and settled distinction. If they have undertaken severally to pay, separate suits may be brought against each; but when their undertaking is joint, unless they waive the advantage, by not interposing a plea in abatement, they must be sued jointly, if in full life, and neither has been discharged by operation of a bankrupt or insolvent law, or is not liable on the ground of infancy." Robertson v. Smith, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 459, 9 Am. Dec. 227.

A defendant has no right to say that an action shall be several which a plaintiff elects to make joint; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ide, 114 U. S. 52, 5 Sup. Ct. 735, 29 L. Ed. 63. A separate defence may defeat a joint recovery, but it cannot deprive a plaintiff of his right to prosecute his own suit to final determination in his own way; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Thompson, 200 U. S. 206, 26 Sup. Ct. 161, 50 L. Ed. 441, 4 Ann. Cas. 1147.

Where several parties enter into a conspiracy to win the money of a third person by gambling or betting, each member of the conspiracy is jointly and severally liable to the person losing the money, under statutes allowing the recovery of money lost by gambling; Lear v. McMillen, 17 Ohio St. 464; McGrew v. Produce Exchange, 85 Tenn. 572, 4 S. W. 38, 4 Am. St. Rep. 771; Preston v. Hutchinson, 29 Vt. 144; although a partnership cannot, strictly speaking, exist for the conduct of an illegal business; Berns v. Shaw, 65 W. Va. 667, 64 S. E. 930, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 522, n. See JOINT TORTFEASORS.

JOINT AND SEVERAL BOND. A bond of two or more obligors, who bind themselves jointly and severally to the obligees, who can sue all the obligors jointly, or any one of them separately, for the whole amount, but cannot bring a joint action against part,—that is, treat it as joint as to some and several as to others.

JOINT BOND. The bond of two or more obligors, the action to enforce which must be joint against them all.

JOINT COMMITTEE. A committee composed of members of both houses of a legislature. See May, Parl. Pr.

JOINT CONTRACT. One in which the contractors are jointly bound to perform the promise or obligation therein contained, or entitled to receive the benefit of such promise or obligation.

It is a general rule that a joint contract survives, whatever may be the beneficial interests of the parties under it. When a partner, covenantor, or other person entitled, having a joint interest in a contract not running with the land, dies, the right to sue survives in the other partner, etc.; Morris' Lessee v. Vanderen, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 65, 1 L. Ed. 38; Wallace v. Fitzsimmons, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 248, 1 L. Ed. 122; Add. Contr. 9th ed. 239. And when the obligation or promise is to perform something jointly by the obligors or promisors, and one dies, the action must be brought against the survivor; Hamm. Partn. 156.

When all the parties interested in a joint contract die, the action must be brought by the executors or administrators of the last surviving obligee against the executors or administrators of the last surviving obligor; Add. Contr. 239. See CONTRACTS; PARTIES; CO-OBLIGOR.

JOINT DEBTORS. Two or more persons jointly liable for the same debt.

To sustain a suit against joint debtors, a joint and subsisting indebtedness must be shown; Robertson v. Smith, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 459, 9 Am. Dec. 227; and by proceeding to judgment against one or more of joint debtors the debt is merged in the judgment as to all; id.

Payment by one joint debtor who has been discharged in bankruptcy of a sum, less than is due on the joint debt, which the creditor accepts in satisfaction of the whole debt, is held to operate as such in favor of the other debtor; Ex parte Zeigler, 83 S. C. 78, 64 S. E. 513, 916, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1005.

JOINT DEBTORS' ACTS. Statutes enacted in many of the states, which provide that judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and for or against one or more of several defendants, and that, "in an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper." The name is also given to statutes providing that where an action is instituted against two or more defendants upon an alleged joint liability, and some of them are served with process, but jurisdiction is not obtained over the others, the plaintiff may still proceed to trial against those who are before the court, and, if he recovers, may have judgment against all of the defendants whom he shows to be jointly liable. 1 Black, Judg. §§ 208, 235.

JOINT EXECUTORS. Those who are joined in the execution of a will. See EXECUTOR.

JOINT FIAT. A fiat which was formerly issued against two or more trading partners.

JOINT FINE. The fine which might be levied upon a whole vill.

JOINT HEIRS. Co-heirs.

JOINT INDICTMENT. One indictment brought against two or more offenders, charging the defendants jointly. It may be where there is a joint criminal act, without any regard to any particular personal default or defect of either of the defendants: thus, there may be a joint indictment against the joint keepers of a gaming-house; 1 Ventr. 302; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 240.

JOINT LIVES. An expression used to designate the duration of an estate or right, limited or granted to two or more persons, to be enjoyed during the lives of both or all of them.

An annuity to two for their lives is payable until the death of one. Where the survivor is to be benefited, the conveyance or devise is usually expressed to be "to hold their joint lives and the life of the survivor."

JOINT OWNERSHIP. See JOINT.

JOINT RESOLUTION. A resolution adopted by both houses of congress or a legislature. When such a resolution has been approved by the president or passed with his approval, it has the effect of a law. 6 Op. Atty. Gen. 680.

The distinction between a joint resolution and a concurrent resolution of congress, is that the former requires the approval of the president while the latter does not. Rep. Sen. Jud. Com. Jan. 1897.

JOINT STOCK BANKS. In English Law. A species of quasi corporations, or companies regulated by deeds of settlement. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY. An association of individuals for purposes of profit, possessing a common capital contributed by the members composing it, such capital being commonly divided into shares of which each member possesses one or more, and which are transferable by the owner. Shelf. Jt. St. Co. 1.

A quasi partnership, invested by statutes in England and many of the states with some of the privileges of a corporation. See Pennsylvania v. Mining Co., 10 Wall. (U. S.) 556, 19 L. Ed. 998; L. R. 4 Eq. 695.

A partnership whereof the capital is divided, or agreed to be divided, into shares so as to be transferable without the express consent of the co-partners. Pars. Part. § 435.

Such associations are not pure partnerships, for their members are recognized as an aggregate body; nor are they pure corporations, for their members are more or less liable to contribute to the debts of the collective whole. Incorporated companies are intermediate between corporations known to the common law and ordinary corporations and partake of the nature of both. 1 Lindl. Partn., 1st ed. 6.

They are to be distinguished from limited partnerships chiefly in that there is, in a joint stock company, no dilectus personarum, that is, no choice about admitting partners, the shares are transferable without involving a dissolution of the association, the assignee of shares becomes a partner by virtue of the transfer, and the rights and duties of the members are determined by articles of association, or in England by a deed of settlement; 1 Pars. Contr., 8th ed. 144.

Joint stock companies may be formed without regard to the statutes, and the promoters may choose to proceed solely upon their common-law rights and responsibilities; People v. Coleman, 133 N. Y. 279, 31 N. E. 96, 16 L. R. A. 183; Spotswood v. Morris, 12 Idaho 360, 85 Pac. 1094, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 665. They are not illegal; Howe v. Morse, 174 Mass. 491, 55 N. E. 213.

The relation of the stockholders to the company is settled by the articles of agreement. They contribute the capital, select the trustees and are entitled to a distributive share of the profits. They have no power to use the name of the company to interfere with its business, or to bind it in any manner. This power they have voluntarily surrendered to the trustees; In re Oliver's Estate, 136 Pa. 43, 20 Atl. 527, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 421, 20 Am. St. Rep. 894; Spotswood v. Morris, 12 Idaho 360, 85 Pac. 1094, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 665; 2 H. L. Cas. 520.

Generally the number of shares is fixed by the charter, but it is sometimes provided that there shall not be less than a certain number nor more than a certain number. In such cases it is left for the company to determine the number within the limits prescribed; Somerset & K. R. Co. v. Cushing, 45 Me. 524; but where the charter fixes the amount of the capital stock, and provides that it may be increased from time to time at the pleasure of the corporation, the directors have no power to increase the amount of the stock, although the charter provides that all the corporate powers shall be vested in, and exercised by a board of directors, and such officers and agents as such board shall appoint; Chicago City R. Co. v. Allerton, 18 Wall. (U. S.) 233, 21 L. Ed. 902.

In New York joint stock companies have all the attributes of a corporation except the right to have and use a common seal, and an action is properly brought for or against the president as such, and the judgment and execution against him bind the joint property of the association, but do not bind his own property; National Bank of Schuylerville v. Van Derwerker, 74 N. Y. 234; People v. Coleman, 5 N. Y. Supp. 394, 970, affirmed 133 N. Y. 279, 31 N. E. 96, 16 L. R. A. 183; but it has been held that the provisions in the New York statutes are merely local in their operation, and that the members may be sued in other states as partners; Boston & A. R. v. Pearson, 128 Mass. 445; Frost v. Walker, 60 Me. 468.

They may be served with summons in another state in the same manner that corporations are served; Adams Exp. Co. v. State, 55 Ohio St. 69, 44 N. E. 506; and on an issue as to whether an association was a joint stock company or a corporation, its classification by the statutes of New York, where it was created, has been held not conclusive; State v. Exp. Co., 1 Ohio, N. P. 238, 2 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 239. A joint stock company having some of the characteristics of a corporation and some of a partnership, including the right to a common seal, ownership of the property by the association, and the right to sue and be sued in the corporate name, was held to be a citizen of the state which created it, and when sued in another state to be entitled to a removal to the federal court irrespective of the citizenship of its individual members; Bushnell v. Park Bros. & Co., 46 Fed. 209; Maltz v. Express Co., 1 Flip. 611, Fed. Cas. No. 9,002; Fargo v. Ry. Co., 6 Fed. 787, 10 Biss. 273.

A limited partnership association created under statute, although it may be called a quasi corporation, and is declared by statute to be a citizen of the state, is not, like a corporation created under the laws of the state, to be deemed a citizen of that state within the meaning of the clause of the federal constitution which extends the judicial power of the United States to controversies between citizens of different states; Great Southern Fire Proof Hotel Co. v. Jones, 177 U. S. 449, 20 Sup. Ct. 690, 44 L. Ed. 842, reversing Jones v. Hotel Co., 86 Fed. 370, 30 C. C. A. 108.

The effect of the clause of the constitution of Pennsylvania that the term corporations "shall be construed to include all joint stock companies or associations having any of the powers or privileges of corporations, but possessed by individuals or partnerships" was declared to be only to place joint stock companies under the restrictions imposed by that article upon corporations, and not to invest them with corporation attributes; Great Southern Fire Proof Hotel Co. v. Jones, 177 U. S. 449, 20 Sup. Ct. 690, 44 L. Ed. 842. They are properly classified with corporations in a tax measure, such as the federal corporation tax; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U. S. 107, 31 Sup. Ct. 342, 55 L. Ed. 389, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1312; Spreckels Sugar Refining Co. v. McClain, 192 U. S. 397, 24 Sup. Ct. 376, 48 L. Ed. 496.

Such companies, formed to deal in real estate, do not create interests within the rule against perpetuities and do not put illegal restraints upon alienation; Howe v. Morse, 174 Mass. 491, 55 N. E. 213; see 13 Harv. L. R. 516.

At common law they are held not corporations but are to be sued as partners; B. & A. R. Co. v. Pearson, 128 Mass. 445; Lewis v. Tilton, 64 Ia. 220, 19 N. W. 911, 52 Am. Rep. 436. But in states where there are statutory provisions concerning them the indebtedness of joint stock companies will be charged pro rata to the solvent members; Cameron v. Bank (Tex.) 34 S. W. 178. An English joint stock company (in this case a fire insurance company) endowed by its deed of settlement with the following powers and faculties, 1. A distinctive artificial name by which it can make contracts. 2. A statutory authority to sue and be sued in the name of its officers as representing the association. 3. A statutory recognition of it as an entity distinct from its members by allowing them to sue it or be sued by it. 4. A provision for its perpetuity by transfer of its shares so as to secure succession of membership, was held to be a corporation in this country; Liverpool & L. Life & F. Ins. Co. v. Massachusetts, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 566, 19 L. Ed. 1029; Oliver v. R. Co., 100 Mass. 531; notwithstanding the acts of parliament declaring it should not be so considered, and the court held that such corporations, whether organized under the laws of a state of the Union or a foreign government, may be taxed by another state for the privilege of conducting their corporate business therein.

When such a company is not organized under the statutes a suit brought by or against it should be in the name of all the partners or of one or more for the use of all: Pipe v. Bateman, 1 Ia. 369; McGreary v. Chandler, 58 Me. 537; and a defective certificate of organization will render all the parties liable to a common-law action as partners; Vanhorn v. Corcoran, 127 Pa. 255, 18 Atl. 16, 4 L. R. A. 386. A mere subscription for shares in an unincorporated joint stock company will not make the subscribers liable as partners to third persons dealing with the company; they must have intended to become members and share in the profits of the business, but an unexplained subscription is evidence of that fact; Hunnewell v. Canning Co., 53 Mo. App. 245.

It is an incumbent duty on the part of a joint stock company not to permit a transfer of stock until fully satisfied of the shareholder's authority to transfer; L. R. 9 Eq. 181; Iasigi v. R. Co., 129 Mass. 46; and as to the nature of shares in such an association see SHARES.

An authority conferred on the directors to make contracts and bargains, and to transact all matters requisite for the affairs of the company will not in general authorize the directors to draw bills; 19 L. J. Ex. 34; 20 L. J. Q. B. 160; but if the directors have authority to bind the company by bills, and they regularly accept, in the name of the company, a bill drawn on the company, every member is liable as a joint acceptor to any holder who is not also a member of the company; 19 L. J. Ex. 34; 5 E. & B. 1; so the acceptance of a bill by an agent who is also a member of the company binds him personally; 9 Exch. 154.

To a suit for a dissolution or winding up of the affairs of a joint stock company, all the shareholders, however numerous, must be parties; 1 Keen 24; and any member of the company may institute an action for its dissolution; Snyder v. Lindsey, 92 Hun 432, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1037. The fact that such a company has conducted business for twenty-three years without making dividends for its stockholders, is good ground for its dissolution at suit of one of them; Willis v. Chapman, 68 Vt. 459, 35 Atl. 459. A society that cannot be incorporated because organized to resist the enforcement of laws cannot sue in the society name for the collection of a debt; Schuetzen Bund v. Agitations Verein, 44 Mich. 313, 6 N. W. 675, 38 Am. Rep. 270. See CORPORATION; DIRECTOR; STOCKHOLDER; PARTNERS; PARTNERSHIP.

JOINT TENANCY. Joint tenancy exists where there has been a limitation of the same estate, by deed, will or parol, to two or more persons without words of severance. Jenks, Modern Land Law 170. Joint tenants are said to have four unities, time, title, interest and possession; Bassler v. Rewodlinski, 130 Wis. 26, 109 N. W. 1032, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 701. The estate of both must arise under the same limitation; but under the statute of uses the necessity that the titles of all the joint tenants should commence at the same time is avoided.

Every kind of property, real and personal, may be so held; Freeman, Co-Ten. & Part. § 16.

If one convey his whole interest to a stranger it works a severance; but if he convey a less interest, it probably does not. The marriage of a female joint tenant is not a severance; nor is a subsequent lease for years by the husband and the other joint tenant, reserving rent jointly; [1897] 1 Ch. 134. Neither a devise by one joint tenant nor an encumbrance created by one joint tenant defeats the full right of the survivor.

If one of two joint tenants dies, the survivor becomes solely entitled to the estate; Co. Litt. 181 a; but not as against a grantee inter vivos of one of the joint tenants; nor against a judgment debt on which execution had been levied in the life time of the debtor.

Survivorship has been abolished, except as to trust estates, in many states; See Demb. Land Titles 27; it has never existed in Ohio, Kansas, Nebraska or Idaho; id. 198; nor in Connecticut; Washb. R. P.

The presumption is that all tenants holding jointly hold as tenants in common, unless a clear intention to the contrary be shown; Webster v. Vandeventer, 6 Gray (Mass.) 428; Parsons v. Boyd, 20 Ala. 112; Miles v. Fisher, 10 Ohio 1, 36 Am. Dec. 61; Bambaugh v. Bambaugh, 11 S. & R. (Pa.) 191; Purdy v. Purdy, 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 547; Allen v. Logan, 96 Mo. 591, 10 S. W. 149; Hershy v. Clark, 35 Ark. 17, 37 Am. Rep. 1; Rowland v. Rowland, 93 N. C. 214. In some states this is by statute.

In some, words that would have created a joint tenancy now create a tenancy in common.

Where there is a devise to two or more by name without a clear intention to vest it in the survivor, it vests severally; Goldstein v. Hammell, 236 Pa. 305, 84 Atl. 772.

Joint tenants at common law have no right to compulsory partition; Co. Litt. 187 a. They convey to each other by Release, in which words of inheritance are unnecessary; id. 273 b. They must plead and be impleaded jointly; id. 180 b., 195 b; but in [1880] 16 Ch. D. 63, it was held that one might sue alone for cutting timber on the land.

See JUS ACCRESCENDI; SURVIVOR.

JOINT TORTFEASORS. Wrongdoers; two or more who commit a tort.

When several persons join in an offence or injury, they may generally be sued jointly, or any number less than the whole may be sued, or each one may be sued separately; Williams v. Sheldon, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 654. Each is liable for himself, because the entire damages sustained were occasioned by each, each sanctioning the acts of the others, so that by suing one alone, he is not charged beyond his just proportion. Any number less than the whole may be sued, because each is answerable for his companion's acts. Thus a joint action may be brought against several for an assault and battery, or for composing and publishing a libel; 2 Saund. 117 a; Bacon, Abr. Actions in General (C); Harris v. Huntington, 2 Tyl. (Vt.) 129, 4 Am. Dec. 728.

But to this rule that for a joint injury a joint action may be brought, there is an exception, namely, that no joint action can be maintained for a joint slander; this exception seems to proceed upon the ground that each man's slander is his own, and it cannot by any means be considered that of another. Although this exception appears to be fully established, yet it is difficult to see the reason of it; when one of several trespassers gives the blow, he is considered as acting for the others, and, if they acted jointly, they may be jointly sued; why not consider the speaker, when acting in concert with others, as the actor for the whole in uttering the words? The blow is no more that of the person who did not give it than the words are the words of him who only united with the other in an agreement that they should be spoken. In either case, upon principle, the maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se, ought to have its force. Such however, is not the law.

Where a person is injured by a joint tort and accepts satisfaction from one of the wrongdoers, he cannot sue the other; Spurr v. R. Co., 56 N. J. L. 346, 28 Atl. 582.

A railroad company may be sued jointly with the servant whose negligence caused the injury, although it was not independently at fault; Illinois Central Ry. Co. v. Houchins, 121 Ky. 526, 89 S. W. 530, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 375, 123 Am. St. Rep. 205.

A covenant not to sue one of two joint tortfeasors does not operate as a release of the other from liability; [1892] 2 Q. B. 511; nor does the dismissal of an action against one, with the execution, for a valuable consideration, of an agreement not to sue him, release the other; City of Chicago v. Babcock, 143 Ill. 358, 32 N. E. 271; nor does the fact that where property is jointly converted by two persons, and one of those converting accounts to the owner, who accepts part of the proceeds, remove the other's liability; Horseley v. Moss, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 341, 23 S. W. 1115.

Where two or more parties act, each for himself and independently of each other, in a manner which may be injurious to another, they cannot be held jointly liable for the acts of each other; Livesay v. Nat. Bank, 36 Colo. 526, 86 Pac. 102, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 598, 118 Am. St. Rep. 120; Blaisdell v. Stephens, 14 Nev. 17, 33 Am. Rep. 523; Forbes v. Marsh, 15 Conn. 384; Larkins v. Eckwurzel, 42 Ala. 322, 94 Am. Dec. 651; Miller v. Ditch Co., 87 Cal. 433, 25 Pac. 550, 22 Am. St. Rep. 254.

Where unlawful attachments were simultaneously sued out by different creditors acting through the same attorney and levied by the same officer on the same property at the same time, but so that one constituted a prior lien on the personalty, and the other a prior lien on the realty attached, the creditors were held not joint wrongdoers, since neither was interested in the success of the other, and their actions, though simultaneous, were not for a common purpose; Miller v. Beck, 108 Ia. 575, 79 N. W. 344. But it has been held that where several creditors sue out at different times separate writs of attachment against a common debtor and cause them to be simultaneously levied by the same officer, they will be regarded, the levy being wrongful, as joint wrongdoers, though they may have acted separately without concert; Sparkman v. Swift, 81 Ala. 231, 8 South. 160; Vose v. Woods, 26 Hun (N. Y.) 486. In Ellis v. Howard, 17 Vt. 330, it was held that where the attachments are levied at the same time, by the same officer, and upon the same property, there is prima facie a joint trespass.

If the plaintiff allege that the concurrent negligence of both defendants caused his injury, he may join them in one action. It depends on the averments of his complaint, and if the state court so decides, he may join them even though the liability of one is statutory and the other rests on the common law; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Dowell, 229 U. S. 102, 33 Sup. Ct. 684, 57 L. Ed. 1090.

JOINT TRESPASSERS. Two or more who unite in committing a trespass. See JOINT TORTFEASORS.

JOINT TRUSTEES. Two or more persons who are intrusted with property for the benefit of one or more others. See TRUSTEE.

JOINTRESS, JOINTURESS. A woman who has an estate settled on her by her husband, to hold during her life, if she survive him. Co. Litt. 46.

JOINTURE. A competent livelihood of freehold for the wife, of lands and tenements, to take effect, in profit or possession, presently after the death of the husband, for the life of the wife at least.

Jointures are regulated by the statute of 27 Hen. VIII. c. 10, commonly called the statute of uses.

To make a good jointure, the following circumstances must concur, namely: It must take effect, in possession or profit, immediately from the death of the husband. It must be for the wife's life, or for some greater estate. It must be limited to the wife herself, and not to any other person in trust for her. It must be made in satisfaction for the wife's whole dower, and not of part of it only. The estate limited to the wife must be expressed or averred to be in satisfaction of her whole dower. It must be made before marriage. See Grogan v. Garrison, 27 Ohio St. 60, where it is said that it may also be made after marriage. A jointure attended with all these circumstances is binding on the widow, and is a complete bar to the claim of her dower; or, rather, it prevents its ever arising. See 4 Kent 55.

But there are other modes of limiting an estate to a wife, which, Lord Coke says, are good jointures within the statute, provided that the wife accepts them after the death of the husband. She may, however, reject them, and claim her dower; Cruise, Dig. tit. 7; 2 Bla. Com. 137. See DOWER. It is held that a jointure cannot be affected by a post-nuptial agreement; McCaulley's Ex'rs v. McCaulley, 7 Houst. (Del.) 102, 30 Atl. 735.

Any reasonable provision which an adult person agrees to accept in lieu of dower, it is said, will amount to an equitable jointure, and although it may be wanting in the requisites of a legal jointure, in equity it will bar dower; Rieger v. Schaible, 81 Neb. 33, 115 N. W. 560, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 866, 16 Ann. Cas. 700; Stilley v. Folger, 14 Ohio 610.

A widow may, by provisions of an ante-nuptial contract, waive her right to an allowance when the rights of minor children are not involved; Kroell v. Kroell, 219 Ill. 105, 76 N. E. 63, 4 Ann. Cas. 801. If such a contract was intended by the parties to operate as an equitable jointure, it will be upheld as such; Mintier v. Mintier, 28 Ohio St. 307.

In its more enlarged sense, a jointure signifies a joint estate limited to both husband and wife. 2 Bla. Com. 137. See 14 Viner, Abr. 540; Washb. R. P.

See MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT.

JOUR (Fr.). Day. It is used in our old law-books: as, tout jours, forever. It is also frequently employed in the composition of words: as, journal, a day-book; journeyman, a man who works by the day; journeys account.

JOURNAL. In Maritime Law. The book kept on board of a ship or other vessel which contains an account of the ship's course, with a short history of every occurrence during the voyage. Another name for log-book. Chitty, Law of Nat. 199.

In Commercial Law. A book used among merchants, in which the contents of the waste-book are separated every month, and entered on the debtor and creditor side, for more convenient posting in the ledger.

In Legislation. An account of the proceedings of a legislative body.

In England, there is no written constitution to control the action of parliament and its act cannot, therefore, be questioned, and so the parliament roll is sufficient to prove the authenticity of an act; 1 Strange 446. The journals of parliament are not records and cannot weaken or control a statute, which is a record and to be tried only by itself; Hob. 110.

The constitution of the United States, art. 1, s. 5, directs that "each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy. See 2 Sto. Const., 5th ed. § 839.

The constitutions of the several states contain similar provisions.

On a reference to the journal of the federal house of representatives to ascertain whether a duly authenticated law was passed, the court is bound to assume that the journal speaks the truth, and cannot receive oral evidence to impeach its correctness; U. S. v. Ballin, 144 U. S. 1, 12 Sup. Ct. 507, 36 L. Ed. 321; but the debates in congress may not be resorted to for the purpose of discovering the meaning of a statute; U. S. v. Freight Ass'n, 166 U. S. 290, 17 Sup. Ct. 540, 41 L. Ed. 1007.

The journal of either house is evidence of the action of that house upon all matters before it; Root v. King, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 613; Cowp. 17. It is a public record of which the courts may take judicial notice; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 482; Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85, 13 Am. Rep. 640; Moody v. State, 48 Ala. 115, 17 Am. Rep. 28; South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U. S. 260, 24 L. Ed. 154; Koehler v. Hill, 60 Ia. 549, 14 N. W. 738, 15 N. W. 609; Wise v. Bigger, 79 Va. 280; Brown v. Nash, 1 Wyo. 85. Cooley, Const. Lim. 135; contra, Gnob v. Cushman, 45 Ill. 119; Board of Commissioners of Madison County v. Burford, 93 Ind. 383. If it should appear therefrom that any act did not receive the requisite vote, or that the act was not constitutionally adopted, the courts may adjudge the act void; Cooley, Const. Lim. 164. Failure to comply with certain constitutional provisions in the passage of an act can be shown only by the journals; Fullington v. Williams, 98 Ga. 807, 27 S. E. 183; and if the journal sufficiently shows on its face a substantial compliance with constitutional requirements, a mere clerical omission in the journals of either house will not vitiate an act; Price v. City of Moundsville, 43 W. Va. 523, 27 S. E. 218, 64 Am. St. Rep. 878. Where they are silent as to the observance of any constitutional requirement, it will not be presumed that such requirement was disregarded, and where they do not expressly show whether the act was constitutionally passed it will be held valid unless there is an omission of some matter expressly required by the constitution to be entered therein; Ritchie v. Richards, 14 Utah 345, 47 Pac. 670.

Mere failure to record the passage of an act, in the absence of any affirmative record that it did not secure the concurrence of both houses, is not sufficient to show that the act was not passed, where the certificate of the presiding officer of each house shows that it was regularly passed; Territory v. O'Connor, 5 Dak. 397, 41 N. W. 746, 3 L. R. A. 355.

Where the constitution requires that the yeas and nays be entered on the journals, they are conclusive as against not only a printed statute published by law, but a duly enrolled act; Union Bank of Richmond v. Commissioners of Town of Oxford, 119 N. C. 214, 25 S. E. 966, 34 L. R. A. 487.

In determining whether an act was passed in accordance with a constitutional provision requiring the assent of two-thirds of the members, recourse may be had to the journals, if the certificate of the presiding officer fails to show by what vote the bill was passed; New York & L. I. Bridge Co. v. Smith, 148 N. Y. 540, 42 N. E. 1088.

The journals need not show that a bill was read by sections on its final passage, as required by the constitution, the presumption being that it was read. And where they affirmatively show non-compliance with an essential requirement to the enactment of a bill, or fail to show any essential step in the enactment which the constitution requires them to show, the enrolled bill as evidence of the law is overcome; State v. Hocker, 36 Fla. 358, 18 South. 767.

Where a bill, as approved, contains important clauses which the journals show were stricken out by the amendment in the houses, it is invalid; State v. Wendler, 94 Wis. 369, 68 N. W. 759.

The journals cannot be resorted to by the court for the purpose of inquiring into the motive which actuated the legislature or any member of it in enacting a law; Blaine County v. Heard, 5 Idaho 6, 45 Pac. 890.

The journals are inadmissible to show that parts of the bill, as passed by the houses, were omitted from the enrolled bill as signed by the presiding officers of the two houses and the governor, where all bills are required to be signed by the governor after having passed the legislative assembly; Harwood v. Wentworth, 4 Ariz. 378, 42 Pac. 1025.

An enrolled bill, on file in the office of the secretary of state, must be accepted without question by the courts as having been regularly enacted by the legislature, and is conclusive evidence of its existence and contents; State v. Jones, 6 Wash. 452, 34 Pac. 201, 23 L. R. A. 340; State v. Young, 32 N. J. L. 29; Weeks v. Smith, 81 Me. 538, 18 Atl. 325; Hunt v. Wright, 70 Miss. 298, 11 South. 608; State v. Glenn, 18 Nev. 34, 1 Pac. 186; People v. Commissioners of Highways of Marlborough, 54 N. Y. 276, 13 Am. Rep. 581.

Every reasonable presumption is made in favor of the action of a legislative body; it will not be presumed from the mere silence of the journals that either house disregarded a constitutional requirement in the passage of an act, unless in cases where the constitution has required the journals to show the action that has been taken; McCulloch v. State, 11 Ind. 424; Miller v. State, 3 Ohio St. 475; and the presumption that a properly authenticated bill was passed is not overcome by the failure of the journals to show any fact which is not specifically required by the constitution to be entered therein; Miesen v. Canfield, 64 Minn. 513, 67 N. W. 632.

Such a bill properly enrolled, signed, and approved cannot be impeached by reference to the journals of either house, to show that it was enacted in conformity to constitutional requirements; Lafferty v. Huffman, 99 Ky. 80, 35 S. W. 123, 32 L. R. A. 203; Com. v. Hardin County Court, 99 Ky. 188, 35 S. W. 275. But other courts have considered it part of their duties to ascertain whether the legislature has complied with the constitutional provisions and hence have introduced the journals to see if those prerequisites, required by the constitution have been performed; State v. Wray, 109 Mo. 594, 19 S. W. 86; Hunt v. State, 22 Tex. App. 396, 3 S. W. 233; Callaghan v. Chipman, 59 Mich. 610, 26 N. W. 806; State v. Brown, 20 Fla. 407; even if proof is adduced that they were; State v. Green, 36 Fla. 154, 18 South. 334.

As to the conclusiveness of an enrolled bill, see Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. State, 28 Okl. 94, 113 Pac. 921, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1. See INTERPRETATION.

JOURNEY. Originally a day's travel. It is now applied to travel from place to place, without restriction of time. But when thus applied, it is employed to designate a travel which is without the ordinary habits, business, or duties of the person, to a distance from his home, and beyond the circle of his friends or acquaintances. Gholson v. State, 53 Ala. 521, 25 Am. Rep. 652.

JOURNEYS ACCOUNT. In English Practice. A new writ which the plaintiff was permitted to sue out within a reasonable time after the abatement, without his fault, of the first writ. This time was computed with reference to the number of days which the plaintiff must spend in journeying to reach the court: hence the name of journeys account, that is, journeys accomptes or counted. This writ was quasi a continuance of the first writ, and so related back to it as to oust the defendant or tenant of his voucher, plea of non-tenure, joint tenancy fully administered, or any other plea arising upon matter happening after date of the first writ; Co. Litt. fol. 9 b.

This mode of proceeding has fallen into disuse, the practice now being to permit that writ to be quashed, and to sue out another. See Termes de la Ley; Bacon, Abr. Abatement (Q); 14 Viner, Abr. 558; 4 Com. Dig. 714; 7 M. & G. 762; Richards v. Ins. Co., 8 Cra. (U. S.) 84, 3 L. Ed. 496.

JOUST. See JUST.

JUBILACION. In Spanish Law. The right of a public officer to retire from office, retaining his title and his salary, either in whole or in part, after he has attained the age of fifty years and been in public service at least twenty years, whenever his infirmities prevent him from discharging the duties of his office.

JUDAISMUS (Lat.). The religion and rites of the Jews. Du Cange. A quarter set apart for residence of Jews. Du Cange. A usurious rate of interest. 1 Mon. Angl. 839; 2 id. 10, 665. An income anciently accruing to the king from the Jews. Blount.

JUDEX (Lat.). In Old English Law. A juror. Spelman, Gloss. A judge, in modern sense, especially—as opposed to justiciarius, i. e. a common-law judge—to denote an ecclesiastical judge. Bracton, fol. 401, 402.

In Roman Law. One who, either in his own right or by appointment of the magistrate for the special case, judged causes.

Thus, the prætor was formerly called judex. But, generally, prætors and magistrates who judge of their own right were distinguished from judices, who were private persons, appointed by the prætor, on application of the plaintiff, to try the cause, as soon as issue was joined, and furnished by him with instructions as to the legal principles involved. They were variously called judices delegati, or pedanei, or speciales. It has been said that they resembled in many respects jurors: thus, both are private persons, brought in at a certain stage of the proceedings, viz., issue joined, to try the cause, under instructions from the judge as to the law of the case. But civilians are not clear whether the judices had to decide the fact alone, or the law and fact. The judex resembles in many respects the arbitrator, or arbiter, the chief differences being, first, that the latter is appointed in cases of trust and confidence, the former in cases where the relations of the parties are governed by strict law (in pactionibus strictis); second, the latter has the whole control of cases, and decides according to equity and good conscience, the former by strict formulæ; third, that the latter may be a magistrate, the former must be a private person; fourth, that the award of the arbiter derives its force from the agreement of submission, while the decree of the judex has its sanction in the command of the prætor to try the cause; Calvinus, Lex.; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 210, note; Mackeldey, Civ. Law, Kaufmann ed. § 193, note.

It has been said that there was generally one judex, sometimes three,—in which case the decision of two, in the absence of the third, had no effect; Calvinus, Lex. But another careful writer says that "although there could never be more than one judex, there were sometimes several arbitri, but the arbiter was chosen from the same class as the judex." Sand. Inst. Just. Introd. lxiii.

Down to the time of handing over the cause to the judex, that is, till issue joined, the proceedings were before the prætor, and were said to be in jure; after that before the judex, and were said to be in judicio. In all this we see the germ of the Anglo-Saxon system of judicature; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 67.

A judge who conducted the trial from beginning to end; magistratus. The practice of calling in judices was disused before Justinian's time: therefore, in the Code, Institutes, and Novels, judex means judge in its modern sense. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 1327.

The term judex is used with very different significations at different periods of Roman law. The distinctive features of the position of the judex belong to the earlier history of the Roman law.

A recent writer defines very clearly the functions of the judex at that period as distinguished from those of the magistrate: "In the earlier history of civil procedure in Rome, we find two sharply defined divisions,—the proceedings which were said to be in jure, and those which were in judicio. The former took place before the magistrate, who represented officially the judicial power of the State. This magistrate in this capacity decided, in the first instance, whether the claim of the complaining party was cognizable at all,—whether there was any form of procedure by which it could be enforced. If it was controverted, and there seemed to be any action that would fit the case, the litis contestatio was formed, by a solemn appeal addressed by each party to his witnesses, and the controversy was then referred to the judex, or in some cases to a body or college of judices. The judices were not magistrates, and did not represent the power of the State. They were, it would seem, more in theory like referees. They took up the issue which had been stated by the magistrate, heard the testimony, and pronounced the sententia, and this finding was afterwards enforced by the magistrate." Howe, Studies in Civ. L. 246.

This relates to the period during which the sharply defined distinction between proceedings in jure and those in judicio was strictly observed. If, for example, the dispute concerned property it was assigned temporarily to the possession of one party, who gave security for its restoration if required, and the judex simply decided which litigant was right; Morey, R. L. 18, 389. The growth of the proceeding by formula during the next period was doubtless largely due to its convenience as a method of conveying to the judex the instructions of the magistrate with respect to the case referred to him. The new proceeding tended very much to increase the flexibility of the law in its application to particular cases, as it has been said there was no tradition to fetter the formula of the prætor. In the old litis contestatio the issue was formulated in narrowly prescribed terms; in the new formula the terms used were informal and freely chosen by the magistrate. "The formula was thus well adapted as a means for directly submitting to the decisions of a judex in judicio any question, or complex of questions, which the prætor deemed actionable. The prætor himself was now in a position, while formulating the legal issue, to give the judex at the same time direct instructions in reference to the decision of such issue. For whether the judge condemned or acquitted depended now solely on the manner in which the prætor formulated the question in dispute." Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 177. It was now for the first time that the judex became in effect an official, he ceased to be an independent private person bound only by the positive law, and his action was dominated by the limitations of the prætor's edict. Thus the latter became a dominating force in legal procedure, and the judex in some sense a subordinate official, and the result was "that the formulary procedure obliterated beyond recovery the clear sharp line which had hitherto severed jus and judicium." This naturally resulted from the fact that by the formula the judex was converted into an organ or instrument not only of the civil, but also of the prætor, made law, and the proceedings in judicio and those in jure were controlled by the same authority; id. 178, 220. In the last period of Roman procedure during the later empire the prætor lost his former power of directing the administration of the law, and when the edict came to be fixed by the will of the emperor the prætor and the præses were bound by it equally with the judex and in the same way that the latter had before been limited by their own edict. Its publication by the prætor was merely formal, and he became a mere instrument for applying the law, and his duties became more and more ministerial in proportion as, on the one hand, scientific jurisprudence developed and defined the contents of the existing law and, on the other hand, the imperial power, superseding all other agencies, appropriated to itself the function of developing the law. Thus the judex gradually became an official whose duty it was to assist the prætor, and, in the same way, the prætor became in reality an official whose duty it was to assist the emperor; id. 220.

For a long period senators alone were qualified to act as judges, and during that time any member of the senate could act, if justified, by mutual consent of the parties, or if they could not agree by law. There were also plebian judges called centumviri elected by the comitia constituting a collegium divided into sections and having special jurisdiction of citizenship and successions; their jurisdiction was exclusive where it existed. As to the duties of the judex see also Inst. 4. 17. 1-7; Sand. Introd. xii., xxi., lxi., lxxiv.; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. §§ 34-37; PRÆTOR; RECUPERATORES; JUDICIUM; IN JURE.

Judex Ordinarius (Lat.). In Civil Law. A judge who had jurisdiction by his own right, not by another's appointment. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Blackstone says that judices ordinarii decided only questions of fact, while questions of law were referred to the centumviri; but this would seem to be rather the definition of judices selecti; and not all questions of law were referred to the centumviri, but particular actions: e. g. querela inofficiosi testamenti. See 2 Bla. Com. 315; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Utr. Centumviri.

Judex Pedaneus. Inferior judges; deputy judges; "petit judges that try only trifling cases (so-called because they had only a low seat and no tribunal)." Harper's Lat. Dict.; Dig. 3. 1. 1. 6.

The name was given to the judex who was delegated to hear the whole cause. Their appointment is said to have been due, in the first instance, to the great increase in the volume of judicial business, which led the emperor Diocletian to authorize the provincial governors to refer cases of minor importance to them. They "were not judices in the old sense of the word, but, according to the opinion of Ortolan, permanent magistrates entrusted with the special duty of conducting such cases as the governor might see fit to refer to them. No other view of the character of these officers seems consistent with the autocratic spirit which permeated the whole imperial system;" Morey, Rom. L. 142.

"About the end of the third century, the præsides provinciarum were in the habit of proceeding extra ordinem in civil actions, i. e. they were in the habit of either giving judgment themselves or of delegating the whole cause to a deputy judge, a judex pedaneus. This deputy judge (who is also called judex datus or judex delegatus) is now in form as well as in substance an official who acts in lieu of the magistrate; he is not merely entrusted, like the old judex privatus, with the conduct of the proceedings in judicio, but is deputed—and this is the reason why no formula is used—to hear and determine the whole cause, including the proceedings in jure. Like the proceedings before the præses himself, the proceedings before this subordinate judge are extra ordinem;" Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 222. It has been said with respect to these judges that the prætors and other great magistrates did not themselves decide the actions which arose between private individuals: these were submitted to judges chosen by the parties, and these judges were called judices pedanei. In choosing them, the plaintiff had the right to nominate, and the defendant to accept or reject those nominated; Heineccius, Antiq. lib. 4, tit. b. n. 40; 7 Touillier, n. 353. As to judices pedanei, generally, see Zimmern, Ges. Rom. Priv. § 18.

Judex Quæstionis. A magistrate who decided the law of a criminal case, when the prætor himself did not sit as a magistrate. Morey, Rom. L. 88.

The director of the criminal court under the presidency of the prætor. Harper's Lat. Dict.; Cic. Brut. 76, 264.

Judex Selectus. A select or selected judex or judge.

The judges in criminal suits selected by the prætor. Harper's Lat. Dict.; Cic. Verr. 2, 2, 13, § 32.

These judices selecti were used in criminal causes, and between them and modern jurors many points of resemblance have been noticed; 3 Bla. Com. 366. They were first returned by the prætor, then drawn by lot, subject to challenge; they were sworn and talesmen were struck. So many points of resemblance were thought to exist between them and the δικασταί of the Greeks and our juries that the English institution has been thought to be derived from the former ones; id. note (n). But the root idea of both systems is sufficiently natural and logical to have been indigenous in both countries. See JURY.

JUDGE. A public officer lawfully appointed to decide litigated questions according to law.

An officer so named in his commission, who presides in some court.

In its most extensive sense the term includes all officers appointed to decide litigated questions while acting in that capacity, including justices of the peace, and even jurors, it is said, who are judges of the facts. Com. v. Dallas, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 229, 1 L. Ed. 812; Respublica v. Dallas, 3 Yeates (Pa.) 300. In ordinary legal use, however, the term is limited to the sense of the second of the definitions here given; People v. Wilson, 15 Ill. 388; unless it may be that the case of a justice or commissioner acting judicially is to be considered an extension of this meaning. See 3 Cush. (Mass.) 584.

It is not an unusual use of language in statutes to put the judge for the court, and to make provisions for him to execute that which can only be executed in court. In re United States, 194 U. S. 197, 24 Sup. Ct. 629, 48 L. Ed. 931.

By the common law every court, while engaged in the exercise of its lawful functions, has the authority to preserve order, decency, and silence in its presence, and may apprehend and punish the offender without examination or proof; but if the offence be committed out of court the party is entitled to notice and a hearing in his defence; People v. Turner, 1 Cal. 152; Redman v. State, 28 Ind. 205. A judge must be in court during a trial; see 10 Am. L. Rev. 50. See CONTEMPT.

An assault on a judge sitting in court is not only punishable as a contempt, but indictable, as a crime against public justice, and more aggravated than an ordinary assault, or even than an assault committed upon another person in a court; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 250; this principle comes from the common law and was, as early as 25 Edw. 3, embodied in a statute, under which such an offence was punishable by the loss of the right hand, forfeiture of lands and goods, and perpetual imprisonment. In Neagle's Case, 135 U. S. 1, 10 Sup. Ct. 658, 34 L. Ed. 55, it was held that "an assault upon a judge of a court of the United States, while in discharge of his official duties, is a breach of the peace of the United States, as distinguished from the peace of the State in which the assault takes place." In this case the petitioner was a United States deputy marshal, appointed for the express purpose of guarding Mr. Justice Field against a threatened attack, which took place, and a killing by the deputy in such defence was held by the court to have been caused by a just apprehension that an attack would result in the death of the justice, and was justifiable and a judgment of the circuit court, discharging him from the custody of the sheriff, by whom he was held under process of the state court, was affirmed.

So any insult, disrespect, or insolence to a judge is punishable; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 250. On this subject, it was said by Holroyd, J.: "In the case of an insult to (the judge) himself, it is not on his own account that he commits; for that is a consideration which should never enter his mind. . . . It is his duty to support the dignity of his station, and uphold the law, so that in his presence at least, it shall not be infringed." 4 B. & Ald. 329, 339.

Within this principle it was held to be a contempt to write a letter to a judge, libelling or abusing him in regard to one of his decisions; In re Pryor, 18 Kan. 72, 26 Am. Rep. 747; or when a judge of an inferior tribunal refuses obedience to process from a superior one; Patchin v. City of Brooklyn, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 664; 1 Eng. L. & Eq. 516; Gorham v. Luckett, 6 B. Monr. (Ky.) 638; State v. Noel, T. U. P. Charlt. (Ga.) 43; Ex parte Carnochan, id. 315.

It has been held that abusing a judge out of court, with reference to expressions made by him on a trial, was a contempt; Com. v. Dandridge, 2 Va. Cas. 408; but in another case it was held that newspaper articles in regard to the conduct of a judge during a trial, and charging him with being an abettor of a person against whom an indictment for murder was pending, could not be visited as a contempt; Ex parte Hickey, 4 Sm. & M. (Miss.) 751. In the federal courts, and in many states, the subject is regulated by statute; U. S. R. S. § 725; U. S. v. R. Co., 16 Fed. 853; Ex parte Robinson, 19 Wall. (U. S.) 505, 22 L. Ed. 205; People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 195, 16 Am. Rep. 528; In re Oldham, 89 N. C. 23, 45 Am. Rep. 673; Foster v. Com., 8 W. & S. (Pa.) 77; Cheadle v. State, 110 Ind. 301, 11 N. E. 426, 59 Am. Rep. 199. The question whether a contempt can be committed otherwise than in court cannot be said to be settled, but Bishop is of the opinion that the English and better American doctrines recognize such contempts, yet, under limitations easily defined; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 258. In all such cases the offence is against the state, not the judge; id. § 269; Haight v. Lucia, 36 Wis. 355; Whittem v. State, 36 Ind. 196.

Bribery or attempting to bribe a judge was, at common law, a very grave offence. Indeed the earlier definitions of bribery seem to confine the offence to judicial officers; 4 Bla. Com. 139; 3 Inst. 145; and they were criticised for being too narrow. See 1 East 183; 4 Burr. 2494; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 85, n. 1.

Upon the same ground are condemned sinister approaches, with intent to influence judges indirectly, though not amounting to bribery; id.; and on this subject it was said by Lord Cottenham: "Every private communication to a judge, for the purpose of influencing his decision upon a matter publicly before him, always is, and ought to be, reprobated; it is a course calculated, if tolerated, to divert the course of justice, and is considered, and ought, more frequently than it is, to be treated, as what it really is, high contempt of court." 1 Macn. & G. 116, 122.

Judges are appointed or elected in a variety of ways in the United States. For the federal courts they are appointed by the president, by and with the consent of the senate; in some of the states they are appointed by the governor, the governor and senate, or by the legislature. The judges of the federal courts and of the courts of some of the states hold their offices during good behavior; of others, during good behavior, or until they shall attain a certain age; and of others, for a limited term of years. The federal judges must have the tenure of office during good behavior conferred upon them before they can be invested with any portion of the judicial power; Kentucky & I. Bridge Co. v. R. Co., 37 Fed. 567, 2 L. R. A. 289.

Impartiality is the first duty of a judge: if he has any (the slightest) interest in the cause, he is disqualified from sitting as a judge; aliquis non debet esse judex in propria causa; 8 Co. 118; Hill v. Wells, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 109; Gregory v. R. Co., 4 Ohio St. 675; Knight v. Hardeman, 17 Ga. 253; Sanborn v. Fellows, 22 N. H. 473; Hawley v. Baldwin, 19 Conn. 585; Howell v. Budd, 91

Cal. 342, 27 Pac. 747; Chase v. Weston, 75 Ia. 159, 39 N. W. 246; such as his relationship to the parties; People v. Connor, 142 N. Y. 130, 36 N. E. 807; even where such party is administrator only; Dennard v. Jordan, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 398, 37 S. W. 876 (but relationship to plaintiff's attorney will not disqualify him; Patton v. Collier, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 544, 38 S. W. 53). Either party may make the objection that the judge is of kin to one of them; Kelly v. Hocket, 10 Ind. 299; and it is for the judge to determine, in the exercise of sound judicial discretion, whether by reason of kinship, etc., it would be improper for him to hear a particular case; he cannot be compelled to vacate the bench by the affidavit of the litigant; Byram's Ex'rs v. Holliday, 84 Ky. 18. A pecuniary interest in the case on trial will incapacitate him from sitting in the cause, both by the common law and the statutes; Ochus v. Sheldon, 12 Fla. 138; Buckingham v. Davis, 9 Md. 324; Pearce v. Atwood, 13 Mass. 340; as where he is interested as a stockholder in a railroad corporation making an application for a commission to appraise land, his interest is such as to invalidate the report of the commissioners; Gregory v. R. Co., 4 Ohio St. 675; or was a member of a mutual benefit society; Texas-Sovereign Camp v. Hale, 56 Tex. Civ. App. 447, 120 S. W. 539; or where the judge's wife was a stockholder in a corporation which was a party; First Nat. Bank v. McGuire, 12 S. D. 226, 80 N. W. 1074, 47 L. R. A. 413, 76 Am. St. Rep. 598. Where a statute disqualified a judge by reason of relationship with either litigant within the sixth degree, this did not disqualify a judge because he and the plaintiff's attorney had married sisters; Zambetti v. Garton, 113 N. Y. Supp. 804; where the lord chancellor, who was a shareholder in a company in whose favor the vice-chancellor had made a decree, affirmed this decree, it was reversed on that ground; 3 H. L. Cas. 759; but it has been held that where the interest of the judge is merely that of a corporator in a municipal corporation, the legislature may provide that this shall constitute no disqualification when the corporation is a party, apparently on the ground that the interest is insignificant; Commonwealth v. Reed, 1 Gray (Mass.) 475. But it is doubtful whether even the legislature can go beyond this class of cases and abolish the rule stated in the maxim; Cooley, Const. Lim. 516.

Active political partisanship will not disqualify a judge to try a contested election case; Fulton v. Longshore, 156 Ala. 611, 46 South. 989, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 602.

If one of the judges is disqualified on this ground, a judgment rendered will be void, even though the proper number may have concurred in the result, which includes the interested judge; 6 Q. B. 753; or though the parties agree to waive objections to the jurisdictions; January v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 488, 38 S. W. 179; Lee v. Mortgage Co., 51 Tex. Civ. App. 272, 115 S. W. 320; and see infra. The objection may be raised for the first time in the appellate court; Richardson v. Welcome, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 332; 2 H. L. Cas. 387; but in Iowa it was held that an objection to a judge of the court of original jurisdiction on the ground of interest must be made in that court; Ellsworth v. Moore, 5 Ia. 486.

In a suit on a collector's bond by the chosen freeholders of a county, one who was an inhabitant, a freeholder, and a taxpayer in the same county was incompetent to sit as judge; Peck v. Freeholders of Essex County, 21 N. J. L. 656. A judge is not disqualified to try a case because he has tried an action in trespass concerning the same property; Martyn v. Curtis, 68 Vt. 397, 35 Atl. 333.

The interest which disqualifies a judge of the supreme court so that a judge of the circuit court may sit in his stead must be immediate, certain, and dependent on the result of the case, and not remote, uncertain, or speculative; Trustees Internal Imp. Fund v. Bailey, 10 Fla. 213.

A bias which disqualifies a judge must be such as might cause him to act corruptly or with such oppression as to be equivalent to corruption, such as to make it improper that a man of integrity should hear the case; but the mere fact that a judge is unfriendly to personal injury suits does not disqualify him in such a case; McDonald's Adm'r v. Coal & Coke Co., 135 Ky. 624, 117 S. W. 349.

By statute a judge of the United States Court of Appeals is disqualified if he acted in the cause in the court below.

The general rule that it is irregular and improper for a judge to try any cause in which he has such an interest as would disqualify as a witness does not apply to orders purely formal in their character, and it is doubtful whether it would extend to a case in which no other judge could try and determine the cause. If the judge is deprived of authority to act, by statutory inhibition, the proceedings are void, otherwise voidable only, and therefore valid until avoided; Heydenfeldt v. Towns, 27 Ala. 423.

It is said to be discretionary with him whether he will sit in a cause in which he has been of counsel; Owings v. Gibson, 2 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 517; Denn v. Tatem, 1 N. J. L. 164. See Bank of North America v. Fitzsimons, 2 Binn. (Pa.) 454; Murphy v. Barlow, 5 Ind. 230; Cullen v. Drane, 82 Tex. 484, 18 S. W. 590. But the practice is to refuse to sit in such case. And in Reams v. Kearns, 5 Coldw. (Tenn.) 217, it was held that where the judge who rendered the judgment in the case had been counsel in it, the judgment was a nullity; Tampa Street R. & Power Co. v. R. Co., 30 Fla. 595, 11 South. 562, 17 L. R. A. 681. Such relation disqualifies; Stepp v. State, 53 Tex. Cr. R. 159, 109 S. W. 1093; but it is held that it may be waived; Kerr v. Burns, 42 Colo. 285, 93 Pac. 1120; acquiescence gives consent; id. The question arose in Delaware at the time of the appointment of Bates, Chancellor, in 1865, whether he was legally disqualified from sitting in such cases, so as to bring them within the constitutional provision, giving jurisdiction to the chief justice in all cases in which the chancellor was interested. In view of the desire of the chancellor not to sit in cases in which he had been of counsel, the question was considered by him and Gilpin, C. J., and the conclusion reached that there was not a legal disqualification. This conclusion was communicated by the chancellor to the legislature with a suggestion that provision should be made for the appointment of a chancellor ad litem in such cases; MS. notes of Bates, Chancellor. Merely to have been counsel for one of the parties does not disqualify; Keller v. Riverton Water Co., 34 Pa. Super. Ct. 301.

A magistrate authorized to sign writs cannot sign them in his own case; Doolittle v. Clark, 47 Conn. 316.

Where there is no other tribunal that can act, the judge may hear the case; Freem. Judg. § 146; 5 H. L. C. 88; Stuart v. Mechanics' Bank, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 501; contra, Washington Ins. Co. of City of New York v. Price, Hopk. Ch. (N. Y.) 2; Hall v. Thayer, 105 Mass. 221, 7 Am. Rep. 513. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 207, 506, 509; People v. Gies, 25 Mich. 83.

It is said that a judge who has a personal interest in a cause may hear it if counsel waive the objection. Parke, B., heard a case under such circumstances; Reedie v. L. & N. W. R. Co., 4 Ex. 244. It is said to be settled in England that he must sit if the case cannot be heard otherwise. Pollock, First Book of Jurispr. 265, citing Thellusson v. Rendlesham, 7 H. L. C. 429. Lord Coke heard the case of Sutton's Hospital, 10 Rep. *1a, though he was at the time one of its governors, and decided it in its favor.

It was held that the absence of a judge from the court-room for a considerable time during the arguments to the jury without the consent of the parties was reversible error; Waller v. People, 209 Ill. 284, 70 N. E. 682.

A judge is not competent as a witness in a cause trying before him, for this among other reasons, that he can hardly be deemed capable of impartially deciding on the admissibility of his own testimony, or of weighing it against that of another; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 364; Ross v. Buhler, 2 Mart. La. (N. S.) 312; Julian v. Gallen, 2 Cal. 358. See Com. Dig. Courts (B 4), (C 2), (E 1), (P 16), Justices (I 1, 2, 3); Bacon Abr. Courts (B); 1 Kent 291; CHARGE.

In the House of Lords Lord Chancellor Westbury abstained from taking part in the decision because he had been concerned in the case; Di Sora v. Phillipps, 10 H. L. C. 624.

While acting within the bounds of his jurisdiction, the judge is not responsible for any error of judgment or mistake of law; 12 Co. 23; Ross v. Rittenhouse, 2 Dall. (Pa.) 160, 1 L. Ed. 331; Reid v. Hood, 2 N. & M'C. (S. C.) 168, 10 Am. Dec. 582; Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 282; Ely v. Thompson, 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 76; Evans v. Foster, 1 N. H. 374; Stone v. Graves, 8 Mo. 148, 40 Am. Dec. 131; Morrison v. McDonald, 21 Me. 550; Hamilton v. Williams, 26 Ala. 527; unless, possibly, a mistake was induced by gross carelessness or ignorance partaking of a criminal quality; 12 Mod. 493. An action will not lie against a judge of a court of record for any act done by him in his judicial capacity; 6 B. & C. 611. An action of a judge, to be criminally or even civilly cognizable, must be wilful and corrupt; 1 W. Bla. 19; Dawning v. Herrick, 47 Me. 462; Hamilton v. Williams, 26 Ala. 527; Yates v. Lansing, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 395; Lenox v. Grant, 8 Mo. 254.

It is a rule sometimes asserted to be absolute and sometimes only prima facie that a judicial officer has no protection against the consequences of an act not within his jurisdiction; Piper v. Pearson, 2 Gray (Mass.) 120, 61 Am. Dec. 438; Clarke v. May, 2 Gray (Mass.) 410, 61 Am. Dec. 470; Sullivan v. Jones, 2 Gray (Mass.) 570; Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 335, 20 L. Ed. 646. But a distinction has sometimes been suggested between acts in excess of jurisdiction and those outside of it. For the latter it has been said that a judge of a court of superior jurisdiction is not liable; Lord De Grey, C. J., in 2 W. Bla. 1141. Of this case it is said by a writer cited infra, who dissents from the doctrine: "It is true this rule is a mere dictum, and also that the decision has been since overruled; but this dictum has sometimes been referred to with approval in subsequent cases;" 15 Am. L. Rev. 440. And Field, J., in Randall v. Brigham, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 523, 19 L. Ed. 285, said that such a judge is not liable when he acts in excess of his jurisdiction, except for malice. This expression, like that of Lord De Grey, was obiter, inasmuch as the case sustained the jurisdiction which had been questioned. In Lange v. Benedict, 73 N. Y. 12, 29 Am. Rep. 80, this point was so decided, but the court drew a distinction between the case where the judge had acquired no jurisdiction at all, and the case where the act was merely in excess of jurisdiction after jurisdiction had been acquired. There the judge of the circuit court had imposed a re-sentence upon a prisoner, and he was accordingly imprisoned; the supreme court held the second sentence illegal, and discharged the prisoner. These cases and the doctrine asserted in them have been doubted and criticised by Arthur Biddle in 15 Am. L. Rev. 442 and note, where the authorities cited and relied on are critically examined. More recently the distinction has been discussed by Bishop, who states the doctrine of distinction between excess and absence of jurisdiction with approval, and even goes further, considering that where the jurisdiction is a close one and it is decided by the judge or magistrate carefully and earnestly in favor of his jurisdiction, "in reason and not quite without support from authority," he should not "suffer, though another or even a higher court held the contrary"; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 460; Bish. Non-Contr. § 783.

There is no distinction between a judge acting in court and acting judicially out of court, that is, in chambers; 3 Moore, P. C. 52. See Moffett v. Boydstun, 4 Kan. App. 406, 46 Pac. 24.

A judge cannot be held liable for delay in deciding a cause; but if it be wilful and corrupt, it is ground for impeachment; and mandamus will lie to compel him to perform his duty; Wyatt v. Arnot, 7 Cal. App. 221, 94 Pac. 86.

"A judge of a court not of record is not liable for any injury sustained which is the result of an honest error of judgment in a matter wherein the court has jurisdiction, and when the act done is not of a purely ministerial nature." The rule is thus stated in 15 Am. L. Rev. 444. See further an article in Ir. L. T. and Sol. J., Nov. 13, 1880; 6 Am. Dec. 303; Lange v. Benedict, 29 Am. Rep. 80, note; Stewart v. Cooley, 23 Am. Rep. 690, note. See CORAM NON JUDICE.

The subject of the liability of a judge to an action is fully considered in Taaffe v. Downes, 3 Moore, P. C. 41, and Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 283, both cited in Randall v. Brigham, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 523, supra.

One circuit judge has no power to review and revise the action of another circuit judge; Warren v. Simon, 16 S. C. 362; nor has a judge when without the state, power to grant an injunction; Price v. Bayless, 131 Ind. 437, 31 N. E. 88.

The acts of a judge de facto are not open to collateral attack; Ball v. U. S., 140 U. S. 118, 11 Sup. Ct. 761, 35 L. Ed. 377.

A judge who acts corruptly may be impeached; Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 282; Com. v. Addison, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 225, 1 L. Ed. 810.

A judge is not bound, unless by statute, to file a memorandum of his decision, and, if filed, it is not a part of the record unless he makes it so; Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Carey, 80 Conn. 426, 68 Atl. 993.

When a lawyer becomes a judge, his right to act as an attorney is temporarily suspended; Perry v. Bush, 46 Fla. 242, 35 South. 225. He may appear for himself; Hegeman v. Johnson, 35 Barb. (N. Y.) 202. In some states circuit judges are permitted to practice in circuit courts other than their own; O'Hare v. R. Co., 139 Ill. 151, 28 N. E. 923; Morton v. R. Co., 81 Mich. 423, 46 N. W. 111.

A court cannot itself decide as to its power to act or to exist as a court; Hill v. Tarver, 130 Ala. 595, 30 South. 499; contra, Swan v. Talbot, 152 Cal. 142, 94 Pac. 238, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1066; State v. Banta, 122 La. 235, 47 South. 538.

An appellate court will not open a decree in a patent case for the introduction of newly discovered evidence because it had failed to "discover the notation of the mortgage in the abstract contained in the file wrapper and did not thereupon reverse the decree," it not having been called to the attention of the court by counsel; Moneyweight Scale Co. v. Scale Co., 199 Fed. 905, 118 C. C. A. 235.

It has been observed that a judge's function is to give a good legal reason for the conclusions of common sense. Lord Esher, quoted in 16 L. Q. R. 3, n.

Under the Act of Settlement in England (1701) it was provided that the judges should hold office during good behavior, subject to removal upon the addresses of both houses of parliament, and that their salaries should be ascertained and established.

For a list of judges of the United States supreme court, see SUPREME COURT; also for a list of lord chancellors, see CHANCELLOR; and for a list of English judges, see L. R. 12 App. Cas.

Under the Roman law a judge, by whose act or default in deciding or conducting a lawsuit, a party to the suit was injured, was liable to an action for damages, the amount of which was left to the discretion of the judge. Such action was regarded as quasi-delictual, because it was available, not only in cases of deliberately unfair decisions, but also in cases of less serious errors committed by the judge, as overlooking the day fixed for trial or disregarding the rules of law concerning adjournment and the like (imprudentia judicis). In such a case he was termed judex qui litem suam fecit (who makes the suit his own). The action in question, however, could not be taken on the ground that the judgment was unjust in substance; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 330; Mack. Rom. L. § 506; Morey, Rom. L. 383. See JUDEX.

JUDGE ADVOCATE. An officer of a court-martial who is to discharge certain duties at the trial of offenders. His duties are to prosecute in the name of the United States; but he shall so far consider himself as counsel for the prisoner, after the prisoner shall have made his plea, as to object to leading questions to any of the witnesses or any question to the prisoner the answer to which might tend to criminate himself. He is, further, to swear the members of the court before they proceed upon any trial, and may also administer oaths for purposes of military justice and other purposes of military administration; U. S. R. S. 2 Supp. 524.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT. It consists in the army of one judge advocate with the rank of brigadier general; two judge advocates with the rank of colonel; three with the rank of major, and for each geographical department or division of troops not provided with such, one acting judge advocate with the rank, etc., of captain, mounted. Act of Congress, February 2, 1901.

A similar officer was provided for the navy under the act of June 8, 1880, with the title of judge-advocate-general of the navy. He has the rank and pay of a captain in the navy, or colonel of the marine corps, as the case may be. His duties are to receive, revise, and have recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and boards for examination of officers, for retirement and promotion, in the naval service, and such other duties as were theretofore performed by naval judge-advocates-general; U. S. R. S. 1 Supp. § 290; 2 id. § 500. The judge-advocate-general's department is now under the chief of staff. Act of February 14, 1903.

JUDGE-MADE LAW. A phrase used to indicate judicial decisions which construe away the meaning of statutes, or find meanings in them which the legislature never intended. It is sometimes used as meaning, simply, the law established by judicial precedent. Cooley, Const. Lim., 4th ed. 70, n. See Austin, Prov. of Jur. where the necessity of judicial legislation and its uses are discussed in extenso.

The expression judge-made law is undoubtedly more frequently used in the former sense, and as expressing a certain degree of opprobrium. It is, however, unavoidable that in the distribution of powers which is now recognized as a necessary element of civilized government, there should be found at times some uncertainty as to the line of demarcation between the legislative and judicial powers as well as between each of them and the executive. The necessity of what is called judge-made law in the proper sense, and the possibility of its existence in the other sense, arises from the power of construction which necessarily exists, and though salutary when properly exercised, is susceptible of abuse, and in such case, difficult, if not impossible, to remedy. Of this power of construction it has been said that it "is a mighty one, and, unrestrained by settled rules, would tend to throw a painful uncertainty over the effect that might be given to the most plainly worded statutes, and render courts, in reality, the legislative power of the state. Instances are not wanting to confirm this. Judge-made law has overrode the legislative department. It was the boast of Chief Justice Pemberton, one of the judges of the despot Charles II., and not the worst even of those times, that he had entirely outdone the parliament in making law." Spencer v. State, 5 Ind. 41, 46. A writer thus characterizes that kind of judicial legislation which is necessary and proper under such a system as the common law: "Although it is considered necessary in all free states to keep the legislative, executive, and judicial powers for the most part separate, and all our American constitutions provide for this, yet it cannot be completely done. The judges, it is well known, actually make a great deal of law, and this judicial legislation cannot be avoided, and indeed much of the best work that we get in this line is done by them. But this they do as delegates of the sovereign people, as much as congress or the state legislatures;" Terry, Anglo-American Law 11.

Mr. Bishop earnestly contends that there is no judge-made law; he says that "law preceded writing, and no writing can be made comprehensive enough to include all law, and no blundering of the judge is so monstrous as denial of right to a suitor who is simply unable to find his case laid down in the statute law or in a previous decision." His view is that more errors are committed by failure to administer justice according to "the general principles of our jurisprudence and the collective conscience of mankind," for want of statute or precedent, than in all other ways. The common-law system was built up when there were few statutes and the judges derived "principles for their decisions from the known usages of the country and from what they found written by God in the breasts of men." Such, he considers, should be the action of judges now, and he assumes that they will always find principles on which to adjudicate any matter unprovided for by statutes or previous decisions. He argues that in view of "the ceaseless variety of changes in human affairs," while precedents are properly followed, yet, now, as in the earlier periods, they have not covered the entire ground, and it is absurd that questions of right or remedy should depend, not upon the abstract right or the convenience or propriety of a decision either way, but "solely on the accident, whether it arose in early times, received then an adjudication, and the adjudication found a reporter." 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. §§ 18, 19.

In a case for which he could find no precedent, Jessel, M. R., said: "I am afraid that, whatever I may call my decision, it will, in effect, be making law, which I never have any desire to do; but I cannot find that the point is covered by any decided case, or even appears to have been discussed in any decided case. The only satisfaction I have in deciding the point is this, that it will in all probability be carried to a higher court, and it will be for that court to make the law, or, as we say, declare the law, and not for me." L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 798, 805.

It has been said that the phrase judicial legislation carries on its face the notion of judicial usurpation, and is habitually used by the courts as a term of reproach; but it is contended by the writer who admits this current use of the phrase, that, properly used, it means the growth of the law at the hand of the judges, and in that sense, so far from being an evil, "it is a desirable, and indeed a necessary, feature of our system." 5 Harv. L. Rev. 172. In the discussion of the subject the writer last cited considers that with respect to much that has been written on the subject of judicial legislation, the meaning cannot be fully understood without taking into consideration the different theories as to the nature of law. Those writers who accept the theory of Austin and Bentham are naturally found to use the terms judge-made law and judicial legislation as terms meriting contempt, and indeed Bentham so characterizes the whole common law. On the other hand, those writers who take the opposite view and maintain that the origin of law is not command but custom, not only eliminate from consideration the idea of judicial legislation, but go so far as to limit the function of the legislature itself in the effort "to assist society in getting rid of its old customs and forming new ones." Supporters of this view are James C. Carter, Rep. Am. Bar Ass'n, 1890, and Prof. Hammond, 1 Bla. Com., Hammond's ed. § 2. See James C. Carter's The Law, etc. The writer in the Harvard Law Review already cited discusses these conflicting views, giving preference to a third theory, intermediate between these two extremes, developed by Lawrence, Essay, Int. L., 2d ed. ch. i. The result is that, in what has been written on the subject of judicial legislation by the advocates of these various theories, there is less difference than is apparent on the surface, and that the process itself is recognized by all, though under different names. The importance of the subject is greatly enhanced in English law by the binding authority which is attributed to former decisions, and the reverence which is accorded to precedent. The conclusion reached is that judicial legislation is a necessary element in the development of the common law, but no precise rules can be laid down either as to the extent to which it should properly go, or how far a judge, in carrying on the process, may undertake to discard old doctrines and substitute new ones.

Lord Esher, M. R., has attempted to distinguish between "fundamental propositions of law" which might be changed only by parliament, and the "evidence of the existence of such a proposition," which was within the disposition of the court; 25 Q. B. Div. 57; but as it is very properly remarked, there is no test suggested to enable a court to make this discrimination.

"In substance the growth of the law is legislative, and this in a deeper sense than that what the courts declare to have been the law is in fact new. It is legislative in its grounds. The very considerations which judges most rarely mention, and always with an apology, are the secret root from which the law draws all the juices of life. I mean, of course, considerations of what is expedient for the community concerned. Every important principle which is developed by litigation is in fact and at the bottom the result of more or less definitely understood views of public policy; most generally, to be sure, under our practice and traditions, the unconscious result of instinctive preferences and inarticulate convictions, but none the less traceable to views of public policy in the last analysis." O. W. Holmes, Jr., The Common Law 35.

"I cannot understand how any person who has considered the subject can suppose that society could have possibly gone on if the judges had not legislated, or that there is any danger whatever in allowing them that power which they have in fact exercised, to make up for the negligence or the incapacity of the avowed legislator. That part of the law of every country which was made by the judges has been far better made than that part which consists of statutes enacted by the legislature." Austin, note to Lect. V.

"No intelligent lawyer would at this day pretend that the decisions of the courts do not add to and alter the law. The courts themselves, in the course of the reasons given for those decisions, constantly and freely use language admitting that they do. . . . But English judges are bound to give their decisions in conformity with the settled general principles of English law, with any express legislation applicable to the matter in hand, and with the authority of their predecessors and their own former decisions. At the same time they are bound to find a decision for every case, however novel it may be; and that decision will be authority for other like cases, in future; therefore it is part of their duty to lay down new rules if required." Pollock's Notes to Maine's Anc. Law 46. See also Pollock, Expans. of C. L. 49; 20 L. Q. R. 406.

In the appendix to Lewis' Law of Perpetuity, in the Report of the Real Property Commissioners (1832), Lord Campbell, Chairman, it is said: "At an early period (18 Edw. I) an act, commonly called the statute de donis conditionalibus, created a direct perpetuity, by enabling parties to establish a perpetual and unalienable entail; and this continued until the ingenuity and good sense of judges, without the aid of the legislature, and in opposition to a positive act of parliament, enabled tenants in tail to unfetter their estates, in favor of the free circulation of property."

"Judge-made law is subject to certain limitations. It cannot openly declare a new principle of law; it must always take the form of a deduction of some legal principle whereof the validity is admitted, or of some application or interpretation of some statutory enactment." Dicey, Law and Opinion in England 486.

JUDGE'S CERTIFICATE. In English Practice. The written statement of the judge who tried the cause that one of the parties is entitled to costs in the action. It is very important in some cases that these certificates should be obtained at the trial. See Tidd, Pr. 879; 3 Chitty, Pr. 458, 486; 3 Campb. 316; 5 B. & Ald. 796. A statement of the opinion of the court, signed by the judges, upon a question of law submitted to them by the chancellor for their decision.

JUDGE'S NOTES or MINUTES. Short statements noted by a judge on the trial of a cause, of what transpires in the course of the trial.

They usually contain a statement of the testimony of witnesses, of documents offered or admitted in evidence, of offers of evidence, and whether it has been received or rejected, and the like matters.

In general, judge's notes are not evidence of what transpired at a former trial, nor can they be read to prove what a deceased witness swore to on such former trial; for they are no part of the record, and he is not officially bound to make them. But in chancery, when a new trial is ordered of an issue sent out of chancery to a court of law, and it is suggested that some of the witnesses in the former trial are of an advanced age, an order may be made that, in the event of death or inability to attend, their testimony may be read from the judge's notes; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 166.

The employment of court stenographers has practically rendered it unnecessary for trial judges to take notes, at least with a view to a bill of exceptions.

JUDGMENT. In Practice. The conclusion of law upon facts found, or admitted by the parties, or upon their default in the course of the suit. Tidd, Pr. 930; Truett v. Legg, 32 Md. 147; Siddall v. Jansen, 143 Ill. 537, 32 N. E. 384. It may be on the main question, or on all of the questions, if there are several; Tipton v. Tipton's Adm'r, 49 Ohio St. 364, 30 N. E. 826.

The decision or sentence of the law, given by the court of justice or other competent tribunal, as the result of proceedings instituted therein for the redress of an injury. 3 Bla. Com. 395; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Swift, 12 Minn. 437 (Gil. 326). It is said to be the end of the law; Blystone v. Blystone, 51 Pa. 373. It affects only parties and privies; Maloney v. Finnegan, 40 Minn. 281, 41 N. W. 979; Caperton v. Hall, 83 Ala. 171, 3 South. 234; Savage v. McCorkle, 17 Or. 42, 21 Pac. 444; Johnson v. Powers, 139 U. S. 156, 11 Sup. Ct. 525, 35 L. Ed. 112.

The language of judgments, therefore, is not that "it is decreed," or "resolved," by the court; but "it is considered" (consideratum est per curiam) that the plaintiff recover his debt, damages, or possession, as the case may require, or that the defendant do go without day. This implies that the judgment is not so much the decision of the court, as the sentence of the law pronounced and decreed by the court, after due deliberation and inquiry.

Litigious contests present to the courts facts to appreciate, agreements to be construed, and points of law to be resolved. The judgment is the result of the full examination of all these.

In Tudor times and later judgment was used of things we call legislative, as well as of things judicial; Oxf. Dict. s. v. Judgment; Exodus, xxi, 1.

DEFINITIONS. The various forms of judgment are designated by the following terms:

Judgment of assets in futuro, is one against an executor or heir, who holds at the time no property on which it can operate. See QUANDO ACCIDERINT.

Judgment of cassetur breve or billa (that the writ or bill be quashed) is a judgment rendered in favor of a party pleading in abatement to a writ or action. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

Judgment by confession is a judgment entered for the plaintiff in case the defendant, instead of entering a plea, confesses the action, or at any time before trial confesses the action and withdraws his plea and other allegations.

Contradictory judgment is a judgment which has been given after the parties have been heard; either in support of their claims or in their defence. Cox's Ex'rs v. Thomas, 11 La. 366. It is used in Louisiana to distinguish such judgments from those rendered by default.

Judgment de melioribus damnis is a judgment entered at the election of the plaintiff for the highest amount where damages have been differently assessed against several defendants. See DE MELIORIBUS DAMNIS.

Judgment by default is a judgment rendered in consequence of the non-appearance of the defendant. The term is also applied to judgments entered under statutes or rules of court, for want of affidavit of defence, plea, answer, and the like, or for failure to take some required step in the cause.

Judgment in error is a judgment rendered by a court of error on a record sent up from an inferior court.

Final judgment is one which puts an end to a suit.

As to judgment in rem, inter partes, or in personam, see those titles.

Interlocutory judgment is one given in the progress of a cause upon some plea, proceeding, or default which is only intermediate and does not finally determine or complete the suit. 3 Bla. Com. 396.

Judgment on the merits is one rendered after argument and investigation, and when it is determined which party is in the right, as distinguished from a judgment rendered upon some preliminary or merely technical point, or by default, and without trial.

Judgment of nil capiat per breve or per billam is a judgment in favor of the defendant upon an issue raised upon a declaration or peremptory plea.

Judgment by nil dicit is one rendered against a defendant for want of a plea.

Judgment of nolle prosequi is a judgment entered against the plaintiff where after appearance and before judgment he says "he will not further prosecute his suit." Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

Judgment of non obstante veredicto is a judgment rendered in favor of one party without regard to the verdict obtained by the other party.

Judgment of non pros. (non prosequitur) is one given against the plaintiff for a neglect to take any of those steps which it is incumbent on him to take in due time. See NON PROS.

Judgment of non suit, a judgment rendered against the plaintiff when he, on trial by jury, on being called or demanded, at the instance of the defendant, to be present while the jury give their verdict, fails to make an appearance. See NON-SUIT.

Judgment by non sum informatus is one which is rendered when, instead of entering a plea, the defendant's attorney says he is not informed of any answer to be given to the action. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

Judgment nunc pro tunc, is one entered on a day subsequent to the time at which it should have been entered, as of the latter date. See NUNC PRO TUNC.

Judgment pro retorno habendo is a judgment that the party have a return of the goods.

Judgment quando acciderint, is such a judgment against an executor or heir as binds only future assets. See QUANDO ACCIDERINT.

Judgment quod computet is a judgment in an action of account-render that the defendant do account.

Judgment quod partitio fiat is the interlocutory judgment in a writ of partition that partition be made.

Judgment quod partes replacitent is a judgment for repleader. See REPLEADER.

Judgment quod recuperet is a judgment in favor of the plaintiff (that he do recover) rendered when he has prevailed upon an issue in fact or an issue in law other than one arising on a dilatory plea. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

Judgment of respondeat ouster is a judgment given against the defendant after he has failed to establish a dilatory plea upon which an issue in law has been raised.

Judgment of retraxit is one given against the plaintiff where, after appearance and before judgment, the plaintiff enters upon the record that he "withdraws his suit."

See these several titles where they are separately treated.

CLASSIFICATION. Judgments in civil causes, considered with respect to the method of obtaining them, may be thus classified.

1. When the result is obtained by the trial of an issue of fact. In this case the trial may involve questions both of law and fact, but the law is applied incidentally to the trial of the disputed facts, as in the admission or rejection of evidence, the conduct of the trial, and the instruction of the jury or, it may be, in the determination of the question whether the evidence is sufficient either in quality or quantity to be submitted to the jury. In these cases the law is admitted or applied to facts found by a jury or the court.

Judgments upon facts found are the following:

(1) Judgment of nul tiel record (q. v.) occurs when some pleading denies the existence of a record, and issue is joined thereon; the record being produced is compared by the court with the statement in the pleading which alleges it; and if they correspond, the party asserting its existence obtains judgment; if they do not correspond, the other party obtains judgment of nul tiel record.

(2) Judgment upon verdict (q. v.) is the most usual of the judgments upon facts found, and is for the party obtaining the verdict.

(3) Judgment non obstante veredicto is a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff notwithstanding the verdict for the defendant; this judgment is given upon motion (which can only be made by the plaintiff) when, upon an examination of the whole proceedings, it appears to the court that the defendant has shown himself to be in the wrong, and that the issue, though decided in his favor by the jury, is on a point which does not at all better his case; Smith, Act. 161. This is sometimes called a judgment upon confession, because it occurs after a pleading by defendant in confession and avoidance and issue joined thereon, and verdict found for defendant, and then it appears that the pleading was bad in law and might have been demurred to on that ground. The plea being substantially bad in law, of course the verdict which merely shows it to be true in point of fact, cannot avail to entitle the defendant to judgment; while, on the other hand, the plea being in confession and avoidance involves a confession of the plaintiff's declaration, and shows that he was entitled to maintain his action. Sometimes it may be expedient for the plaintiff to move for judgment non obstante veredicto, even though the verdict be in his favor; for, in a case like that described above, if he takes judgment as upon the verdict it seems that such judgment would be erroneous, and that the only safe course is to take it as upon confession; Cro. Eliz. 778; 2 Rolle, Abr. 99. See, also, Cro. Eliz. 214; Rastell, Ent. 622; Pemberton v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 307. See NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO.

(4) A judgment of repleader is given when issue is joined on an immaterial point, or one on which the court cannot give a judgment which will determine the right. On the award of a repleader, the parties must recommence their pleadings at the point where the immaterial issue originated. See REPLEADER. This judgment is interlocutory, quod partes replacitent. See Bacon, Abr. Pleas, 4 (M); Coleson v. Blanton, 3 Hayw. (Tenn.) 159.

2. When the facts are admitted by the parties, leaving only issues of law to be determined, which are as follows:

(1) Judgment upon a demurrer against the party demurring concludes him, because by demurring, a party admits the facts alleged in the pleadings of his adversary, and relies on their insufficiency in law. See DEMURRER.

(2) It sometimes happens that though the adverse parties are agreed as to the facts, and only differ as to the law arising out of them, still these facts do not so clearly appear on the pleadings as to enable them to obtain the opinion of the court by way of demurrer; for on demurrer the court can look at nothing whatever except the pleadings. In such circumstances the statute 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42, § 25, which has been imitated in most of the states, allows them after issue joined, and on obtaining the consent of a single judge, to state the facts in a special case for the opinion of the court, and agree that a judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff or defendant by confession or nolle prosequi immediately after the decision of the case; and judgment is entered accordingly, called judgment on a case stated.

(3) Sometimes at the trial the parties find that they agree on the facts, and the only question is one of law. In such case a verdict pro forma is taken, which is a species of admission by the parties, and is general, where the jury find for the plaintiff generally, but subject to the opinion of the court on a special case, or special, where they state the facts as they find them, concluding that the opinion of the court shall decide in whose favor the verdict shall be, and that they assess the damages accordingly. The judgments in these cases are called respectively, judgment on a general verdict subject to a special case, and judgment on a special verdict. See CASE STATED; POINT RESERVED; VERDICT.

3. Besides these, a judgment may be based upon the admissions or confessions of one only of the parties.

(a) Such judgments when for defendant upon the admissions of the plaintiff are:

(1) Judgment of nolle prosequi, where, after appearance and before judgment, the plaintiff says he "will not further prosecute his suit."

(2) Judgment of retraxit is one where, after appearance and before judgment, the plaintiff enters upon the record that he "withdraws his suit," whereupon judgment is rendered against him. The difference between these is that a retraxit is a bar to any future action for the same cause; while a nolle prosequi is not, unless made after judgment; 7 Bingh. 716; 1 Wms. Saund. 207, n.

(3) A plaintiff sometimes, when he finds he has misconceived his action, obtains leave from the court to discontinue, on which there is a judgment against him and he has to pay costs; but he may commence a new action for the same cause.

(4) A stet processus is entered where it is agreed by leave of the court that all further proceedings shall be stayed: though in form a judgment for the defendant, it is generally, like discontinuance, in point of fact for the benefit of the plaintiff, and entered on his application, as, for instance, when the defendant has become insolvent, it does not carry costs; Smith, Act. 162.

(b) Judgments for the plaintiff upon facts admitted by the defendant are:

(1) Judgment by cognovit actionem, cognovit or confession, where, instead of entering a plea, the defendant chooses to acknowledge the rightfulness of the plaintiff's action.

(2) Judgment by confession relicta verificatione, where, after pleading and before trial, he both confesses the plaintiff's cause of action to be just and true and withdraws or abandons his plea or other allegations. Upon this, judgment is entered against him without proceeding to trial.

Analogous to this is the judgment confessed by warrant of attorney: this is an authority given by the debtor to an attorney named by the creditor, empowering him to confess judgment either by cognovit actionem, nil dicit, or non sum informatus. This differs from a cognovit in that an action must be commenced before a cognovit can be given; 3 Dowl. 278, per Parke, B.; but not before the execution of a warrant of attorney. Judgments by nil dicit and non sum informatus, though they are in fact founded upon a tacit acknowledgment on the part of the defendant that he has no defence to the plaintiff s action, yet as they are commonly reckoned among the judgments by default, will be explained under that head.

4. A judgment is rendered on the default of a party, on two grounds: it is considered that the failure of the party to proceed is an admission that he, if plaintiff, has no just cause of action, or, if defendant, has no good defence; and it is intended as a penalty for his neglect; for which reason, when such judgment is set aside or opened at the instance of the defaulting party, the court generally require him to pay costs.

(a) Such judgments against the defendant are:

(1) Judgment by default is against the defendant when he has failed to appear after being served with the writ; to plead, after being ruled so to do, or, in Pennsylvania and some other states, to file an affidavit of defence within the prescribed time; or, generally, to take any step in the cause incumbent on him. The practice of permitting judgment to be entered by default for want of a sufficient affidavit of defence, when the cause of action is a record, or is sworn to, has become practically universal. Under it courts usually refuse a judgment in cases in which motion on the affidavits raises a doubtful question. When such decisions can be reviewed, an order refusing judgment will rarely be reversed; Ensign v. Kindred, 163 Pa. 638, 30 Atl. 274.

(2) Judgment by non sum informatus is a species of judgment by default, where, instead of entering a plea, the defendant's attorney says he is "not informed" of any answer to be given to the action.

(3) Judgment by nil dicit is rendered against the defendant where, after being ruled to plead, he neglects to do so within the time specified.

(b) Such judgments against the plaintiff are:

(1) Judgment of non pros. (from non prosequitur) is one given against the plaintiff for a neglect to take any of those steps which it is incumbent on him to take in due time.

A judgment by default is just as conclusive between the parties of whatever is essential to support it as one rendered after answer and contest; Last Chance Min. Co. v. Mining Co., 157 U. S. 683, 15 Sup. Ct. 733, 39 L. Ed. 859.

(2) Judgment of non suit (from non sequitur, or ne suit pas) is where the plaintiff, after giving in his evidence, finds that it will not sustain his case, and therefore voluntarily makes default by absenting himself when he is called on to hear the verdict. The court give judgment against him for this default; but the proceeding is really for his benefit, because after a nonsuit he can institute another action for the same cause, which is not the case—except in ejectment, in some states—after a verdict and judgment against him.

Judgments are further classified with reference to the stage of the cause at the time they are rendered.

1. Interlocutory judgments are such as are given in the middle of a cause upon some plea, proceeding, or default which is only intermediate, and does not finally determine or complete the suit. Any judgment leaving something to be done by the court, before the rights of the parties are determined, and not putting an end to the action in which it is entered, is interlocutory; Freem. Judg. § 12; 3 Bla. Com. 396. A judgment which is not final is called "interlocutory"; that is, an interlocutory judgment is one which determines some preliminary or subordinate point or plea, or settles some step, question, or default arising in the progress of the cause, but does not adjudicate the ultimate rights of the parties, or finally put the case out of court. Thus, a judgment or order passed upon any provisional or accessory claim or contention is, in general, merely interlocutory, although it may finally dispose of that particular matter; 1 Black, Judgm. 21.

Such is a judgment for the plaintiff upon a plea in abatement, which merely decides that the cause must proceed and the defendant put in a better plea. But, in the ordinary sense, interlocutory judgments are those incomplete judgments whereby the right of the plaintiff is indeed established, but the quantum of damages sustained by him is not ascertained. This can only be the case where the plaintiff recovers; for judgment for the defendant is always complete as well as final. The interlocutory judgments of most common occurrence are where a demurrer has been determined for the plaintiff, or the defendant has made default, or has by cognovit actionem acknowledged the plaintiff's demand to be just. After interlocutory judgment in such case, the plaintiff must ordinarily take out a writ of inquiry, which is addressed to the sheriff, commanding him to summon a jury and assess the damages, and upon the return of the writ of inquiry final judgment may be entered for the amount ascertained by the jury. It is not always necessary to have a writ of inquiry upon interlocutory judgment; for it is said that "this is a mere inquest of office to inform the conscience of the court, who, if they please, may themselves assess the damages;" 3 Wils. 62, per Wilmot, C. J.; and accordingly, if the damages are matter of mere computation, as, for instance, interest upon a bill of exchange or promissory note, it is usual for the court to refer it to the master or prothonotary, to ascertain what is due for principal, interest, and costs, whose report supersedes the necessity of a writ of inquiry; 1 H. Bla. 541; 4 Price 134. But in actions where a specific thing is sued for, as in actions of debt for a sum certain, the judgment upon demurrer, default, or confession is not interlocutory, but is absolutely complete and final in the first instance.

2. Final judgments are such as at once put an end to the action by determining the right and fixing the amount in dispute. Such are a judgment for defendant at any stage of the suit, a judgment for plaintiff after verdict, a judgment for a specific amount confessed upon warrant of attorney, and a judgment signed upon the return of a writ of inquiry, or upon the assessment of damages by the master or prothonotary. Judgment for plaintiff is final also in an action brought for a specific sum, as debt for a sum certain, although entered upon a demurrer or default, because here, the amount being ascertained at the outset, the only question at issue is that respecting the right, and when that is determined nothing remains to be done. The question what is a final judgment becomes material in many cases where there is a right of review on error or appeal as to final, but not as to interlocutory, judgments. The term final judgment has been variously defined. A judgment which puts an end to the action by declaring that the plaintiff has either entitled himself, or has not, to recover the remedy he sues for. 3 Bla. Com. 398. A judgment which determines a particular cause and terminates all litigation on the same right. 1 Kent 316. A judgment which cannot be appealed from, but is perfectly conclusive as to the matter adjudicated upon; Snell v. Manufacturing Co., 24 Pick. (Mass.) 300; Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 294, 7 L. Ed. 415; Forgay v. Conrad, 6 How. (U. S.) 201, 12 L. Ed. 404. A judgment is final which completely settles the rights of the parties. Brown v. Vancleave, 86 Ky. 381, 6 S. W. 25.

When by any direction of a supreme court of a state, an entire cause is determined, the decision, when reduced to form and entered in the records of the court, constitutes a final judgment, whatever may be its technical designation, and is subject to review in the supreme court of the United States; Board of Com'rs of Tippecanoe County v. Lucas, 93 U. S. 108, 23 L. Ed. 822; but when the state court remands a cause for further proceedings in the lower court it is not a final judgment; McComb v. Knox County, 91 U. S. 1, 23 L. Ed. 185; Smith v. Adams, 130 U. S. 167; 9 Sup. Ct. 566, 32 L. Ed. 895; Rice v. Sanger, 144 U. S. 197, 12 Sup. Ct. 664, 36 L. Ed. 403; Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Osborne, 146 U. S. 354, 13 Sup. Ct. 281, 36 L. Ed. 1002. See DECREE.

3. When an issue in fact, or an issue in law arising on a peremptory plea, is determined for the plaintiff, the judgment is "that the plaintiff do recover," etc., which is called a judgment quod recuperet; Steph. Pl. 126; Com. Dig. Abatement (I 14, I 15); 2 Archb. Pr. 3. When the issue in law arises on a dilatory plea, and is determined for the plaintiff, the judgment is only that the defendant "do answer over," called a judgment of respondeat ouster. In an action of account, judgment for the plaintiff is that the defendant "do account," quod computet. Of these, the last two, quod computet and quod respondeat ouster, are interlocutory only; the first, quod recuperet, is either final or interlocutory, according as the quantum of damages is or is not ascertained at the rendition of the judgment.

4. Judgment in error is either in affirmance of the former judgment; in recall of it for error in fact; in reversal of it for error in law; that the plaintiff be barred of his writ of error, where a plea of release of errors or of the statute of limitations is found for the defendant; or that there be a venire facias de novo, which is an award of a new trial; Smith, Act. 196. A venire facias de novo will always be awarded when the plaintiff's declaration contains a good cause of action, and judgment in his favor is reversed by the court of error; Little Schuylkill Nav. R. & Coal Co. v. Norton, 24 Pa. 470, 64 Am. Dec. 672. Frequently, however, when judgment is reversed, the court of error not merely overturns the decision of the court below, but will give such a judgment as the court below ought to have given; Smith, Act. 196; but see NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO.

NATURE OF THE OBLIGATION. The question whether a judgment is a contract is an old one very much discussed, and in some cases it was held to be such, chiefly upon the authority of Blackstone, who rested his opinion as to the propriety of this classification upon the doctrine of the social compact. The relations of a judgment to the idea of a contract or a quasi-contract have received much attention, in connection with the more careful investigation and accurate understanding of that class of obligations known as quasi-contracts. Blackstone said, "Upon showing the judgment, once obtained, still in full force and yet unsatisfied, the law immediately implies that, by the original contract of society, the defendant hath contracted a debt, and is bound to pay it;" 3 Bla. Com. 160. Of this expression it has been said, "This is certainly a very remarkable statement, and involves large assumptions in regard to 'an original contract of society' and its supposed binding force upon a judgment debtor of the nineteenth century;" Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 188. This early theory of an "original contract of society" has been long since abandoned, and after the time of Blackstone's Commentaries Lord Mansfield, in a carefully considered case, said, "A judgment is no contract, nor can it be considered in the light of a contract, as judicium redditur in invitum;"

3 Burr. 1545. The same view of the question was taken by the United States supreme court, which held that a judgment was not a "contract within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition against impairing the obligation of a contract;" Chase v. Curtis, 113 U. S. 452, 5 Sup. Ct. 554, 28 L. Ed. 1038. That court has, in two other important cases, discussed the question of the nature of a judgment and the obligation which is created by it, and in both cases it strongly dissents from the view of Blackstone and the earlier text-writers. In Lewis v. Shreveport, 108 U. S. 285, 2 Sup. Ct. 634, 27 L. Ed. 728, the court said: "A judgment for damages, estimated in money, is sometimes called, by text-writers, a specialty or contract of record, because it establishes a legal obligation to pay the amount recovered, and, by a fiction of law, a promise to pay is implied where such legal obligation exists. It is on this principle that an action ex contractu will lie upon a judgment. But this fiction cannot convert a transaction, wanting the assent of the parties, into one which necessarily implies it. Judgments for torts are usually the result of violent contests, and, as observed by the court below, are imposed on the losing party, by a higher authority, against his will and protest. The prohibition of the federal constitution was intended to secure the observance of good faith, in the stipulation of parties, against state action. Where a transaction is not based upon any assent of parties, it cannot be said that any faith is pledged with respect to it, and no case arises for the operation of the prohibition." In this case it was held that the conversion of a statutory right to demand compensation for damages caused by a mob into a judgment does not make it a contract within the constitutional prohibition against impairing the obligation of a contract. In the more recent case of Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S. 113, 16 Sup. Ct. 139, 40 L. Ed. 95, in referring to the doctrine of Blackstone, with reference to a foreign judgment, the court held that the idea that such judgment imposed or created an obligation or duty was a remnant of an ancient fiction, and "while the theory in question would serve to explain rules of pleading which originated while the fiction was believed in, it is hardly a sufficient guide at the present day in dealing with questions of international law; and it might be safer to adopt the maxim applied to foreign judgments by Chief Justice Weston, speaking for the supreme judicial court of Maine, judicium redditur in invitum, or as given by Lord Coke, in præsumptione legis judicium redditur in invitum; Jordan v. Robinson, 15 Me. 167; Co. Lit. 248 b." In New York it is held that a judgment is in no sense a contract or agreement; Wyman v. Mitchell, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 316; even a judgment founded upon a contract; McCoun v. R. Co., 50 N. Y. 176; and the same doctrine is asserted with great vigor in a later case; O'Brien v. Young, 95 id. 428; this is also the prevailing doctrine in other states; Larrabee v. Baldwin, 35 Cal. 155; Masterson v. Gibson, 56 Ala. 56; McDonald v. Dickson, 87 N. C. 404; Tyler's Ex'rs v. Winslow, 15 Ohio St. 364; Sprott v. Reid, 3 G. Greene (Ia.) 489, 56 Am. Dec. 549; Rae v. Hulbert, 17 Ill. 572; some cases are contra; Morse v. Toppan, 3 Gray (Mass.) 411; Sawyer v. Vilas, 19 Vt. 43; Taylor v. Root, 43 N. Y. 335. The last case alone was relied on as the authority for the proposition that a judgment is a contract by Harlan, J., dissenting, in Louisiana v. Mayor, supra, but the case so relied upon is in a collection omitted from the regular reports and is in direct contradiction to cases cited supra, in which the opposing doctrine is emphatically stated by the same court, one decided four and the other sixteen years later. See also Burnes v. Simpson, 9 Kan. 658. The later text books concur in supporting the statement already made as to the weight of authority. In one a judgment is said to be not under any circumstances a contract (1 Black, Judgt. § 10), and in another it is said that though a judgment is not a contract, it may be treated in some cases as a contract or as included in that term in certain statutes; 1 Freem. Judgt. § 4. Cases in which the contrary has been held will usually be found within this classification.

Leake (Contracts, 1911 Ed. 105) classifies a judgment as a contract of record.

The civil law conception of the judgment is said to be correctly represented by the Louisiana case of Gustine v. Bank, 10 Rob. La. 412, in which it was held that "a judgment does not create, add to, nor detract from, the indebtedness of a party; it only declares it to exist, fixes its amount, and secures to the suitor the means of enforcing payment, and it is therefore necessary to look to the obligation upon which the judgment is based and ascertain whether it has arisen from contract or quasi-contract, from a delict or quasi-delict, or merely from the operation of law; the obligation is simply enforced and increased or diminished by the decree of the court. "It is declared to exist; it is interpreted; it is applied; it is put in the way of enforcement by the judicial power of the state;" Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 190.

In an interesting criticism upon the terminology adopted by Prof. Keener, in his work on quasi-contracts, a writer in the Harvard Law Review objects very seriously to the use of the term quasi-contract as an expression of the obligation of a judgment, which he says is "founded upon the mandate of the court, and depends for its validity upon the right of a court to adjudicate between contending parties;" 10 Harv. L. Rev. 213.

REQUISITES AND VALIDITY. To be valid, a judicial judgment must be given by a competent judge or court, at a time and place appointed by law, and in the form it requires.

A judgment would be null if the judge had not jurisdiction of the matter, or, having such jurisdiction, he exercised it when there was no court held, or out of his district, or if he rendered a judgment before the cause was prepared for a hearing.

The judgment must confine itself to the question raised before the court, and cannot extend beyond it. For example, where the plaintiff sues for an injury committed on his lands by animals owned and kept carelessly by defendant, the judgment may be for damages, but it cannot command the defendant for the future to keep his cattle out of the plaintiff's land. That would be to usurp the power of the legislature. A judgment declares the rights which belong to the citizen, the law alone rules future actions. The law commands all men, it is the same for all because it is general; judgments are particular decisions, which apply only to particular persons, and bind no others; they vary like the circumstances on which they are founded.

"The validity of a judgment is to be determined by the laws in force when it is rendered, and is not affected by subsequent changes therein;" Anderson v. Hotel Co., 92 Va. 687, 24 S. E. 269. "A judgment is not void merely because it is not dated;" Reed v. Lane, 93 Ia. 83, 65 N. W. 380. Courts should not render judgments which cannot be enforced by any process known to the law; Johnson v. Malloy, 74 Cal. 430, 16 Pac. 228. "In an action at law the court cannot render a conditional judgment;" Coh v. Bright, 2 Mo. App. Rep'r 1191.

The jurisdiction of a foreign court over the person or the subject-matter embraced in the judgment or decree of such court is always open to inquiry, and in this respect a court of another state is to be regarded as a foreign court; Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 11 Sup. Ct. 92, 34 L. Ed. 670; and a judgment in a state court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, is binding upon the parties thereto in a suit in another state between the same parties, where the subject-matter and the issues are the same as in the former suit; Carpenter v. Strange, 141 U. S. 87, 11 Sup. Ct. 960, 35 L. Ed. 640.

OPERATION AND EFFECTS. The judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is presumed to have been rendered in the due exercise of that jurisdiction over person and subject-matter, unless the contrary be shown; Calhoun v. Ross, 60 Ill. App. 309; and after twenty years the presumption of due notice to the parties becomes conclusive; Nickrans v. Wilk, 161 Ill. 76, 43 N. E. 741.

Final judgments are commonly said to conclude the parties; and this is true in general, but does not apply to judgments for defendant on non suit, as in case of non suit, by nolle prosequi, and the like, which are final judgments in one sense, because they put an end to all proceedings in the suit, but which nevertheless do not debar the plaintiff from instituting another suit for the same cause. With this qualification, the rule as to the effect of a judgment is as follows: The judgment of a court of concurrent jurisdiction directly upon the point is, as a plea, a bar, or, as evidence, conclusive, between the same parties upon the same matter directly in question in another court. The judgment of a court of exclusive jurisdiction directly upon the point is in like manner conclusive upon the same matter, between the same parties, coming incidentally in question in another court for a different purpose. But neither the judgment of a concurrent nor exclusive jurisdiction is evidence of any matter which came collaterally in question, though within their jurisdiction, nor of any matter incidentally cognizable, nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment. Duchess of Kingston's Case, 20 Howell, St. Tr. 538; 2 Smith, L. C. 424; Harr. Cont. 295.

The rule above given relates to the effect of a judgment upon proceedings in another court; if the court is the same, of course the rule holds a fortiori. Moreover, all persons who are represented by the parties, and claim under them or in privity with them, are equally concluded by the proceedings. All privies whatever in estate, in blood, or in law, are, therefore, estopped from litigating that which is conclusive upon him with whom they are in privity; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 523, 536. A decree or judgment on a matter outside of the issue raised by the pleading is a nullity; Jones v. Davenport, 45 N. J. Eq. 77, 17 Atl. 570; and so is the judgment of a court which is without jurisdiction; In re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 8 Sup. Ct. 482, 31 L. Ed. 402.

A further rule as to the conclusiveness of judgments is sometimes stated thus: "A judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be impeached or set aside in any collateral proceeding except on the ground of fraud." See, generally, 1 Greenl. Ev. pt. 3, ch. 5; Derr v. Wilson, 84 Ky. 14; Robertson v. Winchester, 85 Tenn. 171, 1 S. W. 781; Hilton v. Bachman, 24 Neb. 490, 39 N. W. 419; Sachse v. Clingingsmith, 97 Mo. 406, 11 S. W. 69; Huling v. Improvement Co., 130 U. S. 565, 9 Sup. Ct. 603, 32 L. Ed. 1045. A judgment of a court having jurisdiction both of the subject-matter and the parties, however erroneous it may be, is a valid, binding, and conclusive judgment, as to the matter in controversy, upon the parties thereto and those claiming under them; Adams v. Franklin, 82 Ga. 168, 8 S. E. 44; Cheatham v. Whitman, 86 Ky. 614, 6 S. W. 595; Bateman v. Miller, 118 Ind. 345, 21 N. E. 292; Allan v. Hoffman, 83 Va. 129, 2 S. E. 602; McCoy v. McCoy, 29 W. Va. 794, 2 S. E. 809; Dowell v. Applegate, 152 U. S. 327, 14 Sup. Ct. 611, 38 L. Ed. 463.

This does not prevent a judgment from being attacked directly by writ of error or other proceeding in the nature of an appeal; and its validity may be impeached in other direct proceedings, as by motion to open or set it aside, and in contests between creditors in regard to the validity of their respective judgments; in this latter class of cases the court will sometimes award a feigned issue to try questions of fact affecting the validity of the judgment.

If the record of a judgment show that it was rendered without service of process or appearance of the defendant, or if that fact can be shown without contradicting the recitals of the record, it will be treated as void in any other state; Com. v. Blood, 97 Mass. 538; Hoffman v. Hoffman, 46 N. Y. 30, 7 Am. Rep. 299; McCauley v. Hargroves, 48 Ga. 50, 15 Am. Rep. 660. But this fact cannot be shown in contradiction of the recitals of the record; Newcomb v. Peck, 17 Vt. 302, 44 Am. Dec. 340; Westervelt v. Lewis, 2 McLean, 511, Fed. Cas. No. 17,446; Wetherill v. Stillman, 65 Pa. 105; contra, Norwood v. Cobb, 24 Tex. 551; Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. (U. S.) 457, 21 L. Ed. 897. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 27. Nor will it be presumed to be void because of the absence of the return of service on the summons; Ferguson's Adm'r v. Teel, 82 Va. 690. A judgment is not less conclusive because rendered by default; Harshman v. Knox County, 122 U. S. 306, 7 Sup. Ct. 1171, 30 L. Ed. 1152; but a default judgment is void unless service has been had according to law; Davidson v. Clark, 7 Mont. 100, 14 Pac. 663; Alderson v. Marshall, 7 Mont. 288, 16 Pac. 576; Furgeson v. Jones, 17 Or. 204, 20 Pac. 842, 3 L. R. A. 620, 11 Am. St. Rep. 808; Railway Co. v. Ryan, 31 W. Va. 364, 6 S. E. 924, 13 Am. St. Rep. 865; and a money judgment against a non-resident defendant who is not personally served within the jurisdiction, and who does not voluntarily appear, is void; Scott v. Streepy, 73 Tex. 547, 11 S. W. 532; Needham v. Thayer, 147 Mass. 536, 18 N. E. 429. In the leading case of Pennoyer v. Neff, it was held that a personal judgment is without any validity, if it be rendered by a state court in an action upon a money demand against a non-resident of the state, who was served by a publication of summons, but upon whom no personal service of process within the state was made and who did not appear; no title to property passes by a sale under an execution issued upon such a judgment; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565.

Matters of defence arising since the judgment may be taken advantage of by a writ of audita querela, or, which is more usual, the court may afford summary relief on motion.

Although a judgment is vitiated by fraud it is not thereby rendered absolutely void; it is valid as between the parties to the fraud, and can be avoided only by a person injured by it; Webster v. Reid, Morr. (Ia.) 467; as where one holding a judgment against a railroad brought a suit to have another judgment, and a lease of the road to secure it, declared void for fraud, and obtained a decree accordingly, it was held, that the decree did not affect the validity of the judgment and the lease as between the parties thereto; Graham v. R. Co., 3 Wall. (U. S.) 704, 18 L. Ed. 247.

All the judgments, decrees, or other orders of courts, however conclusive in their character, are under the control of the court which pronounced them during the term at which they are rendered or entered of record, and may then be set aside, vacated, or modified by the court; Harris v. State, 24 Neb. 803, 40 N. W. 317; Henderson v. Coal & Coke Co., 140 U. S. 25, 11 Sup. Ct. 691, 35 L. Ed. 332; but after the term has ended, unless proceedings to correct the errors alleged have been taken before its close, they can only be corrected by writ of error or appeal, as may be allowed in a court which by law can reverse the decision; Brooks v. R. Co., 102 U. S. 107, 26 L. Ed. 91; St. Louis Public Schools v. Walker, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 603, 19 L. Ed. 650. To this rule there is an exception founded on the common-law writ of coram nobis, which brought before the court where the error was committed certain mistakes of fact not put in issue or passed upon by the court, such as the death of one of the parties when the judgment was rendered, coverture if a female party, infancy and failure to appoint a guardian, error in the process, or mistake of the clerk. But if the error was in the judgment itself, the writ did not lie. What was formerly done by this writ is now attained by motion and affidavits when necessary; Pickett v. Legerwood, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 147, 8 L. Ed. 638. See Fielden v. People, 128 Ill. 595, 21 N. E. 584; Seiler v. Bank, 86 Ky. 128, 5 S. W. 536. A judge has the power to amend a record at any time, so as to make it speak the truth; Brooks v. Stephens, 100 N. C. 297, 6 S. E. 81; Ex parte Henderson, 84 Ala. 36, 4 South. 284.

The general rule is that after the expiration of the term all final judgments, etc., pass beyond the control of the court unless steps be taken during the term to set aside, modify or correct them; Kingman v. Mfg. Co., 170 U. S. 675, 18 Sup. Ct. 786, 42 L. Ed. 1192; Tubman v. R. Co., 190 U. S. 38, 23 Sup. Ct. 777, 47 L. Ed. 946. But a judgment may always be reformed for the purpose of correcting computations in it after the term has ended; A. J. Woodruff & Co. v. U. S., 154 Fed. 861. A court may amend its record of a judgment at a subsequent term to prevent injustice through a mistake of the judge, or counsel, or the clerk, as by correcting the wording of an order of dismissal which did not conform to the motion on which it was based; Bernard v. Abel, 156 Fed. 649, 84 C. C. A. 361.

A court which has once rendered a judgment in favor of a defendant, dismissing the cause and discharging him from further attendance, cannot, after the end of the term, without notice to the defendant, set that judgment aside and render a new judgment against the defendant; such judgment is void and not entitled to credit in another state; Wetmore v. Karrick, 205 U. S. 141, 27 Sup. Ct. 434, 51 L. Ed. 745.

Equity will enjoin the enforcement of a judgment secured by perjury where the judgment debtor used diligence, but failed to discover the perjury in time to be available at the trial; Boring v. Ott, 138 Wis. 260, 119 N. W. 865, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1080.

A joint judgment which is void as to one of the parties is void as to all; 6 Mackey 548. A judgment against several persons, one of whom dies before its rendition, is voidable as to all; Claflin v. Dunne, 129 Ill. 241, 21 N. E. 834, 16 Am. St. Rep. 263.

MERGER. The question how far the cause of action is merged in a judgment sometimes becomes very material, as affecting the right to sue on the former in another jurisdiction. "The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction discharges the obligation which the action is brought to enforce. The judgment may operate either to merge the original obligation, in so far as judgment is rendered for the plaintiff; or to estop the plaintiff from subsequently setting up his original claim, in so far as judgment is rendered for the defendant." Harriman, Contr. 295.

The effect of the merger of the cause of action is often very serious; one having a right of action against two or more persons may, by recovering judgment against one of them, lose his remedy against the others. As where the plaintiff, in an action upon a joint contract obligation elected to enter judgment against one defendant, in default of plea or answer, the judgment was held a bar to a subsequent action against the other, the debt being merged in the judgment; Davison v. Harmon, 65 Minn. 402, 67 N. W. 1015; O'Hanlon v. Scott, 89 Hun 44, 35 N. Y. Supp. 31; but the cause of action does not merge in a void judgment; McCadden v. Slauson, 96 Tenn. 586, 36 S. W. 378.

Where the cause of action has arisen in a foreign country, the plaintiff has the option to sue on a judgment obtained there, or ignoring the judgment to proceed upon the original cause of action, in both cases subject to certain exceptions, as where the judgment is to enforce a penalty or for a tort on which there is no action here; Lyman v. Brown, 2 Curt. C. C. 559, Fed. Cas. No. 8,627. This choice of remedy does not exist in the case of judgments in sister states; a cause of action in such case is merged and the remedy is confined to an action on the judgment; Freeman, Judgments § 241; Henderson v. Staniford, 105 Mass. 504, 7 Am. Rep. 551; Barnes & Drake v. Gibbs, 31 N. J. L. 317, 86 Am. Dec. 210; Baxley v. Linah, 16 Pa. 241, 55 Am. Dec. 494; contra, Beall's Adm'r v. Taylor's Adm'r, 2 Gratt. (Va.) 532, 44 Am. Dec. 398. The rule as stated is subject to the exception that there is no merger of the cause of action in the judgment unless the latter is general. Where the judgment was in a penal action, the action was held not to abate on the death of a party, because the judgment having been entered, the action thereafter had the attributes of a contract; Carr v. Rischer, 119 N. Y. 117, 23 N. E. 296.

It has been held that in an action of tort, the tort merges in the judgment, so as to allow an attachment as on the contract; Johnson v. Butler, 2 Ia. 535; although a tort cannot be set up as a counter-claim, the judgment upon it may, as constituting a contract; Taylor v. Root, *43 N. Y. 335; so it was held that a judgment so far extinguished the original debt that a set-off available in the suit on the debt by reason of a claim against an assignor of said debt was no longer available after judgment; Ault v. Zehering, 38 Ind. 429.

The doctrine of the merger of the cause of action is not carried to such extreme as to defeat the equities or just rights of the defendant or plaintiff. Thus it has been held with some frequency that it can be shown against a judgment that the same was obtained upon a debt which was provable against defendant in proceedings in insolvency, and being so provable was barred by the discharge in insolvency, and as the discharge barred the debt, it barred the judgment resting on the debt; Clark v. Rowling, 3 N. Y. 216, 53 Am. Dec. 290.

Where the defendant was sued in Massachusetts, in debt on a judgment, he pleaded a discharge under the New York insolvency law, and it was held that the court would look behind the judgment and see whether under the facts giving rise to it, it was so discharged; Betts v. Bagley, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 572; and, on the other hand, a judgment apparently discharged by insolvency proceedings, but found to be based on notes executed before the passage of the insolvent law was held not affected by the latter, and enforceable; Wyman v. Mitchell, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 316; so it was held that a judgment does not prevent a creditor from taking an attachment as a non-resident creditor; Owens v. Bowie, 2 Md. 457.

Though a judgment is to some purposes a merger of the original contract, and constitutes a new debt, yet when the essential rights of the parties are influenced by the nature of the original contract, the court will look into the judgment for the purpose of ascertaining what the original contract was.

The principle of the cases last cited has been frequently enunciated. In Clark v. Rowling, 3 N. Y. 216, 53 Am. Dec. 290, Hurlbert, J., said that "a judgment, instead of being regarded strictly as a new debt, is sometimes held to be merely the old debt, in a new form, so as to prevent a technical merger from working injustice." In Betts v. Bagley, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 572, Shaw, C. J., said; "Although a judgment, to some purposes, is considered as a merger of the former, and as constituting a new cause of action, yet when the essential rights of parties are influenced by the nature of the original contract, the court will look into the judgment for the purpose of ascertaining what the nature of such original cause of action was. Any other decision would carry the technical doctrine of merger to an inconvenient extent and cause it to work injustice."

FORM. The form of the judgment varies according to the nature of the action and the circumstances, such as default, verdict, etc., under which it is obtained. Anciently great particularity was required in the entries made upon the judgment roll; but now, even in the English practice, the drawing up the judgment roll is generally neglected, except in cases where it is absolutely necessary, as where it is desirable to give the proceedings in evidence on some future occasion; Smith, Act. 169. In this country the roll is rarely if ever drawn up, the simple entry on the trial list and docket, "judgment for plaintiff," or "judgment for defendant," being all that is generally considered necessary; and though the formal entries are in theory still required to constitute a complete record, yet if such record should subsequently be needed for any purpose, it may be made up after any length of time from the skeleton entries upon the docket and trial list. See Wilkins v. Anderson, 11 Pa. 399. When the record is thus drawn up in full, the ancient formalities must be observed, at least in a measure.

JUDGMENT ON VERDICT. A judgment on a verdict virtually overrules all demurrers to the declaration; Fleming Oil & Gas Co. v. Oil Co., 37 W. Va. 645, 17 S. E. 203. The form of such verdicts varies according to the action and frequently also with the character in which a party sues or is sued.

In account, judgment for the plaintiff is interlocutory in the first instance, that the defendant do account, quod computet; Kitchen v. Strawbridge, 4 Wash. C. C. 84, Fed. Cas. No. 7,854.

In assumpsit, judgment for the plaintiff is that he recover the damages assessed by the jury, and full costs of suit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 100. Judgment for the defendant is that he recover his costs. For the form, see Tidd, Pr. Forms 165.

In case, trover, and trespass, the judgment is the same in substance, and differs but slightly in form from that of assumpsit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 100, 147.

A judgment in trover passes title to the goods in question; Mitchell v. Shaw, 53 Mo. App. 652; Griel v. Pollak, 105 Ala. 249, 16 South. 704; but only where the value of the thing converted is included in the judgment; 5 H. & N. 288; and it is held that an unsatisfied judgment does not pass the property; L. R. 6 C. P. 584; Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 1, 16, 18 L. Ed. 129; Pryor v. Cattle Co., 6 N. M. 44, 27 Pac. 327. In a somewhat analogous case it was held that a judgment for the value of horses lost to the owner by negligence of the defendant, of itself passes title to the horses to the defendant becoming liable for their value; St. Louis, A. & T. Ry. Co. v. McKinsey, 78 Tex. 298, 14 S. W. 645, 22 Am. St. Rep. 54. See Floyd v. Browne, 1 Rawle (Pa.) 121, 18 Am. Dec. 602. Where personal property had been sold and partly paid for, title being retained by the vendor, and he recovered in trover both the property and instalments due, on appeal it was directed that the judgment be discharged on payment within a time limited of purchase money, interest, and cost, otherwise the original judgment below to stand of full force; Morton v. Frick Co., 87 Ga. 230, 13 S. E. 463.

In covenant, judgment for the plaintiff is that he recover the amount of his damages as found which he has sustained by reason of the breach or breaches of the defendant's covenant, together with costs of suit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 116. Judgment for defendant is for costs.

In debt, judgment for the plaintiff is that he recover his debt, and in general nominal damages for the detention thereof; and in cases under the 8th & 9th Will. III. c. 11, for successive breaches of a bond conditioned for the performance of a covenant, it is also awarded that he have execution for such damages, and likewise full costs of suit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 108. But in some penal and other actions the plaintiff does not always recover costs; Esp. Pen. Act. 154; Hull, Costs 200; Bull. N. P. 333; Clark v. Dewey, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 251. Judgment for defendant is generally for costs; but in certain penal actions neither party can recover costs; Clark v. Dewey, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 251. See Tidd, Pr. Forms 176.

In detinue, judgment for the plaintiff is in the alternative that he recover the goods or the value thereof if he cannot have the goods themselves, with damages for the detention, and costs; 1 Chitty, Pl. 121, 122; Thompson v. Musser, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 458, 1 L. Ed. 222. See Tidd, Pr. Forms 187.

If judgment in any of the above personal actions is against the defendant in the character of executor, it confines the liability of the defendant for the debt or damages to the amount of assets of the testator in his hands, but leaves him personally liable for costs. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 168. If the executor defendant has pleaded plene administravit, judgment against him confines his liability to such amount of the assets as shall hereafter come to his hands. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 174. A general judgment for costs against an administrator plaintiff is against the estate only.

A judgment against an executor or heir where the plea is false, to the defendant's own knowledge, may be a general judgment as if the recovery was for his own debt, but in other cases a judgment against an executor is generally special, to be levied of the goods or land of his testator; 7 Taunt. 580.

A judgment on a covenant of a married woman against her separate estate may be entered as a personal judgment against her; Williamson v. Cline, 40 W. Va. 194, 20 S. E. 917; such judgment must be entered in a special form; 14 Ch. D. 837; but the record need show no special fact fixing her liability; Jester v. Hunter, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 690.

In dower, judgment for demandant is interlocutory in the first instance with the award of a writ of habere facias seisinam, and inquiry of damages, on the return of which final judgment is rendered for the value of the land detained, as ascertained by the jury, from the death of the husband to the suing out of the inquisition, and costs of suit. See the form, 3 Chitty, Pl. 583.

In ejectment, judgment for plaintiff is final in the first instance, that he recover the term, together with the damages assessed by the jury, and the costs of suit, with award of the writ of habere facias possessionem, directing the sheriff to put him in possession. See the form, 3 Bla. Com. App. xii.; Tidd, Pr. Forms 188. A judgment in ejectment is conclusive as to title between the parties thereto, unless the jury find for the plaintiff less than the fee; McDowell v. Sutline, 78 Ga. 142, 2 S. E. 937. A consent verdict in ejectment is conclusive on the parties and their privies; id.

In partition, judgment for plaintiff is also interlocutory in the first instance; quod partitio fiat with award of the writ de partitione facienda, on the return of which final judgment is rendered,— "therefore it is considered that the partition aforesaid be held firm and effectual forever," quod partitio facta firma et stabilis in perpetuam teneatur; Co. Litt. 169. See the form, 2 Sell. Pr. 319, 2d ed. 222.

In replevin. If the replevin is in the detinuit, i. e. where the plaintiff declares that the chattels "were detained until replevied by the sheriff," judgment for plaintiff is that he recover the damages assessed by the jury for the taking and unjust detention, or for the detention only where the taking was justifiable, and also his costs; Easton v. Worthington, 5 S. & R. (Pa.) 130; Hamm. N. P. 488. If the replevin is in the detinet, i. e. where the plaintiff declares that the chattels taken are "yet detained," the jury in giving a verdict for plaintiff find, in addition to the above, the value of the chattels each separately; for the defendant will perhaps restore some, in which case the plaintiff is to recover the value of the remainder; Hamm. N. P. 489; Fitzh. N. B. 159 b; Easton v. Worthington, 5 S. & R. (Pa.) 130.

If the replevin be abated, the judgment is that the writ or plaint abate, and that the defendant, having avowed, have a return of the chattels.

If the plaintiff is nonsuited, the judgment for defendant, at common law, is that the chattels be restored to him, and that without his first assigning the object of the taking, because by abandoning his suit the plaintiff admits that he had no right to dispossess the defendant by prosecuting the replevin. The form of this judgment is simply "to have a return," pro retorno habendo, without adding the words "to hold irreplevisable;" Hamm. N. P. 490. For the form of judgments of nonsuit under the statutes 21 Hen. VIII. c. 19, and 17 Car. II. c. 7, see Hamm. N. P. 490; 2 Chitty, Pl. 161; 8 Wentw. Pl. 116; 5 S. & R. 132; 1 Saund. 195, n. 3; 2 id. 286, n. 5. In these cases the defendant has the option of taking his judgment pro retorno habendo at common law; Easton v. Worthington, 5 S. & R. (Pa.) 130, supra; 3 Term 349.

When the avowant succeeds upon the merits, the common-law judgment is that he "have return irreplevisable;" for it is apparent that he is by law entitled to keep possession of the goods; Wallace v. Elder, 5 S. & R. (Pa.) 145; Hamm. N. P. 493; 1 Chitty, Pl. 162. For the form of judgment in such case under the statutes last mentioned, see Hamm. N. P. 494.

AFTER VERDICT, the general form of judgment for plaintiff in actions on contracts sounding in damages, and in actions founded on torts unaccompanied with violence, is this: "Therefore it is considered that the said A B do recover against the said C D his damages aforesaid, and also —— for his said costs and charges, by the court now here adjudged of increase to the said A B, with his assent; which said damages, costs, and charges in the whole amount to ——. And the said C D in mercy, etc." In debt for a sum certain, the general form is "—— that the said A B do recover against the said C D his said debt, and also —— for his damages which he has sustained, as well on occasion of detaining the said debt as for his costs and charges by him about his suit in this behalf expended, by the court now here adjudged to the said A B, and with his assent. And the said C D in mercy, etc." In actions founded on torts accompanied with violence, the form of judgments for plaintiff is, "—— that the said A B do recover against the said C D his damages aforesaid, and also —— for his said costs and charges by the court now here adjudged of increase to the said A B, and with his consent; which said damages, costs, and charges in the whole amount to ——. And let the said C D be taken, etc."

Final judgment for the defendant is in these words: "Therefore it is considered that the said A B take nothing by his writ but that he be in mercy, etc. (or that he and his pledges to prosecute be in mercy, etc.), and that the said C D do go thereof without day, etc. And it is further considered ——." Then follows the award of costs and of execution therefor. See Tidd, Pr. Forms 189.

This is the general form of judgment for defendant, whether it arise upon interlocutory proceedings or upon verdict, and whatever be the form of action. This is sometimes called judgment of nil capiat per breve or per billam; Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97.

The words "and the said —— in mercy, etc., or, as expressed in Latin, quod sit in misericordia pro falso clamore suo, were formerly an operative part of the judgment, it being an invariable rule of the common law that the party who lost his cause was punished by amercement for having unjustly asserted or resisted the claim. And on this account pledges of prosecution were required of the plaintiff before the return of the original, who were real and responsible persons and liable for these amercements. But afterwards the amercements ceased to be exacted,—perhaps because the payment of costs took their place,—and, this portion of the judgment becoming mere matter of form, the pledges returned were the fictitious names John Doe and Richard Roe. Bacon, Abr. Fines, etc. (C 1); 1 Ld. Raym. 273.

The words "and let the said —— be taken," in Latin, capiatur pro fine, which occur above in the form of judgment in actions founded on torts accompanied with violence, were operative at common law, because formerly a defendant adjudged to have committed a civil injury with actual violence was obliged to pay a fine to the king for the breach of the peace implied in the act, and was liable to be arrested and imprisoned till the fine was paid. This was abolished by stat. 5 W. & M. c. 12; but the form was still retained in entering judgment against defendant in such actions. See Gould, Pl. §§ 38, 82; Bacon, Abr. Fines, etc. (C 1); 1 Ld. Raym. 273; Style 346.

These are called, respectively, judgments of misericordia and of capiatur.

JUDGMENTS IN OTHER CASES. On a plea in abatement, either party may demur to the pleading of his adversary or they may join issue.

On demurrer, judgment for the plaintiff is that the defendant have another day to plead in chief, or, as it is commonly expressed, that he answer over; quod respondeat ouster; and judgment for defendant is that the writ be quashed; quod cassetur billa or breve. But if issue be joined, judgment for plaintiff is quod recuperet, that he recover his debt or damages, and not quod respondeat; judgment for defendant is the same as in the case of demurrer, that the writ be quashed. But the plaintiff may admit the validity of the plea in abatement, and may himself pray that his bill or writ may be quashed, quod cassetur billa or breve, in order that he may afterwards sue or exhibit a better one; Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97; Lawes, Civ. Pl. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 195. Judgment on demurrer in other cases, when for the plaintiff, is interlocutory in assumpsit and actions sounding in damages, and recites that the pleading to which exception was taken by defendant appears sufficient in law, and that the plaintiff ought, therefore, to recover; but the amount of damages being unknown, a court of inquiry is awarded to ascertain them. See the form, Tidd, Pr. Forms 181. In debt it is final in the first instance. See the form, id. p. 181. Judgment on demurrer when for the defendant is always final in the first instance, and is for costs only. See the form, id. 195.

Judgment by default, whether by nil dicit or non sum informatus, is in these words, in assumpsit or other actions for damages, after stating the default: "wherefore the said A B ought to recover against the said C D his damages on occasion of the premises; but because it is unknown to the court, etc., now hear what damages the said A B hath sustained by means of the premises, the sheriff is commanded, etc." Then follows the award of the writ of inquiry, on the return of which final judgment is signed. See the forms, Tidd, Pr. Forms 165. In debt for a sum certain, as on a bond for the payment of a sum of money, the judgment on default is final in the first instance, no writ of inquiry being necessary. See the form, id. 169.

Plaintiff cannot take a default where there is no declaration on file; Woodruff v. Matheney, 55 Ill. App. 350; and a default cannot be entered after defendant has interposed a plea in bar; Green v. Jones, 102 Ala. 303, 14 South. 630; but the mere filing of an answer will not prevent a judgment by default, there must also be a subsequent appearance by defendant to protect his rights; Lytle v. Custead, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 490, 23 S. W. 451.

It is error to enter judgment by default while a plea to part and a demurrer to the rest of the declaration are on file; Race v. Hall Ass'n, 50 Ill. App. 131; but the rendition of a judgment by default, where the petition states the facts sufficient to maintain the cause of action, is within the discretion of the trial judge; In re Downs, 3 Ohio Dec. 56; and so is the opening of a judgment by default; St. Mary's Hospital v. Ben. Co., 60 Minn. 61, 61 N. W. 824; Jackson v. Brunor, 17 Misc. 339, 39 N. Y. Supp. 1080; where an answer failed to reach the court in time through the fault of the postmaster, it was held that a default should be set aside; Walrad v. Walrad, 55 Ill. App. 668.

Judgment by cognovit actionem is for the amount admitted to be due, with costs, as on a verdict. In Pennsylvania by statute, the plaintiff may take judgment for an amount admitted to be due and proceed to trial for the remainder of his claim.

Judgment of non pros. or non suit is final, and is for defendant's costs only, which is also the case with judgment on a discontinuance or nolle prosequi.

A court has inherent power to enter a judgment on the pleadings; Stratton's Independence v. Dines, 126 Fed. 968.

A judgment by default is just as conclusive an adjudication between the parties of whatever is essential to support the judgment as one rendered after answer and contest; Last Chance Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 157 U. S. 692, 15 Sup. Ct. 733, 39 L. Ed. 859; 1 Freem. Judgt. § 330; Big. Esto. 77. So of a judgment on demurrer; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Slaght, 205 U. S. 122, 27 Sup. Ct. 442, 51 L. Ed. 738.

Some courts refuse to give effect to a judgment by consent as a judgment in invitum, and admit the judgment record only as evidence of the agreement reached by the parties; Jenkins v. Robertson, L. R. 1 H. L. 117, 122. The position is based on the theory that no matter upon which the court has not exercised its judicial mind by determining the respective rights of the litigants and pronouncing judgment accordingly can be considered res judicata. As a matter of definition, this proposition is scarcely open to question. But the parties have caused the court to place their deliberate agreement upon the record as a formal judgment; and except in case of mistake or fraud, it would seem that they should be estopped from later denying it, even though the strict principles of res judicata are not applicable; Kelly v. Town of Milan, 21 Fed. 842, 863. In fact the majority of jurisdictions disregard the argument of definition and hold the judgment binding upon the parties according to its terms; Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. U. S., 113 U. S. 261, 5 Sup. Ct. 460, 28 L. Ed. 971. The original cause of action is considered merged in the judgment, and to a later suit between the same parties on the same subject-matter a plea of res judicata is a complete defense. Where, however, the action is simply dismissed by the consent of the parties, there is not the same ground for the argument of estoppel; Lindsay v. Allen, 112 Tenn. 637, 82 S. W. 171. It states only that the parties have agreed to a dismissal and nothing more.

A judgment is conclusive as to all the media concludendi and it cannot be impaired either in or out of the state by showing that it was based on a mistake of law; Fauntleroy v. Lum, 210 U. S. 230, 28 Sup. Ct. 641, 52 L. Ed. 1039; but when the matter decided is not embraced within the issue, it avoids the judgment; Munday v. Vail, 34 N. J. L. 418, followed in Reynolds v. Stockton, 140 U. S. 268, 11 Sup. Ct. 773, 35 L. Ed. 464.

Matters of Practice. Of docketing the judgment. By the stat. 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 20, all final judgments are required to be regularly docketed: that is, an abstract of the judgment is to be entered in a book called the judgment-docket; 3 Bla. Com. 398. And in these states the same regulation prevails. See Rockwood v. Davenport, 37 Minn. 533, 35 N. W. 377, 5 Am. St. Rep. 872. Besides this, an index is required to be kept in England of judgments confessed upon warrant of attorney, and of certain other sorts of judgments; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 396, n. In most of the states this index is required to include all judgments. The effect of docketing the judgment is to notify all interested persons, including purchasers or incumbrancers of land upon which the judgment is a lien, and subsequent judgment creditors, of the existence and amount of the judgment. Freem. Judg. § 343. Judgments only become liens from the time they are rendered, or notice thereof is filed in the register's office of the county where the property is situated; Fogg v. Blair, 133 U. S. 534, 10 Sup. Ct. 338, 33 L. Ed. 721. In Pennsylvania, the judgment index is for this purpose conclusive evidence of the amount of a judgment in favor of a purchaser of the land bound thereby, but not against him: if the amount indexed is less than the actual amount, the purchaser is not bound to go beyond the index; but if the amount indexed is too large, he may resort to the judgment-docket to correct the mistake; Appeal of Hance, 1 Pa. 408. A failure to index the abstract of a judgment is fatal to the lien; Nye v. Moody, 70 Tex. 434, 8 S. W. 606; Nye v. Gribble, 70 Tex. 458, 8 S. W. 608; Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Hesser, 77 Ia. 381, 42 N. W. 325, 4 L. R. A. 122, 14 Am. St. Rep. 297.

Now, in England, judgments, in order to affect purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors, must be registered in the High Court, and renewed every five years. See 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, s. 5.

Of the time of entering the judgment. After verdict a brief interval is allowed to elapse before signing judgment, in order to give the defeated party an opportunity to apply for a new trial, or to move in arrest of judgment, if he is so disposed. This interval, in England, is four days; Smith, Actions 150. In this country it is generally short; but, being regulated either by statute or by rules of court, it of course may vary in the different states, and even in different courts of the same state.

Judgments are in their nature equal till they are reversed, in what court soever they are obtained; a judgment in a court of record by grant, is equal to a judgment in a court of record by prescription; and a judgment in a court of pie poudre is equal to a judgment in any of the superior courts. Eldon, L. C., in 3 Swanst. 575.

As to whether a judgment rendered in form against a defendant who died after service or appearance and before trial is void, or merely voidable, the authorities are irreconcilably in conflict; Moehlenpah v. Mayhew, 138 Wis. 564, 119 N. W. 826, citing note in 49 L. R. A. 153.

JUDGMENT BOOK. A book which is required to be kept by a clerk among the records of the court, for the entry of judgments. Code N. Y. § 279.

JUDGMENT CREDITOR. See CREDITOR, JUDGMENT.

JUDGMENT DEBT. See DEBT.

JUDGMENT IN PERSONAM. See JUDGMENT INTER PARTES; IN PERSONAM.

JUDGMENT IN REM. An adjudication pronounced upon the status of some particular subject-matter by a tribunal having competent authority for that purpose. 3 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 2015.

An adjudication against some person or thing, or upon the status of some subject-matter; which, wherever and whenever binding upon any person, is equally binding upon all persons. Bartero v. Bank, 10 Mo. App. 78.

The universal effect of a judgment in rem depends upon the principle that it is a solemn declaration, proceeding from an accredited quarter, concerning the status of the thing adjudicated upon; which very declaration operates accordingly upon the status of the thing adjudicated upon, and ipso facto, renders it such as it is thereby declared to be; 3 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 2015–16, 2032, 2043.

The most frequent cases of such judgment are found in the courts exercising jurisdiction of cases in admiralty. So also a foreign court in a case of divorce which is recognized as establishing the status of a person is a judgment in rem.

In Pennoyer v. Neff, the court said: "It is true that, in a strict sense, a proceeding in rem is one taken directly against property, and has for its object the disposition of property, without reference to the title of individual claimants; but, in a larger and more general sense, the terms are applied to actions between parties, where the direct object is to reach and dispose of property owned by them, or of some interest therein. Such are cases commenced by attachment against the property of debtors, or instituted to partition real estate, foreclose a mortgage, or enforce a lien. So far as they affect property in this state, they are substantially proceedings in rem in the broader sense which we have mentioned." 95 U. S. 734, 24 L. Ed. 565. A judgment against a railway company in favor of an assignee of claims for labor performed for a subcontractor, which forecloses a statutory lien on the property of the company for debt, and orders a sale of the property, cannot be construed as a judgment in personam; Austin & N. W. R. Co. v. Rucker, 59 Tex. 587. See IN REM.

JUDGMENT INTER PARTES or IN PERSONAM. One which operates only upon those who have been duly made parties to the record and their privies, being against a person merely, and not settling the status of any person or thing. See 3 Sm. L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 2016; JUDGMENT; JUDGMENT IN REM.

JUDGMENT NISI. A judgment entered on the return of the nisi prius record with the postea indorsed, which will become absolute according to the terms of the "postea" unless the court out of which the nisi prius record proceeded shall, within the first four days of the following term, otherwise order.

Under the compulsory arbitration law of Pennsylvania, on filing the award of the arbitrators, judgment nisi is to be entered, which judgment is to be valid as if it had been rendered on a verdict of a jury, unless an appeal is entered within the time required by law.

JUDGMENT NOTE. A promissory note given in the usual form, and containing, in addition, a power of attorney to appear and confess judgment for the sum therein named. On this account it is not negotiable; Sweeney v. Thickstun, 77 Pa. 131; but see Osborn v. Hawley, 19 Ohio 130.

It is negotiable by the Uniform Neg. Instr. Act. For a list of states in which that act is in force, see NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

It usually contains a number of stipulations as to the time of confessing the judgment; Sherman v. Baddely, 11 Ill. 623; against appeal and other remedies for setting the judgment aside; see Frasier v. Frasier, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 80; 2 Cowp. 465; Lake v. Cook, 15 Ill. 356; an attorney's commission for collection, waiver of exemption, and other conditions.

It does not authorize the confession of a judgment in favor of the original payee of the note after he had ceased to be the owner, even though he may have the note in his possession, and such judgment may be attacked collaterally without violating the full faith and credit clause of the federal constitution in an action in another state; National Exchange Bank v. Wiley, 195 U. S. 257, 25 Sup. Ct. 70, 49 L. Ed. 184.

JUDGMENT PAPER. In English Practice. An incipitur of the pleadings, written on plain paper, upon which the master will sign judgment. 1 Archb. Pr. 229, 306, 343.

JUDGMENT RECORD. In English Practice. A parchment roll on which are transcribed the whole proceedings in the cause, deposited and filed of record in the treasury of the court, after signing of judgment. 3 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 601. See JUDGMENT ROLL. In American practice, the record is signed, filed, and docketed by the clerk, all of which is necessary to suing out execution; Graham, Pr. 341.

JUDGMENT RECOVERED. A plea by a defendant that the plaintiff has already recovered that which he seeks to obtain by his action. This was formerly a species of sham plea, often put in for the purpose of delaying a plaintiff's action. M. & W.

JUDGMENT ROLL. In English Law. A record made of the issue roll (which see), which, after final judgment has been given in the cause, assumes this name. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 97; 3 Chitty, Stat. 514; Freem. Judg. § 75. The Judicature Act of 1875 requires every judgment to be entered in a book by the proper officer. It has been abolished, as such, in New Jersey; Jennings v. Philadelphia & R. Co., 23 Fed. 571.

There is said to be hopeless confusion in the cases as to what constitutes the judgment roll. All the cases agree that the complaint, the summons and, most of them, the return on the summons, the affidavit for publication in case of constructive service, and papers of that sort; Terry v. Gibson, 23 Colo. App. 273, 128 Pac. 1129, citing many cases, and also 1 Gr. Evid. 511, and Freem. Judg. § 78.

JUDICARE. To judge; to decide or determine judicially; to give judgment or sentence.

JUDICATIO. In Civil Law. Judging; the pronouncing of sentence, after hearing a cause. Halifax, Civil Law b. 3, c. 8, no. 7.

JUDICATORES TERRARUM. Certain tenants in Chester, who were bound by their tenures to perform judicial functions. In case of an erroneous judgment being given by them, the party aggrieved might obtain a writ of error out of Chancery, directing them to reform it. They then had a month to consider of the matter. If they declined to reform their judgment, the matter came on writ of error before the king's bench; and if the court of king's bench held the judgment to be erroneous they forfeited £100 to the king by the custom. Jenk. Cent. (ii. 34), p. 71.

JUDICATURE. The state of those employed in the administration of justice; and in this sense it is nearly synonymous with judiciary. This term is also used to signify a tribunal; and sometimes it is employed to show the extent of jurisdiction: as, the judicature is upon writs of error, etc. Comyn, Dig. Parliament (L 1). And see Comyn, Dig. Courts (A).

JUDICATURE ACTS. The English acts under which the present system of courts was organized and is continued.

The statutes of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 66, and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 77, which went into force Nov. 1, 1875, with amendments in 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 9, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 78, and 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 68, made most important changes in the organization of, and methods of procedure in, the superior courts of England. See COURTS OF ENGLAND.

These acts provide for a concurrent administration of legal and equitable remedies, according to seven rules, which substantially provide that any one of the courts, included in the acts shall give the same equitable relief to any plaintiff or defendant claiming it as would formerly have been granted by chancery; equitable relief will be granted against third persons, not parties, who shall be brought in by notice; all equitable estates, titles, rights, duties, and liabilities will be taken notice of as in chancery; no proceeding shall be restrained by injunction, but every matter of equity on which an injunction might formerly have been obtained may be relied on by way of defence, and the courts may in any cause direct a stay of proceedings. Subject to these and certain other provisions of the act, effect shall be given to all legal claims and demands, and all estates, titles, rights, duties, obligations, and liabilities, existing by the common law, custom, or statute, as before the acts; the new courts shall grant, either absolutely or on terms, all such legal or equitable remedies as the parties may appear entitled to; so that all matters may be completely and finally determined, and multiplicity of legal proceedings avoided.

Eleven new rules of law are established, which will be found in the act of 1873, c. 66, § 25, amended by the act of 1875, c. 77, § 10, of the following nature; 1. In the administration of insolvent estates, the same rules shall prevail as may be in force under the law of bankruptcy; 2. No claim of a cestui que trust against his trustee, for property held on an express trust, shall be barred by any statute of limitations; 3. A tenant for life shall have no right to commit equitable waste, unless such right is expressly conferred by the instrument creating the estate; 4. There shall be no merger by operation of law only, of any estate, the beneficial interest in which would not be deemed merged in equity; 5. A mortgagor entitled for the time being to the possession of the profits of land, as to which the mortgagee shall have given no notice of his intention to take possession, may sue for such possession, or for the recovery of such profits, or to prevent or recover damages in respect of any trespass, or other wrong relative thereto, in his own name only, unless the cause of action arises upon a lease or other contract made jointly with any other person; 6. Any absolute assignment of a chose in action, of which express notice in writing shall have been given to the debtor, shall pass the legal right thereto from the date of notice, and all remedies for the same, and the power to give a good discharge: provided, that if the debtor, etc., shall have had notice of any conflicting claims to such debt, he shall be entitled to call upon such claimants to interplead; 7. Stipulations as to time or otherwise, which would not have been deemed of the essence of the contract in equity, shall receive the same construction as formerly in equity; 8. A mandamus or an injunction may be granted, or a receiver appointed by an interlocutory order, which may be made either unconditionally or on terms; and an injunction may be granted to prevent threatened waste or trespass, whether the estates be legal or equitable, or whether the person against whom the injunction is sought is or is not in possession under any claim of title, or does or does not claim a right to do the act sought to be restrained under color of title; 9. In proceedings arising from collisions at sea, where both ships are in fault, the rules hitherto in force in the court of admiralty shall prevail; 10. In questions relating to the custody of infants, the rules of equity shall prevail; 11. Generally, in all matters in which there is any conflict between the rules of common law and the rules of equity, the latter shall prevail.

By the act of 1891, c. 53, to settle doubts said to exist on the subject, it was enacted that the high court should be a prize court within the meaning of the Naval Prize Act of 1864, and the jurisdiction was assigned to the probate, divorce, and admiralty division of the court. An appeal was given only to the queen in council. By the same act the house of lords was authorized to call in the aid of assessors in admiralty cases.

The act of 1894, c. 16, was directed mainly to the restricting the right of appeal.

The division of the legal year into terms is abolished, so far as relates to the administration of justice, but where they are used as a measure for determining the time at or within which any act is required to be done, they may continue to be referred to. Numerous other regulations are established for the arrangement of business and course of procedure under the new system for which reference must be had to the acts. We will merely note that nothing is to affect the law relating to jury trials, and the existing forms of procedure are to be used as far as consistent with these acts. It was provided that nothing should affect the practice or procedure in—1. Criminal proceedings; 2. Proceedings on the crown side of the queen's bench division; 3. Proceedings on the revenue side of the exchequer division; 4. Proceedings for divorce and matrimonial causes. The Chancery Procedure Acts and the Common Law Procedure Acts remain in full force, except so far as impliedly or expressly repealed by the Judicature Acts. Many sections of the former Acts are repealed by subsequent legislation, all which may be found in Chitty's English Statutes, where the acts are published together as amended

See COURTS OF ENGLAND.

JUDICATURE ACTS (IRELAND). The act of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 57, which went into operation Jan. 1, 1878, established a supreme court of judicature in Ireland, under which acts and subsequent ones a system essentially similar in its constitution to that in England is in force. See COURTS OF IRELAND.

JUDICES. Judges. See JUDEX.

JUDICIAL ACT. See ACT.

JUDICIAL ADMISSIONS. Admissions of the party which appear of record in the proceedings of the court. See ADMISSIONS.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL. In English Law. A tribunal composed of members of the privy council, established in 1833. It consists of the Lord Chancellor, the six Lords of Appeal, if Privy Councillors, and such other members of the Privy Council as have held any high judicial office in the United Kingdom, India, or the colonies. It is the court of final appeal from the ecclesiastical courts, from the courts of India, the colonies, the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man. It is the ultimate court of appeal for 350 millions of persons, administering all the different systems of law of the countries under its appellate jurisdiction, and exercising a notable influence on the tenor and course of law in some of those jurisdictions, especially Indian law.

As to Australia, no appeal thereto lies from the supreme court in cases affecting the limits of the constitutional power of the Australian states, unless by special allowance of the supreme court. The South African constitution forbids an appeal except on special leave of the king in council.

See an article in 44 Am. L. Rev. 160; COURTS OF ENGLAND.

JUDICIAL CONVENTIONS. Agreements entered into in consequence of an order of court; as, for example, entering into a bond on taking out a writ of sequestration. Penniman v. Barrymore, 6 Mart. La. (N. S.) 494.

JUDICIAL DECISIONS. The opinions or determinations of the judges in causes before them. Hale, Hist. Cr. Law 68; 5 M. & S. 185. See DICTUM; JUDGE-MADE LAW; PRECEDENTS.

JUDICIAL DISCRETION. See DISCRETION.

JUDICIAL DOCUMENTS. The papers and proceedings which constitute or become part of the record of a litigation. They include the writs, pleadings, documentary proofs, verdicts, inquisitions, judgment, and decrees incident to a cause or judicial proceeding.

Inquisitions, examinations, depositions, affidavits, and other written papers, when they have become proofs of its proceedings and are found remaining on the files of a judicial court, are judicial documents. A deposition after being received and filed as such is a judicial document and can only be proved as such, and is not admissible as a written statement or confession of deponent. It cannot be received in part and excluded in part; Hammatt v. Emerson, 27 Me. 308, 46 Am. Dec. 598.

Judicial documents are thus classified by Starkie: 1. Judgments, decrees, and verdicts. 2. Depositions, examinations, and inquisitions, taken in the course of a legal process. 3. Writs, warrants, pleadings, bills, and answers, etc., which are incident to judicial proceedings.

As to the admissibility and effect of such documents, see, generally, Stark. Ev., Sharsw. ed. [316].

JUDICIAL DUTY. Within the meaning of a constitution, such a duty as legitimately pertains to an officer in a department designated by the constitution as judicial. State v. Hathaway, 115 Mo. 36, 21 S. W. 1081.

JUDICIAL FUNCTION. The exercise of the judicial faculty or office.

The capacity to act in the specific way which appertains to the judicial power, as one of the powers of government.

The term is used to describe generally those modes of action which appertain to the judiciary as a department of organized government, and through and by means of which it accomplishes its purposes and exercises its peculiar powers.

JUDICIAL LEGISLATION. See JUDGE-MADE LAW.

JUDICIAL LIABILITY. See JUDGE.

JUDICIAL MORTGAGE. In Louisiana. The lien resulting from judgments, whether these be rendered on contested cases, or by default, whether they be final or provisional, in favor of the person obtaining them.

JUDICIAL NOTICE. A term used to express the doctrine of the acceptance by a court for the purposes of the case, of the truth of certain notorious facts without requiring proof.

It is the process whereby proof by parol evidence is dispensed with, where the court is justified by general considerations in assuming the truth of a proposition without requiring evidence from the party setting it up. See Wigm. Ev. § 2565. This power is to be exercised with caution. Care must be taken that the requisite notoriety exists. Every reasonable doubt should be resolved promptly in the negative; Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 37, 41, 23 L. Ed. 200.

The classes of facts of which judicial notice will be taken are judicial, legislative, political, historical, geographical, commercial, scientific, and artistic, in addition to a wide range of matters arising in the ordinary course of nature or the general current of human affairs which rest entirely upon acknowledged notoriety for their claims to judicial recognition; Wade, Notice 1403.

If unacquainted with such fact, the court may refer to any person or any document or book of reference for its satisfaction in relation thereto; or may refuse to take judicial notice thereof unless and until the party calling upon it to take such notice produces any such document or book of reference; Steph. Ev. art. 59. It may inform itself from such sources as it deems best; Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 37, 23 L. Ed. 200.

Judicial notice is not conclusive. That a matter is judicially noticed means merely that it is taken as true without the offering of evidence by the party upon whom the burden of proof ordinarily rests. But the opponent is not prevented from disputing the matter by evidence, if he believes it disputable; Wigm. Ev. § 2567. Judicial notice must be requested, as it is a dispensation from producing evidence; Wigm. Ev. § 2568. A court will not take judicial notice of a fact merely because it knows it; Lenahan v. People, 5 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 268.

Judicial notice will be taken of the following:

Laws, Domestic Statutes and Ordinances. Public acts within the state or territory in which the court is held; Parent v. Walmsly's Adm'r, 20 Ind. 82; Jones v. U. S., 137 U. S. 214, 11 Sup. Ct. 80, 34 L. Ed. 691; Wright v. Hawkins, 28 Tex. 452; People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481; Inhabitants of Belmont v. Inhabitants of Morrill, 69 Me. 314; McDonald v. State, 80 Wis. 407, 50 N. W. 185; and of a law regulating within certain districts the right of fishing; Burnham v. Webster, 5 Mass. 266; the right of navigation; Hammond's Lessee v. Inloes, 4 Md. 138; the lumber trade; Pierce v. Kimball, 9 Greenl. (Me.) 54, 23 Am. Dec. 537; or the sale of liquor; Levy v. State, 6 Ind. 281; State v. Cooper, 101 N. C. 688, 8 S. E. 134; of the corporate existence and names of the counties of a state; Trammell v. It has been said that the courts should exercise this power with caution. Care must be taken that the requisite notoriety exists. Every reasonable doubt upon the subject should be solved promptly in the negative; per Swayne, J., in Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 43, 23 L. Ed. 200. In that case the court took judicial notice, in a patent case, of the principle of operation of an ice-cream freezer, and the subject of judicial notice was fully discussed.

JUDICIAL OFFICE. A term used in 34 & 35 Vict. c. 91, to define qualifications of additional members of the judicial committee of the Privy Council.

JUDICIAL POWER. The authority vested in the judges.

The authority exercised by that department of government which is charged with the declaration of what the law is and its construction so far as it is written law.

The power to construe and expound the law as distinguished from the legislative and executive functions.

The use of the term judicial power in sec. 2, Art. III. of the Constitution of the United States furnished an occasion to Mr. Justice Miller for a comment upon the difficulty of defining the term; he says, "It will not do to answer that it is the power exercised by the courts, because one of the very things to be determined is what power they may exercise. It is, indeed, very difficult to find any exact definition made to hand. It is not to be found in any of the old treatises, or any of the old English authorities or judicial decisions, for a very obvious reason. While in a general way it may be true that they had this division between legislative and judicial power, yet their legislature was, nevertheless, in the habit of exercising a very large part of the latter. The house of lords was often the court of appeals; and parliament was in the habit of passing bills of attainder as well as enacting convictions for treason and other crimes.

"Judicial power is, perhaps, better defined in some of the reports of our own courts than in any other place, and especially so in the Supreme Court of the United States, because it has more often been the subject of comment there, and its consideration more frequently necessary to the determination of questions arising in that court than anywhere else. It is the power of a court to decide and pronounce a judgment and carry it into effect between persons and parties who bring a case before it for decision." Miller, Const. U. S. 314.

"But it has now long been settled in England that the interpretation of statute law belongs to the judiciary alone, and in this country they have claimed and obtained an equal control over the construction of constitutional provisions." Sedg. Const. L. 18.

"The power conferred upon courts in the strict sense of that term; courts that compose one of the great departments of the government; and not power in its judicial nature, or quasi judicial, invested from time to time in individuals, separately or collectively, for a particular purpose and limited time." Charge to Grand Jury, 1 Blatch. 635, Fed. Cas. No. 18,261; Gilbert v. Priest, 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 444, 448.

There can be no delegation of judicial power; Zonker v. Cowan, 84 Ind. 395; or of a judicial duty; McCoy v. Able, 131 Ind. 417, 30 N. E. 528, 31 N. E. 453; Southern Oil Co. v. Wilson, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 534, 56 S. W. 429.

"Judicial power is never exercised for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the judge; always for the purpose of giving effect to the will of the legislature; or, in other words, to the will of the law." Osborn v. Bank, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 738, 6 L. Ed. 204.

Nevertheless, leaving out of question the greater necessity of real definition and separation of the legislative and judicial power in American constitutional law there is a distinction between judicial power and political power which was fully recognized in English law, continues to be so in American law, and is entirely independent of the case growing out of the constitutional delimitation and separation of the three powers of government.

"The courts have made a distinction between political and judicial questions and uniformly decline to assume jurisdiction in cases which involve only the former. A political question is one over which the courts decline to take cognizance, in view of the line of demarkation between the judicial branch of the government on the one hand and the executive and legislative branches on the other. Such questions most generally arise when there is an attempt made to prevent the incumbents of either the legislative or executive departments of the government from the performance of some act which such incumbent claims the right to perform by virtue of his office, or to compel him to perform some act which he declines or refuses to perform; Parker v. State, 133 Ind. 178, 32 N. E. 836, 33 N. E. 119, 18 L. R. A. 567."

Courts have no authority to review the acts of co-ordinate departments of the state government within their respective spheres, but they have jurisdiction to determine whether any department has acted within its constitutional sphere; McCully v. State, 102 Tenn. 509, 53 S. W. 134, 46 L. R. A. 567; and they may control the actions of officers and official boards, if they have been without any foundation in the facts before them and are capricious and arbitrary; 4 Burr. 2186; State v. Matthews, 77 S. C. 357, 57 S. E. 1099; Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 25 L. Ed. 676; City of Atlanta v. Wright, 119 Ga. 207, 45 S. E. 994; St. Louis v. Mfg. Co., 139 Mo. 560, 41 S. W. 244, 61 Am. St. Rep. 474; but the power will be exercised with much circumspection and only in clear cases, and the courts must take care not to substitute their own discretion for that of the officers or board whose refusal to act is under consideration, and to interfere by mandamus only when the facts so clearly show the duty of the board or officer to act that there is really no room for the exercise of a reasonable discretion against the doing of the act, the performance of which the court is asked to require; State v. Matthews, 81 S. C. 414, 62 S. E. 695, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 735, 128 Am. St. Rep. 919, 16 Ann. Cas. 182. See 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 735, note.

The rule is recognized definitely by the United States supreme court that the discretion of an executive officer will not be interfered with either by mandamus or injunction; U. S. v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378, 26 L. Ed. 167; Brown v. Hitchcock, 173 U. S. 473, 19 Sup. Ct. 485, 43 L. Ed. 772; National Life Ins. Co. v. Ins. Co., 209 U. S. 317, 28 Sup. Ct. 541, 52 L. Ed. 808, citing Bates & G. Co. v. Payne, 194 U. S. 106, 24 Sup. Ct. 595, 48 L. Ed. 894, and Moyer v. Peabody, 212 U. S. 78, 29 Sup. Ct. 235, 53 L. Ed. 410, where it was held that the existence of insurrection empowers the governor to suppress it by the national guard and to seize and imprison those resisting, and that he is the final judge of the necessity of such action; in such case public danger warrants the substitution of executive for judicial process and the ordinary rights of individuals must yield to what the executive deems the necessity of a critical moment. But courts must prevent deprivation of property by unlawful action of the executive department, though reluctant to interfere with it; Ballinger v. U. S., 216 U. S. 240, 30 Sup. Ct. 338, 54 L. Ed. 464.

An executive officer may be compelled by mandamus to perform a ministerial duty but when he has discretion it cannot be compelled; Hawkins v. Governor, 1 Ark. 570, 33 Am. Dec. 346, where a mandamus to compel the governor to issue a commission was refused. As to the power to issue mandamus to executive officers, see EXECUTIVE POWER.

"When a decision of questions of fact is committed by Congress to the judgment and discretion of the head of a department, his decision thereon is conclusive;" and "even upon mixed questions of law and fact, or of law alone, his action will carry with it a strong presumption of its correctness, and the courts will not ordinarily review it, though they may have the power and will occasionally exercise the right of so doing;" Bates & G. Co. v. Payne, 194 U. S. 106, 24 Sup. Ct. 595, 48 L. Ed. 894. And the courts frequently sustain statutes which make the liberty of a citizen wholly dependent on the decision of facts by an executive officer without appeal; U. S. v. Ju Toy, 198 U. S. 253, 25 Sup. Ct. 644, 49 L. Ed. 1040. The supreme court of Massachusetts has also gone very far in sustaining the action of executive officers or boards exercising quasi judicial authority. The cases will be found collected with a number of federal cases in an article by Edmund M. Parker, on "Executive Judgments and Executive Legislation" in 20 Harv. L. Rev. 116.

The distinction between judicial and political questions was fully considered in Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sen. 444, and it was held by Lord Hardwicke, L. C., that while the dispute as to original boundaries between provinces was a political question to be determined by the king and council, yet where the case arose under an agreement between the parties it was a judicial question.

In The Nabob of Carnatic v. East India Co. (1 Ves. Jr. 371) a plea that the defendant was invested with sovereign powers, and therefore not answerable with respect to the exercise of them in a court of justice, was overruled; but after the case came to hearing the bill was dismissed upon the ground that the case involved a treaty between persons acting as independent states, and the circumstance that the defendants were subjects merely with relation to England had nothing to do with the matter which was not a subject of private municipal jurisdiction; 2 id. 56.

The Cherokee nation was held to be a state but not a foreign state in the sense of the constitution, and therefore could not maintain an action against the state of Georgia in the courts of the United States; Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 1, 8 L. Ed. 25. In this case Chief Justice Marshall said that the propriety of interposition by the court to control the state legislature "savors too much of the exercise of political power to be within the province of the judicial department." Mr. Justice Thompson in a dissenting opinion which upheld the jurisdiction was careful to say, "I do not claim for this court the exercise of jurisdiction upon any matter properly falling under the denomination of political power." And again: "I do not claim as belonging to the judiciary the exercise of political power. That belongs to another branch of the government. The protection and enforcement of many rights secured by treaties most certainly do not belong to the judiciary. It is only where the rights of persons or property are involved, and when such rights can be presented under some judicial form of proceedings, that courts of justice can interpose relief." Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet (U. S.) 51, 75, 8 L. Ed. 25. See also New York v. Connecticut, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 4, 1 L. Ed. 715.

It was very earnestly discussed in one of the early cases concerning the boundary between two states, whether the jurisdiction in such cases, now so well established, was included in the judicial power as understood by the constitution of the United States, and it was held that although the constitution did not in terms extend the judicial power to all controversies between two or more states, yet it in terms excluded none, whatever might be their nature or object; Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 657, 9 L. Ed. 1233. In this case the court recognized the distinction between political and civil controversies and held that the case in question was the latter because it depended first upon a fact, and second upon the question whether an agreement between the states was void or valid, both of these presenting not a political but a judicial controversy. And it was said that where there was submission by sovereigns or states of a controversy between them, from that moment the question ceased to be a political one but comes immediately within the judicial power for determination by a court.

In Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cra. (U. S.) 137, 2 L. Ed. 60, the question whether the commission of a public officer was improperly withheld from him was held to be a judicial and not a political question, but a mandamus to the secretary of state to deliver it was refused because the court had not original jurisdiction to issue it. But in Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 475, 18 L. Ed. 437, an injunction to restrain the president from executing the reconstruction acts was refused on the ground that the bill presented a political and not a judicial question.

In Georgia v. Stanton, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 50, 71, 18 L. Ed. 721, it was said that the distinction between judicial and political power is so generally acknowledged in the jurisprudence both of England and of this country that we need do no more than refer to some of the authorities on the subject. The suit invoked the power of the court to restrain the secretary of war and his subordinates from executing acts of congress which, it was alleged, would annul and abolish an existing state government. In refusing the injunction the court said that it could hardly be denied that the case called for the judgment of the court upon political questions and upon rights, not of persons or property, but of a political character. "For the rights for the protection of which our authority is invoked, are the rights of sovereignty, of political jurisdiction, of government, of corporate existence as a state, with all its constitutional powers and privileges. No case of private rights or private property infringed, or in danger of actual or threatened infringement, is presented by the bill, in judicial form, for the judgment of the court."

Among the questions which have been held to be judicial questions and within the powers of the courts to decide are: Whether an amendment to the constitution has been constitutionally adopted; Kadderly v. Portland, 44 Or. 118, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222; even though a contrary declaration had been made by the political department of the state government; Gabbert v. Ry. Co., 171 Mo. 84, 70 S. W. 891; whether an apportionment of senators and representatives involved an abuse of legislative discretion by a defiance of the constitutional limitations thereon; Brooks v. State, 162 Ind. 568, 70 N. E. 980; whether license fees are a reasonable imposition under the police power; Margolies v. Atlantic City, 67 N. J. L. 82, 50 Atl. 367; whether legislation ostensibly under the police power is really such when the constitutionality of the act is assailed; Halter v. Nebraska, 205 U. S. 34, 27 Sup. Ct. 419, 51 L. Ed. 696, 10 Ann. Cas. 525, affirming 74 Neb. 757, 105 N. W. 298, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1079, 121 Am. Dec. 189; whether the use authorized by the legislature of a reservoir in connection with the water supply is or is not a public use; Miller v. Fitchburg, 180 Mass. 32, 61 N. E. 277; whether a right has vested; Rice v. State, 7 Ind. 332; the power of laying out or altering streets vested in the mayor and aldermen; Parks v. Boston, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 218, 19 Am. Dec. 322; the power to hear and decide proceedings for the summary disposition of tenants, and a writ of prohibition was granted to restrain the recorder from proceeding in such case after his judicial powers had been transferred to the city judge; People v. Russel, 19 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 136; People v. Russel, 29 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 176; whether certain corporations shall be accepted as sole security; In re American Banking & Trust Co., 17 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 274; whether a tax is invalidated by failure of assessors to comply with the law; Plumer v. Board of Sup'rs, 46 Wis. 163, 50 N. W. 416 (but an act making tax bills prima facie evidence of the validity of the charge against the property was not an invasion of the judicial power; City of St. Joseph v. Farrell, 106 Mo. 437, 17 S. W. 497.)

What occupations are the proper subjects of the police power is a judicial question; Price v. People, 193 Ill. 114, 61 N. E. 844, 55 L. R. A. 588, 86 Am. St. Rep. 306; and the legislative determination as to what is the proper exercise of that power is not final, but is subject to the supervision of the courts; Moeschen v. Tenement House Department of City of New York, 203 U. S. 583, 27 Sup. Ct. 781, 51 L. Ed. 328, affirming Tenement House Department of City of New York v. Moeschen, 179 N. Y. 325, 72 N. E. 231, 70 L. R. A. 704, 103 Am. St. Rep. 910, 1 Ann. Cas. 439 (the tenement house case); but unless the court can see that a given police regulation has no just relation to the object which it purports to carry out or to the protection of the public health, safety, comfort, or morals, the decision of the legislature as to its necessity or reasonableness is conclusive; Odd Fellows' Cemetery Ass'n v. City of San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 73 Pac. 987.

On the other hand, among the cases which have been held to be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the political branches of the government and not reviewable by the courts are: What property shall be embraced within a tax district, and whether it shall be taxed for municipal purposes; Kettle v. City of Dallas, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 632, 80 S. W. 874; whether property is benefited by the construction of a sewer (in the absence of fraud); Prior v. Const. Co., 170 Mo. 439, 71 S. W. 205; the reasonableness of a municipal license tax upon the privilege of conducting a business; Woodall v. City of Lynchburg, 100 Va. 318, 40 S. E. 915; the reasonableness of a particular regulation of a useful business; Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152; the amount and necessity of taxation; Street v. City of Columbus, 75 Miss. 822, 23 South. 773; the repeal of a charter which was expressly subject to repeal, unless in a case where the legislature should exercise its power in such a manner as to violate clearly the principles of natural justice; Lothrop v. Stedman, 42 Conn. 583, 13 Blatchf. 134, Fed. Cas. No. 8,519; the adjustment of a debt between a new county and the old one from which it had been carved out; Riverside County v. San Bernardino County, 134 Cal. 517, 66 Pac. 788; the disposal of property belonging to the state; State v. Bryan, 50 Fla. 293, 39 South. 929; whether an appropriation shall or shall not be made; Carr v. State, 127 Ind. 204, 26 N. E. 778, 11 L. R. A. 370, 22 Am. St. Rep. 624; whether a system of classification adopted by the legislature is good or vicious; State v. Kolsem, 130 Ind. 434, 29 N. E. 595, 14 L. R. A. 566; the applicability of a general law to a particular case, and the necessity or propriety of a special law; Weston v. Ryan, 70 Neb. 211, 97 N. W. 347, 6 Ann. Cas. 922; Smith v. Grayson County, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 153, 44 S. W. 921.

It is within the province of the political department of the government to define the method of securing imperfect rights of property ceded to the United States after war, and the courts have no jurisdiction to enforce them except as authorized by congress; U. S. v. Sandoval, 167 U. S. 278, 17 Sup. Ct. 868, 42 L. Ed. 168; nor is it within the judicial power to make any declaration upon the question of the length of time required for the pacification of Cuba and when the United States troops shall be withdrawn; Neely v. Henkel, 180 U. S. 109, 21 Sup. Ct. 302, 45 L. Ed. 448; id. 180 U. S. 126, 21 Sup. Ct. 308, 45 L. Ed. 457; so in ascertaining the tribal and other relations of Indians, the courts generally follow the political departments; Farrell v. U. S., 110 Fed. 942, 49 C. C. A. 183.

If a statute is constitutional there is no power in the courts to consider whether it is in accordance with a reasonable or wise public policy; McGuire v. Ry. Co., 131 Ia. 340, 108 N. W. 902, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 706; Prison Association v. Ashby, 93 Va. 667, 25 S. E. 893; Rice v. Ionia Probate Judge, 141 Mich. 692, 105 N. W. 17; nor can the motives of the legislature be considered in a judicial proceeding; State v. R. Co., 166 Ind. 580, 77 N. E. 1077; nor the motives of the executive in issuing a warrant for the rendition of a prisoner; In re Moyer, 12 Idaho 250, 85 Pac. 897, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 227, 118 Am. St. Rep. 214.

"If a contract is entered into in behalf of the government, and a contest should arise about the meaning of the contract, it belongs to the judiciary to decide what that contract was, and if the legislature decide that question, they invade the province of the judiciary;" Commonwealth v. Beaumarchais, 3 Call (Va.) 169, quoted in Bedford v. Shilling, 4 S. & R. (Pa.) 401, 8 Am. Dec. 718.

The determination of county boundaries in a suit by a county for taxes or by one county against another is not a question for judicial inquiry but a political one; Norfolk Southern Ry. Co. v. Washington County, 154 N. C. 333, 70 S. E. 634; Guadalupe County v. Wilson County, 58 Tex. 228; but under a statute passed subsequently to this case, the court exercised jurisdiction; Cameron's Heirs v. State, 95 Tex. 545, 68 S. W. 508; but would not do so as to surveys made before the enactment of the law; Rockwell County v. Kaufman County, 69 Tex. 172, 6 S. W. 431. In another state a question of boundaries between counties was held to be one not for commissions of either county, but for a court of chancery under a taxpayer's bill; Union Pacific R. Co. v. Carr, 1 Wyo. 96. If there is a statute, the method prescribed by it must be resorted to before recourse can be had to the courts; Parish of Caddo v. Parish of De Soto, 114 La. 366, 38 South. 273.

The separation of the three departments among which, in modern systems, the sovereign powers of government are distributed, and to some extent the difficulty involved in the effort to distribute those powers, are discussed in the title EXECUTIVE POWER, which, with the title LEGISLATIVE POWER, should be read and referred to in connection with the present title.

Separation of powers, though generally adopted, does not always rest upon a constitutional basis. Whether it does or does not do so affects very materially the judicial power with respect to its stability and independence. In England, not only the supreme legislative authority, but the power of deciding upon the constitutionality of its acts, is vested in parliament, there being no fundamental law in the nature of a written constitution to which that body must conform. The phrase English constitution is one of constant use, and there is, undoubtedly, a body of fundamental principles which are recognized as having been finally accepted as inviolable and which are grouped under that name. A recent writer says that it "is made up of certain views which have been read out of or read into English history and embodied in certain governmental acts,"—"it is in a large part a matter of theory and opinion," and "the substance of it may be summed up in one sentence: All the powers of government are in the hands of parliament." Macy, Eng. Const. 14, 16.

Practically modern opinion is undivided as to this omnipotence of parliament, and under no form of law can its action be restrained or reviewed. Such restraint as is imposed upon it is a moral one which exists only in the potency of certain principles which, in the United States, have been crystallized into constitutional safeguards, while in England they remain, as it were, in solution, affecting, however, and giving form and tone to the government and the body politic. The highest judicial power in England is subordinate to the legislative power, and bound to obey any law that parliament may pass, although it may, in the opinion of the court, be in conflict with the principles of Magna Carta, or the Petition of Rights. Taney, C. J., in Gordon v. U. S., 117 U. S. 699, appendix.

It is doubtless true that the parliament could, as a matter of law, abolish all courts and assume to itself the administration of justice, but even in that case there would still exist the judicial power now administered by courts, and it would be equally distinct as now from the legislative function, even if both were exercised by the same agency of government.

The French constitution of Sept. 3, 1791 (the first written constitution in Europe), recited that the judicial power cannot in any case be exercised by the legislative body or by the king, and that tribunals cannot interfere with the exercise of the legislative power nor suspend the execution of the laws, nor encroach upon administrative functions, nor cite any administrators to appear before them on account of their functions. This comprehensive limitation is attributed by a thoughtful writer on this subject to the French historical associations, which were hostile to any judicial competency to criticise legislation for unconstitutionalty. It is to this influence that the writer referred to attributes the different views on this subject which are found in the French constitution referred to and that of the United States. Coxe, Jud. Pow. 78. From a historical review on the subject the author last cited concludes that in France long before 1787 the French judicial power had been used to declare legislation to be void because contrary to the views of right entertained by the court; and that, by the further contrast to American views, the judicial power in question existed under an unwritten constitution and was expressly prohibited under a subsequent written constitution.

Under the Swiss constitution the federal government is organized to some extent upon the idea of the separation of powers; but as it has been observed, "the separation of powers is not very strictly observed between the federal assembly and the federal council, nor indeed . . . between the judicial authority and the political federal authorities;" Adams and Cunningham on the Swiss Confederation 48. The Swiss federal tribunal is bound by all laws passed by the federal assembly without qualification; which is not competent to decide whether the federal law be constitutional or unconstitutional; this is declared not to be a judicial question, nor is it such a question whether a constitution or a law of a canton contains anything contrary to the constitution of the confederation, such a question is extra-judicial and is decided by the federal assembly; Vincent, Swiss Government §4, 142. Another writer says that the Swiss federal court, although instituted in imitation of the American, differs from it in an essential point, while in the United States judicial power alone extends to declaring a law unconstitutional, under the Swiss constitution some points of cantonal law are reserved and the federal legislature is made the sole judge of its own powers and the authorized interpreter of the constitution; 1 Bryce, Am. Com. 254.

In Germany it is said that the law of a state must yield in case of conflict between it and constitutional law of the empire, and that the judicial tribunal must decide between them, but that it was uncertain whether such tribunal can decide upon a question of the constitutionality of a law of the empire; Coxe, Jud. Pow. 96.

In Canada it is said that the supreme court and the privy council in England have concurred in recognizing the rights of provincial courts to pass upon the constitutionality of the laws enacted by the provincial legislatures and the Dominion parliament; Doutre, Const. of Canada, preface.

For an extended historical commentary on previous systems of law, with respect to the limitations of judicial power in passing upon the validity or effect of legislation, see Coxe, Jud. Pow. pt. 1.

The English doctrine of the absolute inviolability of a legislative act never did acquire a footing in this country. It was repudiated by James Otis nearly a quarter of a century before the framing of the American constitution. He contended before the superior court of judicature for the province of Massachusetts, that the validity of statutes must be determined by courts of justice. This doctrine afterwards became the principle of American constitutional law. Before 1787, the colonial courts refused to grant writs of assistance, on the ground that general writs of assistance were unconstitutional; Quincy (Mass.) 504; and see Bowman v. Middleton, 1 Bay (S. C.) 252, where an act passed by the colonial legislature was declared void; Den v. Singleton, Mart. (N. C.) 49. Judicial questions of a national character were, under the confederation, determined by a court; Articles of Confederation, Art. 9; and the framers of the constitution ordained and established a judiciary as a necessary department, and used in it the phrase judicial power as one well understood and not needing definition in the instrument itself; Federalist, Nos. 22, 28, 80, 81; 3 Elliott's Deb. 142, 143.

It is the settled law in this country that the judicial power extends to and includes the determination of the constitutionality and validity of legislative acts, although the propriety of this conclusion is still sometimes challenged. For a discussion of the subject, its history, and the authorities, see CONSTITUTIONAL.

But a court has no power to declare unconstitutional a duly enacted statute simply because it may seem to the court that such legislation does not conform to the general theory upon which the government is founded; Reeves v. Corning, 51 Fed. 774.

The constitution declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Art. 3, s. 1.

It has been remarked that the essential character of its judiciary is a distinct recognition by the constitution of the nationality of the federal government; Pom. Const. L. § 108.

By the constitutions of the several states, the judicial power is vested in such courts as are enumerated in each respectively.

A provision in a state constitution that the powers of government shall be divided into three distinct departments, each confided to separate persons, operates to forbid the exercise by a court or judge of a power not judicial; Appeal of Norwalk St. Ry. Co., 69 Conn. 576, 37 Atl. 1080, 38 Atl. 708, 39 L. R. A. 794. And a constitutional grant of judicial authority is power to administer remedies for remedial rights; to render judicial decisions, so called, in actions or special proceedings to enforce the same; State v. Chittenden, 127 Wis. 468, 107 N. W. 500.

Where a state constitution expressly provided that judges of the supreme court should not exercise non-judicial powers or powers of appointment, the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius was applied, and the power of appointment of local officers by judges of other courts was held valid, the exercise of such power having been according to the usage of the state; Com. v. Collier, 213 Pa. 138, 62 Atl. 567, 5 Ann. Cas. 92.

There is nothing in the constitution of the United States to forbid or prevent the legislature of a state from exercising judicial functions; Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co., 211 U. S. 210, 29 Sup. Ct. 67, 53 L. Ed. 150; or from conferring judicial power on non-judicial bodies; Consolidated Rendering Co. v. Vermont, 207 U. S. 541, 28 Sup. Ct. 178, 52 L. Ed. 327, 12 Ann. Cas. 658; but even in the absence of special limitations in the state constitutions, legislatures cannot exercise powers in their nature essentially judicial; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 391. The different classes of power have been apportioned to different departments, and as all derive their authority from the same instrument, there is an implied exclusion of each department from exercising the functions conferred upon the others; Cooley, Const. Lim. 106. The legislative power cannot from its nature be assimilated to the judicial; the law is made by the one, and applied by the other; Merrill v. Sherburne, 1 N. H. 204, 8 Am. Dec. 52; Greenough v. Greenough, 11 Pa. 494, 51 Am. Dec. 567; Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. v. Com'rs of Clinton County, 1 Ohio St. 81; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 391; In re Ridgefield Park, 54 N. J. L. 288, 23 Atl. 674. In the oft-repeated phrase of Chief Justice Marshall, "the legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes, the law." Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. (U. S.) 1, 46, 6 L. Ed. 253.

Two capital distinctions have been noted between the judicial power in England and in the United States,—the first grows out of the existence in the latter country of a written constitution restricting the power of the legislature, from which springs the duty of the courts to declare invalid any act which is expressly prohibited by or which is not authorized by the constitution, either expressly or by implication. The other results from the power of construction imposed upon the American judge by the brevity of the constitution. Continuing the last thought, it is said:

"The words of that instrument are general, laying down a few large principles. The cases which will arise as to the construction of these general words cannot be foreseen until they arise. When they do arise the generality of the words leaves open to the interpreting judges a far wider field than is afforded by ordinary statutes, which, since they treat of one particular subject, contain enactments comparatively minute and precise. Hence, although the duty of a court is only to interpret, the considerations affecting interpretations are more numerous than in the case of ordinary statutes, more delicate, larger in their reach and scope. They sometimes need the exercise not merely of legal acumen and judicial fairness but of a comprehension of the nature and methods of government which one does not demand from the European judge who walks in the narrow path traced for him by ordinary statutes. It is therefore hardly an exaggeration to say that the American constitution, as it now stands, with the mass of fringing decisions which explain it, is a far more complete and finished instrument than it was when it came fire-new from the hands of the Convention. It is not merely their work but the work of the judges, and most of all one man, the great Chief Justice Marshall." Bryce, Am. Com. 248.

The American system of leaving constitutional questions to be settled by the courts is considered by the author last quoted to secure very great advantages over the theory which was advanced at the time of the formation of the federal government of subjecting the acts of the state legislature to the veto of congress. The result is, as he puts it, that "the court does not go to meet the question; it waits for the question to come to it. When the court acts, it acts at the instance of a party—sometimes the plaintiff or the defendant may be the national government or a state government, but far more frequently both are private persons, seeking to enforce or defend their private rights." He illustrates this by the fact that the doctrine of Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch (U. S.) 87, 3 L. Ed. 162, that a repeal of a grant by the state to an individual impairs the obligation of the contract, was determined in an actior between individuals, the result being that the decision upon the validity of the action of the state is relieved from those opinions which might affect its determination, if the state itself were a party; 1 Bryce, Am. Com. 252. A more far-reaching case which might be used as an illustration is the Dartmouth College Case, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 518, 4 L. Ed. 629, in which an action between an individual and a private corporation, resulted in placing upon the states a limitation of power second to few if any contained in their constitutions.

Under the American constitutional system, there is to be found no force more potent, effective, and far-reaching than this power of constitutional construction which is now unquestionably vested in the courts. Through it the judicial power, in a way, approaches much more nearly to the absolute ultimate authority of the English parliament than does the legislative power. It has also been said: "We proceed upon the theory that our constitution is written: and in our written constitutions, state and national, we have provided courts for the purpose of passing upon the laws enacted by the legislatures and determining their constitutionality. We do not know, therefore, whether a governmental act is valid or not until a court of competent jurisdiction has passed upon it. We depend upon our courts to tell us what our constitution means. Our real constitutions are thus found not wholly in the written documents bearing the name, but in the decisions of the supreme court of the United States and in those of the highest courts in the various states. The study of the American constitution is in large part, from beginning to end, a study of judicial decisions." Macy, Eng. Const. 89.

Mr. Bryce considers it a weak point in the federal constitution that a decision of the supreme court may be obtained in reversal of a former one by the appointment of judges to fill vacancies favorable to such reversal, or in case there be no vacancy, by the joint action of congress and the executive in increasing the number of judges. Of the former method, he instances the Legal Tender Cases, 1 Am. Const. 264, 269, 297. This reference served to put in a very definite form the somewhat widespread impression that appointments of judges were made for the purpose of reversing the previous decision of the court. The possibility of such action in any case by the executive is so serious a contingency that this particular charge has been recently made the subject of critical examination by Senator Hoar, whose brother was then attorney general of the United States. His pamphlet is a valuable historical document, and shows by the dates that the appointments in question were made prior to the decision, and from the testimony of members of the cabinet, that they had been agreed upon long before, neither the president nor any member of the cabinet having any knowledge as to the probable decision; see 5 Am. Lawy. 4.

The fact that the suggestion of any motive in the appointment of judges has so rarely been made may be considered strong evidence that the danger alluded to is not a serious one. But even if it were, it is a danger necessarily incident to all human institutions. No system of checks and balances has ever been devised, and probably none ever will be, so perfect as to dispense with the need of integrity and good faith in the administration of government.

It may be noted here, as already stated under CONSTITUTIONAL, that Chief Justice Gibson (in a dissenting opinion), in Eakin v. Raub, 12 S. & R. (Pa.) 345 (1825), ably contended, after the decision in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cra. (U. S.) 176, 2 L. Ed. 60, that a state court is bound to execute an act repugnant to the constitution of a particular state, but not one repugnant to the federal constitution; though in Norris v. Clymer, 2 Pa. 281, he said to counsel that he had modified his opinion on this subject.

It was said by another eminent judge that it is doubtful whether an act of the legislature can be deemed absolutely void; it is rather to be treated as voidable and this objection can only be raised by one affected by it and not by a stranger; Shaw, C. J., in In re Wellington, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 96, 26 Am. Dec. 631, quoted with approval in Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) 232.

A state legislature cannot annul the judgments nor determine the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; U. S. v. Peters, 5 Cra. (U. S.) 115, 3 L. Ed. 53; nor authoritatively declare what the law is or has been, but what it shall be; Ogden v. Blackledge, 2 Cra. (U. S.) 272, 2 L. Ed. 276.

Congress cannot interfere with or control state courts except in so far as the federal courts have appellate jurisdiction.

Congress cannot without the consent of the state constrain the state courts to entertain or act upon applications for naturalization; Rushworth v. Judges of Inferior Court, 58 N. J. L. 97, 32 Atl. 743, 30 L. R. A. 761.

The judicial powers of the United States, first under the constitution as originally adopted, extended to cases "between a state and citizens of another state," but the very early case of Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. (U. S.) 419, 1 L. Ed. 440, in which the plaintiff as executor brought an action of assumpsit against the state, which was sustained by the court, resulted in the adoption of the 11th amendment. As a consequence it was held that cases past or present in which the state was a party were removed from the jurisdiction of the court; Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 378, 1 L. Ed. 644; but the mere fact that a state may be interested does not oust the jurisdiction; Osborn v. Bank, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 738, 6 L. Ed. 204; in a comparatively late case the soundness of the opinion in the case of Chisholm v. Georgia was doubted, the suggestion being that the clause of the constitution giving jurisdiction in such cases was properly limited to cases cognizable in the courts of a state or suits by a state against citizens of another state; Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U. S. 1, 10 Sup. Ct. 504, 33 L. Ed. 842. The grant of judicial power in all cases in law and equity, etc., was held not to authorize a writ of error in the circuit court of the District of Columbia in a criminal case; U. S. v. More, 3 Cra. (U. S.) 159, 2 L. Ed. 397; but this provision is held generally to include criminal as well as civil proceedings, and the power so vested in the federal courts is independent of the judiciary of the states; Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 257, 25 L. Ed. 648.

In U. S. v. Smith, 4 N. J. L. 37, the action was to recover a penalty under the provisions of an act of congress. The question was raised by plea whether under the act jurisdiction would properly be given to a state court. A demurrer to the plea was overruled, and in a dissenting opinion Southard, J., discusses at length the question: What is the judicial power of the United States?

The distinctive features which characterize the three great departments of government are in the main easily recognized. There is little difficulty in determining whether a power is judicial or executive, and the questions arising with respect to those distinctions result not so much from inherent difficulty in the subject as from a tendency in modern constitutions and legislation to confuse the functions of the two departments in the classes of cases of which illustrations have been already cited. So it may be said that ordinarily there ought to be little difficulty in distinguishing legislative and judicial powers. Properly understood, the two functions are entirely different, and yet there are points of contact from which spring disputed cases, such, for example, as the regulation of procedure, the application of rules of evidence, the attempt to regulate judicial discretion, and many others. This may involve, on the one hand, an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power, or, on the other, the assumption by the legislature of some portion of the authority which belongs to the courts. The cases in which it is a question whether a certain power is legislative or judicial are mainly considered under the title of LEGISLATIVE POWER, to which reference should be made. As a reason why there is naturally found much debatable ground between the judiciary and the legislature, it has been suggested that:

"In most countries the courts have grown out of the legislature; or rather, the sovereign body, which, like parliament, was originally both a law and a legislature, has delivered over most of its judicial duties to other persons, while retaining some few to be still exercised by itself." 1 Bryce, Amer. Com. 235. The author just quoted enumerates the points in which America has followed the English practice. There are no separate administrative tribunals, but officials are sued or indicted in the regular courts; judges are secure in their tenure; judicial proceedings are recognized in law and not set aside by a statute within the competence of the legislature. He considers that America has improved on England in forbidding the legislature to exercise the powers of a criminal court, by acts of attainder, etc., and stands behind England in continuing to use a legislative body as a court of impeachment, the trial of disputed election cases by committees, and the disposition of public franchises, or the appropriation of private property, by legislative rather than judicial methods. Thus three pieces of ground debatable between the legislature and the judiciary, which all originally belonged to the legislature, and in America still do, have been in England made the subject of judicial power and method; id. 235. The judicial power extends to and includes only such acts as are in their nature judicial.

From its earliest history the United States supreme court has consistently declined to exercise any powers other than those which are strictly judicial; Muskrat v. U. S., 219 U. S. 346, 31 Sup. Ct. 250, 55 L. Ed. 246, citing Gordon v. U. S., 117 U. S. 697, appendix, where the subject was examined in the opinion by Taney, C. J.

An act of congress of 1792 devolved upon the circuit courts the duty of examining pension claims and certifying them to the secretary of war. In Hayburn's Case, 2 Dall. (U. S.) 409, 1 L. Ed. 436, the attorney general moved for a mandamus to compel the judges to proceed to hear the cases under the act, but the case was not decided, as the act was repealed. The reasons given by the circuit judges for refusing to perform the duties imposed upon them by the act are set forth in 2 Dall. 410, n. Under an act of 1793 the nature of the duties assigned to the judges were somewhat changed. This act came before the supreme court in U. S. v. Yale Todd. Both of these decisions are set forth in a note of Taney, C. J., in U. S. v. Ferreira, 13 How. (U. S.) 52, 14 L. Ed. 42, where it is said that the result of the opinions in these two cases is that the power thus conferred was not a judicial power, and therefore could not be exercised by the courts, and that as the act intended to confer the power on the court as a judicial function, it could not authorize the judges to exercise it out of court as commissioners, and this decision has ever since been regarded as constitutional law.

It is a settled principle of constitutional law that judges cannot be required to perform any other than judicial duties; Ex parte Griffiths, 118 Ind. 83, 20 N. E. 513, 3 L. R. A. 398, 10 Am. St. Rep. 107, where the doctrine is stated emphatically in the language of Cooley, Const. Law 53, and many other cases are cited.

The general principle upon which is based the want of power in the legislature to confer upon the judges any other than judicial duties "is that under the constitutional system of the United States and of the states, there is a clear and explicit separation of the duties of the government in the three departments which, it has been well said, are not merely equal, they are exclusive, in respect to the duties assigned to each. They are absolutely independent of each other." Wright v. Defrees, 8 Ind. 298.

It is held that the constitutional powers of the judges are defined by the provisions conferring upon them the judicial power, eo nomine, and as was said by Mr. Justice Field, in the supreme court of California: "In its own sphere of duties this court cannot be trammelled by any legislative restrictions. Its constitutional duty is discharged by rendition of decisions;" Houston v. Williams, 13 Cal. 24, 73 Am. Dec. 565; and the supreme court of Arkansas said of the constitutional right of the court, "The legislative department is incompetent to touch it;" Vaughn v. Harp, 49 Ark. 160, 4 S. W. 751.

Congress cannot require the judiciary to exercise powers that are not judicial; Ex parte Riebeling, 70 Fed. 310 (to pass upon the value of the services of an informer in the case of seizure of smuggled goods); the opinion considered the matter historically and at length. It was followed by Judge McPherson in U. S. v. Queen, 105 Fed. 269.

Acts held valid as not conferring non-judicial powers are: Conferring on the court the power to establish towns; Morton v. Woodford, 99 Ky. 367, 35 S. W. 1112; to determine whether conditions prescribed by general law for the creation or enlargement of municipal bodies have been complied with; Forsythe v. City of Hammond, 68 Fed. 774; to inquire whether water rates fixed by municipalities and corporations operate to deprive the owner of appropriated water of his property without just compensation; San Diego Land & T. Co. v. City, 74 Fed. 79; authorizing a court on appeal from county commissioners to fix the salary of a county attorney; Rockwell v. County of Fillmore, 47 Minn. 219, 49 N. W. 690.

It is not a judicial function to exercise merely ministerial powers in relation to committing inebriates; Foreman v. Board, 64 Minn. 373, 67 N. W. 207; nor to entertain appeals from county commissioners upon the propriety of annexing territory to a city; Forsyth v. City of Hammond, 71 Fed. 443; to exercise over the business intercourse of common carriers control which ought to belong to themselves; State v. R. Co., 46 Neb. 682, 65 N. W. 766, 31 L. R. A. 47; to prevent the submission to the people of a constitutional amendment by injunction against the secretary of state; State v. Thorson, 9 S. D. 149, 68 N. W. 202, 33 L. R. A. 582; to require the court to make appointments to fill political offices unconnected with the courts, as members of a municipal board of review; 27 W. L. Bul. 334; or health commission; 11 Am. L. Rec. 651 (in both of which last two cases the court refused to appoint); a collector of taxes; McLean County Precinct v. Bank, 81 Ky. 254; supervisors of election; Case of Supervisors of Election, 114 Mass. 247, 19 Am. Rep. 341; a bridge committee; State v. George, 22 Or. 142, 29 Pac. 356, 16 L. R. A. 737, 29 Am. St. Rep. 586; jury commissioners; State v. Mounts, 36 W. Va. 179, 14 S. E. 407, 15 L. R. A. 243 (where it was considered that jury commissioners were not public officers but officers of the court); justices of the peace; Ex parte Bassitt, 90 Va. 679, 19 S. E. 453; park commissioners; Ross v. Board of Chosen Freeholders, 69 N. J. L. 291, 55 Atl. 310 (which decision reversed the supreme court and is severely criticized as not justified by the state constitution in 37 Am. L. Rev. 620).

But it has been held that judges may constitutionally be vested with power to appoint city commissioners, though that duty is administrative and not judicial; City of Terre Haute v. R. Co., 149 Ind. 174, 46 N. E. 77, 37 L. R. A. 189, where a long list is given of powers conferred upon judges not strictly of a judicial character. And in another state it is held that the power to exercise non-judicial functions does not make an act unconstitutional, as, though not compulsory, there is no valid objection to its due execution, if the court or judge chooses to perform the duty, since third persons cannot complain on the ground that the performance could not have been enforced; State v. Cincinnati, 52 Ohio St. 419, 451, 40 N. E. 508, 27 L. R. A. 737. So, though the court might have refused to perform a duty imposed by statute of levying a tax on lawyers, yet having done so and not claiming their privilege, the party assessed cannot raise this objection; State v. Gazlay, 5 Ohio 14. The legislature cannot constitute the court a board to try contested elections, that power not being essentially judicial; Miller v. Wheeler, 33 Neb. 765, 51 N. W. 137; nor can a court be charged with the duty of purchasing land for the use of the county and executing a mortgage for the purchase money; Burgoyne v. Board, 5 Cal. 9; nor with the power of incorporating towns; People v. Town of Nevada, 6 Cal. 143; or assessment of taxes; Hardenburgh v. Kidd, 10 Cal. 402; or the valuation of property for taxation; Auditor of State v. R. Co., 6 Kan. 500, 7 Am. Rep. 575; City of Baltimore v. Bonaparte, 93 Md. 156, 48 Atl. 735; or fixing the salaries of court reporters; Smith v. Strother, 68 Cal. 194, 8 Pac. 852; or authorizing the marshall to levy and collect a municipal tax of which mandamus against a city has failed to secure payment; Rees v. City of Watertown, 19 Wall. (U. S.) 107, 22 L. Ed. 72; Heine v.

Levee Commissioners, 19 Wall. (U. S.) 655, 22 L. Ed. 223; or the adjustment of state railway bonds by deciding which of two sections of an act shall take effect and be law; State v. Young, 29 Minn. 474, 9 N. W. 737; or passing upon the constitutionality of a legislative act or municipal ordinance as an abstract question; Shephard v. Wheeling, 30 W. Va. 479, 4 S. E. 635.

In the La Abra Mining Company case it was held that the question whether an award by an international commission and an umpire under a convention between the United States and Mexico was obtained by fraud was one in its nature susceptible of judicial determination; La Abra Mining Co. v. U. S., 175 U. S. 423, 20 Sup. Ct. 168, 44 L. Ed. 223, where a demurrer had been interposed upon the main ground that the questions involved were of a diplomatic or political nature.

The court has jurisdiction to determine the constitutionality of an act apportioning the state into legislative districts; Denney v. State, 144 Ind. 503, 42 N. E. 929, 31 L. R. A. 720.

But while the courts are not permitted to have non-judicial duties imposed upon them, so, on the other hand, are the other departments of the government forbidden to invade or usurp the judicial power. And this is held to extend to and include everything necessarily or even properly incident to the exercise of their jurisdiction.

The power to punish contempts is strictly judicial and cannot be abridged by the legislature; Hale v. State, 55 Ohio St. 210, 45 N. E. 199, 36 L. R. A. 254, 60 Am. St. Rep. 691; Wyatt v. People, 17 Col. 252, 29 Pac. 961; Little v. State, 90 Ind. 338, 46 Am. Rep. 224; Burke v. Territory, 2 Okl. 499, 37 Pac. 829; but reasonable regulations by the legislature touching the exercise of this power are binding; id.; but the power cannot be conferred upon an executive board; Langenberg v. Decker, 131 Ind. 471, 31 N. E. 190, 16 L. R. A. 108; and an order directing a sheriff to commit a person to jail until he answers questions propounded to him by commissioners appointed to take his examination before trial is erroneous as an attempted delegation of judicial power in allowing the sheriff to determine what is compliance with the order; Fertilizer Co. v. Taylor, 112 N. C. 141, 17 S. E. 69.

The purpose of a judicial inquiry is to enforce the laws as they are at present. Legislation looks to the future and changes existing conditions by making new laws to be applicable hereafter; Ross v. Oregon, 227 U. S. 150, 33 Sup. Ct. 220, 57 L. Ed. 458. "The province of the courts is to decide what the law is or has been, and to determine its application to particular facts in the decision of causes; the province of the legislature is to declare what the law shall be in the future; and neither of these departments can lawfully invade the province of the other;" Ratcliffe v. Anderson, 31 Gratt. (Va.) 105, 107, 31 Am. Rep. 716, quoted in Shephard v. Wheeling, 30 W. Va. 479, 4 S. E. 635, where it was held that the abstract question of the constitutionality of an act or ordinance cannot be decided by a court.

When the state constitution confers the whole judicial power on specified courts and officers, no portion of it can be conferred on any officer not elective and not so specified; Chandler v. Nash, 5 Mich. 409; Shoultz v. McPheeters, 79 Ind. 373.

Legislation is not an interference with judicial functions, which regulates the rules of pleading; Whiting v. Townsend, 57 Cal. 515; or procedure; In re Probate Blanks, 71 N. H. 621, 52 Atl. 861; or affects the powers of individual judges as distinguished from the court itself; State v. Taylor, 68 N. J. L. 276, 53 Atl. 392; but the court may make reasonable rules as to the hearing of causes and they will prevail against a statute; Herndon v. Ins. Co., 111 N. C. 384, 16 S. E. 465, 18 L. R. A. 547; though it cannot make a rule which deprives one of a right secured by law; Main v. Lynch, 54 Md. 658. As to the power of the courts to make rules, see In re Du Pont, 8 Del. Ch. 442, 68 Atl. 399. The court may change its own calendar and fix dates of trial; Merchants' National Bank v. Greenhood, 16 Mont. 395, 41 Pac. 250, 851; and a statute providing that the court must designate a day for hearing preferred causes was held unconstitutional as depriving the court of the right to hear such causes according to the circumstances of each particular case; Riglander v. Star Co., 98 App. Div. 101, 90 N. Y. Supp. 772; Jones v. Spear, 21 Vt. 426; so the power to appoint or remove a janitor of a court room belongs to the court; In re Janitor of Supreme Court, 35 Wis. 410.

The legislature cannot require judges to file opinions in writing; Houston v. Williams, 13 Cal. 24, 73 Am. Dec. 565; Vaughn v. Harp, 49 Ark. 160, 4 S. W. 751; Ex parte Griffiths, 118 Ind. 83, 20 N. E. 513, 3 L. R. A. 398, 10 Am. St. Rep. 107; Matter of Head Notes, 43 Mich. 641, 8 N. W. 552.

A statute prescribing causes for which a judgment may be set aside does not restrict the power of the court to set aside judgments for other causes than those mentioned; Nealis v. Dicks, 72 Ind. 374. Among the inherent powers of courts independent of legislative exactment is the power to prevent the enforcement against an accused person of a judgment obtained by duress; Maynard v. Mier, 85 Ind. 318.

The following acts are held unconstitutional assumptions of judicial power by the legislature: Vacating a final judgment; State v. R. Co., 71 Conn. 43, 40 Atl. 925;

Martin v. Land Co., 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. 591; declaring what shall be conclusive evidence; People v. Rose, 207 Ill. 352, 69 N. E. 762; prescribing the manner in which courts shall discharge their judicial duties; Parkison v. Thompson, 164 Ind. 609, 73 N. E. 109, 3 Ann. Cas. 677; abridging or taking away the inherent power of courts to enforce their decrees and command respect for their processes; Anderson v. Forging Co., 34 Ind. App. 100, 72 N. E. 277; making a specification of weights in bills of lading conclusive evidence of correctness; Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Simonson, 64 Kan. 802, 68 Pac. 653, 57 L. R. A. 765, 91 Am. St. Rep. 248; declaring a tax deed or the recitals therein to be conclusive evidence of a compliance with those matters which are essential to the exercise of the taxing power, etc.; Wilson v. Wood, 10 Okl. 279, 61 Pac. 1045; depriving a state Supreme Court of its revisory jurisdiction over all other state tribunals; Brown v. Kalamazoo Circuit Judge, 75 Mich. 274, 42 N. W. 827, 5 L. R. A. 226, 13 Am. St. Rep. 438; validating the levy of a tax which had been finally adjudicated to be invalid; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. People, 219 Ill. 408, 76 N. E. 571; authorizing the courts to set aside judgments and grant new trials after the term; Peerce v. Kitzmiller, 19 W. Va. 564; White v. Crump, id. 583; abridging the right of a court of chancery to pass upon questions of fact without a jury; Detroit Nat. Bank v. Blodgett, 115 Mich. 160, 73 N. W. 120, 885.

The following acts have been held to be constitutional: A federal act empowering the comptroller to appoint receivers for insolvent national banks (as not vesting in him a judicial power); Bushnell v. Leland, 164 U. S. 684, 17 Sup. Ct. 209, 41 L. Ed. 598; an act establishing rules of evidence which are not in conflict with the constitution; Banks v. State, 124 Ga. 15, 52 S. E. 74, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1007; prescribing rules of procedure or pleading; Parkison v. Thompson, 164 Ind. 609, 73 N. E. 109, 3 Ann. Cas. 677; regulating the procedure in contempt cases; Mahoney v. State, 33 Ind. App. 655, 72 N. E. 151, 104 Am. St. Rep. 276; regulating the exercise of the powers of a court for the punishment of constructive contempts; Drady v. Dist. Court, 126 Ia. 345, 102 N. W. 115; constituting facts which, according to the ordinary rules of human experience, tend to prove another fact, conclusive evidence of it; County Seat of Linn County, 15 Kan. 500; imposing indeterminate sentences; State v. Stephenson, 69 Kan. 405, 76 Pac. 905, 105 Am. St. Rep. 171, 2 Ann. Cas. 841; declaring the oath and examination of the mother of a bastard child to be presumptive evidence against the person accused of its paternity; State v. Rogers, 119 N. C. 793, 26 S. E. 142; discharging a motion for a new trial, if not acted upon by the court at the term; James v. Appel, 192 U. S. 129, 24 Sup. Ct. 222, 48 L. Ed. 377.

Where an act provided for filling vacancies in municipal offices by a person elected by the council to serve until "the next city election," it was held that a subsequent act providing that the words quoted should be construed to mean the election at which the voters would have elected the successor without respect to the vacancy, was an invasion of judicial power as seeking to compel the courts to construe the previous act in a way contrary to its letter and spirit; Com. v. Warwick, 172 Pa. 140, 33 Atl. 373. In this case, however, Mitchell, J., filed an able dissenting opinion in which he maintained that the judgment was an "unprecedented and unwarranted invasion by the judiciary of the legislative authority," that expository acts had been in use in Pennsylvania from colonial days, and that they were "a legislative formula never heretofore questioned." See also Titusville Iron Works v. Oil Co., 122 Pa. 627, 15 Atl. 917, 1 L. R. A. 361; where they are held to be a common form of legislative expression to which future effect must be given. In Lambertson v. Hogan, 2 Pa. 22, it was held that "explanatory acts must be construed as operating on future cases alone, except where they are designed to explain a doubtful statute."

Wherever a power is given to examine, hear, and punish, it is a judicial power, and they in whom it is reposed act as judges; Holt, C. J., 1 Salk. 200. In this case the censors of the College of Physicians under their charter fined and imprisoned a physician for administering unwholesome pills and noxious medicines, and it was held that certiorari would lie.

The phrase judicial power, as adopted in American constitutional law, includes the determination of questions of fact in equity cases. The term must be construed as vesting such power as the courts under the English and American system of jurisprudence always exercised in that class of actions, and it is not competent for the legislature to withdraw from the courts invested by the constitution with judicial power, as to matters in equity, the determination of questions in fact, as one of the established elements of that power; Callanan v. Judd, 23 Wis. 343, 349.

It frequently happens that the courts are concluded by the result of an inquiry, quasi-judicial in its character, which under some very general definitions, such as that of Lord Holt, supra, might be referred to the judicial power, but is required in this particular case and by the legislature or executive as a guide to their own action.

In cases where the existence of certain facts is necessary to be ascertained as a basis for determining whether it is wise to enact a statute, the ascertainment of the fact by the legislature will be considered conclusive, and its decision will not be reviewed by the courts in a collateral proceeding. As where the establishment of a court depended upon the fact that the county had a population exceeding fifty thousand, the court refused to question the action of the legislature, although it appeared by the United States census that the population of the county was less than the required amount; Ex parte Renfrow, 112 Mo. 591, 20 S. W. 682; and where the legislature prohibited parents from procuring or consenting to the employment of a female child under the age of fourteen years as a dancer, the court would not review its decision that such legislation was necessary to protect the health and morals of children on the ground that the law infringed the rights of parents in some particular cases; People v. Ewer, 19 N. Y. Supp. 933.

Where a reapportionment of representatives based upon relative changes of population, was made by act of congress to take effect two years later, it was held to be a political and not a judicial question, and the courts could not give redress for any injustice resulting therefrom; State v. Boyd, 36 Neb. 181, 54 N. W. 252, 19 L. R. A. 227; with respect to apportionment of the state for legislative purposes, where the act of the legislature was in violation of the constitution of the state, the question of the validity of the statute is not a political one, but a judicial question; Parker v. State, 133 Ind. 178, 32 N. E. 836, 33 N. E. 119, 18 L. R. A. 567; State v. Cunningham, 83 Wis. 90, 53 N. W. 35, 17 L. R. A. 145, 35 Am. St. Rep. 27.

The decision of congress recognizing a claim as an equitable obligation of the government and appropriating money for its payment can rarely be the subject of review by the courts; U. S. v. Realty Co., 163 U. S. 427, 16 Sup. Ct. 1120, 41 L. Ed. 215.

A court or judge cannot be authorized to perform legislative duties; Smith v. Strother, 68 Cal. 194, 8 Pac. 852.

An act of the legislature provided that before any railway company should construct its roads in the streets of a city, the city authorities, or the superior court, or a judge thereof, on appeal, should approve the plan of construction. It was held that the power which the superior court or a judge thereof was required to exercise was legislative and not judicial, and therefore could not be exercised by them; Appeal of Norwalk St. Ry. Co., 69 Conn. 576, 37 Atl. 1080, 38 Atl. 708, 39 L. R. A. 794. The case discusses the question fully.

An act authorizing the court or judge allowing a mandamus to direct the manner of serving it is not a delegation of legislative powers; State v. Express Co., 66 Minn. 271, 68 N. W. 1085, 38 L. R. A. 225.

The act of July 25, 1882, authorizing judges and clerks of United States courts to issue subpœnas upon the application of the commissioner of pensions for the examination of witnesses concerning pension claims, is constitutional and under it the courts can compel witnesses to appear and testify on that subject; In re Gross, 78 Fed. 107. A statute authorizing judges to fix salaries of deputies or assistants employed by county officers is not unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power to a judicial tribunal; Stone v. Wilson, 39 S. W. 49, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 126, overruling Com. v. Addams, 95 Ky. 588, 26 S. W. 581, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 135.

Questions frequently arise as to the validity of legislative acts requiring of executive officers duties quasi-judicial in their character, the propriety of which is challenged upon the ground that they impose judicial functions upon executive officers. Such are provisions of law authorizing the removal of subordinate officers, the constitution of boards for taxation, assessment, and the like. It is a well-settled principle that "judicial functions or duties can be conferred only upon courts and judicial officers;" State v. Noble, 118 Ind. 361, 21 N. E. 244, 4 L. R. A. 101, 10 Am. St. Rep. 143; Van Slyke v. Fire Ins. Co., 39 Wis. 390, 20 Am. Rep. 50; People v. Hayne, 83 Cal. 111, 23 Pac. 1, 7 L. R. A. 348, 17 Am. St. Rep. 211. But it has been held that there is no invasion of the judicial power in making state executive officers ex officio of a state board of taxation; Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 513, 33 N. E. 421, 18 L. R. A. 729; Indianapolis & V. R. Co. v. Backus, 133 Ind. 609, 33 N. E. 443; or charging them with the duty of assessing property or serving on a board of equalization; Sawyer v. Dooley, 21 Nev. 390, 32 Pac. 437.

Power to summon and examine witnesses under oath conferred on an administrative officer is not a distinctive judicial power; Matter of Fenton, 58 Misc. 303, 109 N. Y. Supp. 321.

So it was held that the act, authorizing the establishment of a public park in the District of Columbia, and providing that in case of disagreement between the land owner and the park commissioners the appraisement should be submitted to the president, for his approval did not impose a judicial function upon the president whose duty was merely to decide whether the United States would have the land at the appraised value, and not to decide whether such value was reasonable as respects the property owner; Shoemaker v. U. S., 147 U. S. 282, 13 Sup. Ct. 361, 37 L. Ed. 170; such an act merely makes the president the agent of congress to decide whether the proceedings shall be completed or abandoned; U. S. v. Cooper, 20 D. C. 104.

A constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from creating other courts than those mentioned in the constitution does not prevent it from authorizing appeals to a court from the decision of a license board; Thompson v. Koch, 98 Ky. 400, 33 S. W. 96; and where the judicial power was vested by the constitution in certain named courts, it was still competent for the legislature to provide for the removal of administrative officers in cities by the board of aldermen "sitting as a court," such power being held not strictly judicial; Gibbs v. Board, 99 Ky. 490, 36 S. W. 524.

The fact that the law confers on jury commissioners judicial powers in the selection of citizens for jury services does not involve a conflict with the fourteenth amendment of the constitution; Murray v. Louisiana, 163 U. S. 101, 16 Sup. Ct. 990, 41 L. Ed. 87.

Judicial powers were not conferred on the governor by authorizing him to investigate charges of official misconduct of state officers with a view to their removal; McMaster v. Herald, 56 Kan. 231, 42 Pac. 697; or by an act authorizing him to remove any officer appointed by him; Cameron v. Parker, 2 Okl. 277, 38 Pac. 14; and the action of a governor in removing an officer under such act will not be reviewed by the courts; id; State v. Rost, 47 La. Ann. 53, 16 South. 776.

The power to remove city officers for cause is administrative, not judicial, and may therefore be conferred on a non-judicial body; State v. Common Council, 90 Wis. 612, 64 N. W. 304.

Questions of power between the judiciary and the executive have generally arisen upon applications for a mandamus to compel or an injunction to prevent action of an executive officer.

The question of power to issue a mandamus in such cases is discussed under the title EXECUTIVE POWER, and the authorities are there collected. A discussion of the subject, not strictly in a suit at law, but as the result of one, the participants in which were a judge and a quasi-judicial officer, may be referred to here.

In Gilcrist v. Collector of Charleston it was held that the circuit court has no power to issue a mandamus to a collector, commanding him to grant a clearance, and that all instructions from the executive which are not supported by law are illegal, and no inferior officer is bound to obey them; 1 Hall, Am. L. J. 429, Fed. Cas. No. 5,420. This decision was the subject of a letter from Cæsar A. Rodney, attorney general, to the president criticising the action of the court and challenging its jurisdiction; 1 Hall, Am. L. J. 433, Fed. Cas. No. 5,420. In reply to this letter Mr. Justice Johnson, who presided at the trial, made some remarks, in the course of which he says: "Jurisdiction in a case is one thing; the mode of exercising that jurisdiction is quite another;" the jurisdiction of the court must be derived from the constitution, and he expressly disclaims "any other origin of our jurisdiction, especially the unpopular grounds of prerogative and analogy to the king's bench."

In asserting the necessity of the recognition of the right of the courts to coerce an executive officer by a judicial order, he insists that such authority is necessarily involved in the use of the term power in the constitution: "The term judicial power conveys the idea both of exercising the faculty of judging and of applying physical force to give effect to a decision. The term power could with no propriety be applied, nor could the judiciary be denominated a department of government, without the means of enforcing its decrees. In a country where laws govern, courts of justice necessarily are the medium of action and reaction between the government and the governed. The basis of individual security and the bond of union between the ruler and the citizen must ever be found in a judiciary sufficiently independent to disregard the will of power, and sufficiently energetic to secure to the citizen the full enjoyment of his rights. To establish such a one was evidently the object of the constitution." He contends that the establishment of a judiciary without power to enforce its decrees would have been to no purpose, and that where a jurisdiction is conferred and no forms prescribed for its exercise, there is an inherent power in the court to adopt a mode of proceeding adapted to the exigency of each case; 1 Hall, Am. L. J. 446, Fed. Cas. No. 5,420.

It has been a subject of controversy how far the decisions of the court of claims control the executive departments of the government of the United States in their action on similar cases. It was said by Richardson, C. J., that the decisions of the court of claims in general, not appealed from, are guides to the executive officers of the government, and furnish precedents for the executive departments in all like cases; Meigs v. U. S., 13 Wash. L. Rep. 122. This decision was thus criticised by Comptroller Lawrence: The court of claims undoubtedly had a right (1) to lay down law for itself, but it has no authority to lay down law (2) for the executive officers of the government, yet the opinion referred to assumes to do so. This is the necessary effect of the words employed by it, and whether so intended or not, it is their logical effect. For if the court of claims can prescribe not only its own duties and the rules and principles of law governing its own action, but also the same for accounting officers in the executive administration of the executive business of the government, it may for like reasons do the same for heads of executive departments and even the president himself; 6 Dec. First Comp. 238.

The federal courts will not interfere with the pension officers in the exercise of their discretion; Gaines v. Thompson, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 347, 19 L. Ed. 62; Carrick v. Lamar, 116 U. S. 423, 6 Sup. Ct. 424, 29 L. Ed. 677.

Questions purely political or arising out of international relations the courts do not assume to determine, but leave them to what they term the political departments of the government and follow the decisions of the executive. Such a question is the recognition of independence or belligerency which is discussed at length under the title of EXECUTIVE POWER.

The power of the courts to enjoin executive officers rests upon the same principles as those applicable to a mandamus. It is the general rule that the official action of the executive department of the government or of the state cannot be controlled by a writ of injunction; Fleming v. Guthrie, 32 W. Va. 1, 9 S. E. 23, 3 L. R. A. 53, 25 Am. St. Rep. 792; Bates v. Taylor, 87 Tenn. 319, 11 S. W. 266, 3 L. R. A. 316; Smith v. Myers, 109 Ind. 1, 9 N. E. 692, 58 Am. Rep. 375. The execution of orders of the president for removing intruders from government land will not be interfered with by injunction; Guthrie v. Hall, 1 Okl. 454, 34 Pac. 380.

An injunction may be obtained to protect a de facto officer whose title is disputed as well as that of one de jure, but it is not an appropriate means of determining a title to an office; In re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 210, 8 Sup. Ct. 482, 31 L. Ed. 402. In neither of these cases, however, is there involved any question of conflict between the executive and judicial power, inasmuch as the latter legitimately extends to and includes proceeding for the trial of title to office by quo warranto, which title see.

The power of staying the execution of a death sentence pending an appeal conferred by law on a court is not the granting of a reprieve within the meaning of a constitutional grant of executive power, but is a judicial power included in the separation of government into three independent departments; Parker v. State, 135 Ind. 534, 35 N. E. 179, 23 L. R. A. 859. See Butler v. State, 97 Ind. 373.

In State v. Doyle, 40 Wis. 175, 22 Am. Rep. 692, which was an application for a mandamus against the state officer seeking to require him to revoke the license of an insurance company, return was made pleading an injunction of the circuit court of the United States to restrain the Secretary of State from revoking the license, and it was held that "where a suit is prosecuted in a federal court by a private party against a state officer who has no personal interest or liability in the action, but is sued in his official capacity only, to affect a right of the state only, the state is the real defendant, within the prohibition of the 11th amendment to the federal constitution. A circuit court of the United States has therefore no jurisdiction of a suit by a foreign corporation to restrain a state officer from revoking (as required by the law of the state) a license granted the plaintiff corporation to do business in the state."

So also the power to exclude or to expel aliens, being a power affecting international relations, is vested in the political departments of the government and is to be regulated by treaty or by act of congress and to be executed by the executive authority according to the regulations so established, except so far as the judicial department has been authorized by treaty or by statute or is required by the paramount law of the constitution to intervene; Fong Yue Ting v. U. S., 149 U. S. 698, 13 Sup. Ct. 1016, 37 L. Ed. 905. See ALIEN; CHINESE.

Of all the instances of what appears to an American legal mind the confusion of powers under the English system, none is more striking than the commingling of executive and judicial duties found in the office of the lord chancellor.

In commenting upon the alteration in his customary position by the powers of an administrative character conferred upon him by the Judicature Acts, a recent writer says, "It would appear, to the independent observer, that the tenure, the power of appointments, and the administrative duties of the chancellor, though necessarily pertinent to his high office, are inconsistent with his position as chief judge, co-equal and co-ordinate with the others, and that if the intention of the statute was to confer that position upon him, it was contrary to English usage, if not unconstitutional." Inderwick, King's Peace 232.

There has been much discussion as to whether the courts, in decisions dealing with labor strikes and public commotion arising out of them, have extended their jurisdiction beyond recognized principles. In this discussion the phrase "government by injunction" has been constantly used. The cases are cited under the titles: INJUNCTION; CONTEMPT; LABOR UNION; CONSPIRACY; COMBINATION; BOYCOTT; STRIKES; and do not require further discussion here. See also, 13 Law Quart. Rev. 347; 31 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 1, 782; 34 id. 576; 37 id. 1; 3 Va. L. Reg. 625; Rep. Am. Bar. Assn. 1894, p. 299; 29 Am. L. Rev. 282.

In impeachment proceedings, the legislature acts judicially; it was so held in sustaining the impeachment proceedings against Governor Sulzer at a special session, although they were not specified by the governor in his call.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS. A proceeding which takes place in or under the authority of a court of justice, or which relates in some way to the administration of justice, or which legally ascertains any right or liability. Hereford v. People, 197 Ill. 222, 64 N. E. 310.

Conclusive presumptions are made in favor of judicial proceedings. Thus, it is an undoubted rule of pleading that nothing shall be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court but that which is so expressly alleged; 1 Saund. 74; 10 Q. B. 411, 455. So also, it is presumed, with respect to such writs as are actually issued by the superior courts at Westminster, that they are duly issued, and in a case in which the courts have jurisdiction, unless the contrary appears on the face of them; and all such writs will of themselves, and without any further allegation, protect all officers and others in their aid acting under them; and this, too, although they are on the face of them irregular, or even void in form; 6 Co. 54 a; 10 Q. B. 411, 455.

The rule is well settled that words spoken in the course of judicial proceedings, though they are such as impute crime to another, and therefore if spoken elsewhere would import malice and be actionable in themselves, are not actionable if they are applicable and pertinent to the subject of inquiry. And this extends not merely to regular courts of justice, but to all inquiries before magistrates, referees, municipal, military, and ecclesiastical bodies; and they are only restrained by this rule, viz., that they shall be made in good faith to courts or tribunals having jurisdiction of the subject, and power to hear and decide the matter of complaint or accusation, and that they are not resorted to as a cloak for private malice. The question, therefore, in such cases is, not whether the words spoken are true, not whether they are actionable in themselves, but whether they were spoken in the course of judicial proceedings, and whether they were relevant and pertinent to the cause or subject of inquiry; Newell, Def. Lib. & Sland. 424; Heard, Lib. & S. § 101. The rule that no action will lie for words spoken or written in the course of any judicial proceeding has been acted upon from the earliest times. In 4 Co. 14 b, it was adjudged that if one exhibits articles to justices of the peace, "in this case the parties shall not have, for any matter contained in such articles, any action upon the case, for they had pursued the ordinary course of justice in such cases; and if actions should be permitted in such cases, those who have just cause for complaint would not dare to complain, for fear of infinite vexation." And it has been decided that, though an affidavit made in a judicial proceeding is false, slanderous, and malicious, no action will lie against the party making it; 18 C. B. 126; 4 H. & N. 568.

The general rule is subject to this qualification: that in all cases where the object or occasion of the words or writing is redress for an alleged wrong, or a proceeding in a tribunal or before some individual or associated body of men, such tribunal, individual, or body must be vested with authority to render judgment or make a decision in the case, or to entertain the proceeding, in order to give them the protection of privileged communications. This qualification of the rule runs through all the cases where the question is involved; Odg. Lib. & Sl. 188, n.; Heard, Lib. & S. § 104.

Statements made extra-judicially to a magistrate with a view to asking his advice are not a judicial proceeding; 3 B. & C. 24.

Official Records of the States. The constitution provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. This applies as well to the judgments and records of the courts of the several territories; Suesenbach v. Wagner, 41 Minn. 108, 42 N. W. 925. Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved and the effect thereof. The term records includes all executive, judicial, legislative, and ministerial acts, constituting the public records of the state; Desty, Fed. Const. 203; White v. Burnley, 20 How. (U. S.) 250, 15 L. Ed. 886; Watrous' Heirs v. McGrew, 16 Tex. 509.

Legislative acts must be authenticated by the seal of the state; U. S. v. Johns, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 412, 1 L. Ed. 888.

As to the effect of judicial proceedings under this provision, see FOREIGN JUDGMENTS. As to records generally, see RECORDS.

JUDICIAL SALE. A sale, by authority of some competent tribunal, by an officer authorized by law for the purpose. The term includes sales by sheriffs, marshals, masters, commissioners, or by trustees, executors, or administrators, where the latter sell under the decree of a court.

A sale, whether public or private, made by a receiver, pursuant to the direction or authority given by the court; In re Denison, 114 N. Y. 621, 21 N. E. 97.

It is premature and erroneous to decree a sale of property to satisfy incumbrances thereon before ascertaining the amounts and priorities of the liens binding such property; Bristol Iron & Steel Co. v. Caldwell, 95 Va. 47, 27 S. E. 838.

A decree confirming a master's sale, and declaring that the title be vested in the purchaser "upon the payment of the purchase money," vests no title in such purchaser until the purchase money is paid; Blair v. Blair (Tenn.) 41 S. W. 1078.

The officer who makes the sale conveys all the rights of the defendant, and all other persons legally affected by the proceedings, in the property sold. Under such a sale there is no warranty, either express or implied, of the thing sold; The Monte Allegre, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 616, 6 L. Ed. 174; Boorum v. Tucker, 51 N. J. Eq. 135, 26 Atl. 456; Wright v. Tichenor, 104 Ind. 185, 3 N. E. 853. A sale of real estate does not conclude one not a party to those proceedings; and whatever title he had to the property so sold remains unaffected by the sale; United Lines Telegraph Co. v. Trust Co., 147 U. S. 431, 13 Sup. Ct. 396, 37 L. Ed. 231. Where the property sold under a decree is correctly represented by a plat, referred to in the advertisement and exhibited at the sale, which discloses an encroachment on a street, the purchaser cannot plead ignorance thereof; Carneal v. Lynch, 91 Va. 114, 20 S. E. 959, 50 Am. St. Rep. 819. A purchaser at a judicial sale, not made under compulsory process, can set up eviction of a paramount title as a defence in an action for the purchase money, but where land is sold in equity to pay the debts of an estate, and a judgment has to be rendered against the purchaser for the purchase money, he cannot enjoin its collection because of eviction; Latimer v. Wharton, 41 S. C. 508, 19 S. E. 855, 44 Am. St. Rep. 739.

The doctrine of caveat emptor applies to a sale under a decree foreclosing a mortgage, and the purchaser cannot rely upon statements made by the officer conducting the sale that he will get a title free from incumbrance; Norton v. Trust Co., 40 Neb. 394, 58 N. W. 953.

The purchaser of a leasehold interest at a sheriff's sale is charged with notice of the lease and subject to its covenants and conditions; Aderhold v. Supply Co., 158 Pa. 401, 28 Atl. 22; and a purchaser at such sale of an heir's interest is bound by notice given at the sale by decedent's heirs that the interest was subject in the purchaser's hands to the right, if any, of decedent's estate to charge the heir's indebtedness against his share; Donaldson's Estate, 158 Pa. 292, 27 Atl. 959. Where a conveyance from a life tenant is procured by fraud and the property sold under a judgment against a vendee, a purchaser at that sale with knowledge of the fraud can hold against the devisees in remainder; Fields v. Bush, 94 Ga. 664, 21 S. E. 827.

A decree homologating proceedings at a family meeting to sell a child's property will protect a purchaser in good faith; Dauterive v. Shaw, 47 La. Ann. 882, 17 South. 345. Equity will not relieve a purchaser from complying with the terms of sale because of a defect in the title, rendering the title unmarketable, of which the purchaser was cognizant; Stewart v. Devries, 81 Md. 525, 32 Atl. 285. Where land is sold under a condition not authorized by the decree of sale, the purchaser will not be compelled to take the title although his son signed the condition without apprehending its effect; Recor v. Blackburn, 71 Hun 54, 24 N. Y. Supp. 692. It is well settled that "the title of an innocent purchaser of land at a judicial sale under a mortgage is not affected by the usurious character of such mortgage." Sharpe v. Tatnall, 5 Del. Ch. 302; Elliott v. Wood, 53 Barb. (N. Y.) 285. See as to bona fide purchaser, Riley v. Martinelli, 97 Cal. 575, 32 Pac. 579, 21 L. R. A. 38, 33 Am. St. Rep. 209. When real estate is sold by the sheriff or marshal the sale is subject to the confirmation of the court, or it may be set aside. See McPherson v. Foster, 4 Wash. C. C. 45, Fed. Cas. No. 8,921; Bleeker v. Bond, 4 Wash. C. C. 322, Fed. Cas. No. 1,536.

An officer at a sale on execution conducted by himself cannot act as agent, with full discretionary powers of an absent person in the purchase of property, since the law casts on him the duty of fidelity to the execution debtor, and such purchase by the officer is void, and confers no title on his principal; Caswell v. Jones, 65 Vt. 457, 26 Atl. 529, 20 L. R. A. 503, 36 Am. St. Rep. 879.

Any statements made with a purpose to deter bidding may avoid the sale; Phelps v. Benson, 161 Pa. 418, 29 Atl. 86; Herndon v. Gibson, 38 S. C. 357, 17 S. E. 145, 20 L. R. A. 545, 37 Am. St. Rep. 765; Barnes v. Mays, 88 Ga. 696, 16 S. E. 67.

It is generally said to be a rule that mere inadequacy of price is not of itself sufficient ground for setting aside a judicial sale; Bethlehem Iron Co. v. Ry. Co., 49 N. J. Eq. 356, 23 Atl. 1077; Passmore v. Moore (Ky.) 22 S. W. 325; Dazet v. Landry, 21 Nev. 291, 30 Pac. 1064; Pewabic Min. Co. v. Mason, 145 U. S. 349, 12 Sup. Ct. 887, 36 L. Ed. 732; and that there must be shown in addition to inadequacy some fraud, accident, mistake, or other special circumstance to warrant rescission of the contract; Harman v. Copenhaver, 89 Va. 836, 17 S. E. 482. But the general rule as stated is not sustained without qualifications, since the inadequacy may be so gross as to shock the conscience of the court, as it is frequently expressed, and to be regarded as of itself sufficient ground for setting aside the sale; Connell v. Wilhelm, 36 W. Va. 598, 15 S. E. 245; as where land valued at $8,000, with incumbrances amounting to $2,700 was sold at $2,000; Johnson v. Avery, 56 Minn. 12, 57 N. W. 217; or where the same land brought at a subsequent sale $1,500; Johnson v. Avery, 60 Minn. 262, 62 N. W. 283, 51 Am. St. Rep. 529. Where the price is grossly inadequate, the court will be quick to seize upon any other circumstance impeaching the fairness of the transaction; Schroeder v. Young, 161 U. S. 334, 16 Sup. Ct. 512, 40 L. Ed. 721; or the least irregularity in the proceeding; Warder-Bushnell-Glesser Co. v. Allen, 63 Mo. App. 456. See as to inadequacy, Bean v. Hoffendorfer, 84 Ky. 685, 2 S. W. 556, 3 S. W. 138.

A sale of property as a whole may be confirmed if the decree that it be so sold is not objected to, and there is no offer of a better bid in case the bidding be reopened; Central Trust Co. v. R. Co., 60 Fed. 9. The objection that different parcels of real estate were sold together cannot be made by one who has suffered no injury therefrom; Parker v. Car-Wheel Co., 108 Ala. 140, 18 South. 938.

Combinations to prevent competitive bidding, and any conduct at the sale upon the part of interested parties which is fraudulent will make the sale void, as where there was an agreement between judgment creditors without knowledge of the debtor that one should refrain from bidding, in consideration of a promise to pay his judgment, made by the other, the sale was held void for fraud; Phelps v. Benson, 161 Pa. 418, 29 Atl. 86; and where a mortgagor publicly announced at the sale that she was a widow dependent upon the premises for support, that she intended to bid, and that she requested no one to bid against her, the sale was set aside; Herndon v. Gibson, 38 S. C. 357, 17 S. E. 145, 20 L. R. A. 545, 37 Am. St. Rep. 765. One intending to purchase commits fraud by paying another not to bid against him; Goble v. O'Connor, 43 Neb. 49, 61 N. W. 131; Saxton v. Seiberling, 48 Ohio St. 554, 29 N. E. 179; and on disclosure of the facts after sale, payment of purchase money, and conveyance, an administrator's sale may be set aside; Barnes v. Mays, 88 Ga. 696, 16 S. E. 67; to show such fraud evidence is admissible of the amount intended to be bid by the competitor who was hired not to bid; id.; but where the competitor is induced by an execution creditor under a secret agreement to refrain from bidding, it is incompetent for the creditor to show on a petition for subrogation that the property brought less than its market value; 24 Pittsb. Leg. J. 92. Where during an administrator's sale, one of the bidders arranged with the others for a consideration to stop bidding, and he thereby obtained the property for less than its market value, the sale was void; Ingalls v. Rowell, 149 Ill. 163, 36 N. E. 1016; but where there is an agreement between two persons to prevent bidding, and one of them purchases the land, the sale will not be set aside at the instance of the other on the ground that he was prevented from bidding by reason of inducement offered by the purchaser; Harrell v. Wilson, 108 N. C. 97, 12 S. E. 889. An agreement between five lien holders, any one of whom was financially unable to bid for himself, that one should bid on the property as trustee for them all, was not invalid as a combination to discourage bidding; Gulick v. Webb, 41 Neb. 706, 60 N. W. 13, 43 Am. St. Rep. 720.

Upon the refusal of a purchaser at a judicial sale to fulfil his contract, the property may be resold and such purchaser held liable for any deficiency in price arising upon the second sale; Stuart v. Gay, 127 U. S. 518, 8 Sup. Ct. 1279, 32 L. Ed. 191. But it has been held that to be held liable he must be served with a rule, awarded after the sale was reported, to show cause why he should not complete his purchase, or in default, the property to be resold; Stout v. Mercantile Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. 571, 56 Am. St. Rep. 843.

See an elaborate and valuable note on the subject of injunctions against judicial sales in 30 L. R. A. 98–143; and a similar note upon the protection to purchasers and who is a bona fide purchaser, in 21 L. R. A. 33.

JUDICIAL SEPARATION. See SEPARATION.

JUDICIAL WRITS. In English Practice. The capias and all other writs subsequent to the original writ not issuing out of chancery, but from the court to which the original was returnable.

Being grounded on what had passed in that court in consequence of the sheriff's return, they are called judicial writs, in contradistinction to the writs issued out of chancery, which were called original writs; 3 Bla. Com. 282.

JUDICIARY. The system of courts of justice in a country. The department of government charged or concerned with the administration of justice. The judges taken collectively; as, the liberties of the people are secured by a wise and independent judiciary. The term is in very current use in designating the method of selecting judges in a state or country,—as, an elective judiciary.

As an adjective: Of or pertaining to the administration of justice or the courts; judicial,—the judiciary act, the judiciary amendment, the judiciary question, etc. See COURT; JUDGE; 3 Story, Const. 5th ed. § 1576.

JUDICIARY ACT. The act of congress of Sept. 24, 1789, establishing the federal courts of the United States.

This act, of which the authorship is attributed to Oliver Ellsworth, long remained in force without substantial change, save in the extension of the system as required by the growth of the nation. Its provisions are embodied in the Revised Statutes.

This act, "considering the complex and highly artificial nature of the federal jurisdiction, is justly regarded as 'one of the most remarkable instances of wise, sagacious, and thoroughly considered legislative enactments in the history of the law.'" Jones v. Foreman, 66 Ga. 371, 373.

"The wisdom and forethought with which it was drawn have been the admiration of succeeding generations. And so well was it done that it remains to the present day, with a few unimportant changes, the foundation of our system of judicature, and the law which confers, governs, controls, and limits the powers of all the federal courts, except the Supreme court, and which largely regulates the exercise of its powers." U. S. v. Holliday, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 407, 414, 18 L. Ed. 182.

Numerous amendments have been passed from time to time, the most important of which were the acts of March 3, 1875, and March 3, 1887, amended August 13, 1888. The act of March 3, 1891, created the circuit courts of appeals; and the system of federal courts was greatly changed by the new Judicial Code, enacted March 3, 1911, and in effect, on January 1, 1912. See UNITED STATES COURTS.

JUDICIUM. In Roman Law. The proceeding before a judge or judex (q. v.) to obtain his decision of the legal issue, presented as the result of the proceedings in jure. Sohm. Inst. Rom. L. § 34. See IN JUDICIO; IN JURE.

JUDICIUM CAPITALE. In English Law. Judgment of death; capital judgment. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 39, § 2. Called also "judicium vitæ amissionis," judgment of loss of life. Id. lib. 2, c. 1, § 5.

JUDICIUM DEI (Lat. the judgment or decision of God). In Old English Law. A term applied to trials by ordeal; for, in all trials of this sort, God was thought to interfere in favor of the innocent, and so decide the cause. Now abolished.

JUDICIUM PARIUM. In English Law. Judgment of the peers; judgment of one's peers; trial by jury. Magna Carta, c. 29. See JURY.

JUGE. In French Law. Judge. It is applied in strictness only to judges of the inferior courts. Members of the Cour d'Appel and of the Cour de Cassation are called Conseillers.

JUGE DE PAIX. In French Law. A justice of the peace. See COURTS OF FRANCE.

JUGE D'INSTRUCTION. In French Law. An officer subject to the procureur-general, who in cases of criminal offences receives the complaints of the parties injured, and who summons and examines witnesses upon oath, and after communication with the procureur-general draws up the forms of accusation. They have also the right, subject to the approval of the same superior officer, to admit the accused to bail. They are usually chosen from among the regular judges. By the act of December 8, 1897, changes of the most radical character were introduced. Under this law, within twenty-four hours of his arrest, an accused person must be conducted before the procureur who must require the juge d'instruction to question him immediately. In case of his refusal, absence, or other obstacle, the accused must be examined without delay by the official designated by the public minister. In default of examination within the time prescribed, the public prosecutor must order him to be set at liberty, and any person kept confined for more than twenty-four hours in the place of detention without examination, or without being brought before the public prosecutor shall be considered as arbitrarily detained, and all violations of this law by officials are to be prosecuted as outrages against liberty. At the examination the magistrate having verified the identity of the accused, is required to make known to him the facts charged against him and receive his declaration, first having warned him that he is free not to make any. Mention of this warning must be made in the procès-verbal. If the accusation is sustained, the magistrate shall inform the accused of his right to choose a counsel, and if he makes no choice, shall himself appoint one, if the accused demands it. Mention of this formality must be made in the procès-verbal. If the accused has been found outside of the arrondissement where the warrant was issued, and at a distance of more than ten myriameters (about 60 miles) from the principal place of the arrondissement, he is conducted before the public prosecutor of the one in which he was found and by him examined. The accused is not removed from this jurisdiction against his consent, and if when the inquiry is made of him, that is refused, information is sent to the officer who signed the warrant, with a statement of facts bearing on the identity of the person. The warning must be given to the accused at this examination that he is free not to make any declarations, and it must be mentioned in the procès-verbal. The juge d'instruction charged with the matter decides immediately upon the receipt of this message whether there is reason to order the transfer. In case of flagrant crime the juge d'instruction can proceed to examine him immediately if there is urgency resulting from the condition of a witness in danger of death, or the existence of indications likely to disappear, or even if he is taken away from the place. If the accused remains in custody, he can immediately have the first examination and communicate freely with his counsel. Provisions of the law of July 14, 1865, amending article 613 of the code of criminal instruction are abrogated in all that concerns places of detention subjected to the cell régime. There may be an interdiction of communication ordered by the juge d'instruction for ten days, which may be once only renewed for ten days more. In each case the interdiction of communication shall not apply to the counsel of the accused. He must make known the name of his counsel, and whether detained or set free, cannot be examined unless with his express consent except in the presence of his counsel. The counsel can only act for him after having been authorized by the magistrate, and in case of refusal, a note should be made of the incident in the procès-verbal. The counsel should be summoned by letter at least twenty-four hours in advance. The counsel is entitled to be informed by the recorder of the inquiries to which the accused is to be subjected and of every order made by the judge. Journal Officiel de la République Française, Dec. 10, 1897.

JUICIO. In Spanish Law. A trial or suit. White, New Recop. b. 3, tit. 4, c. 1.

JUICIO DE APEO. In Spanish Law. The decree of a competent tribunal directing the determining and marking the boundaries of lands or estates.

JUICIO DE CONCURSO DE ACREEDORES. In Spanish Law. The decree obtained by a debtor against his creditors, or by the creditors against their debtor, for the payment of the amount due, according to the respective rank of each creditor, when the property of the debtor is insufficient to pay the whole of his liabilities.

JUMPING BAIL. A colloquial expression describing the act of the principal in a bail bond in violating the condition of the obligation by failing to do the thing stipulated, as, not appearing in court on a particular day to abide the event of a suit or the order of court, but instead, withdrawing or fleeing from the jurisdiction. Anderson's L. Dict.

JUNIOR. Younger. This has been held to be no part of a man's name, but an addition by use, and a convenient distinction between a father and son of the same name. People v. Collins, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 549; Com. v. Perkins, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 388.

Any matter that distinguishes persons renders the addition of junior or senior unnecessary; 1 Mod. Ent. 35; Salk. 7. But if the father and son have both the same name, the father shall be prima facie intended, if junior be not added, or some other matter of distinction; Salk. 7; 6 Co. 20; 11 id. 39; Hob. 330. If father and son have the same name and addition, and the former sue the latter, the writ is abatable unless the son have the further addition of junior, or the younger. But if the father be the defendant and the son the plaintiff, there is no need of the further addition of senior, or the elder, to the name of the father; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 187.

JUNIOR BARRISTER. A barrister under the rank of queen's counsel. Moz. & W. Also the junior of two counsel employed on the same side in a case. See BARRISTER.

JUNIPERUS SABINA (Lat.). In Medical Jurisprudence. A plant commonly called savin.

It is used for lawful purposes in medicine, but too frequently for the criminal purpose of producing abortion, generally endangering the life of the woman. It is usually administered in powder or oil. The dose of oil for lawful purposes, for a grown person, is from two to four drops. Parr, Med. Dict. Sabina. Foderé mentions a case where a large dose of powdered savin had been administered to an ignorant girl in the seventh month of her pregnancy, which had no effect on the fœtus. It, however, nearly took the life of the girl. Foderé, tome iv. p. 431. Given in sufficiently large doses, four or six grains, in the form of powder, it kills a dog in a few hours; and even its insertion into a wound has the same effect. 3 Orfila, Traité des Poisons 42. For a form of indictment for administering savin to a woman quick with child, see 3 Chit. Cr. L. 798. See 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 316.

JUNK-SHOP. A place where odds and ends are purchased and sold. City Council of Charleston v. Goldsmith, 12 Rich. (S. C.) 470. In this case it was said that "it is perfectly immaterial whether it is a large or a small shop," and a person was properly indicted and convicted for keeping such a house without license who bought from other shops, and also from persons bringing to his shop the articles which make a junk-shop. Where a tax was laid upon "stores" in which the stock never exceeds in value $2,000, the term was held to cover a store kept by a dealer in old iron and other metals, old glass, old rope, and old paper stock; Pitts v. City of Vicksburg, 72 Miss. 181, 16 South. 418.

Acts prohibiting the keeping of such shops without license and prescribing a fine for violation of the act are constitutional; Marmet v. State, 45 Ohio St. 63, 12 N. E. 463; although they impose different licenses upon dealers in general merchandise and those who sell specified articles; City of New Orleans v. Kaufman, 29 La. Ann. 283, 29 Am. Rep. 328; but such a tax was held invalid when a municipal ordinance clearly showed that it was for revenue, an act for raising revenue not being an exercise of police power; Pitts v. Vicksburg, 72 Miss. 181, 16 South. 418.

See City of Grand Rapids v. Brandy, 105 Mich. 670, 64 N. W. 29, 32 L. R. A. 116, 55 Am. St. Rep. 472; PAWNBROKERS.

JURA. As to titles based on this word, see the corresponding titles under JUS.

JURA FISCALIA (Lat.). Rights of the exchequer. 3 Bla. Com. 45.

JURA IN RE (Lat.). In Civil Law. Rights in a thing, as opposed to rights to a thing (jura ad rem). Rights in a thing which are not lost upon loss of possession, and which give a right to an action in rem against whoever has the possession. These rights are of four kinds: dominium, hæreditas, servitus, pignus. Heineccius, Elem. Jur. Civ. § 333. See JUS IN RE.

JURA PERSONARUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Rights which belong to men in their different characters or relations, as father, apprentice, citizen, etc. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 122, n.

JURA REGALIA (Lat.). Royal rights. 1 Bla. Com. 117, 119, 240; 3 id. 45.

JURAMENTÆ CORPORALES (Lat.). Corporal oaths, q. v.

JURAMENTUM CALUMNIÆ (Lat. oath of calumny). In Civil and Canon Law. An oath required of plaintiff and defendant, whether the parties themselves insist on it or not, that they are not influenced in seeking their right by malice, but believe their cause to be just. It was also required of the attorneys and procurators of the parties. Called, also, jusjurandum or sacramentum calumniæ. Calv. Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Utr.; Clerke, Pr. tit. 42.

JURAMENTUM JUDICIALE (Lat.). In Civil Law. An oath which the judge of his own accord, defers to either of the parties.

It is of two kinds: first, that which the judge defers for the decision of the cause, and which is understood by the general name juramentum judiciale, and is sometimes called suppletory oath, juramentum suppletorium; second, that which the judge defers in order to fix and determine the amount of the condemnation which he ought to pronounce, and which is called juramentum in litem. Pothier, Obl. p. 4, c. 3, s. 3, art. 3.

JURAT. In Practice. That part of an affidavit where the officer certifies that the same was "sworn" before him.

The jurat is usually in the following form, viz.: "Sworn and subscribed before me, on the —— day of ——, 1914. J. P., Justice of the Peace."

In some cases it has been held that it was essential that the officer should sign the jurat, and that it should contain his addition and official description; Jackson v. Stiles, 3 Cai. (N. Y.) 128. But see Chase v. Edwards, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 283; Proff. Not; Hawkins v. State, 136 Ind. 630, 36 N. E. 419. A jurat being no part of an affidavit, a general demurrer to the sufficiency of the affidavit will not reach a failure to add to the name of the person who administered the oath his official designation; Smith v. Walker, 93 Ga. 252, 18 S. E. 830.

An officer in some English corporations, chiefly in certain towns in Kent and Sussex, whose duties are similar to those of aldermen in others; stat. 1 Edw. IV.; 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 30; 13 Edw. I. c. 26.

Officers in the island of Jersey, of whom there are twelve, members of the royal court, and elected for life; 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 103; L. R. 1 P. C. 94.

JURATA (Lat.). In Old English Law. A jury of twelve men sworn. Especially, a jury of the common law, as distinguished from the assize, or jury established or re-established by stat. Hen. II.

The assize was a body of jurors summoned to answer certain specific questions in accordance with a positive law that such questions should be answered in that way. But in time the ordinary method of proof came to be the jury to which the parties agreed to submit these preliminary or incidental questions. This new body, so summoned, is the jurata into which the assize is converted; "assisa vertitur in juratam." 1 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 151.

The jurata, or common-law jury, was a jury called in to try the cause, upon the prayer of the parties themselves, in cases where a jury was not given by statute Hen. II., and as the jury was not given under the statute of Henry II., the writ of attaint provided in that statute would not lie against a jurata for false verdict. It was common for the parties to a cause to request that the cause might be decided by the assiza, sitting as a jurata, in order to save trouble of summoning a new jury, in which case "cadit assiza et vertitur in juratam," and the cause is said to be decided non in modum assizæ, but in modum juratæ. 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 335, 336; Glanville, lib. 13, c. 20; Bracton, lib. 3, c. 30. But this distinction has been long obsolete.

Juratæ were divided into: first, jurata dilatoria, which inquires out offenders against the law, and presents their names, together with their offences, to the judge, and which is of two kinds, major and minor, according to the extent of its jurisdiction; second, jurata judicaria, which gives verdict as to the matter of fact in issue, and is of two kinds, civilis, in civil causes, and criminalis, in criminal causes. Du Cange.

A clause in nisi prius records called the jury clause, so named from the word jurata, with which its Latin form begins. This entry, jurata ponitur in respectu, is abolished. Com. Law Proc. Act, 1852, § 104; Whart. Law Lex.; 9 Co. 32; 59 Geo. III. c. 46; 4 Bla. Com. 342. Such trials were usually held in churches, in presence of bishops, priests, and secular judges, after three days fasting, confession, communion, etc. Du Cange.

A certificate placed at the bottom of an affidavit, declaring that the affiant has been sworn or affirmed to the truth of the facts therein alleged. Its usual form is, "Sworn (or affirmed) before me, the —— day of ——, 19—." A jurat.

JURE DIVINO (Lat.). By divine right. Divine Right is the name generally given to the theory of government which holds monarchy to be the only legitimate form of government. The monarch and his legitimate heirs being, by divine right, entitled to the sovereignty, cannot forfeit that right by any misconduct, or any period of dispossession. But where the knowledge of the right heir is lost, the usurper, being in possession by the permission of God, is to be obeyed as the true heir. Sir Robert Filmer, the most distinguished exponent of the theory, died about 1650. See DIVINE RIGHT OF KINGS.

JURE PROPINQUITATIS (Lat.). By right of relationship. Co. Litt. 10 b.

JURE REPRESENTATIONIS (Lat.). By right of representation. See PER STIRPES. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 219, n. 14, 224.

JURE UXORIS (Lat.). By right of a wife.

JURIDICAL. Relating to administration of justice, or office of a judge. Webster, Dict.

Regular; done in conformity to the laws of the country and the practice which is there observed.

JURIS CONSULTUS (Lat. skilled in the law). In Civil Law. A person who has such knowledge of the laws and customs which prevail in a state as to be able to advise, act, and to secure a person in his dealings. Cicero.

The early jurisconsults gave their opinions gratuitously, and were also employed in drawing up written documents. From Augustus to Adrian, only those allowed by the emperor could be jurisconsults; before and after those emperors, any could be jurisconsults who chose. If their opinion was unanimous, it had the force of law: if not, the prætor could follow which opinion he chose. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Utr.

There were two schools of jurisconsults at Rome, the Proculeians and Labinians. The latter were founded by Labeo, and were in favor of innovation; the former by Capito, and held to the received doctrines. Cushing, Int. Rom. Law. §§ 5, 6.

JURIS ET DE JURE (Lat.). Of right and by law. A presumption is said to be juris et de jure when it is conclusive, i. e. when no evidence will be admitted to rebut it, in contradistinction to a presumption, which is simply juris, i. e. rebuttable by evidence; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 15, note; Wills, Circ. Ev. 29; Best, Pres. 20, § 17; Best, Ev. 43.

JURIS ET SEISINÆ CONJUNCTIO (Lat.). The union of seisin, or possession, and the right of possession, forming a complete title. 2 Bla. Com. 311.

JURISDICTION (Lat. jus, law, dicere, to declare). The authority by which judicial officers take cognizance of and decide causes. State v. Wakefield, 60 Vt. 618, 15 Atl. 181. The power to hear and determine a cause. Parker v. Wallace, 3 Ohio 494; Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, 2 How. (U. S.) 338, 11 L. Ed. 283; Dahlgren v. County of Santa Cruz, 8 Cal. App. 622, 97 Pac. 681, where, after quoting this definition, the court adds: "And necessarily includes the power to decide it incorrectly as well as correctly;" and adds the following from People v. Sturtevant, 9 N. Y. 263, 59 Am. Dec. 536: "It does not relate to the rights of the parties as between themselves, but to the power of the court." In the California case, it was held that a gross error in the exercise of jurisdiction could not be annulled on certiorari.

The test of the jurisdiction of a court is whether or not it had power to enter upon the inquiry; not whether its conclusion in the course of it was right or wrong; Board of Com'rs of Lake County v. Platt, 79 Fed. 567, 25 C. C. A. 87.

The right of a judge to pronounce a sentence of the law, on a case or issue before him, acquired through due process of law. It includes power to enforce the execution of what is decreed. In re Ferguson, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 239; Hopkins v. Com., 3 Metc. (Mass.) 460.

"The right to adjudicate concerning the subject-matter in the given case. To constitute this there are three essentials: First, the court must have cognizance of the class of cases to which the one to be adjudicated belongs; second, the proper parties must be present; and third, the point decided upon must be, in substance and effect, within the issue;" Reynolds v. Stockton, 140 U. S. 254, 268, 11 Sup. Ct. 773, 35 L. Ed. 464.

"Jurisdiction is authority to decide the case either way." The Fair v. Specialty Co., 228 U. S. 22, 25, 33 Sup. Ct. 410, 57 L. Ed. 716.

Ancillary jurisdiction. Where one court of chancery entertains a bill in aid of a suit commenced in another chancery jurisdiction, both being designed to operate upon the same subject-matter or property right, but where the first suit is inadequate to give complete relief for want of territorial jurisdiction over the entire subject of litigation, the subsequent suits are said to be ancillary to the first. A familiar illustration is a bill to foreclose a mortgage on a railroad passing through two or more states, in which ancillary bills are filed in states other than that in which the first suit is brought, without regard to the citizenship of the parties.

Appellate jurisdiction is that given by appeal or writ of error from the judgment of another court.

Assistant jurisdiction is that afforded by a court of chancery in aid of a court of law: as, for example, by a bill of discovery, or for the perpetuation of testimony, and the like.

Auxiliary jurisdiction is another name given to this jurisdiction in aid of a court of law.

Jurisdiction of the cause is the power over the subject-matter given by the laws of the sovereignty in which the tribunal exists.

Civil jurisdiction is that which exists when the subject-matter is not of a criminal nature.

Concurrent jurisdiction is that which is possessed over the same parties or subject-matter at the same time by two or more separate tribunals.

Consultative jurisdiction. Where one court aids another by giving an opinion on a matter which the latter has under consideration, the court which gives the opinion is said to exercise a consultative jurisdiction. 4 App. Cas. 30.

Criminal jurisdiction is that which exists for the punishment of crimes.

Exclusive jurisdiction is that which gives to one tribunal sole power to try the cause.

General jurisdiction is that which extends to a great variety of matters. General jurisdiction in law and equity is jurisdiction of every kind that a court can possess, of the person, subject-matter, territorial, and generally the power of the court in the discharge of its judicial duties. Mussen v. Granite Works, 63 Hun 367, 18 N. Y. Supp. 267.

Limited jurisdiction (called, also, special and inferior) is that which extends only to certain specified causes.

Original jurisdiction is that bestowed upon a tribunal in the first instance.

Jurisdiction of the person is that obtained by the appearance of the defendant before the tribunal. Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 462, 6 Am. Dec. 88.

Territorial jurisdiction is the power of the tribunal considered with reference to the territory within which it is to be exercised. Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 462, 6 Am. Dec. 88.

Cooley speaks of "courts of general jurisdiction, by which is meant that their authority extends to a great variety of matters, while others are only of special and limited jurisdiction," that is, have authority extending only to certain specified cases; Const. Lim., 5th ed. 502. The inferior federal courts, though of limited jurisdiction, are not technically inferior courts; McCormick v. Sullivant, 10 Wheat. (U. S.) 192, 6 L. Ed. 300. There are courts which are competent to decide on their own jurisdiction and to exercise it to a final judgment without setting forth in their proceedings the facts and evidence on which it is rendered, whose record is absolute verity, which can be questioned only in an appellate court; other courts are so constituted that their judgments "can be looked through for the facts and evidence which are necessary to sustain them," whose decisions are not evidence of themselves to show jurisdiction and its lawful exercise; Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. (U. S.) 341, 11 L. Ed. 283.

The fundamental question of jurisdiction, first of the appellate court, and then of the court from which the record comes, presents itself on every writ of error and appeal and must be answered by the court whether propounded by counsel or not; Defiance Water Co. v. Defiance, 191 U. S. 184, 24 Sup. Ct. 63, 48 L. Ed. 140.

Jurisdiction is given by the law; Clyde & R. Plank Road Co. v. Parker, 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 323; Baker v. Chisholm, 3 Tex. 157; and cannot be conferred by consent of the parties; Gamber v. Holben, 5 Mich. 331; Fields v. Walker, 23 Ala. 155; State v. Bonney, 34 Me. 223; Vose v. Morton, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 27, 50 Am. Dec. 750; Bell v. R. Co., 4 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 549; Huber v. Beck, 6 Ind. App. 47, 32 N. E. 1025; Hager v. Falk, 82 Wis. 644, 52 N. W. 432; Parkhurst v. Machine Co., 65 Hun 489, 20 N. Y. Supp. 395; St. Louis R. Co. v. Ry. Co., 52 Fed. 770; nor can silence or positive consent of parties confer on a federal court jurisdiction denied by statute; State of Indiana v. Tolleston Club, 53 Fed. 18. Where the jurisdiction of a court as to the subject-matter is limited, the consent of parties cannot enlarge it; Fleischman v. Walker, 91 Ill. 319. Where under a contract parties agree that in case of a breach one might be served with a writ in Scotland, the court refused to allow service on the defendant domiciled there; no agreement between individuals can empower a court to do an act which it is, by rules made under a statute, forbidden to do; [1896] 1 Q. B. 35. But a privilege defeating jurisdiction may be waived if the court has jurisdiction over the subject-matter; Raney v. McRae, 14 Ga. 589, 60 Am. Dec. 660; Campbell v. Wilson, 6 Tex. 379; Kenney v. Greer, 13 Ill. 432, 54 Am. Dec. 439; Boyers v. Elliott, 7 Humphr. (Tenn.) 209; Gracie v. Palmer, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 699, 5 L. Ed. 719; see Bunker v. Langs, 76 Hun 543, 28 N. Y. Supp. 210; and parties may admit facts which show jurisdiction; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Ramsey, 22 Wall. 322, 22 L. Ed. 823, where the files of the record were lost and the court thereupon presumed that they contained all necessary jurisdictional facts.

Jurisdiction given by the law of the sovereignty of the tribunal is held sufficient everywhere, at least as to all property within the sovereignty; The Globe, 2 Blatchf. 427, Fed. Cas. No. 5,483; Johnson v. Holley, 27 Mo. 594; and as to persons on whom process is actually and personally served within the territorial limits of jurisdiction, or who appear and by their pleadings admit jurisdiction; McMullen v. Guest, 6 Tex. 275; Barnes v. Harris, 4 N. Y. 375; Adams v. Lamar, 8 Ga. 83. See Wells v. Patton, 50 Kan. 732, 33 Pac. 15. But the appearance of a person on whom no personal service of process has been made, merely to object to the jurisdiction is not such an admission; Wright v. Boynton, 37 N. H. 9, 72 Am. Dec. 319; Bissell v. Briggs, 9 Mass. 462, 6 Am. Dec. 88.

Jurisdiction must be either of the subject-matter, which is acquired by exercising powers conferred by law over property within the territorial limits of the sovereignty, or of the person, which is acquired by actual service of process or personal appearance of the defendant. The question as to the possession of the former is to be determined according to the law of the sovereignty; Dav. 407; of the latter, as a simple question of fact. See CONFLICT OF LAW; FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

Jurisdiction in a personal action cannot be obtained by service on a defendant outside of the jurisdiction; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565. The courts of one state have no jurisdiction over persons of other states unless found within their territorial limits; Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. (U. S.) 367, 21 L. Ed. 959.

Jurisdiction in rem over a non-resident's property can be obtained by proceedings against it, of which notice should be given in order to give a binding effect to the proceedings; such notice may be actual or constructive; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565; see Stewart v. Anderson, 70 Tex. 588, 8 S. W. 295. Any judgment obtained in such proceedings has no effect beyond the property in question; no other property can be reached under it; nor can any suit be maintained on it, either in the same court or elsewhere; Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 317, 19 L. Ed. 931.

Where the jurisdiction of a court is based upon the amount in controversy, some cases hold that the test is in the amount alleged in the pleadings to be due; Lord v. Goldberg, 81 Cal. 599, 22 Pac. 1126, 15 Am. St. Rep. 82; Abbott v. Gatch, 13 Md. 314, 71 Am. Dec. 635; but not if the amount is so alleged in bad faith; Fix v. Sissung, 83 Mich. 561, 47 N. W. 340, 21 Am. St. Rep. 616; it will be determined by the allegations of the complaint and not on ex parte affidavits; Holden v. Machinery Co., 82 Fed. 209. Where, on an appeal from a justice of the peace, it appears by testimony at the trial that the plaintiff's demand exceeded the statutory jurisdiction, there is no jurisdiction; Collins v. Collins, 37 Pa. 387. Where the amount in controversy appeared by the pleadings to be sufficient to give jurisdiction, but the jury found for a sum less than the jurisdictional amount, it was held that the court did not have jurisdiction; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. W. Co. v. Johnson, 67 Ind. 546; Darling v. Conklin, 42 Wis. 478; but it is also held that in such cases the judgment will stand, but without costs; Abbott v. Gatch, 13 Md. 314, 71 Am. Dec. 635. Where a defence is made to a part of a claim and the jury find for less than the full claim, the jurisdiction is not affected; Hardin v. Cass County, 42 Fed. 652.

"By matter in dispute is meant the subject of litigation—the matter for which the suit is brought—and upon which issue is joined, and in relation to which jurors are called and witnesses examined;" Lee v. Watson, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 339, 17 L. Ed. 557. In an action upon a money demand, where the general issue is pleaded, the matter in dispute is the debt claimed; Gray v. Blanchard, 97 U. S. 565, 24 L. Ed. 1108. In actions sounding in damages, the damages claimed give jurisdiction; Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U. S. 550, 6 Sup. Ct. 501, 29 L. Ed. 729; in cases impeaching the right to an office, the amount of the salary attached to the office is the criterion; Smith v Adams, 130 U. S. 175, 9 Sup. Ct. 566, 32 L. Ed. 895; in ejectment the value of the land claimed determines the jurisdiction; Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Smith, 135 U. S. 195, 10 Sup. Ct. 728, 34 L. Ed. 95; and so it is in a bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance as a cloud on the title; Simon v. House, 46 Fed. 317.

In a tax case it is measured by the value of the right to be protected and not by the amount of the tax for a single year; Berryman v. Board of Trustees, 222 U. S. 334, 32 Sup. Ct. 147, 56 L. Ed. 225; and in a suit to enjoin a threatened or continued commission of certain acts, the amount in controversy is the value of the right which plaintiff seeks to protect; Board of Trade of City of Chicago v. Cella Commission Co., 145 Fed. 28, 76 C. C. A. 28.

On the other hand, it has been held that in an action involving taxes, only one year's levy and not future taxes can be considered; Joint Dists. Nos. 70 and 98 v. School Dist. No. 11, 9 Kan. App. 883, 57 Pac. 1060. If only part of the claim is contested and it is thereby reduced below the jurisdictional amount, there is no jurisdiction; Citizens' Savings Bank v. Coffee Co., 91 S. W. 261, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 1200.

In all cases facts on which the jurisdiction of a federal court depends must in some form appear on the face of the record; its jurisdiction is limited, and the presumption is that a cause is without its jurisdiction unless the contrary affirmatively appear; Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Rhoads, 119 U. S. 237, 7 Sup. Ct. 193, 30 L. Ed. 380; until it is in some way shown by the record that the sum demanded is not the matter in dispute, that sum will govern in all questions of jurisdiction, but when it is shown that the sum demanded is not the real matter in suit, the sum shown and not the sum demanded will prevail; Hilton v. Dickinson, 108 U. S. 174, 2 Sup. Ct. 424, 27 L. Ed. 688; the amount of damages laid in the declaration is not conclusive upon the question of jurisdiction; if the court find that the amount of damages stated in the declaration is colorable for the purpose of creating a case within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, the jurisdiction is defeated, and it is the duty of the court to dismiss the proceedings; this may be shown by evidence or depositions taken in the cause; however done it should be upon due notice to the parties to be affected by the dismissal; Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U. S. 326, 9 Sup. Ct. 289, 32 L. Ed. 690. If this be made to appear "to the satisfaction of the circuit court at any time after suit has been brought," the court must dismiss the suit; Act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. L. 472). If, from plaintiff's evidence at the trial, the amount laid in the complaint appears to have been beyond reasonable expectation of recovery, the action should be dismissed; Holden v Machinery Co., 82 Fed. 209. Fictitious claims cannot be added to give jurisdiction; Smith v. Ins. Co., 33 La. Ann. 1071. Costs and interest in the appellate courts are excluded; Hartsook's Adm'r v. Crawford's Adm'r, 85 Va. 413, 7 S. E. 538. In suing for personal property, damages for detention cannot be added; Graves v. Thompson, 35 Wash. 282, 77 Pac. 384. The jurisdictional amount may appear by affidavit after appeal taken; U. S. v. Freight Ass'n, 166 U. S. 290, 17 Sup. Ct. 540, 41 L. Ed. 1007.

A plea of set-off will not deprive the court of jurisdiction, though, if established, it would reduce the plaintiff's recovery below the jurisdictional amount; Odell v. Culbert, 9 W. & S. (Pa.) 66, 42 Am. Dec. 317; Lord v. Goldberg, 81 Cal. 599, 22 Pac. 1126, 15 Am. St. Rep. 82; and where a defendant sets up a recoupment, he thereby accepts the jurisdiction; Merchants' Heat & Light Co. v. Clow & Sons, 204 U. S. 286, 27 Sup. Ct. 285, 51 L. Ed. 488, where it is said that "there is some difference in the decisions as to when the defendant becomes so far an actor as to submit to the jurisdiction," and the cases are cited.

In a creditor's bill several judgments held by different creditors cannot be added to make up the jurisdictional amount in the circuit court; Hunt v. Bender, 154 U. S. 556, Appx., 14 Sup. Ct. 1163, 18 L. Ed. 915. But it is otherwise where several plaintiffs are interested collectively under a common title, the validity of which is before the court; New Orleans P. Ry. Co. v. Parker, 143 U. S. 42, 12 Sup. Ct. 364, 36 L. Ed. 66. A reasonable attorney's fee, stipulated by the parties in case of a suit, may be added to the debt to make up its jurisdictional amount; Rogers v. Riley, 80 Fed. 759. Where the judgment in the supreme court of a territory exceeded $5,000, the supreme court of the United States has jurisdiction though the judgment in the trial court was for a less sum, and the amount is reached by adding interest to that judgment; Benson Min. & Smelting Co. v. Smelting Co., 145 U. S. 428, 12 Sup. Ct. 877, 36 L. Ed. 762. On the appeal it must be shown that the amount in controversy in the appellate court is sufficient; McCoy v. McCoy, 33 W. Va. 60, 10 S. E. 19; the plaintiff in error must show this fact; Wilson v. Blair, 119 U. S. 387, 7 Sup. Ct. 230, 30 L. Ed. 441.

A court of general jurisdiction is presumed to be acting within its jurisdiction till the contrary is shown; Brown, Jur. § 202; Wright v. Douglass, 10 Barb. (N. Y.) 97; Town of Huntington v. Town of Charlotte, 15 Vt. 46. A court of limited jurisdiction, or a court acting under special powers, has only the jurisdiction expressly delegated; State v. Metzger, 26 Mo. 65; Wight v. Warner, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 384; and it must appear from the record that its acts are within its jurisdiction; Proctor v. State, 5 Harr. (Del.) 387; Green v. Wheeler, 1 Scam. (Ill.) 554; Bersch v. Schneider, 27 Mo. 101; Clyde & R. P. R. Co. v. Parker, 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 323; Sullivan v. Blackwell, 28 Miss. 737; Barrett v. Crane, 16 Vt. 246; Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. (U. S.) 319, 11 L. Ed. 283; see Metcalf v. Watertown, 128 U. S. 586, 9 Sup. Ct. 173, 32 L. Ed. 543; unless the legislature, by general or special law, remove this necessity; Bush v. Lindsey, 24 Ga. 245, 71 Am. Dec. 117; Small v. Hempstead, 7 Mo. 373; Kemp v. Kennedy, 1 Pet. C. C. 36, Fed. Cas. No. 7,686. See Bac. Abr. Courts (C, D).

The judgment of a court of another state is entitled to the presumption of validity; Gottlieb v. Grain Co., 181 N. Y. 563, 74 N. E. 1117; Dallas County v. Merrill, 77 Mo. 578; State v. Weber, 96 Minn. 422, 105 N. W. 490, 113 Am. St. Rep. 630; and when the record of proceedings in such a case does not show that every step essential to jurisdiction was duly taken, it must be presumed that the court proceeded to judgment only after acquiring jurisdiction; Smith v. Trust Co., 154 N. Y. 333, 48 N. E. 553; and the burden is on the defendant to show the nonexistence of jurisdictional facts; Russell v. Butler (Tex. Civ. App.) 47 S. W. 406; Gilchrist v. Oil Land Co., 21 W. Va. 115, 45 Am. Rep. 555.

Where one of two courts of concurrent jurisdiction has taken cognizance of a cause, the other will not entertain jurisdiction of the same cause; Brown, Jur. § 95; Gamble v. Warner, 16 Ohio 373; Henry v. Tupper, 27 Vt. 518; Conover v. New York, 25 Barb. (N. Y.) 513; Gould v. Hayes, 19 Ala. 438; Sharon v. Terry, 36 Fed. 337, 1 L. R. A. 572; Ober v. Gallagher, 93 U. S. 199, 23 L. Ed. 829; Powers v. City Council of Springfield, 116 Mass. 84.

The leading general principle as to concurrent jurisdiction is that whichever court of those having such jurisdiction first acquires possession of a cause will retain it throughout; Wells, Jurisd. § 156; Gould v. Hayes, 19 Ala. 438; Conover v. New York, 25 Barb. (N. Y.) 513. A court which has acquired rightful jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter will retain it for all purposes within the general scope of the equities to be enforced; Ober v. Gallagher, 93 U. S.

199, 23 L. Ed. 829; Taylor v. City of Fort Wayne, 47 Ind. 274; where concurrent jurisdiction may be exercised by the federal and state authorities, the court which first takes jurisdiction can be interfered with by no other court, state or federal. It is a subversion of the judicial power to take a cause from a court having jurisdiction, before its final decision is given; Ex parte Robinson, 6 McLean 355, Fed. Cas. No. 11,935; Mail v. Maxwell, 107 Ill. 554. The supreme court and the common pleas have concurrent jurisdiction in matters of equity; and pending a bill in the common pleas, the supreme court will not entertain jurisdiction for the same cause; Cleveland, P. & A. R. Co. v. Erie, 1 Grant 212.

The jurisdiction of the court thus first exercising jurisdiction extends to the execution of the judgment rendered; Hawes v. Orr, 10 Bush (Ky.) 431. Courts have no power to interfere with the judgments and decrees of other courts of concurrent jurisdiction; Anthony v. Dunlap, 8 Cal. 26; Revalk v. Kraemer, 8 Cal. 66, 68 Am. Dec. 304.

The rule that among courts of concurrent jurisdiction, that one which first obtains jurisdiction of a case has the exclusive right to decide every question arising in the case, is subject to some limitations; and is confined to suits between the same parties or privies, seeking the same relief or remedy, and to such questions or propositions as arise ordinarily and properly in the progress of the suit first brought, and does not extend to all matters which may by possibility become involved with it; Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 334, 18 L. Ed. 257; Putnam v. New Albany, 4 Biss. 368, Fed. Cas. No. 11,481.

When either a federal or state court of competent jurisdiction takes possession of or acquires jurisdiction over property, that property is as effectually withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the other court as though removed to the territory of another sovereignty; Palmer v. Texas, 212 U. S. 118, 29 Sup. Ct. 230, 53 L. Ed. 435; Wabash R. Co. v. Adelbert College, 208 U. S. 38, 28 Sup. Ct. 182, 52 L. Ed. 379.

Where the first court, because of its limited jurisdiction or mode of proceeding, is not capable of determining the whole controversy, another court may take jurisdiction and accomplish it; Gould v. Hayes, 19 Ala. 438.

Where in a divorce case the court awarded the custody of the children to the mother, retaining jurisdiction for further order in that behalf, the court of another state, to which the mother removed and died, had jurisdiction to determine as to the custody of the children as between the father and the guardian appointed by the court of the other state, with whom the children had been left by the mother; Clarke v. Lyon, 82 Neb. 625, 118 N. W. 472, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 171.

At common law the rule is well established that the pendency of a prior suit in personam in a foreign court, between the same parties for the same cause of action, is no sufficient cause for stay or bar of a suit instituted in a local court. This rule obtains in regard to actions pending in another state; White v. Whitman, 1 Curtis, 494, Fed. Cas. No. 17,561; Smith v. Lathrop, 44 Pa. 326, 84 Am. Dec. 448; but see Ex parte Balch, 3 McLean 221, Fed. Cas. No. 790, where it was held that the pendency of a suit between the same parties and respecting the same subject-matter in another state, may be pleaded in abatement in the federal courts, but to make such plea effectual it must show that the court where suit is has jurisdiction.

It was held that the provision of the federal constitution giving to congress exclusive jurisdiction over lands purchased by consent of the state legislature does not oust the jurisdiction of state courts to try civil actions of tort, since congress has not provided for them; Madden v. Arnold, 22 App. Div. 240, 47 N. Y. Supp. 757. The court of appeals of that state held that jurisdiction of such actions unquestionably remained in the state in the absence of legislation by congress; Barrett v. Palmer, 135 N. Y. 336, 31 N. E. 1017, 17 L. R. A. 720, 31 Am. St. Rep. 835; and the United States supreme court upheld the judgment on the ground that the federal jurisdiction had lapsed under the terms of the cession and declined to determine the other question; Palmer v. Barrett, 162 U. S. 399, 16 Sup. Ct. 837, 40 L. Ed. 1015.

In another class of cases it has been held that a jurisdiction executed by the state courts may be entirely ousted by the interposition of congress by a statute conferring on the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction. An action against a foreign consul may be so brought in the state court; Wilcox v. Luco, 118 Cal. 639, 45 Pac. 676, 50 Pac. 758, 45 L. R. A. 579, 62 Am. St. Rep. 305.

Any act of a tribunal beyond its jurisdiction is of no effect whatever; Kenney v. Greer, 13 Ill. 432, 54 Am. Dec. 439; Corwithe v. Griffing, 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 9; State v. Richmond, 26 N. H. 232; whether without its territorial jurisdiction; Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. (U. S.) 506, 16 L. Ed. 169; Cook v. Walker, 15 Ga. 457; or beyond its powers; Kenney v. Greer, 13 Ill. 432, 54 Am. Dec. 439; Barrett v. Crane, 16 Vt. 246.

When a court has jurisdiction of a res its judgment or decree may affect the property interest of its owner, though a non-resident over whom personal jurisdiction neither was nor could be acquired, and, conversely, the action of a court may operate on property beyond the jurisdiction if the owner has been personally subjected to it. Illustrations of this are numerous. A court of equity has the power to control the disposition of land situated in another jurisdiction or even a foreign country, if the person who has the ownership or control is before the court; Corbett v. Nutt, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 464, 475, 19 L. Ed. 976; Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 57, 10 L. Ed. 873; or to order the cancellation or discharge of a foreign mortgage; Williams v. Fitzhugh, 37 N. Y. 444; and in the famous case of Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves. 444, the English court of chancery decreed specific performance of a contract made in England concerning the boundaries of the colonies of Delaware, Maryland and Pennsylvania.

Courts always refuse to send officers into other jurisdictions to abate nuisances or partition land; Mississippi & M. R. Co. v. Ward, 2 Black (U. S.) 485, 17 L. Ed. 311; Wimer v. Wimer, 82 Va. 890, 5 S. E. 536, 3 Am. St. Rep. 126; the principle being that where the suit concerns specific property the res must be present within the jurisdiction, but the United States circuit court in Nevada granted an injunction to restrain a defendant from wrongfully diverting, in California, waters naturally flowing down a river having its source in that state and flowing into and through the state of Nevada, where complainant's lands were situated; Miller & Lux v. Rickey, 127 Fed. 573, where it was held on a plea to the jurisdiction that it was an action transitory in its nature and the court having jurisdiction of defendant's person had jurisdiction to try the same. See a criticism of this case in 17 Harv. L. Rev. 572. That the objection above stated as to proceeding in rem where the suit is in a jurisdiction in which the res is not situated applies with equal force to requiring the defendant to do any act in a foreign jurisdiction; inasmuch as the court cannot enforce its decree it should not make it. The general principle applies to the federal courts as well as to those of a state; Northern Indiana R. Co. v. R. Co., 15 How. (U. S.) 233, 14 L. Ed. 674. Decrees may sometimes be made indirectly affecting foreign lands, as by enjoining trespass in a foreign jurisdiction; Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Worster, 23 N. H. 462; but for affirmative relief it is in accordance with public policy to send a party to a jurisdiction where the act must be done; Willey v. Decker, 11 Wyo. 496, 73 Pac. 210, 100 Am. St. Rep. 939.

The question of the sufficiency of the service of a summons may be raised upon motion to quash the return supported by affidavits; Wall v. R. Co., 95 Fed. 398, 37 C. C. A. 129; or on a rule to set aside service of process; Park Bros. & Co. v. Boiler Works, 204 Pa. 453, 54 Atl. 334.

Illegality in the service of process by which jurisdiction is to be obtained is not waived by the special appearance of the defendant to move that the service be set aside; nor after such motion is denied, by his answering to the merits; such illegality is waived only when, without having insisted upon it, he pleads in the first instance to the merits; Harkness v. Hyde, 98 U. S. 476, 25 L. Ed. 237. The filing of a general appearance is not a waiver of defendant's right to move to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, where that was based on diverse citizenship and the action was brought in the wrong district; Crown Cotton Mills v. Turner, 82 Fed. 337. But where the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and service was made in the jurisdiction, a defence on the merits after a motion to quash the service of summons had been overruled was held to waive the objection to the jurisdiction; Eddy v. La Fayette, 49 Fed. 807, 1 C. C. A. 441.

In Ex parte Wisner, 203 U. S. 449, 27 Sup. Ct. 150, 51 L. Ed. 264, there is an expression by the court that under the acts of 1875 and 1888 the residences of the parties are jurisdictional and not the subject of waiver, but in Logan & Bryan v. Cable Co., 157 Fed. 570, it was said that this was obiter and that the decisions had never been harmonious as to the effect of that dictum.

While a non-resident defendant corporation may not lose its right of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court on the ground of insufficient service of process by pleading to the merits pursuant to order of the court after objections overruled, it does waive its objection and submits to the jurisdiction if it also sets up a counterclaim even though it be one arising wholly out of the transaction sued upon by plaintiff, and in the nature of recoupment rather than set-off; Merchants' Heat & Light Co. v. Clow & Sons, 204 U. S. 286, 27 Sup. Ct. 285, 51 L. Ed. 488.

It is held that the question must be raised before making any plea to the merits, if at all, when it arises from formal defects in the process, or when the want is of jurisdiction over the person; Smith v. Curtis, 7 Cal. 584; Bohn v. Devlin, 28 Mo. 319; Brown v. Webber, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 560; Whyte v. Gibbes, 20 How. (U. S.) 541, 15 L. Ed. 1016; Perseverance Min. Co. v. Bisaner, 87 Ga. 193, 13 S. E. 461; Callender v. Gates, 45 Ill. App. 374; Bunker v. Langs, 76 Hun 543, 28 N. Y. Supp. 210. But one who invokes the jurisdiction of a court is estopped to deny it on appeal, though this rule does not apply to divorce cases; English v. English, 19 Pa. Super. Ct. 586.

Objection to jurisdiction may be taken by motion to dismiss; Collins v. Collins, 37 Pa. 387; Kinnaman v. Kinnaman, 71 Ind. 417; at common law, by a plea in abatement; Roberts v. Lewis, 144 U. S. 653, 12 Sup. Ct. 781, 36 L. Ed. 579; Waterman v. Tuttle, 18 Ill. 292; Smith v. Elder, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 105; it can be raised in the federal courts by a plea in abatement; Simon v. House, 46 Fed. 317; and under the codes, by demurrer, if the want of jurisdiction appear in the complaint; Works, Courts and Juris. 106; or if it be in a court of special jurisdiction, by demurrer, answer, or motion in arrest of judgment; id. 109.

Where the subject-matter is not within the jurisdiction, the court may dismiss the proceedings of its own motion; Gormly v. McIntosh, 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 271; Robertson v. State, 109 Ind. 79, 10 N. E. 582, 643; and a remedy may be had by a writ of prohibition; 3 Bla. Com. 12. See PROHIBITION.

If the objection is only to a defective service, it must be raised in the court below; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565.

Where the citizenship of the parties appears in the petition, defect of jurisdiction on that ground may be raised by demurrer, in the absence of a general appearance; Meyer v. Herrera, 41 Fed. 65.

It is rarely, if ever, too late to object to the jurisdiction of a court where the want of power to hear and determine appears on the face of the proceedings; per Bronson, J., Delafield v. Illinois, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 159. Thus, an appellant from chancery to the court of errors may avail himself in the latter court of an objection to the chancellor's jurisdiction, though it was not made before him, when the objection, if valid, is of such a kind that it could not have been obviated, had it been started at an earlier stage in the proceedings; id. The objection that the complainant has an adequate remedy at law when made for the first time in an appellate court is looked upon with supreme disfavor; Preteca v. Land Grant Co., 50 Fed. 674, 1 C. C. A. 607, 4 U. S. App. 326. See Foltz v. Ry. Co., 60 Fed. 316, 8 C. C. A. 635. And entering into a stipulation by defendant, for a trial before a master, is a waiver of the right to object to the jurisdiction in equity; Sanders v. Village of Riverside, 118 Fed. 720, 55 C. C. A. 240.

The judgment of a court of another state is always subject to impeachment for the want of jurisdiction, either as to subject-matter or parties.

Courts of general jurisdiction over the parties and the subject-matter of the cause are as a general rule competent to decide questions arising as to their jurisdiction and such decisions are not open to collateral attack; White, C. J., in Ex parte Harding, 219 U. S. 363, 31 Sup. Ct. 324, 55 L. Ed. 252, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 392; and generally courts of dernier resort are conclusive judges of their own jurisdiction; People v. Clark, 1 Park Cr. Cas. (N. Y.) 360; State v. Scott, 1 Bail. (S. C.) 294; but the power of a supreme court over inferior courts always exists (both in civil and criminal cases) where an inferior court acts beyond its jurisdiction or refuses to act within it and there is no other remedy; State v. Helms, 136 Wis. 432, 118 N. W. 158.

It has been generally held that a contract ousting the courts of jurisdiction over future controversies would be invalid; Chamberlain v. R. Co., 54 Conn. 472, 9 Atl. 244; Mentz v. Ins. Co., 79 Pa. 480, 21 Am. Rep. 80. The reason for this rule does not seem to be apparent and it has been termed obsolete. Indeed, the New York court of appeals has indicated its disapproval of the rule though bound by it under stare decisis; Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Coal Co., 50 N. Y. 250.

It has been held in New York that a stipulation not to appeal to the court of appeals in an appealable case may be enforced; Townsend v. Stone Dressing Co., 15 N. Y. 587; if clear in its terms and leaving no doubt of the intention of the party to cut himself off from the right; Stedeker v. Bernard, 93 N. Y. 589; and a contract to refrain from a particular remedy to enforce an existing claim seems not to be against public policy which is not concerned with the option which every man has to sue or forbear to sue; Gitler v. Ins. Co., 124 App. Div. 273, 108 N. Y. Supp. 793.

While parties cannot confer jurisdiction by consent, if the jurisdictional facts are properly alleged and appear of record and the parties proceed to trial upon pleadings which go to the merits, the jurisdictional facts are not subsequently put in issue or seriously denied, the case will not be ordinarily dismissed for want of jurisdiction unless the proofs create a legal certainty that the controversy is not within the jurisdiction; William H. Perry Co. v. Klosters Aktie Bolag, 152 Fed. 967, 82 C. C. A. 321. It was held that individuals or corporations cannot create judicial tribunals for the final and conclusive settlement of controversies; Bauer v. Samson Lodge, 102 Ind. 269, 1 N. E. 571; but any person may covenant that no right of action shall accrue till a third person has decided on any difference that may arise between himself and the other party to the covenant; 5 H. L. Cas. 811; 10 App. Cas. 229; but it has been held that a provision for submitting the whole question of liability to arbitrators as a condition precedent to a right of action is invalid; L. R. 1 Q. B. D. 563. But this case is said not to be in harmony with the other English authorities, though it follows the doctrine of Coleridge, J., in 8 Exch. 497, a case which was affirmed in 5 H. L. Cas. 811, but upon broader grounds. See 11 Harv. L. Rev. 239. In Massachusetts, the decisions appear to distinguish between agreements to arbitrate all disputes and those for the submission of the question of damages only, or questions of that kind which do not go to the root of the action; the former are invalid; the latter valid; see White v. R. Co., 135 Mass. 216; Hutchinson v. Ins. Co., 153 Mass. 143, 26 N. E. 439, 10 L. R. A. 558. In Maine, parties may, by agreement, impose conditions with respect to preliminary and collateral matters, such as do not go to the root of the action, but cannot be compelled, even by their own agreements, to refer the whole cause of action to arbitration, and thus oust the courts of jurisdiction; Dugan v. Thomas, 79 Me. 221, 9 Atl. 354. It is said that the rule that a general covenant to submit any differences is a nullity, is too well settled to be questioned; Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Coal Co., 50 N. Y. 250. See Hohl v. Town of Westford, 33 Wis. 331. An agreement that the decision of an engineer, in case of any dispute, shall be obligatory, is binding; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Fenlon, 4 W. & S. (Pa.) 205; Fox v. R. Co., 3 Wall. Jr. 243, Fed. Cas. No. 5,010; contra, Trott v. Ins. Co., 1 Cliff. 439, Fed. Cas. No. 14,189. The subject is treated in 11 Harv. L. Rev. 234.

Stipulations made in contracts by persons domiciled in the same state limiting the venue to a particular county have been held invalid as against public policy, and tending to oust the courts of their jurisdiction; Nute v. Ins. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 174; Healy v. Bldg. Ass'n, 17 Pa. Sup. Ct. 385; contra, Greve v. Ins. Co., 81 Hun 28, 30 N. Y. Supp. 668, where the court considered the theory of the preceding cases as worth little notice and this case was followed in Heslin v. Bldg. Ass'n, 28 Misc. 376, 59 N. Y. Supp. 572; but an annotator on the subject in 17 Yale L. J. 474, thinks the former view has the weight of authority.

A stipulation between persons domiciled in different states limiting the venue to one state was held void; Reichard v. Ins. Co., 31 Mo. 518; as were also agreements not to resort to the federal courts; Doyle v. Ins. Co., 94 U. S. 535, 24 L. Ed. 148; Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n v. Woolen Mills, 82 Fed. 508, 27 C. C. A. 212.

But a stipulation, between parties both domiciled in a foreign country, that all disputes arising on a contract should be referred to the courts of that country, although the contract was to be performed in the United States and Canada was held valid; Mittenthal v. Mascagni, 183 Mass. 19, 66 N. E. 425, 60 L. R. A. 812, 97 Am. St. Rep. 404; and a provision in a contract between a foreign corporation and a resident of New York not to sue on a judgment against the defendant in any other court than those of Russia was held valid; Gitler v. Russian Co., 124 App. Div. 273, 108 N. Y. Supp. 793.

Other contracts limiting the right to sue as in some of the cases above cited on an existing cause of action are not invalid as on the ground that they oust jurisdiction; Montgomery v. Ins. Co., 108 Wis. 146, 84 N. W. 175. They may be held so on other grounds of public policy; Kilborn v. Field, 78 Pa. 194.

Stipulations in a policy of marine insurance, that any dispute in relation to loss shall be referred to referees; that no policy-holder shall maintain any claim thereon until he shall have offered to submit to such reference; and that in case any suit shall be begun without such offer, the claim shall be dismissed and the company exempted from liability under it, are void; Stephenson v. Ins. Co., 54 Me. 55, 70. A clause in an insurance policy providing for arbitration of any dispute as to loss, and that no action should be maintained till such arbitration was had, does not oust the jurisdiction of the courts; the condition is revocable, though its breach may subject the party to an action for a breach of it; Mentz v. Ins. Co., 79 Pa. 478, 21 Am. Rep. 80.

A by-law of a mutual fire insurance corporation, to which their policies are expressed to be subject, that any suit on a policy shall be brought in the courts where the company is established, is not binding on the assured; Nute v. Ins. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 174.

An agreement by a foreign insurance company, in conformity with a state statute, that if sued in a state court, it will not remove the suit to a federal court, is invalid; Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 445, 22 L. Ed. 365.

An Iowa statute which requires that every foreign corporation named in it shall, as a condition for obtaining a permit to transact business in Iowa, stipulate that it will not remove into the federal court certain suits which it would by the laws of the United States have a right to remove, is void because it makes the right to a permit dependent upon the surrender by the foreign corporation of a privilege secured to it by the constitution and laws of the United States; Barron v. Burnside, 121 U. S. 186, 200, 7 Sup. Ct. 931, 30 L. Ed. 915; the state might as well pass an act to deprive a citizen of another state of his right of removal. See INSURANCE.

Mutual benefit societies may prescribe regulations as to procedure in enforcing claims, and may require appeals to superior bodies before instituting suit, but they cannot entirely take away the right to invoke the aid of the courts in enforcing claims existing in favor of its members upon contracts; Bauer v. Samson Lodge, 102 Ind. 269, 1 N. E. 571.

An agreement by which the members of an association undertake to confer judicial powers, in respect to the common property, upon its officers, selected out of the association, as a tribunal having general authority to adjudicate upon alleged violations of the rules, and to decree a forfeiture of the rights, to such property, of the parties, is void. The court will not aid in enforcing the judgment of a tribunal sought to be created by private compact, except in case of submission to arbitration of specific matters of controversy; Austin v. Searing, 16 N. Y. 112, 69 Am. Dec. 665.

The powers both of courts of equity and of law over their own process to prevent abuse, oppression, and injustice are inherent and equally extensive and efficient; as is also their power to protect their own jurisdiction and officers in the possession of property that is in the custody of the law; Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276, 4 Sup. Ct. 27, 28 L. Ed. 145.

If the subject of the bill creates jurisdiction, it cannot be defeated by matter set up in the answer; the plaintiff is master to decide what law he will rely upon; The Fair v. Specialty Co., 228 U. S. 22, 33 Sup. Ct. 410, 57 L. Ed. 716 (except where the bill is based on diversity of citizenship, denied in the answer; id.).

When a prisoner after pleading guilty is allowed to go out of custody without bail, the court has no further jurisdiction over him, and cannot, at a subsequent term, order his rearrest, and pronounce sentence upon him; People v. Allen, 155 Ill. 61, 39 N. E. 568, 41 L. R. A. 473.

Although in criminal cases the jurisdiction is confined to the locus in quo of the crime, there are cases in which, for a single criminal act, the perpetrator is liable to be tried in more than one jurisdiction. Such a case is presented where a continuous unlawful act is set on foot by a single impulse and operated by an unintermittent force, however long time it may occupy; Armour Packing Co. v. U. S., 153 Fed. 1, 82 C. C. A. 135, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 400, affirmed 209 U. S. 56, 28 Sup. Ct. 428, 52 L. Ed. 681; and when such an act or series of acts runs through several jurisdictions, the offense is committed and cognizable in each; though complete in the jurisdiction where first committed, it may continue, be committed, and be punished in another jurisdiction; id.

JURISDICTION CLAUSE. That part of a bill in equity which is intended to give jurisdiction of the suit to the court, by a general averment that the acts complained of are contrary to equity and tend to the injury of the plaintiff, and that he has no remedy, or not a complete remedy, without the assistance of a court of equity, is called the jurisdiction clause. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 43.

This clause is unnecessary; for if the court appear from the bill to have jurisdiction, the bill will be sustained without this clause; and if the court have not jurisdiction, the bill will be dismissed though the clause may be inserted. Story, Eq. Pl. § 34.

JURISPRUDENCE. The science of the law. The practical science of giving a wise interpretation to the laws and making a just application of them to all cases as they arise.

The science of human law. And. Am. L. § 18.

By science, in the first definition, is understood that connection of truths which is founded on principles either evident in themselves or capable of demonstration,—a collection of truths of the same kind, arranged in methodical order. In the latter sense, it is the habit of judging the same questions in the same manner, and by this course of judgments forming precedents. 1 Ayliffe, Pand. 3. See Bentham, Austin, Amos, Markby, Heron, Phillimore, Lorimer, Salmond, Taylor, Lindley, on Jurisprudence.

Sir F. Pollock divides jurisprudence into: 1. Positive (which is practical, historical, comparative or analytical); 2. Final jurisprudence; and 3. International jurisprudence. General jurisprudence is hardly more than the collective result of comparative and analytical jurisprudence. Comparative jurisprudence deals with the groundwork and typical conceptions which are common to all legal systems, or to all that have made any considerable way towards completeness; and analytical jurisprudence with speculations as to such ideas as Duty, Intent, Ownership, Possession, etc. By Final Jurisprudence he designates the consideration of laws as they ought to be—ground which belongs perhaps more to the statesman than the lawyer. It assumes the shape of a Theory of Legislation, with special branches treating of the formal structure of laws, codification, legal procedure, etc. The general principles of legislation and government, which are put forward as claiming assent from all men in so far as they are rational and social beings, are said to be of natural obligation. The sum of them is called the law of nature, droit naturel, Naturrecht. The law which would in itself be best for a given nation in given circumstances is sometimes called by a certain school of writers, positive law. The sort of doctrine which embodies it may be called Ethical Jurisprudence (Oxford Lectures, The Methods of Jurisprudence).

As to a distinction between jurisprudence and law, see Holland Jurisprudence 5–12; Taylor, Jurisprudence 28.

JURIST. One versed in the science of the law. One skilled in the civil law. One skilled in the law of nations.

JURISTIC PERSON. The usual form of a juristic person and the only one (except the state) at common law, is a corporation. In Germany there are juristic persons (Stiftungen) which are not corporations and have no members. They consist of property devoted to charitable uses, the title to which is not vested in individuals or corporations. Juristic person may, perhaps, include Fiscus and Hæreditas Jacens (q. v.); Gray, Nature and Sources of Law 58.

It is called also persona ficta, and is defined sometimes as a corporation.

See Warner v. Beers, 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 103; 24 Harv. L. Rev. 17; 57 U. P. S. Rev. 131.

JUROR (Lat. juro, to swear). A man who is sworn or affirmed to serve on a jury.

Any person selected and summoned according to law to serve in that capacity, whether the jury has been actually impanelled and sworn or not. State v. McCrystol, 43 La. Ann. 907, 9 South. 922.

JURY (Lat. jurata, sworn). A body of men who are sworn to declare the facts of a case as they are proven from the evidence placed before them.

The term "jury," as used in the constitution, means twelve competent men, disinterested and impartial, not of kin nor personal dependents of either of the parties, having their homes within the jurisdictional limits of the court, drawn and elected by officers free from all bias in favor of or against either party; duly impanelled, and sworn to render a true verdict, according to the law and the evidence; State v. McClear, 11 Nev. 39.

In the trial by jury, the right of which is secured by the VIIth Amendment, both the court and the jury are essential factors; Slocum v. Ins. Co., 228 U. S. 364, 33 Sup. Ct. 523, 57 L. Ed. 879.

The best theory regards the jury system as having been derived from Normandy, where, as in the rest of France, it had existed since its establishment under the Carlovingian kings. It made its appearance in England soon after the Norman Conquest. No trace of it is to be found in Anglo-Saxon times, nor was it, as is often supposed, established by Magna Charta; 10 Harv. L. Rev. 150, by J. E. R. Stephens. The same writer finds the idea of unanimity re-established in the time of Edward IV., a majority verdict having previously sufficed; in the Year Books of 23 Edward III. is the first indication of the jury deciding on evidence produced before them in addition to their own knowledge. Early in the reign of Henry IV. evidence was required to be given at the bar of the court, and the modern practice or method of jury trials had its origin; id. 159.

Prof. J. B. Thayer finds the origin of the jury in the Frankish inquisition; it existed in Normandy and went thence to England in the eleventh century; 5 Harv. L. Rev. 249. The use of a jury both for civil and criminal cases is mentioned for the first time in English statute law in the Constitutions of Clarendon; id. 156.

The origin of trial by jury is said by another writer to be rather French than English, rather royal than popular, rather a livery of conquest than a badge of freedom. Originally juries were called in, not to hear, but to give, evidence. They were the neighbors of the parties and were presumed to know when they came into court the facts about which they were to testify. They were chosen by the sheriff to represent the neighborhood. The verdict was the sworn testimony of the countryside. By slow degrees the jury acquired a new character. Sometimes when the jurors knew nothing of the facts, witnesses who did know the facts would be called in to supply the requisite information. They became more and more dependent on the evidence given in their presence by those witnesses who were summoned by the parties. In the fifteenth century the change had taken place, though in yet later days a man who had been summoned as a juror and sought to escape on the ground that he already knew something of the facts, might be told that he had given a very good reason for his being placed in the jury box. It may well be said therefore that trial by jury, though it had its roots in the Frankish inquest, grew up on English soil; 1 Social England 255, 290. So also 1 Poll. & Maitl. 117-121.

Another writer finds its foundation in Norman institutions and its establishment by positive legislation in the time of Henry II. Lesser, Hist. of Jury Syst. 172.

In an interesting discussion of the "Administration of the Criminal Law," by W. H. Taft, 15 Yale L. J. 1 (1905), it is stated that since 1848 "the trial by jury in criminal cases was adopted in France, in Belgium, in Germany, in Norway and Sweden, in Spain, in Italy, and Russia, except in trials for political offences, and is now in use in those countries." He also considers that, although adopted in Porto Rico, it has been a failure there, and that its adoption in the Philippines would be unwise, adding that "it is by no means clear that in our own jurisprudence trial by jury in civil cases is an unmixed good." The inapplicability of the jury system and also of what are usually termed the constitutional guarantees (all of which except trial by jury were extended to them by President McKinley) to such a country is argued at some length and with vigor.

A common jury is one drawn in the usual and regular manner.

A grand jury is a body organized for certain preliminary purposes.

A jury de medietate linguæ is one composed half of aliens and half of denizens.

Such juries might formerly be claimed, both in civil and criminal cases, where the party claiming the privilege was an alien born, by virtue of 28 Edw. III. c. 13, and by an earlier statute, where one party was a foreign merchant; 27 Edw. III. c. 8. Such a jury was provided in criminal cases by a statute of Edward I. It was abolished by 33 Vict. c. 14. The right has been recognized in this country; Respublica v. Mesca, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 73, 1 L. Ed. 42; People v. McLean, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 381; Richards v. Com., 11 Leigh (Va.) 690; contra U. S. v. McMahon, 4 Cra. C. C. 573, Fed. Cas. No. 15,699; State v. Antonio, 11 N. C. 200. It has been generally abolished by statute; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 19; excepting in Kentucky, where it still exists; id.

A petit or traverse jury is a jury who try the question in issue and pass finally upon the truth of the facts in dispute. The term jury is ordinarily applied to this body distinctively.

A special jury is one selected by the assistance of the parties.

This is granted in some cases upon motion and cause shown, under various local provisions. The method at common law was for the officer to return the names of forty-eight principal freeholders to the proper officer. The attorneys of the respective parties, being present, strike off each twelve names, and from the remaining twenty-four the jury is selected. A similar course is pursued in these states where such juries are allowed. See 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 357. The earliest rule of court on the subject was made in 8 Will. III.; 1 Salk. 405. It formerly was granted only in cases of special consequence or great difficulty; but later, a special jury has usually been granted in ordinary cases. In some states such a jury is of course; in New York, statutes provide for such only in cases of special importance or intricacy, as to which the court must decide.

A struck jury is a special jury. See Cook v. State, 24 N. J. L. 843.

Trial by jury is guaranteed by the constitution of the United States in all criminal cases except upon impeachments, and in all suits at common law where the subject-matter of the controversy exceeds twenty dollars in value. The right to such a trial is also provided in many of our state constitutions. It has been held, however, not to be an infringement of this federal constitutional right, where a statute provides that in all criminal prosecutions the party accused, if he shall so elect, may be tried by the court instead of by a jury; Miller, Const. U. S. 494; Coleman v. Edwards, 5 Ohio St. 57; Ward v. People, 30 Mich. 116; State v. Worden, 46 Conn. 349, 33 Am. Rep. 27. It was held that a jury trial may be waived when there is a positive legislative enactment giving the right to do so; Hallinger v. Davis, 146 U. S. 314, 13 Sup. Ct. 105, 36 L. Ed. 986. This clause of the constitution does not apply to state courts; Hare, Am. Const. L. 860; Eilenbecker v. District Court, 134 U. S. 31, 10 Sup. Ct. 424, 33 L. Ed. 801; Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 557, 22 L. Ed. 487; Cooley, Const. Lim. 410; Williams v. Hert, 110 Fed. 166, where it was also held that when a state was admitted to the Union "on an equal footing with the original states in all respects whatsoever," no right of trial by jury in criminal cases is guaranteed, although it had been secured by the ordinance and acts of congress for the government of the territory out of which the state was created. The states may, therefore, in their own constitutions, dispense with trial by jury both in civil and criminal cases; Ordron. Const. Leg. 261; and cases supra; or provide that a jury shall consist of less than twelve; Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 581, 20 Sup. Ct. 448, 494, 44 L. Ed. 597; In re McKee, 19 Utah, 231, 57 Pac. 23; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 23 L. Ed. 678; Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, 25 L. Ed. 989.

It does not apply to cases in the court of claims; McElrath v. U. S., 102 U. S. 426, 26 L. Ed. 189; nor to proceedings for disbarring an attorney; Re Wall, 107 U. S. 265, 2 Sup. Ct. 569, 27 L. Ed. 552; nor for assessing damages; Raymond v. R. Co., 14 Blatchf. 133, Fed. Cas. No. 11,593; nor to equity cases in the federal courts; Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 126, 26 L. Ed. 672; nor to cases where the right is antecedently and voluntarily relinquished; Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 235, 4 L. Ed. 559; nor does a like provision in a state constitution apply to any proceedings in which a jury was not required at common law; e. g., a justice's court; Vaughn v. Scade, 30 Mo. 600; Knight v. Campbell, 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 16; nor to any court which exercised its functions without the aid of a jury prior to the adoption of a constitution; Thomps. & Merr. Juries 11; People v. Justices of Court of Special Sessions, 74 N. Y. 406.

The provisions of the United States constitution relating to trial by jury are as follows:

"The trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the state where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any state, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed." U. S. Const. art. 3, sec. 2, par. 3.

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. . . ." Amdt. VI, U. S. Const.

"In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." Amdt. VII, U. S. Const.

The first clause of the seventh amendment of the United States constitution in relation to trials by jury relates only to the federal courts; the states are left to regulate them in their own courts; Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 532, 22 L. Ed. 487. The second clause, prohibiting federal courts from re-examining any fact tried by a jury otherwise than according to the common law, applies to the facts tried by jury in a cause in a state court; Justices v. U. S., 9 Wall. (U. S.) 274, 19 L. Ed. 658. Article 3, sec. 2, cl. 3, providing for jury trials of all crimes except impeachment does not apply to state courts; Eilenbecker v. District Court, 134 U. S. 31, 10 Sup. Ct. 424, 33 L. Ed. 801; nor does the prohibition of the fourteenth amendment against abridging the right of trial by jury in suits at common law; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 23 L. Ed. 678; and the same is true of a provision in article 3 for the trial of all crimes in the state where committed; Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 9 Sup. Ct. 28, 32 L. Ed. 352.

The seventh amendment declaring that no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law. The effect of this prohibits the United States courts from re-examining facts tried by a jury, except in the granting of a new trial by the court which tried the issue, or to which the record was properly returnable, or the award of a venire facias de novo by an appellate court for an error in law; Lincoln v. Power, 151 U. S. 436, 14 Sup. Ct. 387, 38 L. Ed. 224; Slocum v. Ins. Co., 228 U. S. 364, 33 Sup. Ct. 523, 57 L. Ed. 879. But such action by an appellate state court was held to be constitutional and not to infringe the right to due process of law or trial by jury; Gunn v. R. Co., 27 R. I. 320, 62 Atl. 118, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 362; id., 27 R. I. 432, 63 Atl. 239, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 883.

The amendment secures unanimity in finding a verdict as an essential feature of trial by jury in common law cases, and an act of congress cannot impart the power to change a constitutional rule, and cannot be treated as attempting to do so; Springville v. Thomas, 166 U. S. 707, 17 Sup. Ct. 717, 41 L. Ed. 1172.

The provision securing the right to jury trials applies to the District of Columbia; Callan v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540, 8 Sup. Ct. 1301, 32 L. Ed. 223; and the provisions are applicable to it in both civil and criminal cases, but the right is not infringed by an act enlarging the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace in the District of Columbia to $300 and requiring every appellant from his judgment to give bond for the payment of final judgment on appeal; Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U. S. 1, 19 Sup. Ct. 580, 43 L. Ed. 873. It has also been held to be secured in territories; Black v. Jackson, 177 U. S. 349, 20 Sup. Ct. 648, 44 L. Ed. 801; but was based upon the acts of congress relating to them; Webster v. Reid, 11 How. (U. S.) 437, 13 L. Ed. 761; Thompson v. Utah, 170 U. S. 343, 18 Sup. Ct. 620, 42 L. Ed. 1061. But the right of trial by jury was not extended by the Constitution by its own force without legislation to the Philippines, since they are not incorporated into the United States by congressional action; Dorr v. U. S., 195 U. S. 138, 24 Sup. Ct. 808, 49 L. Ed. 128, 1 Ann. Cas. 697.

Under the fourteenth amendment a jury trial is guaranteed to municipal offenders sentenced to infamous punishment and a statute for the summary infliction of such punishment is unconstitutional; Jamison v. Wimbish, 130 Fed. 351; but the exercise of summary jurisdiction over such offences by magistrates has long been exercised; Green v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. 556, 21 Pac. 307, 541; Byers v. Com., 42 Pa. 89; and was so in Georgia when the amendment was adopted; Floyd v. Com'rs of Eatonton, 14 Ga. 354, 58 Am. Dec. 559. Accordingly, the decision of the federal court above cited has been very much criticized as not warranted by the supreme court cases and particularly the construction of the amendment in the Slaughter House Cases; 18 H. L. R. 136; as to the right to waive a trial by jury in criminal cases, it is thought by a writer in 21 H. L. R. 212, that the cases may be reconciled by careful analysis and the conclusions reached are that if the constitution prohibits a conviction except by verdict, the court alone cannot decide the case; State v. Holt, 90 N. C. 749, 47 Am. Rep. 544; and a statute allowing a waiver would be invalid; State v. Cottrill, 31 W. Va. 162, 6 S. E. 428; contra, State v. Griggs, 34 W. Va. 78, 11 S. E. 740; and this applies even in cases of minor offences; State v. Stewart, 89 N. C. 563. Under constitutions which provide only that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, the statutes allowing a waiver are generally upheld; Edwards v. State, 45 N. J. L. 419; contra, Brimingstool v. People, 1 Mich. N. P. 260; even in felonies; Murphy v. State, 97 Ind. 579; State v. Worden, 46 Conn. 349, 33 Am. Rep. 27; if there be no statute, however, the waiver cannot be allowed; Harris v. People, 128 Ill. 585, 21 N. E. 563, 15 Am. St. Rep. 153; contra, Wren v. State, 70 Ala. 1. A statute providing that the issues of facts shall be tried by jury was construed to prohibit a waiver; In re McQuown, 19 Okl. 347, 91 Pac. 689, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1136.

A waiver of a jury by the defendant in an action for a penalty in a revenue case does not invalidate the judgment; Schick v. U. S., 195 U. S. 65, 24 Sup. Ct. 826, 49 L. Ed. 99, 1 Ann. Cas. 585, where, however, the dissenting opinion of Harlan, J., should be examined.

A jury trial is not guaranteed by a state constitution providing for "due process of law"; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 378; nor even by the provision for it in the fourteenth amendment; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 23 L. Ed. 678; Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 581, 20 Sup. Ct. 448, 494, 44 L. Ed. 597; nor does it abridge its privileges and immunities; id. "Due process of law" simply requires that there shall be a day in court, and the legislature may take away or change a remedy; People v. Board of Sup'rs, 70 N. Y. 228; but it has been held in some cases that the expression does guarantee a jury trial; Inhabitants of Saco v. Wentworth, 37 Me. 165, 58 Am. Dec. 786; State v. Ray, 63 N. H. 406, 56 Am. Rep. 529; Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray (Mass.) 329; Hurtado v. People, 110 U. S. 516, 4 Sup. Ct. 111, 292, 28 L. Ed. 232.

An act providing for the trial of a contested election to a public office which deprives the party of a trial of disputed facts by jury is not unconstitutional; Ewing v. Filley, 43 Pa. 384.

In the Delaware constitution of 1897, provision is made for the trial of criminal offences against the election laws, by the court without a jury.

The number of jurors must be twelve; and it is held that the term jury in a constitution imports, ex vi termini, twelve men; People v. Justices, 74 N. Y. 406; Turns v. Com., 6 Metc. (Mass.) 231; Norval v. Rice, 2 Wis. 22; whose verdict is to be unanimous; Cruger v. R. Co., 12 N. Y. 190. See State v. McClear, 11 Nev. 39, supra.

Where a constitution preserves the right of trial by jury inviolate, the legislature cannot change the number of jurors in either civil or criminal cases; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 10; Henning v. R. Co., 35 Mo. 408; Allen v. State, 51 Ga. 264.

The question whether the common law requirement of twelve jurors may be changed has in recent years received much attention in the courts. There has been a growing tendency, at least, towards the serious consideration of changes in the jury system as administered at common law and secured by the state and federal constitutions. See GRAND JURY. The decided weight of authority is that, where the right to trial by jury is secured by the constitution, the legislature cannot authorize a verdict by a less number than twelve; that the constitutional reservation implies a right to the concurrent judgment of that number, and any statute limiting it is unconstitutional and void; Opinion of Justices, 41 N. H. 550; Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Adams, 33 Fla. 608, 15 South. 257, 24 L. R. A. 272; Bradford v. Territory, 1 Okl. 366, 34 Pac. 66; Bettge v. Territory, 17 Okl. 85, 87 Pac. 897; Cancemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 128; Harris v. State, 128 Ill. 585, 21 N. E. 563, 15 Am. St. Rep. 153; Carroll v. Byers, 4 Ariz. 158, 36 Pac. 499; and such, under the sixth amendment, must be the number of jurors, neither more nor less than twelve, that being the rule at common law; Thompson v. Utah, 170 U. S. 343, 18 Sup. Ct. 620, 42 L. Ed. 1061. Such is the meaning of "trial by jury" in the primary and usual sense of the term at common law in the American constitutions; Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U. S. 1, 19 Sup. Ct. 580, 43 L. Ed. 873, where there is an extended historical discussion of the subject by Gray, J., and it was held further that by the seventh amendment after trial by jury, in either the federal or state court, the facts tried and decided cannot be re-examined in any court of the United States except upon a new trial granted by the federal court or when ordered by the appellate court for error in law. Accordingly one charged with crime cannot waive a jury trial by twelve jurors; Jennings v. State, 134 Wis. 307, 114 N. W. 492, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 862.

While a person accused of an infamous crime, though not a felony, may waive the disqualification of jurors, or even their impartiality, such person cannot waive his right to a trial by a jury of twelve by consenting, after a legal jury had been impaneled and two had been excused, to continue the trial and abide by the verdict of the remaining ten; Dickinson v. U. S., 159 Fed. 801, 86 C. C. A. 625; Hill v. People, 16 Mich. 351; per Cooley, C. J.; contra, Com. v. Dailey, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 80, per Shaw, C. J.; a later case being criticized in the case first cited; but there need not be a jury of twelve in civil cases; City of Huron v. Carter, 5 S. D. 4, 57 N. W. 947; Roach v. Blakey, 89 Va. 767, 17 S. E. 228; Kreuchi v. Dehler, 50 Ill. 176.

The constitutional right of a jury trial in criminal cases cannot be waived by one indicted for a felony so as to make valid a trial by eleven jurors; Territory v. Ortiz, 8 N. Mex. 154, 42 Pac. 87. This doctrine has been based upon various grounds. It was said in one case that the duty of the state to its citizens would prohibit a waiver of a full panel; Cancemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 128. Shaw, C. J., suggested that in some cases the defendant's chance of acquittal might be greater with eleven jurors than with twelve; and Cooley suggests the view that a jury of less than twelve is a tribunal unknown to the law, and would amount to a mere arbitration, which is not allowable; Const. Lim., 6th Ed. 391. Some courts held that there may be a valid waiver as to misdemeanors; State v. Worden, 46 Conn. 349, 33 Am. Rep. 27; State v. Albee, 61 N. H. 423, 60 Am. Rep. 325; State v. Alderton, 50 W. Va. 101, 40 S. E. 350; and others that the right was not secured with respect to minor or trivial offences; People v. Justices of Court, 74 N. Y. 406; Byers v. Com., 42 Pa. 89; or at least that a jury may be dispensed with in the first instance where there is a right of appeal with a jury; Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray (Mass.) 329; City of Emporia v. Volmer, 12 Kan. 622.

Statutes conferring the right to waive are not in conflict with the constitution of the United States; Hallinger v. Davis, 146 U. S. 314, 13 Sup. Ct. 105, 36 L. Ed. 986; or of the state; People v. Noll, 20 Cal. 164. It was held that in civil cases in Utah a jury of twelve was not required; Wolf Co. v. Brewing Co., 10 Utah 179, 37 Pac. 262; Mackey v. Enzensperger, 11 Utah 154, 39 Pac. 541; but see American Pub. Co. v. Fisher, 166 U. S. 464, 17 Sup. Ct. 618, 41 L. Ed. 1079, where it was held that litigants in common law actions in the courts of Utah while a territory had a right to trial by jury which involved unanimity of verdict, and this right could not be taken away by territorial legislation. As to unanimity of a verdict in a state court see infra.

There would seem to be no legal objection to permitting this change by constitutional provision, but even that, it has been held, will not sustain a statute providing that in certain contingencies, at the discretion of the trial court, a jury may consist of less than twelve men; McRae v. R. Co., 93 Mich. 399, 53 N. W. 561, 17 L. R. A. 750. In California, in civil cases and misdemeanors, the jury may consist of twelve or any number less than twelve upon which the parties may agree in open court. And the number of jurors may be limited in many states, including Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Iowa, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Jersey, North Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming. See 36 Cent. L. J. 437.

A statute changing the jury to nine in civil cases applies to pending cases; Roenfeldt v. Ry. Co., 180 Mo. 554, 79 S. W. 706, where the court said that "no one has a vested right to have his cause tried by any particular mode of procedure."

Statutes providing for compulsory reference have been held constitutional in many cases as not infringing the right to trial by jury; Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 20 Am.

Rep. 194; Edwardson v. Garnhart, 56 Mo. 81; Norton v. Rooker, 1 Pinney (Wis.) 195.

And the provision requiring the payment of costs before appeal was also held constitutional; McDonald v. Schell, 6 S. & R. (Pa.) 240; Emerick v. Harris, 1 Binney (Pa.) 416. The seventh amendment of the United States Constitution does not apply to the state courts; Edwards v. Elliott, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 532, 22 L. Ed. 487; Pearson v. Yewdall, 95 U. S. 294, 24 L. Ed. 436; with respect to the state constitutions where the right of trial by jury is secured, it continues inviolate with respect to all cases triable by jury before the constitution was adopted; Tribou v. Strawbridge, 7 Or. 156; Lee v. Tillotson, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 337, 35 Am. Dec. 624; Mead v. Walker, 17 Wis. 190.

In New York where the action of account was before the constitution triable without a jury, under a colonial statute it has been held that long accounts in a counter-claim in an action on contract where the plaintiff's claim is disputed will not justify compulsory reference because the colonial practice only permitted set-off with plea of payment, and therefore the statute could not have been applicable to a counter-claim when the plaintiff's cause of action was disputed; Steck v. Iron Co., 142 N. Y. 236, 37 N. E. 1, 25 L. R. A. 67, and note collecting cases.

Unanimity in giving a verdict was not universal in the early days of the common law; at times eleven sufficed; in some cases a majority. Probably it was only in the second half of the fourteenth century that unanimity became an established principle; 5 Harv. L. Rev. 296, by Prof. J. B. Thayer. "The rule of unanimity of the jury was not fixed before the 14th century and it was probably never laid down in terms that juries must be unanimous. What was actually decided was that the verdict of fewer than 12 men would not suffice, and it became a fixed custom to have that number on the pettit jury." Pollock, Expans. of C. L. 95.

The requirement of unanimity of twelve jurors arose from the custom which taught men to regard it as the proper amount of evidence to establish the credibility of a person accused of an offence; Forsyth, Trial by Jury 240. At common law, except as above stated, unanimity was essential to a verdict, so that it has been held that a conviction by eleven jurors, even where the accused waived a trial by twelve jurors, would be set aside; Cancemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 128. "Unanimity was one of the peculiar and essential features of trial by jury at common law;" American Pub. Co. v. Fisher, 166 U. S. 464, 17 Sup. Ct. 618, 41 L. Ed. 1079, supra; but the court expressly said that the power of a state to change the rule as to unanimity was not before them, and cited Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 23 L. Ed. 678; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 4 Sup. Ct. 111, 292, 28 L. Ed. 232. Changes in this respect have been made in many states. In civil actions in California, Idaho, Louisiana, Nevada, Texas, and Washington, three-fourths may render a verdict; two-thirds in Montana in civil actions and crimes less than felonies, and five-sixths in Idaho, in all cases of misdemeanor. In Iowa the legislature may authorize a verdict by less than twelve in inferior courts.

Unanimity is still required in England. In a case before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, where a British subject was convicted of murder in Japan, the court being comprised of a British judge and five jurors, established under a British treaty, it was argued by Sir Frank Lockwood that the British government could not establish such a court with a jury of less than twelve, but the court held that the conviction was lawful. [1897] App. Cas. 719.

A modification of the jury system, much considered and quite generally adopted, is the provision authorizing the parties to waive a jury and elect to have the facts tried by the court. This course in civil cases is authorized in most of the states, as well as in the federal courts. It is provided for in the constitutions of Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Vermont, Wisconsin, Washington, and West Virginia. By statute a like practice obtains in Illinois, Missouri, New Jersey, and Wyoming, and also by the bill of rights in Arizona and by statute in New Mexico. There can be a waiver in civil cases and in criminal cases not amounting to felony in Idaho, Montana, North Dakota, and California.

The general principle is, however, that in criminal cases, the accused can neither waive his right to a trial by a jury of twelve nor be deprived of it by the legislature; Cancemi v. People, 18 N. Y. 128; Allen v. State, 54 Ind. 461; State v. Carman, 63 Ia. 130, 18 N. W. 691, 50 Am. Rep. 741 (contra, State v. Kaufman, 51 Ia. 578, 2 N. W. 275, 33 Am. Rep. 148); State v. Davis, 66 Mo. 684, 27 Am. Rep. 387; Bell v. State, 44 Ala. 393; Williams v. State, 12 Ohio St. 622; Kleinschmidt v. Dunphy, 1 Mont. 118; Swart v. Kimball, 43 Mich. 443, 5 N. W. 635. Judge Cooley, after stating that less than twelve would not be a common-law jury, or such as the constitution guarantees, adds, "And the necessity of a full panel could not be waived—at least in case of felony—even by consent." Const. Lim., 4th ed. 395. It was held that where one juror was an alien the failure to challenge him was not a waiver of the objection, and on the refusal of the court to set aside the judgment, it would be reversed, on error; Hill v. People, 16 Mich. 356; contra, State v. Quarrel, 2 Bay (S. C.) 150, 1 Am. Dec. 637. One accused of crime cannot waive the absence of one juror; Jennings v. State, 134

Wis. 307, 114 N. W. 492, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 862 and note.

On the trial of a misdemeanor, a full jury may be waived; Com. v. Dailey, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 80, per Shaw, C. J.; Tyra v. Com., 2 Metc. (Ky.) 1; U. S. v. Shaw, 59 Fed. 110; or where the penalty is only a fine; State v. Mansfield, 41 Mo. 470. A jury may be waived in all civil cases, without any statute; Roach v. Blakey, 89 Va. 767, 17 S. E. 228.

The fact that a court of chancery may summon a jury to try an issue of fact is not equivalent to the right of trial by jury under the seventh amendment of the constitution; Cates v. Allen, 149 U. S. 451, 13 Sup. Ct. 883, 977, 37 L. Ed. 804. And the constitutional right does not relate to suits over which equity exercised jurisdiction when the constitution was adopted; Davis v. Settle, 43 W. Va. 17, 26 S. E. 557; but the right cannot be defeated by giving equity jurisdiction over an action in which the right applies; id. It is not impaired by an act giving the appellate court authority to reverse for excessive damages; Smith v. Pub. Co., 178 Pa. 481, 36 Atl. 296, 35 L. R. A. 819. In that case it was held that the act which gives the supreme court "power in all cases to affirm, reverse, amend, or modify a judgment, order, or decree appealed from and to enter such judgment," etc., as it may deem proper and just, does not infringe upon the right of trial by jury and is constitutional; and in a later case, this decision was adhered to, and it was further held that where the supreme court had reversed a judgment, without awarding a new venire, it might subsequently amend the judgment of reversal by adding thereto a formal judgment in favor of defendant; Nugent v. Traction Co., 183 Pa. 142, 38 Atl. 587; Dalmas v. Kemble, 215 Pa. 410, 64 Atl. 559.

A state law authorizing a judgment n. o. v. on the whole record to be entered by an appellate court where a point requesting binding instructions has been reserved or declined is in conflict with the seventh amendment of the federal constitution; Slocum v. Ins. Co., 228 U. S. 364, 33 Sup. Ct. 523, 57 L. Ed. 879, where it was held that the circuit court of appeals in entering such a judgment under the state statute had acted improperly in not merely reversing the judgment with a venire. It is also held that a state statute providing that a new trial shall not be granted on account of the smallness of the damages is, if applicable to federal courts, a violation of the seventh amendment; Hughey v. Sullivan, 80 Fed. 72.

Several state courts have held that a reversal and entry of final judgment by the appellate court under state statute is not an infringement of trial by jury; Larkins v. R. Ass'n, 221 Ill. 428, 77 N. E. 678; Gunn v. R. Co., 26 R. I. 112, 58 Atl. 452; Houghton Implement Co. v. Vavrosky, 15 N. D. 308, 109 N. W. 1024; nor is the requirement of a remittitur by an appellate court; Burdict v. R. Co., 123 Mo. 221, 27 S. W. 453, 26 L. R. A. 384, 45 Am. St. Rep. 528; Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Syfan, 91 Tex. 562, 44 S. W. 1064.

Qualifications. Jurors must possess the qualifications which may be prescribed by statute, must be free from any bias caused by relationship to the parties or interest in the matter in dispute, and in criminal cases must not have formed any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused.

"1. They are to be good and lawful men. 2. Of sufficient freeholds, according to the provisions of several acts of parliament. 3. Not convict of any notorious crime. 4. Not to be of the kindred or alliance of any of the parties. 5. Not to be such as are prepossessed or prejudiced before they hear their evidence." Cond. Gen. 297.

At common law there was a freehold qualification, but to no certain amount; by 2 Hen. V. it was 40*s.*; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 20; Proffatt, Jury Trial § 115.

An alien may serve as a juror, that is, a foreigner intending to be naturalized; People v. Scott, 56 Mich. 154, 22 N. W. 274; contra, State v. Primrose, 3 Ala. 546, and see Proffatt, Jury Trial § 116. An atheist has been held to be disqualified; Shane v. Clarke, 3 Harr. & McH. (Md.) 101. Women could not serve as jurors at common law, except upon a jury to try an issue under a writ de ventre inspiciendo (q. v.); 3 Bla. Com. 362. They are now qualified in some states.

Under U. S. R. S. § 5440, an official of the United States is disqualified as a juror by reason of his relations with the government although not a salaried officer; Crawford v. U. S., 212 U. S. 183, 29 Sup. Ct. 260, 53 L. Ed. 465, 15 Ann. Cas. 392, where it was put upon the ground that bias disqualifies a juror, and it is implied in the relation between employer and employee and actual evidence thereof is unnecessary (a criminal case in a federal court).

Under the common law the master, servant, steward, counsellor, or attorney, of either party is not a competent juror and statutory provisions of qualifications not inconsistent with this rule do not abrogate it; id.; Block v. State, 100 Ind. 357.

It has been held that where one of the jurors was incompetent, as an alien, his presence vitiated the whole panel and the verdict; Shane v. Clarke, 3 Harr. & McH. (Md.) 101; unless waived by failure to challenge; State v. Pickett, 103 Ia. 714, 73 N. W. 346, 39 L. R. A. 302; 11 Harv. L. R. 545. The fact discovered after verdict that a juror who was not challenged was unable to understand the English language was held insufficient ground for granting a new trial; San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Gray (Tex.) 66 S. W. 229; such ignorance of English language would not be a ground of challenge; In re Allison, 13 Colo. 525, 22 Pac. 820, 10 L. R. A. 790, 16

Am. St. Rep. 224; but the failure to challenge has been held to be a waiver of the right; 2 Moo. & Sc. 41; St. Louis & S. E. R. Co. v. Casner, 72 Ill. 384; but where the disqualification was not known until after the verdict, a new trial was granted as a matter of discretion; Woodward v. Dean, 113 Mass. 297; and as a matter of right; Shane v. Clarke, 3 Har. & McH. (Md.) 101.

An employee of a stockholder of a corporation is not disqualified by reason of his employment; Sansouver v. Dye Works, 28 R. I. 539, 68 Atl. 545; 13 N. Burns. 8. Business relations which disqualify one from acting as a juror are: Employer and employee; Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Mask, 64 Miss. 738, 2 South. 360; even if the former is a corporation; Burnett v. R. Co., 16 Neb. 332, 20 N. W. 280; landlord and tenant; Hathaway v. Helmer, 25 Barb. (N. Y.) 29; contra, Arnold v. Fruit Co., 141 Cal. 738, 75 Pac. 326; partners; Stumm v. Hummel, 39 Ia. 478; master and servant; State v. Coella, 3 Wash. 99, 28 Pac. 28; attorney and client; 3 Bla. Com. 363; but not a client of the attorney in the suit; McCorkle v. Mallory, 30 Wash. 632, 71 Pac. 186; business relations with a party may disqualify in a particular case, though not from the relation generally; Laidlaw v. Sage, 2 App. Div. 374, 37 N. Y. Supp. 770; but not the mere relation of a debtor and creditor; Thompson v. Douglass, 35 W. Va. 337, 13 S. E. 1015.

Whether it is contempt of court for a master to discharge a workman because he was obliged to serve as a juror is discussed in an article quoted from the London Law Times in 36 Am. L. Rev. 596.

The federal constitution provides that in criminal trials the jury shall be taken "from the state and district where the crime shall have been committed." State constitutions usually confine the selection to the county or district, except where, in some states, a provision is made in case jurors cannot conveniently be found in the county. The right to a trial by a jury of the vicinage is an essential part of trial by jury.

In some states the qualifications of jurors are regulated by the constitution; e. g., Florida requires them to be taken from the registered voters. Georgia requires that jurors shall be upright and intelligent persons. Subject to the constitutional provisions as to impairing the right of trial by jury, the legislature has power to define the qualifications of jurors. It may dispense with the freehold qualification required by common law; Kerwin v. People, 96 Ill. 206; Com. v. Dorsey, 103 Mass. 412; but see 20 Am. L. Reg. 436; Proffatt, Jury Trial § 115.

In some states conviction for certain high crimes disqualifies; some states require citizenship; others that jurors shall be selected from the qualified voters; others impose tests of integrity, or intelligence or education. Freehold or property tests are required in some states. That the jurors shall be over twenty-one years of age is probably a universal requirement; while in some states those past a certain age cannot serve; Proffatt, Jury Trial § 117.

In the federal courts the qualifications are the same as those relating to the highest courts of law in the respective states; U. S. R. S. § 800; but this does not require a minute adherence to the state practice; U. S. v. Collins, 1 Woods 499, Fed. Cas. No. 14,837, per Bradley, J. A statute confining the selection of jurors to white citizens is invalid under the fourteenth amendment; the right to serve on a jury is an incident of citizenship; Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 25 L. Ed. 664; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370, 26 L. Ed. 567.

The intelligence and ability of a juror are matters within the sound discretion of the court, and it is sufficient if he knows the English language and can understand the testimony and the argument of counsel; State v. Casey, 44 La. Ann. 969, 11 South. 583. It rests with each state to prescribe such qualifications as it seems proper for jurymen, taking care only that no discrimination in respect to such service be made against any class of citizens solely because of their race; In re Shibuya Jugiro, 140 U. S. 291, 11 Sup. Ct. 770, 35 L. Ed. 510.

The passage of the Act of July 20, 1840, R. S. § 800, granting peremptory challenges to the government in criminal cases, has not taken away the right to conditional or qualified challenges when permitted in the state and adopted by the federal court by rule or by special order; Sawyer v. U. S., 202 U. S. 150, 26 Sup. Ct. 575, 50 L. Ed. 972, 6 Ann. Cas. 269, where it was held not unreasonable to permit jurors to be required to stand aside at the foot of the panel, it appearing that neither the government nor the defendant had exhausted all their peremptory charges when the jury was empanelled.

The selection of jurors is to be made impartially; and elaborate provisions are made to secure this impartiality. In general, a sufficient number are selected, from among the qualified citizens of the county or district, by the sheriff, or a similar executive officer of the court, and, in case of his disqualification, by the coroner, or, in some cases, by still other designated persons. See ELISORS. From among these the requisite number is selected at the time of trial, to whom objection may be made by the parties.

Sir Matthew Hale says that the writ to return a jury issues to the sheriff who is entrusted to elect and return the jury without the nomination of either party. The jurors were to be such persons as for estate and quality were fit to serve on that employment. They were to be of the neighborhood of the fact to be inquired, or at least of the county. Cond. Gen.

At common law jurors were selected, usually, by the sheriff or coroner. It is done in this country in various ways; by judges of election; by town authorities or by various officials or special boards or commissions. Statutory provisions as to the time and mode of selecting jurors are said to be usually directory only and need not be strictly complied with; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 44; but this is not the case with all such requirements.

In the federal courts the panel of jurors is selected by the clerk of the court and a commissioner appointed by the court, who must be taken from the opposite political party to that to which the clerk belongs; the clerk and the commissioner place names in the jury box alternately without regard to party affiliations. Any judge may order the names to be drawn from the boxes used by the state authorities in selecting jurors in the highest court of the state; no person may serve as a petit juror more than once in a year.

A juror is not disqualified by having formed or expressed an opinion from newspaper accounts where he testified that he could try the case solely on the evidence and would be governed by it; Dimmick v. U. S., 121 Fed. 638, 57 C. C. A. 664; nor is one incompetent merely because he had formed and expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of a person jointly indicted with the defendant; Griggs v. U. S., 158 Fed. 572, 85 C. C. A. 596; Weston v. Com., 111 Pa. 251, 2 Atl. 191; State v. Bill, 15 La. Ann. 114.

Erroneously overruling challenge for cause is harmless error where peremptory challenges are not exhausted; Green v. State, 40 Fla. 191, 23 South. 851; or where the jury did not serve and the jury was not complete without exhausting peremptory challenges; State v. Nicholls, 50 La. Ann. 699, 23 South. 980. See CHALLENGE.

Summoning improper jurors, whether biased or otherwise, is a contempt of court on the part of the officer who does it; Richards v. U. S., 126 Fed. 105, 61 C. C. A. 161; and a challenge to the array will lie in such case; id.; Harjo v. U. S., 1 Okl. Cr. R. 590, 98 Pac. 1021, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1013.

Exemption. Usually public officials are exempt; and persons engaged in various classes of occupations are often exempt; thus in New York, clergymen, physicians, lawyers, professors, and teachers, persons engaged in certain kinds of manufacturing, canal officials, those employed on steam vessels, employés of railroad and telegraph companies, members of the militia and fire department, etc. Exemption is only during actual employment; State v. Willard, 79 N. C. 660; and the right of exemption is a personal privilege and usually not a ground of challenge; Moore v. Cass, 10 Kan. 288; Davison v. People, 90 Ill. 221; or a disqualification; Breeding v. State, 11 Tex. 257; State v. Forshner, 43 N. H. 89, 80 Am. Dec. 132.

The members of an association formed to aid in the prosecution of a particular class of offences, and those who are in sympathy with the association, and contribute money for the purposes of its organization, are not competent to sit as jurors on the trial of an indictment for an offence of the class for the prosecution of which the association is formed and the money contributed; State v. Moore, 48 La. Ann. 380, 19 South. 285. In a suit against a beneficial association, membership in the order does not disqualify a juror, but only membership of the lodge sued; Delaware Lodge No. 1, I. O. O. F., v. Allmon, 1 Pennewill (Del.) 160, 39 Atl. 1098.

Persons related within the prohibited degree to members of a mutual fire insurance company are incompetent to serve as jurors in an action against it; Moore v. Ins. Ass'n, 107 Ga. 199, 33 South. 65.

A juror was disqualified at common law by openly declaring his opinion that the party was guilty; 2 Hawk. Pl. C. ch. 43, § 27. Yet if such declaration was made from his knowledge of the case and not out of any ill-will to the party, it is no cause of challenge; 2 id. § 28.

Where a statute disqualifies persons related within certain degrees of affinity from serving as jurors on the trial of a cause to which their affinities are parties, husbands whose wives are second cousins are not affinities; Tegarden v. Phillips, 14 Ind. App. 27, 42 N. E. 549.

In Tennessee it has been held that a statute disqualifying from service, either on grand or petit juries, persons engaged in a conspiracy against law and order is not unconstitutional; Jenkins v. State, 99 Tenn. 569, 42 S. W. 263. In this case the statute in question was for the suppression of what are known as White Caps, and disqualified for jury duty all persons who had been guilty of any offence under the statute. So also a similar disqualification of all persons violating the act for the suppression of polygamy was held valid; Clawson v. U. S., 114 U. S. 477, 5 Sup. Ct. 949, 29 L. Ed. 179.

Swearing the jury. At common law it appears to have been the practice to swear each juryman as he is drawn and accepted; Joy, Conf. 220; State v. Potter, 18 Conn. 166. The present practice is to swear the entire jury after the panel is completed. Either practice is lawful; People v. Reynolds, 16 Cal. 128. It is not irregular to swear all the jurors when the court opens, to try all the issues that may be brought before them; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 318; People v. Albany Court of Common Pleas, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 548. But this practice has been disapproved of in criminal cases on the ground of the salutary effect both on the prisoner and the jury of the formality of administering an oath in the presence of the prisoner; Barney v. People, 22 Ill. 160. It is also considered the better practice in criminal cases to have the panel full before the oath is administered; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 319; O'Connor v. State, 9 Fla. 215.

The impanelling and final acceptance of a jury by a court is a judicial determination that the jurors are competent; and if any objection to the qualifications of a juror is known to a party before such determination, it cannot be raised afterwards, unless on exception to the overruling of a challenge; People v. Scott, 56 Mich. 154, 22 N. W. 274.

If, after a jury is sworn, a juror becomes incompetent, the entire jury should be discharged; but if a juror never was competent, a twelfth juror may be sworn in his place; State v. Ronk, 91 Minn. 419, 98 N. W. 334.

In 1 Cox C. C. 150, a juror became ill in the midst of the trial, the jury was then discharged, a new juror was drawn and the eleven jurors were resworn and the evidence recapitulated; so in De Berry v. State, 99 Tenn. 207, 42 S. W. 31, as to either a civil or criminal trial; to the same effect, State v. Davis, 31 W. Va. 390, 7 S. E. 24. If a sworn juror becomes ill before the panel is made up, a new juror may be selected; State v. Moncla, 39 La. Ann. 868, 2 South. 814. If a juror becomes insane pending a criminal trial, the court should declare a mistrial and proceed de novo; Dennis v. State, 96 Miss. 96, 50 South. 499, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 36.

The parties are entitled to fresh challenges against the entire new jury; Turner v. Territory, 15 Okl. 557, 82 Pac. 650; contra, State v. Hazledahl, 2 N. D. 524, 52 N. W. 315, 16 L. R. A. 150; State v. Nash, 46 La. Ann. 194, 14 South. 607. See note to Dennis v. State, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 36.

Influencing the jury. An attempt to influence a jury corruptly by promises, persuasions, entreaties, money, entertainments, and the like is a misdemeanor at common law; State v. Brown, 95 N. C. 685; 2 Bish. Cr. L. 384; Gibbs v. Dewey, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 503. Arguments of counsel in open court at the trial of a cause are a legitimate use of influence and are not within this rule, but it would be a crime to take advantage of the opportunity afforded in order to influence the jurors corruptly; People v. Myers, 70 Cal. 582, 12 Pac. 719. Where an attempt to influence a jury, amounting to embracery, is made, it is immaterial whether they give any verdict or not, and if they give a verdict, it is no defence that it is a true one. This crime may be committed by a juror if he corruptly attempts to influence other jurors; Cl. Cr. L. 326; or if he by indirect practices gets himself sworn on the tales to serve on one side; 1 Litt. 573.

Misconduct of jurors. The giving of testimony by a juror to his associates in the jury room is misconduct; Richards v. State, 36 Neb. 17, 53 N. W. 1027; Ellis v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 508, 27 S. W. 135; but in order to obtain a new trial on the ground of misconduct, injury to the party must be shown; Medler v. State, 26 Ind. 171; State v. Cross, 95 Ia. 629, 64 N. W. 614; Com. v. Roby, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 496; a new trial was granted because a juror stated in the jury room that the defendant had hit the prosecutor on the head with an ax-handle on a former occasion; Mann v. State, 47 Tex. Cr. R. 250, 83 S. W. 195; but probably the granting or denial of a motion for a new trial for misconduct of the jury is largely in the discretion of the court; People v. Johnson, 110 N. Y. 134, 17 N. E. 684; Com. v. White, 147 Mass. 76, 16 N. E. 707.

Where each of the jurors set down the term of imprisonment and divided the sum by twelve, but did not agree in advance to be bound by the result, the verdict could not be questioned; McAnally v. State (Tex.) 57 S. W. 832.

As to the effect of improper influence on, or misconduct of, the jury, see NEW TRIAL.

Separation during trial. At common law the jury was kept together until they had agreed upon their verdict. Even the right to adjourn a trial from day to day was doubted; 24 How. St. Tr. 414. At present jurors in civil cases are allowed to separate each day; and so in trials for misdemeanors, at the discretion of the court. In some cases also in trials for felony, even in capital cases. But in an able work the opinion is maintained that in cases of capital felonies the jury should not be allowed to separate, as they were not at common law; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 367; but absolute isolation is not required; they may be kept under the charge of a sworn officer who shall exercise a reasonable oversight; id. 370. The officer in charge must be sworn; 2 Hale, P. C. 296; although if he be a sheriff or constable and ex officio in charge of the jury, he need not be specially sworn; Meyer v. Foster, 16 Wis. 294.

The presence of a barber admitted to the jury room for the convenience of the jurors is not sufficient cause for setting aside the verdict; Com. v. Lombardi, 221 Pa. 31, 70 Atl. 122.

Where the jury is discharged by the court for having separated after being sworn, the trial is not a bar to a subsequent prosecution; State v. Costello, 11 La. Ann. 283; State v Hall, 9 N. J. L. 256; People v. Reagle, 60 Barb. (N. Y.) 527; Hilbert v. Com., 51 S. W. 817, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 537; Com. v. Roby, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 496; but where the jury, finding one of their number disqualified, dispersed without the knowledge of the court, the defendant was held to have been once in jeopardy and could not again be tried; Maden v. Emmons, 83 Ind. 331.

Affidavits of jurors will not be received to impeach a verdict; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 539, citing numerous cases; Croasdale v. Tantum, 6 Houst. (Del.) 218; People v. Azoff, 105 Cal. 632, 39 Pac. 59; Allison v. People, 45 Ill. 37. Nor will statements of third parties who derived their information from a member of the jury; Thomp. & Merr. Juries 547; Peterson v. Skjelver, 43 Neb. 663, 62 N. W. 43; State v. Schaefer, 116 Mo. 96, 22 S. W. 447.

The court may question the jury as to the grounds upon which they based their verdict, if there was more than one ground; Spoor v. Spooner, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 281. A juryman may be heard to show misconduct on the part of third parties; Ritchie v. Holbrooke, 7 S. & R. (Pa.) 458; and jurymen should report to the court any attempt to influence them; Allison v. People, 45 Ill. 37. But affidavits appear to be admissible to impeach the verdict, in Tennessee; Joyce v. State, 7 Baxt. (Tenn.) 273; and to a certain extent in Iowa; Wright v. Telegraph Co., 20 Ia. 195; and Kansas; Johnson v. Husband, 22 Kan. 277; and to show that a verdict was decided by lot; Fain v. Goodwin, 35 Ark. 109.

Testimony or affidavits of jurors as to what occurred in the jury room are generally excluded; Woodward v. Leavitt, 107 Mass. 453, 9 Am. Rep. 49, and this rule has been followed to the extent of excluding even evidence of improper conduct—as that a juror had made material statements from his own knowledge; St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Ricketts, 96 Tex. 68, 70 S. W. 315; Price's Ex'r v. Warren, 1 Hen. & M. (Va.) 385; Clum v. Smith, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 560; Boetge v. Landa, 22 Tex. 105; contra, State v. Burton, 65 Kan. 704, 70 Pac. 640.

The admission of affidavits of jurymen to the fact that they have not been influenced by newspaper articles is immaterial, if a motion for a new trial is rightly overruled on other grounds; Spreckels v. Brown, 212 U. S. 208, 29 Sup. Ct. 256, 53 L. Ed. 476.

Jurors are competent witnesses, in a proceeding in equity to remedy a mistake made by the foreman in announcing the verdict, to prove that the verdict read out in court was not their verdict, but the result of an oversight; Hamburg-Bremen Fire Ins. Co. v. Mfg. Co., 76 Fed. 479, 22 C. C. A. 283.

Proceedings apart from the jury. There is no settled rule that arguments as to the admissibility of evidence should be conducted apart from the jury in criminal cases; Mose v. State, 36 Ala. 211; contra, White v. State, 10 Tex. App. 381; it is in the discretion of the court, and no exception lies in either case; State v. Wood, 53 N. H. 484; State v. Moore, 104 N. C. 743, 10 S. E. 183; Com. v. Rogers, 181 Mass. 184, 63 N. E. 421; Lewis v. State, 85 Miss. 35, 37 South. 497; Poole v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 348, 76 S. W. 565; Driggers v. State, 38 Fla. 7, 20 South. 758. In deciding the question, the court may assign its reasons in the hearing of the jury; Patterson v. State, 86 Ga. 70, 12 S. E. 174. It was held that in a murder trial the jury may be required to retire during the argument of such questions; Kraner v. State, 61 Miss. 158; but in another such case it was held error for the court to exclude the jury during argument on the law by defendant's counsel; Patterson v. State (Tex.) 60 S. W. 557.

Where confessions are offered, the preliminary inquiry may be conducted in the presence of the jury or not, in the discretion of the judge; Lefevre v. State, 50 Ohio St. 584, 35 N. E. 52; State v. Kelly, 28 Or. 225, 42 Pac. 217, 52 Am. St. Rep. 777; such inquiry was held to be properly conducted in the presence of the jury in Holsenbake v. State, 45 Ga. 43; Shepherd v. State, 31 Neb. 389, 47 N. W. 1118; contra, Hall v. State, 65 Ga. 36; Carter v. State, 37 Tex. 362; and where after proper preliminary examination, they have been admitted, there is no room for question touching the propriety of conducting the examination in the presence of the jury, but it has been held that it must not be in the presence of the jury if the accused so request; Ellis v. State, 65 Miss. 44, 3 South. 188, 7 Am. St. Rep. 634.

Expert evidence. In respect of questions upon which men of ordinary observation and experience have some practical knowledge of their own, jurors are not dependent upon the opinions of experts even though they would be assisted by them, since they are expected to apply their own observation and experience of the affairs of life to the evidence in forming their conclusions; Lillibridge v. McCann, 117 Mich. 84, 75 N. W. 288, 41 L. R. A. 381, 72 Am. St. Rep. 553; McGarrahan v. R. Co., 171 Mass. 211, 50 N. E. 610; State v. R. Co., 86 Me. 309, 29 Atl. 1086; Jamieson v. Oil Co., 128 Ind. 555, 28 N. E. 76, 12 L. R. A. 652; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Moore, 166 Fed. 663, 92 C. C. A. 357, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 962, where many other cases are collected.

See EXPERTS.

Jurors taking notes. Jurors may not take notes of the testimony of witnesses to refresh their memories in consultation with their fellow jurors; Com. v. Wilson, 19 Pa. Dist. Ct. 48, where Wiltbank, J., an experienced trial judge, directed notes so taken to be surrendered and sealed and returned to the jurymen after the trial. The reason for this rule is said to be that "the jury should not be allowed to take evidence with them to their room except in their memory. It can make no difference whether the notes are written by a juror or by some one else. Jurors would be too apt to rely on what might be imperfectly written and thus make the case turn on a part only of the facts;" Cheek v. State, 35 Ind. 492; Batterson v. State, 63 Ind. 531; Long v. State, 95 Ind. 481. Where a justice of the peace, at the request of the jury after they had retired, gave them without the consent of the parties his minutes of the trial, the judgment was reversed on certiorari, and this action was affirmed by the supreme court; Neil v. Abel, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 185.

Where a juror on a trial for murder for three weeks openly took notes of the testimony, it was held that it did not as a matter of law require the setting aside of the verdict; Com. v. Tucker, 189 Mass. 457, 76 N. E. 127, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1056; and in civil cases some courts permit counsel to request the jury to take notes of a particular fact or calculation, though they cannot be required to comply; Tift v. Towns, 63 Ga. 237; Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Miller, 71 Ill. 463; but generally note-taking by jurors is considered an improper practice, though it is allowed by statute in some states; U. S. v. Davis, 103 Fed. 457; Cowles v. Hayes, 71 N. C. 230; Thomas v. State, 90 Ga. 437, 16 S. E. 94.

Even in a murder trial the verdict will not be set aside if it does not affirmatively appear that neither the defendant nor his counsel had knowledge of it, as consent is in that case presumed from failure to object; State v. Robinson, 117 Mo. 649, 23 S. W. 1066.

Taking a view. Where a jury is called upon to assess the value of land, the impressions acquired by the jury after a view are competent evidence; Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Farwell, 59 Neb. 544, 81 N. W. 440; Parks v. City of Boston, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 198; City of Springfield v. Dalby, 139 Ill. 34, 29 N. E. 860; Tully v. R. Co., 134 Mass. 499; though it has been held that the view is only effectual for the application of evidence given in court; Machader v. Williams, 54 Ohio St. 344, 43 N. E. 324; and it is stated that this restriction is imposed where the view is for any other purpose than the mere valuation of the land; Wright v. Carpenter, 49 Cal. 607; but this limitation upon the general rule has been considered to be without foundation; 13 Harv. L. R. 692.

In some cases, where a jury is authorized in a trial before a justice of the peace, it has been held to be no more than a body of referees and not a true jury trial, and therefore the case could be tried by another jury in the superior court; Capital Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U. S. 1, 19 Sup. Ct. 580, 43 L. Ed. 873.

The province of the jury is to determine the truth of the facts in dispute in civil cases, and the guilt or innocence of the person accused in criminal cases. Thorn. Jur. § 133. See CHARGE. If they go beyond their province, their verdict may be set aside; 4 Maule & S. 192; 3 B. & C. 357; 2 Price 282: Ex parte Baily, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 479; Hall v. Huse, 10 Mass. 39.

The question whether the jury are judges of the law as well as of the fact, or whether it is the function of the court conclusively to instruct the jury upon the law, particularly in criminal cases, has been very much discussed from the earliest times and was the subject of critical examination by the United States supreme court; Sparf v. U. S., 156 U. S. 51, 15 Sup. Ct. 273, 39 L. Ed. 343. See infra.

Coke says: "As the jury may, as often as they think fit, find a general verdict, I therefore think it unquestionable that they so far may decide upon the law as well as fact, such a verdict naturally involving both. In this I have the authority of Littleton himself, who hereafter writes, 'that if the inquest will take upon themselves the knowledge of the law upon the matter, they may give their verdict generally.'"

He further says in substance: "Questions of law generally and more properly belong to the judges. The immediate and direct right of declaring upon questions of law is entrusted to the judges; that in the jury is only incidental." Co. Litt. 156 a, n. (5).

Though the question had not, until more recently, been the subject of a direct decision of the United States supreme court, it had frequently arisen in England and America. In the former country, in the case of the Dean of St. Asaph, the court alluded to the admission by both parties of an ancient rule of the common law that the law should be determined by the court and the facts by the jury; but they differed as to what was law and what fact, it being contended on one side that the question of guilt in a libel case, after the fact of publication and truth of the innuendoes are found by the jury, was a question of law, and on the other side that the guilt of the defendant was a question of fact. This concurrence of views on the point in question "affords strong proof that, up to the period of our separation from England, the fundamental definition of trials by jury depended on the universal maxim, without an exception, ad quæstionem facti respondent juratores, ad quæstionem juris respondent judices."

The doctrine that a jury may disregard the law as declared by the court finds its principal, original support in Bushell's case, Vaughan 135, where the question was on habeas corpus whether jurors were liable to be fined and imprisoned for nonpayment of fine for having found a general verdict in opposition to the instructions of the court. Vaughan, C. J., held that because a general verdict of necessity resolves "both law and fact complicately and not the fact by itself," it could not be proved that the jurors did not proceed upon their view of the evidence.

This line of argument is implicitly relied upon by the advocates of the extreme right of the jury, but has been rightly characterized as narrow; though conclusive in the case to which it related; U. S. v. Morris, 1 Curt. C. C. 23, Fed. Cas. No. 15,815; Hallam, Const. Hist. c. 13; Com. v. Anthes, 5 Gray (Mass.) 185. The line of argument in the English case, taken together with the criticisms upon it, well illustrate the difficulties of the subject which arise necessarily in every case which is submitted to a jury upon mixed questions of law and fact. However frankly it may be stated that the jury are bound by the views of the law delivered to them by the court, the obligation to accept those views is rather moral than susceptible of rigid practical enforcement. Early English cases supporting the doctrine that the jury are judges of the fact and not of the law are, 1 Plowd. 111; id. 233; 2 id. 493; 2 Stra. 766; Lord Hardwicke said: "The thing that governs greatly in this determination is, that the point of the law is not to be determined by juries; juries have a power by law to determine matters of fact only; and it is of the greatest consequence to the law of England and to the subject, that these powers of the judge and the jury are kept distinct; that the judge determine the law, and the jury the fact; and if ever they come to be confounded, it will prove the confusion and destruction of the law of England." Cas. temp. Hardwicke 23. Foster, after stating the rule that the ascertainment of all the facts is the province of the jury, says: "For the construction the law putteth upon facts stated and agreed, or found by a jury is in this, as in all other cases, undoubtedly the proper province of the court." And he adds that in cases of difficulty, a special verdict is usually found, but where the law is clear, the jury, under the direction of the court as to the law, may and, if well advised, always will find a general verdict conformably to such direction; Fost. Cr. L., 3d ed. 255. To the same effect, it has been urged, is the settled current of English authority; Wynne's Eunomus, Dial. III. §§ 53, 523; 1 Steph. Hist. Cr. L. 551; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 22, § 21; 3 Term 428; 4 Bing. 195; 8 C. & P. 94; contra, Vaughan 135; 4 B. & Ald. 145.

The question arose most frequently in England in connection with prosecutions for libel, and it was contended that Fox's Libel Act changed the common-law rule, but this was not the case. In a leading case arising under that act, it was held that it was for the judge to define the offence and then for the jury to say whether the publication under consideration was within that definition; 6 M. & W. 104 (see as to this case, Sparf v. U. S., 156 U. S. 97, 15 Sup. Ct. 273, 39 L. Ed. 343; U. S. v. Morris, 1 Curt. C. C. 55, Fed. Cas. No. 15,815); 2 Jur. 137. In the House of Lords the unanimous opinion of the judges was given by Tindal, C. J., in answer to a question whether, if a fine were received in evidence, it ought to be left to the jury to say whether it barred an action of quare impedit, that "the judge who tried the cause should state to the jury whether in point of law the fine had that effect, or what other effect on the rights of the litigant parties, upon the general and acknowledged principle ad quæstionem juris non respondent juratores." 4 Cl. & Fin. 445.

In state courts it has been held to be "a well-settled principle, lying at the foundation of jury trials, admitted and recognized ever since jury trial had been adopted as an established and settled mode of proceeding in courts of justice, that it was the proper province and duty of judges to consider and decide all questions of law, and the proper province and duty of the jury to decide all questions of fact;" Com. v. Anthes, 5 Gray (Mass.) 185; Pierce v. State, 13 N. H. 536; Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 173; People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 65; State v. Burpee, 65 Vt. 1, 34, 25 Atl. 964, 19 L. R. A. 145, 36 Am. St. Rep. 775 (overruling State v. Croteau, 23 Vt. 14, 54 Am. Dec. 90, and every case which followed it); Montee v. Com., 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 132. The citations include both civil and criminal cases. There undoubtedly exists a power in the jury to override the law as declared by the court and to make their action effective by an acquittal in a criminal case which cannot be set aside. This thought has received frequent expression from judges and courts of great authority. "The unquestionable power of juries to find general verdicts, involving both law and fact, furnishes the foundation for the opinion that they are judges of the law, as well as of the facts, and gives some plausibility to that opinion. They are not, however, compelled to decide legal questions, having the right to find special verdicts, giving the facts, and leaving the legal conclusions, which result from such facts, to the court. When they find general verdicts, I think it is their duty to be governed by the instructions of the court as to all legal questions involved in such verdicts. They have the power to do otherwise, but the exercise of such power cannot be regarded as rightful, although the law has provided no means, in criminal cases, of reviewing their decisions whether of law or fact, or of ascertaining the grounds upon which their verdicts are based;" Duffy v. People, 26 N. Y. 588; see also People v. Finnegan, 1 Park. Cr. Cas. (N. Y.) 147. In Pennsylvania there has been, in some cases, a very strong expression of the idea that in criminal cases the juries are judges of the law as well as of the fact. This was very earnestly stated by Sharswood, C. J., who said that the power of the jury to judge of the law in a criminal case was one of the most valuable securities guaranteed by the bill of rights of Pennsylvania; Kane v. Com., 89 Pa. 522, 33 Am. Rep. 787; but this unqualified statement is not sustained by the leading cases in that state. In Com. v. Sherry, reported in Whart. Hom. (App.) 481, Rogers, J., said: "You are, it is true, judges in a criminal case, in one sense, of both law and fact; for your verdict, as in civil cases, must pass on law and fact together. If you acquit, you interpose a final bar to a second prosecution, no matter how entirely your verdict may have been in opposition to the views expressed by the court. . . It is important for you to keep this distinction in mind, remembering that, while you have the physical power, by an acquittal, to discharge a defendant from further prosecution, you have no moral power to do so against the law laid down by the court. . . . For your part, your duty is to receive the law, for the purposes of this trial, from the court. If an error injurious to the prisoner occurs, it will be rectified by the revision of the court in banc. But an error resulting from either a conviction or acquittal, against the law, can never be rectified. In the first case, an unnecessary stigma is affixed to the character of a man who was not guilty of the offence with which he is charged. In the second case, a serious injury is effected by the arbitrary and irremediable discharge of a guilty man. You will see from these considerations the great importance of the preservation, in criminal as well as in civil cases, of the maxim that the law belongs to the court and the facts to the jury."

Other expressions substantially to the same effect are: "If the evidence on these points fail the prisoner, the conclusion of his guilt will be irresistible, and it will be your duty to draw it;" Gibson, C. J., in Com. v. Harman, 4 Pa. 269.

"The court had an undoubted right to instruct the jury as to the law, and to warn them as they did against finding contrary to it. This is very different from telling them that they must find the defendant guilty, which is what is meant by a binding instruction in criminal cases;" Nicholson v. Com., 96 Pa. 503. In Com. v. McManus, 143 Pa. 64, 21 Atl. 1018, 22 Atl. 761, 14 L. R. A. 89, it was held "that the statement by the court was the best evidence of the law within the reach of the jury, and that the jury should be guided by what the court said as to the law," and this, Paxson, C. J., speaking for the court, declared to be in harmony with the case in which is found the expression of Sharswood, C. J., supra.

In this case Mr. Justice Mitchell filed a vigorous concurring opinion in which he says: "Upon one point I would go further and put an end once for all to a doctrine that I regard as unsound in every point of view, historical, logical, or technical. . . . The jury are not judges of the law in any case, civil or criminal; neither at common law, nor under the constitution of Pennsylvania, is the determination of the law any part of their duty or their right. The notion is of modern growth and arises undoubtedly from a perversion of the history and results of the right to return a general verdict, especially in libel cases, which ended in Fox's Bill." He then considers the question historically, and on the authorities, and says that there is not a single respectable English authority for the doctrine, and that, against a "solid phalanx" of American authorities, there is but a single authority in its favor (State v. Croteau, 23 Vt. 14, 54 Am. Dec. 90), which was by a divided bench (and which has been since overruled; State v. Burpee, 65 Vt. 1, 25 Atl. 964, 19 L. R. A. 145, 36 Am. St. Rep. 775, supra). He concludes that "the jury were never judges of the law in any case, civil or criminal, except as involved in the mixed determination of law and fact by a general verdict." In an annotation of the case in State v. Burpee, 65 Vt. 1, 25 Atl. 964, 19 L. R. A. 145, 36 Am. St. Rep. 775, which overruled what is here characterized as practically the only authority in support of the doctrine, it is said: "The ghost of the doctrine that juries in criminal cases are to judge of the law as well as the facts would seem to be effectually laid by the above decision. . . . That solitary authority (State v. Croteau, 23 Vt. 14, 54 Am. Dec. 90), which has often been attacked and discredited, is now by the case above reported completely overruled."

In the federal courts, prior to the direct decision of the supreme court already referred to, the question had been frequently examined. The most elaborate discussion of the subject was by Mr. Justice Curtis, whose opinion is very much relied upon by the supreme court. His conclusion was "that when the constitution of the United States was founded, it was a settled rule of the common law that, in criminal as well as in civil cases, the court decided the law, and the jury the facts; and it cannot be doubted that this must have an important effect in determining what is meant by the constitution when it adopts a trial by jury." U. S. v. Morris, 1 Curt. C. C. 23, Fed. Cas. No. 15,815. Mr. Justice Field said (charging a jury) in U. S. v. Greathouse, 4 Sawy. 457, Fed. Cas. No. 15,254: "There prevails a very general, but an erroneous, opinion that in all criminal cases the jury are the judges as well of the law as of the fact—that is, that they have the right to disregard the law as laid down by the court, and to follow their own notions on the subject. Such is not the right of the jury." "It is their duty to take the law from the court and apply it to the facts of the case. It is the province of the court, and of the court alone, to determine all questions of law arising in the progress of a trial; and it is the province of the jury to pass upon the evidence and determine all contested questions of fact. The responsibility of deciding correctly as to the law rests solely with the court, and the responsibility of finding correctly the facts rests solely with the jury."

To the same effect are U. S. v. Battiste, 2 Sumn. 240, Fed. Cas. No. 14,545; U. S. v. Riley, 5 Blatchf. 204, Fed. Cas. No. 16,164; Stettinius v. U. S., 5 Cra. C. C. 573, Fed. Cas. No. 13,387; U. S. v. Keller, 19 Fed. 633.

The authorities which have been sometimes relied upon to support the contrary view are Georgia v. Brailsford, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 1, 1 L. Ed. 483; 1 Burr's Trial 470; 2 id. 422; Whart. St. Tr. 48, 84; Chase's Trial App. 44. These authorities received a very critical examination both by Mr. Justice Curtis in U. S. v. Morris, 1 Curt. C. C. 23, Fed. Cas. No. 15,815, and by Mr. Justice Harlan, who delivered the opinion of the court in Sparf v. U. S., 156 U. S. 51, 15 Sup. Ct. 273, 39 L. Ed. 343; and in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Gray (and except by the latter) they were not considered, when properly read, as sustaining the view in support of which they are usually cited. The opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan, last referred to, contains a full discussion of the subject, and in it will be found most of the authorities herein cited. It was held that where there was no evidence upon which the jury could properly find the defendant guilty of an offence included in it less than the one charged, it is not error to instruct them that they cannot return the verdict of any lesser offence. In support of the rule laid down in this decision, see also Cooley, Const. Lim. 323; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 49; Thomp. Tr. § 1016; and the valuable note by Dr. Wharton in 1 Cr. L. Mag. 51. By way of explanation of some of the expressions so much relied upon in support of a contrary view, Mr. Justice Harlan in his opinion referred to, supra, says: "The language of some judges and statesmen in the early history of the country, implying that the jury were entitled to disregard the law as expounded by the court, is, perhaps, to be explained by the fact that 'in many of the states the arbitrary temper of the colonial judges, holding office directly from the crown, had made the independence of the jury in law as well as in fact of much popular importance.' Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr., 8th ed. § 806; Williams v. State, 32 Miss. 389, 396, 66 Am. Dec. 615."

The argument for the right of the jury to decide the law in criminal cases has been most recently fully presented in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Gray, with whom concurred Mr. Justice Shiras, in Sparf v. U. S., supra. In this opinion, from a long and careful examination of the authorities, the conclusion is thus stated: "It is our deep and settled conviction, confirmed by a reexamination of the authorities under the responsibility of taking part in the consideration and decision of the capital case now before the court, that the jury, upon the general issue of guilty or not guilty in a criminal case, have the right, as well as the power, to decide, according to their own judgment and consciences, all questions, whether of law or of fact, involved in that issue." It may be noted that of three cases cited in this opinion as containing the ablest discussion of the subject on both sides, and taking the same view as that advocated by Mr. Justice Gray, two opinions, those of Chancellor Kent and Mr. Justice Thomas in favor of the right, were also dissenting opinions and that of Judge Hall, of Vermont, on the other side, the only one of the three which was an authority, has lately been overruled, as stated supra. The English authorities are very fully discussed, and much attention is given to cases which are claimed as authorities in favor of the views presented which have already been cited, supra, and of which those who argue against the right of the jury to decide the law, question either the authority or the application. The contention of this dissenting opinion is that the result of the English authorities is in favor of the ultimate right of the jury to decide the law, notwithstanding the instructions of the court, and that the earlier American authorities are to the same effect. It is admitted that in the later American cases, "the general tendency of decision in this country has been against the right of the jury, as well as in the courts of the several states, including many states where the right was once established, as in the circuit courts of the United States. The current has been so strong that in Massachusetts, where counsel are admitted to have the right to argue the law to the jury, it has yet been held that the jury have no right to decide it, and it has also been held, by a majority of the court, that the legislature could not constitutionally confer upon the jury the right to determine, against the instructions of the court, questions of law involved in the general issue in criminal cases; and in Georgia and in Louisiana, a general provision in the constitution of the state, declaring that 'in criminal cases the jury shall be judges of the law and fact,' has been held not to authorize them to decide the law against the instructions of the court. . . . But, upon the question of the true meaning and effect of the constitution of the United States in this respect, opinions expressed more than a generation after the adoption of the constitution have far less weight than the almost unanimous voice of earlier and nearly contemporaneous judicial declarations and practical usage." Sparf v. U. S., 156 U. S. 51, 168, 15 Sup. Ct. 273, 39 L. Ed. 343.

A statute which provided that the court should state its opinion to the jury upon all questions of law arising in the trial of a criminal case and submit to their consideration both the law and fact without any direction how to find their verdict did not make the jury judges of the law as well as of the facts, and it was their bounden duty to accept the law as stated by the court; State v. Gannon, 75 Conn. 206, 52 Atl. 727, where the cases are examined at length and the opinions in Sparf v. U. S., 156 U. S. 51, 15 Sup. Ct. 273, 39 L. Ed. 343, supra, are referred to as covering the whole range of the controversy. The other cases cited in the Connecticut case in support of this view are Lord Mansfield, in 3 Term 428; Story, J., in U. S. v. Battiste, 2 Sumn. 240, Fed. Cas. No. 14,545; Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Porter, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 263; Curtis, J., in U. S. v. Morris, 1 Curtis 23, Fed. Cas. No. 15,815; Selden, J., in Duffy v. People, 26 N. Y. 588; State v. Smith, 6 R. I. 33; Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 173; State v. Burpee, 65 Vt. 1, 25 Atl. 964, 19 L. R. A. 145, 36 Am. St. Rep. 775.

Directing the verdict. The most frequent expression of the rule is that, where there is no evidence tending to prove the facts set up by the party who sustains the burden of proof, the court is bound, on request, to direct the jury to return a verdict for the opposite party; Charles v. Patch, 87 Mo. 462. On the other hand, where there is any evidence tending to prove such facts, the court cannot so direct the verdict, but must submit the evidence to the jury and leave it to them to determine whether it is sufficient to that end; Dow v. Chandler, 85 Mo. 247; Thomp. Tr. § 2245.

When the testimony is all in one direction, or when all the evidence for the plaintiff has been given, and it has no tendency whatever to prove the particular issue relied on to recover, and there is no question in regard to the credibility of the witnesses who have given the evidence, the court may determine the whole case as a question of law; Boland v. R. Co., 36 Mo. 491; Vinton v. Schwab, 32 Vt. 612.

It is only where the evidence, with all fair and legitimate inferences, and viewed in the most favorable light, is insufficient to justify a verdict for the plaintiff, that the court may direct a verdict for the defendant; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack, 143 Ill. 242, 32 N. E. 285, 18 L. R. A. 215; Dwyer v. R. Co., 52 Fed. 87; Leiser v. Kieckhefer, 95 Wis. 4, 69 N. W. 979. A federal court may direct a verdict for either party whenever, under the state of the evidence, it would be compelled to set aside one returned the other way; Monroe v. Ins. Co., 52 Fed. 777, 3 C. C. A. 280. Where, from the testimony before the jury, different minds might draw different conclusions, it is error to direct a verdict; Eisenlord v. Clum, 67 Hun 518, 22 N. Y. Supp. 574; Des Jardins v. Boom Co., 95 Mich. 140, 54 N. W. 718. Where the right of recovery depends on questions of fact, there must be a submission to the jury; Heere v. Bank, 160 Pa. 314, 28 Atl. 688. A direction to find for the defendant was held proper, in an action against a railroad for interference with the plaintiff's business, where no evidence was offered showing the injury caused by such interference; Baird v. R. R., 154 Pa. 463, 25 Atl. 834. Where it is shown by an open statement of counsel for the plaintiff that the contract on which the suit is brought is void, the court may direct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant; Oscanyan v. Arms Co., 103 U. S. 261, 26 L. Ed. 539. There can be no serious doubt but that the court can at any time direct the jury when the facts are undisputed, and that the jury should follow such direction; id.

A court may withdraw a case from a jury and direct a verdict where evidence is undisputed or is so conclusive that the court in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion would be compelled to set aside a verdict returned in opposition to it; Delaware L. & W. R. Co. v. Converse, 139 U. S. 469, 11 Sup. Ct. 569, 35 L. Ed. 213; Anderson County v. Beal, 113 U. S. 227, 5 Sup. Ct. 433, 28 L. Ed. 966; Randall v. R. Co., 109 U. S. 478, 3 Sup. Ct. 322, 27 L. Ed. 1003; though jurors are the recognized triors of the facts and cases are not lightly to be taken from them, particularly the question of negligence, and where the jury had reasonable ground to infer it, the question should be left to them; Marande v. R. Co., 184 U. S. 173, 22 Sup. Ct. 340, 46 L. Ed. 487.

For a clear statement of the doctrine of peremptory instructions, as laid down by Mr. Justice Harlan, see INSTRUCTIONS. See also CHARGE; VERDICT.

Coercion of juries. Any communication of the judge to the jury after they have retired except in open court is improper; Sargent v. Roberts, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 337, 11 Am. Dec. 185; Texas Midland R. Co. v. Byrd, 102 Tex. 263, 115 S. W. 1163, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 429, 20 Ann. Cas. 137; so if the judge entered the jury room, it is reversible error; State v. Murphy, 17 N. D. 48, 115 N. W. 84, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609, 16 Ann. Cas. 1133; Abbott v. Hockenberger, 31 Misc. 587, 65 N. Y. Supp. 566; Du Cate v. Brighton, 133 Wis. 628, 114 N. W. 103; or sends additional instructions without the consent of or notice to parties or counsel; Read v. City of Cambridge, 124 Mass. 567, 26 Am. Rep. 690; Quinn v. State, 130 Ind. 340, 30 N. E. 300; Fox v. Peninsular White Lead Works, 84 Mich. 676, 48 N. W. 203; in some cases a new trial was refused because no prejudice resulted, but the practice was disapproved; Galloway v. Corbitt, 52 Mich. 460, 18 N. W. 218; Moseley v. Washburn, 165 Mass. 417, 43 N. E. 182; State v. Olds, 106 Ia. 110, 76 N. W. 644. Some cases hold that no consent will be implied but must be affirmatively shown; Taylor v. Betsford, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 487; Jones v. Johnson, 61 Ind. 257; in other cases consent has been presumed; Henlow v. Leonard, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 200. See a note on the subject generally, State v. Murphy, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609.

Where the action of the trial judge and his remarks to the jury, when from time to time they are brought before him stating their inability to agree, amounts to coercion, the verdict must be set aside; People v. Sheldon, 156 N. Y. 268, 50 N. E. 840, 41 L. R. A. 644, 66 Am. St. Rep. 564, where Parker, C. J., discusses the subject at large.

It is within the discretion of the trial judge to recall a jury for inquiry as to their difficulty and for further instructions if deemed advisable, but it is not permissible to inquire in what proportion they are divided, and any instructions in respect to their duty to agree should be carefully guarded, so as not to press that duty unduly upon the minority; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Craig, 80 Fed. 496, 25 C. C. A. 585.

At common law the coercion of juries was both usual and proper; Proff. Jury Trials § 475; and they were kept together practically as prisoners until agreement; Thomp. & Mer. Juries § 310; but that custom no longer obtains; Physioc v. Shea, 75 Ga. 466; and it is settled law that the court may advise the jury to agree but should not threaten long confinement; Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Moog, 81 Ala. 335, 1 South. 108; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Jackson, 81 Ind. 19; East Tennessee & W. N. C. R. Co. v. Winters, 85 Tenn. 240, 1 S. W. 790; Slater v. Mead, 53 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 57; State v. Grizzard, 89 N. C. 115; but it is not error for the judge to refer to the length of the term and add that he will give them plenty of time to consider and direct their proper accommodation; Osborne v. Wilkes, 108 N. C. 653, 13 S. E. 285. It is also held that any language used by the bailiff in charge tending to coercion will be a ground for a new trial; Cole v. Swan, 4 G. Greene (Iowa) 32; Obear v. Gray, 68 Ga. 182; but a mere jesting remark of the bailiff will not be sufficient to require a new trial, although taken seriously by some of the jury; Pope v. State, 36 Miss. 121; where it does not appear that any prejudice resulted; Darling v. R. Co., 17 R. I. 708, 24 Atl. 462, 16 L. R. A. 643, and note.

The removal of a case from the consideration of a jury, in criminal cases, can only take place by consent of the prisoner; 6 C. & P. 151; 5 Cox, Cr. Cas. 501; State v. Slack, 6 Ala. 676; or by some necessity; Wright v. State, 5 Ind. 290, 61 Am. Dec. 90; McCauley v. State, 26 Ala. 135; Poage v. State, 3 Ohio St. 239; Williams v. Com., 2 Gratt. (Va.) 570, 44 Am. Dec. 403; Reynolds v. State, 3 Ga. 60; so as to compel the prisoner to be tried again for the same offence; 4 Bla. Com. 360. But where such necessity exists as would make such a course highly conducive to purposes of justice; U. S. v. Coolidge, 2 Gall. 364, Fed. Cas. No. 14,858; Com. v. Cook, 6 S. & R. (Pa.) 586, 9 Am. Dec. 465; 2 D. & B. 166; People v. Goodwin, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 205, 9 Am. Dec. 203; Com. v. Fells, 9 Leigh (Va.) 620; 13 Q. B. 734; it may take place.

Where the state court has the right to discharge a jury for want of agreement, the result is a mistrial and the accused cannot on a subsequent trial interpose the plea of once in jeopardy; Keerl v. State of Montana, 213 U. S. 135, 29 Sup. Ct. 469, 53 L. Ed. 734, where the question was suggested but not decided whether the fourteenth amendment in itself forbids a state from putting one of its citizens in a second jeopardy.

In a criminal case, the court has power to withdraw a juror, but this action rests in the sound discretion of the court and is to be exercised only in very extraordinary and striking circumstances in order to prevent the failure of justice; State v. Lewis, 83 N. J. L. 161, 83 Atl. 692.

The question of necessity seems to be in the decision of the court which tries the case; State v. Updike, 4 Harr. (Del.) 581; Hurley v. State, 6 Ohio 399; People v. Green, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 55; U. S. v. Perez, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 579, 6 L. Ed. 165. But see 1 Cox, Cr. Cas. 210; 13 Q. B. 734; Wright v. State, 5 Ind. 292, 61 Am. Dec. 90. A distinction has been taken in some cases between felonies and misdemeanors in this regard; 3 D. & B. 115; U. S. v. Gibert, 2 Sumn. 19, Fed. Cas. No. 15,204; State v. Honeycutt, 74 N. C. 391; but is of doubtful validity; People v. Goodwin, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 187, 9 Am. Dec. 203; Com. v. Bowden, 9 Mass. 494; Com. v. Olds, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 137; McCauley v. State, 26 Ala. 135; Campbell v. State, 11 Ga. 353.

Among cases of necessity which have been held sufficient to warrant the discharge of a jury without releasing the prisoner are sickness of the judge; Nugent v. State, 4 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 72, 24 Am. Dec. 746; State v. Farrow, 8 Bax. (Tenn.) 571; or of his wife; State v. Tatman, 59 Ia. 471, 13 N. W. 632; sickness; Com. v. Clue, 3 Rawle (Pa.) 498; 2 Mood. & R. 249; 3 Crawf. & D. 212; 1 Thach. Cr. Cas. 1; Mixon v. State, 55 Ala. 129, 28 Am. Rep. 695; State v. Emery, 59 Vt. 84, 7 Atl. 129; or other incapacity of a juror; U. S. v. Morris, 1 Curt. 23, Fed. Cas. No. 15,815; People v. Damon, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 351; Stone v. People, 3 Scam. (Ill.) 326; Poage v. State, 3 Ohio St. 239; Dilworth v. Com., 12 Gratt. (Va.) 689, 65 Am. Dec. 264; but see 8 B. & C. 417; 8 Ad. & E. 831; Barlow v. State, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 114; Com. v. Jones, 1 Leigh (Va.) 599; State v. Hall, 9 N. J. L. 256; death of a juror's wife; Chamber of Commerce Bldg. Co. v. Klussman, 25 Oh. Cir. Ct. 728; sickness of the prisoner; 2 C. & P. 413; State v. Wiseman, 68 N. C. 203; Lee v. State, 26 Ark. 260, 7 Am. Rep. 611; or the death or insanity of a judge or juror; People v. Webb, 38 Cal. 467; Bescher v. State, 32 Ind. 480; expiration of a term of court; State v. Moor, Walk. (Miss.) 134, 12 Am. Dec. 541; Lore v. State, 4 Ala. 173; State v. M'Lemore, 2 Hill (S. C.) 680; inability of the jury to agree; People v. Denton, 2 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 275; Com. v. Purchase, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 521, 13 Am. Dec. 452; Hurley v. State, 6 Ohio 399; U. S. v. Perez, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 579, 6 L. Ed. 165; Rollins v. Nolting, 53 Minn. 232, 54 N. W. 1118; Pierce v. State, 67 Ind. 354; State v. Allen, 47 Conn. 121; State v. Blackman, 35 La. Ann. 483; State v. Washington, 90 N. C. 664; Kelly v. U. S., 27 Fed. 616; contra, Com. v. Cook, 6 S. & R. 577, 9 Am. Dec. 465 (a leading case, per Tilghman, C. J.); McCauley v. State, 26 Ala. 135; 3 Crawf. & D. 212; L. R. 1 Q. B. 289; Com. v. Fitzpatrick, 121 Pa. 109, 15 Atl. 466, 1 L. R. A. 451, 6 Am. St. Rep. 757. But see Dye v. Com., 7 Gratt. (Va.) 662.

In Com. v. Clue, 3 Rawle (Pa.) 498, Gibson, C. J., held that mere inability to agree is not sufficient to justify discharge, nor the illness of two jurymen if it can be relieved by permitting them to have refreshments. In some states, statutes have provided for a discharge upon a disagreement; Lee v. State, 26 Ark. 260, 7 Am. Rep. 611; Crookham v. State, 5 W. Va. 510; Ex parte McLaughlin, 41 Cal. 211, 10 Am. Rep. 272.

After a jury has been sworn, but before the evidence has been begun, a juror may be discharged and another juror called, this being by consent of counsel for the accused; Catron v. State, 52 Neb. 389, 72 N. W. 354. Where, in a felony case, the greater part of the evidence had been heard and a juror was discharged for illness and another one substituted and the evidence was then heard de novo, it was held no ground for a new trial; State v. Davis, 31 W. Va. 390, 7 S. E. 24. If, in a felony case, a juror becomes incapacitated by illness, a mistrial should be declared and the case be tried de novo; West v. State, 42 Fla. 244, 28 South. 430.

Insufficiency of the evidence to convict; 2 Str. 984; Andrews v. Hammond, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 540; Klock v. People, 2 Park. Cr. Cas. (N. Y.) 676; U. S. v. Shoemaker, 2 McLean 114, Fed. Cas. No. 16,279; and sickness or other incapacity of a witness; 1 Crawf. & D. 151; 1 Mood. 186; are not sufficient necessities to warrant the discharge of a jury. See Com. v. Wade, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 399; U. S. v. Coolidge, 2 Gall. 364, Fed. Cas. No. 14,858; 2 Benn. & H. L. Cr. Cas. 337.

It is within the discretion of the trial judge to refuse to discharge the jury until they arrive at a verdict; Wilson v. Ry. Co., 2 Misc. 127, 20 N. Y. Supp. 852. A jury may be discharged from giving any verdict, whenever the court is of the opinion that there is a manifest necessity for the act, or that the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated, and may even order a trial before another jury, and a defendant is not thereby twice put in jeopardy; Thompson v. U. S., 155 U. S. 271, 15 Sup. Ct. 73, 39 L. Ed. 146.

When a jury in a criminal case is discharged during the trial, and the defendant subsequently put on trial before another jury, he is not thereby twice put in jeopardy within the meaning of the fifth amendment to the United States constitution; Simmons v. U. S., 142 U. S. 148, 12 Sup. Ct. 171, 35 L. Ed. 968.

See JEOPARDY; WITHDRAWING A JUROR.

Duties and privileges of. Qualified persons may be compelled to serve as jurors under penalties prescribed by law. They are exempt from arrest in certain cases. See PRIVILEGE. They are liable to punishment for misconduct in some cases.

When improper questions are asked of a witness, by a juryman, and answered, if no objection is made or exception taken, no error is saved, and if inquiries are made by juryman with court's permission, failure of the court to interpose objections is not reversible error; State v. Crawford, 96 Minn. 95, 104 N. W. 768, 822, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 839; as a general rule, though the cases are few, questions of witnesses by jurors seem to be permitted; Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Harper, 128 Ill. 384, 21 N. E. 561; Schaefer v. Ry. Co., 128 Mo. 64, 30 S. W. 331.

A frequent variation from the common-law jury system is to permit the jury to impose the punishment (this being formerly considered a matter for judicial discretion), or, as in some states, to divide the responsibility between the judge and jury; and such legislation is held constitutional; Rice v. State, 7 Ind. 332; State v. Hockett, 70 Ia. 442, 30 N. W. 742; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 934.

In criminal cases, in Scotland, a jury consists of fifteen and a majority may convict. In Belgium, criminal and political charges and offences of the press are tried before a jury. Trial by jury has existed in Greece since 1834. In Sweden it exists in cases of offences of the press; and in Italy, in criminal cases, and a majority may convict. In Norway, it was established in 1887, and there also a majority may convict. In Russia, since 1864, all criminal cases involving severe penalties, except political offences, are tried by juries. Hawaii has a jury of twelve, both in civil and criminal cases, of whom nine may render a verdict. In South America, all the states have the jury system. In France, trial by jury exists in cases of felony, and it is provided in Germany, by the imperial code, in all criminal cases except treason, political crimes and offences of the press.

JURY BOX. A place set apart for the jury to sit in during the trial of a cause.

JURY LIST. A paper containing the names of jurors impanelled to try a cause, or it contains the names of all the jurors summoned to attend court.

JURYMAN. A juror; one who is impanelled on a jury. Webster, Dict.

JURY PROCESS. The writs for summoning a jury, viz.: in England, venire juratores facias, and distringas juratores, or ha- beas corpora juratorum. These writs are now abolished, and jurors are summoned by precept. 1 Chitty, Archb. 344; Com. Law Proc. Act, 1852, § 104; 3 Chitty, Stat. 519.

JURY OF WOMEN. A jury of women is given in two cases; viz.: on writ de ventre inspiciendo, which was a writ directed to the sheriff, commanding him that, in the presence of twelve men and as many women, he cause examination to be made whether a woman therein named is with child or not, and if with child, then about what time it will be born, and that he certify the same.

The jury has to be one of "discreet women." The practice was to close the doors before the jury was impanelled. See 8 Carr. & P. 265, where a surgeon was sent out with the jury; on his return to the court he was sworn and made his report. The jury then retired and brought in a verdict.

It was granted in a case when a widow, whose husband had lands in fee-simple, marries again soon after her husband's death, and declares herself pregnant by her first husband, and, under that pretext, withholds the lands from the next heir; Cro. Eliz. 506; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 15. In that case, although the jury was made up of men and women, the examination was made by the latter; 1 Madd. Ch. 11; 2 P. Wms. 591. Such a writ was issued in the case of In re Blackburn, 14 L. J. N. S. Ch. 336. In New York it is said that an application was made for such a jury in the Rollwagen will case and denied upon the ground that "as the lady was not going to be hanged and did not herself solicit the investigation, there was no power to compel her to submit to it;" 10 Alb. L. J. 3. In the opinion of the court in Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250, 11 Sup. Ct. 1000, 35 L. Ed. 734, the statement is made by Mr. Justice Gray that this writ has never been used in this country. The authorities cited in this title show that this statement is too broad both as to the use of the common-law writ and as to physical examination, which title see further as to that case.

Where pregnancy is pleaded by a condemned woman, in delay of execution, a jury of twelve discreet matrons was called from those in court, who were impanelled to try the fact and report to the court. They chose a fore-matron from their own number. On their returning a verdict of "enceinte," the execution was delayed until the birth, and in some cases the punishment was commuted to perpetual exile. When the criminal was merely privement enceinte, and not quick (see QUICKENING), there was no respite. See 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 412; Taylor, Med. Jur., Bell's ed. 520; Archb. Cr. Pl. 187. The proceeding has been said to be obsolete, though it has been recognized in America and at a very recent date in England, in Reg. v. Webster, tried before Lord Denman at the Old Bailey in London in July, 1879. The plea of pregnancy was interposed before sentence, and immediately "a jury of matrons selected from a crowd of females in the gallery were impanelled" and sworn, and the inquisition was held forthwith before the judge. The result was a verdict that the prisoner was not quick with child and she was sentenced. The verbatim report of the proceedings may be found in 9 Cent. L. J. 94. In State v. Arden, 1 Bay (S. C.) 487, the plea was allowed and an inquisition held, but the prisoner was found not pregnant and sentenced to death. In Holeman v. State, 13 Ark. 105, the plea was overruled in a larceny case where a woman was convicted of a penitentiary offence. In the case of Mrs. Bathsheba Spooner, who was tried in Massachusetts in 1778 for the murder of her husband, she being under sentence of death, petitioned the governor and council for a respite on account of pregnancy. A writ de ventre inspiciendo was issued by the council to the sheriff directing him to summon a jury of two men midwives and twelve discreet and lawful matrons "to ascertain the truth of her plea." The verdict was that she "is not quick with child," and she was executed, but a post mortem examination proved that her assertion was true; 3 Harv. L. Rev. 44; 39 Alb. L. J. 326.

"While the cases are very rare, there is no evidence (or authority, it might be added) that a jury of women is not a part of the machinery of the law in those states in which the common law prevails." 12 A. & E. Encyc. of L. 331. Such a jury was impanelled in a criminal case in Chester county, Pa., June 27, 1689; 5 Haz. Pa. Reg. 158; Records of Upland Court now in the Pennsylvania Historical Society. See 48 Am. L. Rev. 280.

It may be safely affirmed that no woman who pleads pregnancy in delay of execution will in any common-law jurisdiction be sentenced to death without examination into the truth of the fact pleaded, and in the absence of other statutory provision, it is difficult to see how she could be deprived of this common-law right. It is undoubtedly true that the proceeding is antiquated and ill adapted to the purpose, and therefore the subject is well worthy of legislative attention. Doubtless the rarity of such legislation is due to the infrequency of capital trials of women. In one state at least the contingency is provided for. In New York it is provided by statute that if there is reasonable ground to believe that a female defendant sentenced to death is pregnant, a jury of six physicians shall be impanelled to inquire into the fact, and if it is found by the inquisition that she is "quick with child," the execution is to be suspended until the governor issues a warrant directing it, which he may do as soon as he is satisfied that she is no longer "quick with child," or he may commute her punishment to imprisonment for life; N. Y. Code Crim. Proc. §§ 501–2. See DE VENTRE INSPICIENDO; REPRIEVE.

JURY WHEEL. A mechanical contrivance, usually a circular box revolving on a crank, in which the names of persons subject to jury duty are placed, by the officers, and at the times and places prescribed by law, and from which the proper number to constitute the jury panels for any particular term of court are drawn by lot.

JUS (Lat.). Law; right; equity. Story, Eq. Jur. § 1. In the Roman law the word had two distinct meanings. It was either a body of law, as the jus honorarium, or an individual right, as the jus suffragii. See Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 7, where this distinction is developed in the course of a discussion of fundamental conceptions. See Evans' pamphlet on Roman Law According to Livy. A third use of the word was in apposition to judicium, as to which see IN JUDICIO.

Jus is said to have the following meanings: a law court; a bond or tie; power, authority; right to do a thing; law, or a system of law; what is right and fair. The plural means either rights, or rules of law, ordinances, decisions, and so authority. Nettleship, Lexicog.

As to the distinction between jus and lex, see Lex.

See IN JURE; JUDEX; JUS AD REM.

JUS ABUTENDI (Lat.). The right to abuse. By this phrase is understood the right to abuse property, or having full dominion over property. 3 Toullier, n. 86. The right of destruction or consumption, and free disposition. Morey, Rom. L. 283. See DOMINIUM JUS UTENDI.

JUS ACCRESCENDI (Lat.). The right of survivorship. See SURVIVOR.

In Roman Law. The right of accretion. This exists in two cases: According to the general rule a person could not die partly testate and partly intestate, and if any part of the estate was unprovided for, either by the oversight of the testator or any of the heirs, it was ratably distributed among the heirs; Morey, Rom. L. 325; so if the same thing were left to two or more persons each took an equal share; if one of them should die before he had received the legacy, the share of the one so dying passed to the remaining joint legatee or legatees by this right; id. 334. It has been suggested that the germ of this right is to be found in the succession by necessity; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 100.

See ESTATE IN JOINT TENANCY.

JUS ACTUS. In Roman Law. A rural servitude giving to a person a passage for carriages, or for cattle.

JUS AD REM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A right to a thing. It is generally treated as a right to property not in possession, as distinguished from jus in re, which implies the absolute dominion. In English law, this distinction is illustrated by Blackstone, by reference to ecclesiastical promotions, where, although the freehold passes to the person promoted, corporal possession is required to vest the property completely in the new proprietor, who acquires jus ad rem, an inchoate, or imperfect, right of nomination and institution, but not the jus in re, or complete and full right, unless by corporal possession; 2 Bla. Com. 312. The distinction expressed by these terms in the Roman law is analogous to the common-law distinction between the effect of a right of entry and that of actual entry, which in English real property law is expressed in the maxim non jus, sed seisina, facit stipitem; id. Jus ad rem is said to be merely an abridged expression for jus ad rem acquirendam, and it properly denotes the right to the acquisition of a thing. Austin, Jur. Lect. 14.

"On this distinction between claims to things advanced against all men, and those advanced primarily against particular men, is based the division of rights into real and personal expressed by writers of the middle ages, on the analogy of terms found in the writings of the Roman jurists, by the phrases jura in re and jura ad rem. A real right, a jus in re, or, to use the equivalent phrase preferred by some later commentators, jus in rem, is a right to have a thing to the exclusion of all other men. A personal right, jus ad rem, or, to use a much more correct expression, jus in personam, is a right in which there is a person who is the subject of right, as well as a thing as its object, a right which gives its possessor a power to oblige another person to give, or procure, or do, or do not do, something." Sand. Inst. Just. Introd. xlviii.

A right which belongs to a person only mediately and relatively, and has for its foundation an obligation incurred by a particular person.

The jus in re, by the effect of its very nature, is independent and absolute, and is exercised per se ipsum, by applying it to its object; but the jus ad rem is the faculty of demanding and obtaining the performance of some obligation by which another is bound to me ad aliquid dandum vel faciendum, vel præstandum. Thus, if I had the ownership of a horse, the usufruct of a flock of sheep, the right of habitation of a house, a right of way over your land, etc., my right in the horse, in the flock of sheep, in the house, or the land, belongs to me directly, and without any intermediary; it belongs to me absolutely and independently of any particular relation with another person, I am in direct and immediate relation with the thing itself which forms the object of my right without reference to any other relation. This constitutes a jus in re. If, on the other hand, the horse is lent to me by you, or if I have a claim against you for a thousand dollars, my right to the horse or to the sum of money exists only relatively, and can only be exercised through you; my relation to the object of the right is mediate, and is the result of the immediate relation of debtor and creditor existing between you and me. This is a jus ad rem. Every jus in re, or real right, may be vindicated by the actio in rem against him who is in possession of the thing, or against any one who contests the right. It has been said that the words, jus in re of the civil law convey the same idea as thing in possession at common law. This is an error, arising from a confusion of ideas as to the distinctive characters of the two classes of rights. Nearly all the common-law writers seem to take it for granted that by the jus in re is understood the title or property in a thing in the possession of the owner; and that by the jus ad rem is meant the title or property in a thing not in the possession of the owner. But it is obvious that possession is not one of the elements constituting the jus in re; although possession is generally, but not always, one of the incidents of this right, yet the loss of possession does not exercise the slightest influence on the character of the right itself, unless it should continue for a sufficient length of time to destroy the right altogether by prescription. In many instances the jus in re is not accompanied by possession at all; the usuary is not entitled to the possession of the thing subject to his use; still, he has a jus in re. So with regard to the right of way, etc. See DOMINIUM.

A mortgage is considered by most writers as a jus in re; but it is clear that it is a jus ad rem: it is granted for the sole purpose of securing the payment of a debt or the fulfilment of some other personal obligation. In other words, it is an accessory to a principal obligation and corresponding right: it can have no separate and independent existence. The immovable on which I have a mortgage is not the object of the right, as in the case of the horse of which I am the owner, or the house of which I have the right of habitation, etc.: the true object of my right is the sum of money due to me, the payment of which I may enforce by obtaining a decree for the sale of the property mortgaged. 2 Marcadè 350.

The description of legal duties and rights as being in rem or in personam is usually said to be unauthorized by classical Latin usage; Roman lawyers spoke of "actiones," not "jura," as being in rem or in personam. But it should be remembered that in Roman usage "action" included what we now call "a right of action," any determinate claim to some form of legal redress. Action was the right of obtaining by process of law what is due, not the process itself. Hence the modern usage is not so wide apart from the Roman as it appears at first sight to be. Pollock, First Book of Jurispr. 92.

JUS ÆLIANUM. A body of laws upon the same plan as the jus flavianum (q. v.) though more complete. It was published about B. C. 200 by Sextus Ælius and consisted of three parts: (1) The law of the XII. Tables; (2) The interpretation of the same; (3) The description of the legis actiones or forms of procedure. Morey, Rom. L. 85.

JUS ÆSNECIÆ. The right of the eldest-born to inherit; primogeniture.

JUS ALBINATUS. The right of the king by confiscation or escheat to the property of a deceased foreigner unless he had a peculiar exemption. This prerogative was abolished in 1790. 1 Bla. Com. 372; 2 Steph. Com. 409, n. It was the Droit d'Aubaine of the French law, which title see.

JUS ANGARIÆ. See ANGARIA; ANGARY, RIGHT OF.

JUS ANGLORUM. The laws and customs of the West Saxons, in the time of the Heptarchy, by which the people were for a long time governed, and which were preferred before all others. Wharton.

JUS ÆQUUM. Equitable law. A term used by the Romans to express the adaptation of the law to the circumstances of the individual case as opposed to jus strictum (q. v.).

JUS AQUÆDUCTUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude which gives to the owner of land the right to bring down water through or from the land of another, either from its source or from any other place.

Its privilege may be limited as to the time when it may be exercised. If the source fails, the servitude ceases, but revives when the water returns. If the water rises in, or naturally flows through, the land, its proprietor cannot by any grant divert it so as to prevent it flowing to the land below; 2 Rolle, Abr. 140, l. 25; Lois des Bât. part 1, c. 3, s. 1, art. 1. But if it had been brought into his land by artificial means, it seems it would be strictly his property, and that it would be in his power to grant it; Dig. 8. 3. 1. 10; 3 Burge, Confl. Laws 417. See Washb. Easem.; RIVER; WATER-COURSE.

JUS AQUÆ HAUSTUS. In Roman Law. A rural servitude giving to a person a right of watering cattle on another's field, or of drawing water from another's well.

JUS BELLI. So much of international law as regulates the relations of nations to each other with respect to a state of war, including belligerency and neutrality, which several titles see.

The right of war so far as it concerns the treatment which may be properly accorded to an enemy. Grot. De Bell. et Pac. I. 1, § 3.

JUS BELLUM DICENDI. The right of making a declaration of war.

JUS CIVILE (Lat.). In Roman Law. The private law, in contradistinction to the public law, or jus gentium. 1 Savigny, Dr. Rom. c. 1, § 1.

The local law of the city of Rome.

It is said that the twelve tables marked the starting-point in the development of the Roman law so far as it can be historically authenticated, and that its development advanced steadily in uninterrupted progression until it culminated in the corpus juris civilis of Justinian; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 10. It is, however, rather more accurate to say that the culmination of the Roman law, as a system, was not reached until the period of the development side by side of the jus civile and jus gentium. For an interesting discussion of the origin and growth of this system, see Morey, Rom. L. 14, 24. See JUS GENTIUM.

JUS CIVITATIS. In Roman Law. The full franchise of citizenship comprising, on the one hand, public rights, including the right of holding office and the right of voting; and on the other hand private rights, including the right to hold and dispose of property, according to the forms of the civil law, and the right of marriage, and all domestic relations. Morey, Rom. L. 48.

The collection of laws which are to be observed among all the members of a nation. It is opposed to jus gentium, which is the law which regulates the affairs of nations among themselves. 2 Lepage, El. du Dr. c. 5, 1. It was very much what is understood in modern terminology by municipal law.

JUS CLOACÆ MITTENDÆ. In Civil Law. The name of a servitude which requires the party who is subject to it to permit his neighbor to conduct the waters which fall on his grounds over those of the servient estate.

JUS COMMUNE. The common law, applicable to all persons alike. The ordinary law, as opposed to jus singulare (q. v.).

"The general law, as opposed to exceptional rules or privileges applicable only to a class." Pollock, First Book of Jurispr. 250.

JUS CORONÆ. The right of succession to the throne of Great Britain.

JUS CURIALITATIS ANGLIÆ. The right of curtesy. See CURTESY.

JUS DARE (Lat.). To enact or to make the law. Jus dare belongs to the legislature; jus dicere, to the judge.

JUS DELIBERANDI (Lat.). The right of deliberating, given to the heir, in those countries where the heir may have benefit of inventory (q. v.), in which to consider whether he will accept or renounce the succession.

In Louisiana he is allowed ten days before he is required to make his election. La. Civ. Code art. 1028.

JUS DEVOLUTUM. A phrase formerly used in Scotch ecclesiastical law to designate the right which devolved on the presbytery to present a minister to a vacant parish or benefice, in case the patron should neglect to exercise his right within the time limited by law, by presenting within six months a properly qualified person. Int. Cyc.

JUS DICERE (Lat.). To declare the law. It is the province of the court jus dicere, to declare what the law is.

JUS DISPONENDI (Lat.). The right to dispose of a thing.

In a general sense it means the right of alienation, and is frequently applied in the case of a married woman with respect to her separate estate. In a special or limited sense, it is applied to the reservation by a vendor of chattels or the ultimate ownership of goods with the possession of which he has parted. It is said to be often a matter of great nicety to determine upon a contract of sale, whether or not the vendor's purpose or intention was to reserve a jus disponendi. Benj. Sales, Ch. VI. § 382. See SALE.

The reservation of this right is essential where the property in the thing sold is reserved as a security for deferred payments or purchase-money, and it is permitted in many cases in which it is not permissible at common law. The great increase in the number of transactions in which such reservation is customary, as car trusts, instalment sales, etc., makes the subject one of increased importance and interest.

JUS DISTRAHENDI. The right of sale of goods pledged in case of non-payment. See PLEDGE; DISTRESS.

JUS DIVIDENDI. The right of testamentary disposition of real estate.

JUS DUPLICATUM (Lat. double right). When a man has the possession as well as the property of anything, he is said to have a double right, jus duplicatum. Bracton, l. 4, tr. 4, c. 4; 2 Bla. Com. 199.

JUS EDICERE, JUS EDICENDI. The right to issue edicts. It belonged to all the higher magistrates, but special interest is attached to the prætorian edicts in connection with the history of Roman law. See PRÆTOR.

JUS EX NON SCRIPTO. Law constituted by custom or such usage as indicates the tacit consent of the community.

The definition of Ulpian was: "Diuturna consuetudo pro jure et lege in his quæ non ex scripto descendunt, observari solet;" D. 1, 3, 33. This is well, though freely, translated thus: "Whatever has existed for a long period of time, and is in harmony with the moral judgment of the community is regarded as having the force of law, and the judicial authority is bound to recognize it as such, even though it has never been expressed in a legal enactment." Morey, Rom. L. 223. The same author says with respect to such law: "It was also a maxim of the Romans, that not only can laws be established by custom; they can also be abrogated by custom—that is, by contrary usage. It is unnecessary to consider here the objections raised by some modern jurists, such as Austin, to this view of customary, or unwritten law. It is enough for our present purpose to say that this was the conception of the Roman jurists regarding the origin of a portion of the positive law, and a conception which has been adopted by the majority of modern civilians;" id. Another phrase by which this law was known was jus moribus constitutum. See LAW.

JUS FECIALE (Lat.). In Roman Law. Fecial law. It has been termed that branch of international law which had its foundation in the religious belief of different nations: such as the international law which now exists among the Christian people of Europe. Savigny, Dr. Rom. c. 2, § 11. But the earlier writers on the civil law gave to it more of a characterization as international law than is attributed to it by modern writers.

See FECIAL LAW; INTERNATIONAL LAW.

It related to rules and ceremonies or modes of procedure for declarations of war and ratifications of treaties of peace. The subject was entrusted to a college of priests, who were, however, the mere agents of the state. Hershey, Int. L. 43.

JUS FIDUCIARUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A right to something held in trust. For this there was a remedy in conscience. 2 Bla. Com. 328. See FIDEI COMMISSUM.

JUS FLAVIANUM. A publication of the legis actiones or a practical manual of the procedure, including a list of dies fasti (q. v.).

Of this publication it is said: "The first step which led to the decline of the legis actiones was due to their publication. As long as the knowledge of legal forms was restricted to the patrician class, the people at large were helpless in their efforts to obtain an impartial administration of justice." Morey, Rom. L. 85. The author was Cnæus Flavius, who was a scribe or clerk of Appius Claudius. His publication was B. C. 304. It was followed about a century later by the Jus Ælianum (q. v.). See also Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 14, n. 2.

JUS FODIENDI. In Civil Law. The name of a rural servitude which permits digging on the land of another. Inst. 2, 3, 2; Dig. 8, 3, 1, 1. A similar right was recognized in early English law; Bract. 222.

JUS GENTIUM (Lat.). The law of nations. It has been said that although the Romans used these words in the sense we attach to law of nations, yet among them the sense was much more extended. Falck, Encyc. Jur. 102, n. 42. It has been termed a system made up by the early Roman lawyers of the common ingredients in the customs of the old Italian tribes, for the purpose of adjudicating questions arising in Rome between foreigners or natives and foreigners. Maine, Anc. Law 49.

The jus gentium is differently characterized by the later writers on the civil law from the meaning given to the phrase by the earlier writers who treated it, as more identical with the idea of modern international law than it is now considered to have been.

The distinction between the jus gentium and the jus civile is thus admirably expressed: "The jus gentium, on the other hand, came to be regarded as a universal law of all mankind, common to all nations, because resting on the nature of things and the general sense of equity which obtains among all men, the 'jus gentium quod apud omnes gentes peræque custoditur,' a sort of natural law, exacting recognition everywhere in virtue of its inherent reasonableness. It would, however, be erroneous to suppose that the Romans attempted to introduce a code of nature such as the philosophers had devised. The jus gentium was, and never had been anything else but a portion of positive Roman law, which commercial usage of other sources of law, more especially the prætorian edict (q. v.), had clothed in a concrete form. Nor again must it be imagined that the Romans simply transferred a portion of foreign (Hellenic) law bodily into their own system. In the few quite exceptional cases where they did so (as e. g. in the case of hypotheca), they did not fail to impress their institutions with a national Roman character. The antithesis between jus civile and jus gentium was merely the outward expression of the growing consciousness that Roman law, in absorbing the element of greater freedom, was commencing to discard its national peculiarities and transform itself from the special local law of a city into a general law for the civilized world. The jus gentium was that part of the private law of Rome which was essentially in accordance with the private law of other nations, more especially with that of the Greeks, which would naturally predominate along the seaboard of the Mediterranean. In other words, jus gentium was that portion of the positive law of Rome which appeared to the Romans themselves in the light of a 'ratio scripta,' of a law which obtains among all nations and is common to all mankind." Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 13.

The Romans discovered, or thought they discovered, a common groundwork of legal institutions in the various commonwealths that became subject to Rome. What remained, after deducting local and technical peculiarities, was called by them the common law of nations, jus gentium. Pollock, Oxford Lectures 10.

The origin of the jus gentium was undoubtedly to be found in the adjustment of the Roman law to the relations existing between Roman citizens and foreigners, and between foreigners themselves. The growth of a different system was a not unnatural result of the administration of law in cases where both parties were not Roman citizens, by the foreign prætors, who were not bound by the strict rules of the jus civile, but from going about from place to place, and administering a kind of equitable jurisdiction in the settlement of disputes, they might not inaptly be termed peripatetic or itinerant arbitrators. The growth of a system of law administered by them alongside of the jus civile was not unlike the growth of the equity jurisprudence alongside of the common law. Then, too, the fact that these officers were constantly engaged in settling disputes, to which at least one party was a foreigner, naturally led to their becoming familiar with the principles of other systems of law, and in applying them to the case in hand, so far as they commended themselves to their sense of justice. The new system was afterwards extended to the whole non-citizen class. And while in the first instance it was treated as an entirely distinct system from the jus civile, it gradually supplanted the latter, and by a process which was originally the absorption of much of the jus gentium into the jus civile, it subsequently became recognized as a constituent part of Roman Law, and was gradually welded into a complete system of jurisprudence.

The confusion between jus gentium and international law is said to be entirely modern.

For a bibliography of this subject, see Hershey, Int. L. 54.

See Morey, Rom. L. 59–71; INTERNATIONAL LAW; JUS CIVILE; JUS NATURALE.

JUS GLADII (Lat. the right of the sword). Supreme jurisdiction. The right to absolve from or condemn a man to death.

JUS HABENDI (Lat.). The right to have a thing. The right to be put into actual possession of property to which one is entitled.

JUS HABENDI ET RETINENDI. The right to have and retain the offerings, tithes, and profits of a parsonage or rectory. Toml.; Moz. & W.

JUS HÆREDITATIS. The right of succession as an heir, or of inheritance. See HEIR.

JUS HONORARIUM. In Civil Law. A name applied to the prætorian edicts and also to the edicts of the curule ædiles, when on certain occasions they were published. Inst. 1, 2, 7.

This system of law was simply the usual development of an expanding and elastic jurisprudence, which naturally resulted from the increase in Rome of population and power, and the greater complication of her civilization; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 10; it was spoken of as having a distinct place by the side, and as the complement, of the jus civile; Sand. Introd. Inst. Just. xxi. It was a system of judge-made law (q. v.) in the proper sense. Its vigorous development was coincident with the formulary procedure, which was well adapted to give it scope and effect; Sohm, Introd. Rom. L. 178.

Its place and function in the Roman jurisprudence are thus described: "The prætorian law, being a law made by officials, 'jus honorarium,' was opposed to the jus civile, i. e. law, in the strict and proper sense of the term, the law made by the people, developed by popular enactments and popular customs. Thus both the jus civile and the jus honorarium contained elements of jus gentium, but in the jus honorarium, the influence of the jus gentium predominated. The prætorian edict was, in the main, the instrument by means of which the free principles of jus æquum gained their victory over the older jus strictum. Though at first the edict may merely have served the purpose of giving fuller effect to the jus civile, and then of supplementing the jus civile, nevertheless, in the end, borne along by the current of the times, it boldly assumed the function of reforming the civil law." Id. 54.

See JUDEX; PRÆTOR.

All magistrates of elevated rank possessed the power of legislating, "jus edicendi," with regard to such matters as fell within their jurisdiction, and the body of rules so established was termed jus honorarium. But as the jus prætorium forms so important a part of it, the term jus honorarium is often restricted to the jus prætorium.

JUS HONORUM. In Roman Law. The right of holding offices. See JUS SUFFRAGII.

JUS IMAGINIS. In Roman Law. The right of displaying the pictures and statues of one's ancestors, somewhat as in the English law of Heraldry, there is a right to the coat-of-arms.

JUS IMMUNITATIS. The law of exemption from the liability to hold public office.

JUS IN PERSONAM. A personal right. Considered by some writers as a more correct expression for jus ad rem, which see. According to the Roman law, property could not be transferred by mere agreement. The latter, even though in form a legal contract, had the effect only of expressing the intention of the parties and creating a personal right against the one making the agreement in a real right to the property itself. Morey, Rom. L. 307. See JUS AD REM.

JUS IN RE (Lat.). A right which belongs to a person, immediately and absolutely, in a thing, and which is the same against the whole world,—idem erga omnes. See JUS AD REM.

"The objection to using the term jus in re is that the expression occurs in the classical jurists as meaning an interest in a thing short of ownership, as the interest of a mortgagee in the thing pledged, and on this ground the term jus in rem, which in this sense is not found in the classical jurists, but is supported by the analogy of the familiar term actio in rem, seems preferable." Sand. Inst. Just. xlix. See JUS AD REM.

JUS IN RE ALIENA. An easement on servitude, or right in, or arising out of, the property of another.

JUS IN RE PROPRIA. The right of enjoyment which appertains to full and complete ownership of property. Frequently, by relation, the full ownership or property itself.

JUS INCOGNITUM (Lat.). An unknown law. This term is applied by the civilians to obsolete laws, which, as Bacon truly observes, are unjust; for the law to be just must give warning before it strikes. Bacon. Aph. 8, s. 1; Bowyer, Mod. Civ. Law 33. But until it has become obsolete no custom can prevail against it. See OBSOLETE.

JUS ITALICUM. In Roman Law. A right bestowed upon a community by which it acquired "the privileges of a colonia Italica (i. e. an old colony of Roman citizens endowed with full legal rights), that its soil is therefore exempt from the land-tax and capable of quiritary ownership, in other words, is placed on the same footing as the fundas Italicus." Heisterbergk, Name und Begriff des jus Italicum (1885). Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 22, n. 2.

JUS ITINERIS. In Roman Law. A rural servitude giving to a person the right to pass over an adjoining field, on foot or horseback.

JUS LATII. The right or privilege conferred upon the various communities of Latium.

This has been termed a "kind of qualified citizenship (civitas sine suffragio), such as Rome had, in early times, granted to the inhabitants of Cære." Morey, Rom. L. 50. These rights orjginally included the rights of intermarriage and of commercial intercourse between Rome and the inhabitants of the Latin towns. The author last cited says: "The possession of these rights formed the essential feature of the early jus Latii, or Latinitas. In later times, however, the right which went under this name and which was bestowed upon the Latin colonies outside of Latium, included the commercium only;" id. Sohm says that from the earliest times the members of the town communities of Latium who were the original Latins had the same private marriage law as the Romans. It was, in fact, their original law, and it was because they were allies governed by the same law that they enjoyed the jus commercii and the jus connubii of the Romans. They did not, of course, possess the public rights of a Roman until the powerful interest attaching to those rights resulted in the granting of Roman citizenship first to the Latin allies then to all the Italian communities; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 22. There were two forms of the jus latii, latium minus which was the older and usual one, and the latium majus. In communities in the former, only officials acquired Roman civitas. In those which had the latter it was extended to the decuriones. See DECURIONES; id. § 22, n. 2. Another authority confines the two forms to magistrates and defines them thus: "The latium majus raising to the dignity of Roman citizens not only the magistrate himself, but also his wife and children; the latium minus raising to that dignity only the magistrate himself." Bro. L. Dict.

JUS LEGITIMUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A legal right which might have been enforced by due course of law. 2 Bla. Com. 328.

JUS LIBERORUM. In Roman Law. The privilege conferred upon a woman who had three or four children. In order that she should be able to take all the property given her by will, she must have had this privilege conferred upon her. Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 86. In the time of Hadrian, a decree was made conferring upon a mother, as such, who, being an ingenua, had the jus trium liberorum, or being a libertina, the jus quatuor liberorum, a civil law right to succeed her intestate children; id. § 98.

Another author defines this privilege as one by which exemption was given from all troublesome offices. Brown, L. Dict.

JUS MERUM (Lat.). A simple or bare right; a right to property in land, without possession, or the right of possession.

JUS MORIBUS CONSTITUTUM. See JUS EX NON SCRIPTO.

JUS NATURALE. The name given to those rules of conduct which are universally binding upon men and which are sanctioned by the dictates of right reason, as opposed to rules of conduct prescribed and enforced by the sovereign power of the state which are called positive law, known to the Romans as jus civile, and in modern jurisprudence as municipal law.

The jus naturale, or law of nature, is simply the jus gentium, or law of nations, seen in the light of a peculiar theory. Maine, Anc. Law 52. Sir F. Pollock refers to this as "an unhappy term," which seems to be a mere external ornament borrowed from Greek philosophers in excess of zeal to make a show of philosophical culture, and inconsistent with the proper Roman use of jus. Oxford Lectures 7.

A much quoted definition of Ulpian was that which nature attaches to animals. Of this it has been said that it was peculiar, and the conception exercised little or no influence upon the judicial thought of Rome. Morey, Rom. L. 111, where also are collected many definitions of the Roman jurists.

Sandars considers the passage from Ulpian unfortunately borrowed by Justinian and thereby removed from the connection in which it was used, which was a subsidiary and divergent line of thought, and had nothing to do with the main theory. Accordingly "in considering what the Roman jurists meant by jus naturale this fragment of Ulpian may be dismissed almost entirely from our notice." Sand. Inst. Just. 7.

The conception of the jus naturale came from the Stoics and has been termed "by far the most important addition to the system of Roman law, which the jurists introduced from Greek philosophy." Sand. Inst. Just. Introd. xxii. And Maine says of it that "the importance of this theory to mankind has been very much greater than its philosophical deficiencies would lead us to expect." Anc. L. 71.

While it is undoubtedly true that the highest conception of law is that natural law and positive law should be entirely harmonious, it is in the domain of international law that this conception more nearly approaches realization. The jus gentium was a system largely based upon the jus naturale, and it is due to that fact that the Roman system so largely formed the basis upon which Grotius commenced to build, the system which has developed into modern international law. It has been said that while he "rejected Ulpian's definition of the jus naturale, he accepted the idea of natural law expressed in the later jus gentium of the Romans as a body of principles based upon the common reason of mankind. It was therefore possible for him to extend the equitable principles already developed in the Roman jus gentium to the relations existing between sovereign states. States were looked upon as moral persons—subjects of the natural law, and as equal to each other in their moral rights and obligations." Morey, Rom. L. 208. See JUS GENTIUM; LAW OF NATURE; LAW.

JUS NON SACRUM. In Roman Law. That portion of the jus publicum which regulated the duties of magistrates.

Non-sacred law; that which dealt with the duties of civil magistrates, the preservation of public order, and the rights and duties of persons in their relation to the state. Morey, Rom. L. 223. It was analogous to that which would now be called the police power.

JUS NON SCRIPTUM. See JUS EX NON SCRIPTO.

JUS ONERIS FERENDI. An urban servitude in the Roman Law, the owner of which had the right of supporting and building upon the house wall of another.

JUS PAPIRIANUM. A collection of leges regiæ said to have been collected from the early periods of Roman history in the time of Romulus, Numa, and other kings.

They were a private compilation described as "fragments of a collection," which, "though clearly showing the religious spirit of the early law, are yet meagre and unsatisfactory." Morey, Rom. L. 25. Though a private collection, it is suggested that they received the name of royal laws merely because the regulations which they contained were placed under the immediate protection of the kings. They were concerned in the main with sacred matters, i. e. they were essentially of a religious and moral character, and bear clear testimony to the closeness of the original connection between law and religion; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 11, n. 2. Ascribed to Sextus (or Caius) Papirius, who was supposed to have lived in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus; Hunter, Rom. L. 1.

JUS PASCENDI. In Roman Law. The rural servitude giving the right of pasturage on another's land.

JUS PATRONATUS (Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. A commission from the bishop, directed usually to his chancellor and others of competent learning, who are required to summon a jury, composed of six clergymen and six laymen, to inquire into and examine who is the rightful patron. 3 Bla. Com. 246.

JUS PERSONARUM (Lat.). The right of persons. See JURA PERSONARUM.

JUS PISCANDI. See JUS VENANDI ET PISCANDI.

JUS POSSESSIONIS. The simple right of possession which may exist independently of ownership.

"Possession and ownership may, and generally do, coincide. But as a person may be the owner of a thing and not possess it, so a person may be the possessor of a thing and not be the owner. It is when the possessor is not the legal owner that it becomes important to consider to what rights he is entitled by virtue of his possession." Morey, Rom. L. 285. See JUS POSSIDENDI; POSSESSION.

JUS POSSIDENDI. The right of possessing, which is the legal consequence of ownership. It is to be distinguished from the jus possessionis (q. v.), which is a right to possess which may exist without ownership.

JUS POSTLIMINII (Lat.). The right of the owner to claim property after its recapture from an enemy. See POSTLIMINY.

JUS PRÆTORIUM. A body of laws developed from the exercise of discretion by the prætors, as distinguished from the leges or positive law. See PRÆTOR.

JUS PRECARIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A right to a thing held for another, for which there was no remedy. 2 Bla. Com. 328.

JUS PRESENTATIONIS. The right of presentation.

JUS PRIVATUM. The municipal law of the Romans as distinguished from the jus publicum, which was the law of political conditions and of crimes (with that of criminal procedure). Campbell's Analysis of Austin, 143.

"The relations of power subsisting between persons and the world of things, or the equivalents of things, are the subject-matter of private law. Private law, in other words, has to do with the dominion of persons over things. Its pith is, therefore, contained in the law of property. The subject-matter of public law are the relations of power which subsist between persons and persons. Here, the power is ideal, in the sense that its object is the free-will of another, i. e. something invisible and outwardly intangible. Public law, then, has to do with the dominion of persons over persons. The rights of control with which such private law is concerned are reducible to a money value; the rights of control with which public law is concerned are not thus reducible. In private law, again, the subject of a right appears in his individual capacity, as commanding the world of material things. In public law, on the other hand, the subject of a right appears in his capacity as a member of a community which it is his part to serve in order that he may share in the benefits it confers. Finally, as against their object, the rights of private law merely confer a power, the rights of public law, on the other hand, impose, at the same time, a duty on the person to whom the right pertains. The distinction is clearly exemplified in the case of the right of ownership in a thing, on one side, and the right of a sovereign over his people on the other." Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 7.

JUS PROJICIENDI (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude by which the owner of a building has a right of projecting a part of his building towards the adjoining house, without resting on the latter. It is extended merely over the ground. Dig. 50. 16. 242; 8. 2. 25; 8. 5. 8. 5.

JUS PROPRIETATIS. The right of property, as Blackstone phrases it: "the mere right of property without either possession or even the right of possession. This is frequently spoken of in our books under the name of mere right," jus merum (q. v.); 2 Bla. Com. 197. See RIGHT OF PROPERTY.

JUS PROTEGENDI (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude: it is a right by which a part of the roof or tiling of one house is made to extend over the adjoining house. Dig. 50. 16. 243. 1; 8. 2. 25; 8. 5. 8. 5.

JUS PROTIMESEOS. The right of pre-emption of a landlord in case the tenant wishes to dispose of his rights as a perpetual lessee. Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 57. Pactum protimeseos was the right of pre-emption to the seller; i. e. in case the buyer should sell, he must sell to the former seller. Hunter, Rom. L. 503.

JUS PROVINCIARUM. A franchise conferred upon provincials much more limited than that conferred upon the people of Italy.

It has been described as "equivalent to the jus italicum minus the freedom from land taxation which the latter right involved. In short, the provincials possessed no status as Roman citizens; and even their capacity of ownership in their own land was qualified by their tributary obligations to Rome. The civil incapacity of the provincials had reference, however, merely to their exclusion from the strictly legal rights sanctioned by the jus civile." Morey, Rom. L. 55.

JUS PUBLICUM. See JUS PRIVATUM.

JUS QUÆSITUM (Lat.). A right to ask or recover: for example, in an obligation there is a binding of the obligor, and a jus quæsitum in the obligee. 1 Bell, Com. 323.

JUS QUIRITIUM. Quiritarian ownership, so called under the ancient jus civile, because, strictly speaking, there was recognized but this one form of ownership. It could be acquired only through the technical forms of civil law, and never by a foreigner. The strictness which was observed in this respect was due to the fact that this was the form of private ownership, which, under Roman law, was as developed from the general right of dominion and ownership by the state. To prevent hardships and injustice in the strict application of the rules of law, it was permitted to the prætor to issue possessory interdicts to protect the possession of those who had not complied with all the technical conditions of ownership. In this way, legal sanction was given to the right of possession which amounted substantially to a right of property. This affords another illustration of the many points in which the Roman system presents a strict similarity to the English equity jurisprudence as long afterwards developed. Morey, Rom. L. 21, 74, 283; Sand. Inst. Just. Introd. xx.

JUS RECUPERANDI, INTRANDI, Etc. The right of recovering and entering upon land.

JUS RERUM (Lat.). The right of things. Its principal object is to ascertain how far a person can have a permanent dominion over things, and how that dominion is acquired.

JUS SACRUM. In Roman Law. That portion of the public law which was concerned with matters relating to public worship and including the regulation of sacrifices and the appointment of priests. There was a general division of the jus publicum into jus sacrum and jus non sacrum (q. v.).

JUS SANGUINIS. The right of blood.

According to Roman and Germanic principles, nationality is based primarily upon descent (jus sanguinis). This is said to prevail in Germany, Austria, Hungary, Sweden and Switzerland; so also in the Napoleonic Code. Hershey, Int. L. 237.

See JUS SOLI.

JUS SCRIPTA. Written law. After stating that the Roman law was written and unwritten just as it was among the Greeks, Justinian adds: "The written part consists of laws, plebiscita, senatus-consulta, enactments of emperors, edicts of magistrates, and answers of jurisprudents." Sand. Inst. Just. 1, 2, 3. See JUS EX NON SCRIPTA.

JUS SINGULARE. A law which is an exception to the ordinary law. A special rule applicable to an individual case or class of cases. Where it benefits particular classes of persons, it is called privilege, in an objective sense; privilege in a subjective sense is a particular right conferred upon a definite person by leges speciales. See JUS COMMUNE.

JUS SOLI. The law of the place of one's birth as contrasted with jus sanguinis, the law of the place of one's descent or parentage. It is of feudal origin. Hershey, Int. L. 237.

JUS SPATIANDI. A right of way over land by the public by uses merely for the purposes of recreation and instruction. It is usually limited to the cases of highways, parks, and squares. The public were denied any right in the grounds containing the ancient druidical monuments at Stonehenge; Attorney-General v. Antrobus, [1905] 2 Ch. 188. See 19 Harv. L. Rev. 55. See Ducange, Glossarium, for a definition under the word spatiare.

JUS STILLICIDII VEL FLUMINIS RECIPIENDI. In Roman Law. An urban servitude giving the owner a right to project his roof over the land of another or to open a house drain upon it.

JUS STRICTUM (Lat.). A Latin phrase, which signifies law interpreted without any modification, and in its utmost rigor. See JUS ÆQUUM.

JUS SUFFRAGII. In Roman Law. The right of voting. This and the jus honorum (q. v.) were the public rights of the Roman citizen.

JUS TERTII. The right of a third person. This is set up by way of defence in many actions where it is sought to establish relations of landlord and tenant, or bailor and bailee, by a plea of setting up the jus tertii.

JUS TIGNI IMMITTENDI. In Roman Law. An urban servitude which gave the right of inserting a beam into the wall of another.

JUS TRIPERTITUM. A threefold right. The term is used by Justinian who says that the requisites of the Roman testament seem to have had a triple origin (ut hoc jus tripertitum esse videatur). Sand. Inst. Just. 2, 10, 3. "It is out of regard to this threefold derivation from the prætorian edict, from the civil law, and from the imperial constitutions, that Justinian speaks of the law of wills in his own days as jus tripertitum." Maine, Anc. L. 207.

JUS UTENDI (Lat.). The right to use property without destroying its substance. It is employed in contradistinction to the jus abutendi. 3 Toullier, n. 86.

JUS VENANDI ET PISCANDI. The right of hunting and fishing.

JUS VITÆ NECISQUE. In Roman Law. The right of life and death. Originally a father, or his pater-familias if he was himself in domestic subjection, could decide—not arbitrarily, but judicially—whether or not to rear his child; and while this right became subject to certain restrictions, yet when the child had grown up, the father, in the exercise of his domestic jurisdiction, might visit his son's misconduct, both in private and public life, with such punishment as he thought fit, even banishment, slavery, or death. In the early Empire these rights became relaxed, and they disappeared in the Justinian law. Muirhead, Roman Law, 28, 346, 417. See PATRIA POTESTAS.

JUST. This word is frequently used in legal phraseology in combination with other words, such as reasonable, equitable, convenient.

Where, as a foundation for an attachment, an affidavit was required that the plaintiff's claim is just, it is not sufficient if it does not state positively, but only inferentially, that his claim is just, and it does not amount to the same thing to say that the plaintiff "ought justly to recover the amount," or that "said several sums are justly due;" Robinson v. Burton, 5 Kan. 293.

In the English Traffic Act, in the phrase "just and reasonable," it was said to mean, to the advantage of the customer; 51 L. J. Q. B. 601.

Where conditions of traffic companies are to be just and reasonable, the reasonableness is a question of law, not of fact; 18 C. B. 805, 829.

It is a "just and reasonable" provision in by-laws to disqualify by reason of bankruptcy or notorious insolvency; 10 H. L. Cas. 404.

An agreement to pay what an individual (who was a taxing officer of the court of chancery) should say was a just and reasonable compensation for the services rendered by the complainant's solicitor in a suit commenced in that court, and settled before decree, obliges the party so agreeing to pay the bill of costs regularly taxed by the individual named in the agreement; Culley v. Hardenbergh, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 508. The terms "just and reasonable," as employed by the legislature in the Practice Act, obviously have reference to the rules of practice then existing by the common law, and contemplate no other or different terms than would be just and reasonable, as judged of by that practice; Empire Fire Ins. Co. v. Trust Co., 1 Ill. App. 391.

The words "just and fair" within the meaning of the New York statute, authorizing the imprisonment of a fraudulent debtor, were thus construed: "Where the debtor has procured from the creditor, at whose suit he is imprisoned, property by fraud, even if he has spent the proceeds in any way that would be unobjectionable, if they were his own, and if by loss or accident he is deprived of them, his proceedings are not just and fair, and where the debtor has combined or united with others to fraudulently obtain the property of the creditor, at whose suit he is imprisoned, even if such others got the proceeds of the fraud, and he kept none, his proceedings are not 'just and fair' within the meaning of the statute," authorizing the examination of an imprisoned debtor, in proceedings for his discharge from imprisonment, if it appear that his proceedings have not been "just and fair" towards the creditor under whose judgment he is imprisoned; In re Roberts, 59 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 136; In re Finck, id. 145.

In the English Companies Act, 1862, it is "just and equitable" to wind up a company when the whole substratum of the business which was the object of the company had become strictly impossible; 1 Cox 213; 3 K. & J. 78; 20 Ch. Div. 169.

In the phrase a "just cause" for a court to do anything, the word just "does not add much weight, though it may add a little; it means some substantial reason must be shown;" Jessel, M. R., in 21 Ch. Div. 397.

To be "just and convenient" to appoint a receiver or grant an injunction or mandamus, respect must be given to what is just according to settled principles, as well as to what is convenient; 9 Ch. Div. 89.

"All my just debts" includes all debts; Wms. Ex. 1719; L. R. 4 H. L. 506. A direction to pay debts or just debts included a mortgage debt in exoneration of the property, but 30 and 31 Vict. c. 69, § 1, did away with that reasoning; 9 Ch. Div. 12, per Jessel, M. R. A direction to pay just debts did not include a note of the testator made before he was of age, and therefore voidable; Smith v. Mayo, 9 Mass. 62, 6 Am. Dec. 28. See also Smith v. Porter, 1 Binn. (Pa.) 209; Culley v. Hardenbergh, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 508; Martin v. Gage, 9 N. Y. 398.

JUST BEFORE. "At the time when," was the construction of these words in a plea to justify the killing of a dog; Ir. C. L. 156.

JUST COMPENSATION. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

JUSTICE. The constant and perpetual disposition to render to every man his due. Justinian, Inst. b. 1, tit. 1; Co. 2d Inst. 56. The conformity of our actions and our will to the law. Toullier, Droit Civ. Fr. tit. prél. n. 5.

Commutative justice is that virtue whose object it is to render to every one what belongs to him, as nearly as may be, or that which governs contracts. To render commutative justice, the judge must make an equality between the parties, that no one may be a gainer by another's loss.

Distributive justice is that virtue whose object it is to distribute rewards and punishments to each one according to his merits, observing a just proportion by comparing one person or fact with another, so that neither equal persons have unequal things nor unequal persons things equal. Tr. Eq. 3; and Toullier's learned note, Droit Civ. Fr. tit. prél. n. 7, note.

In the most extensive sense of the word it differs little from virtue; for it includes within itself the whole circle of virtues. Yet the common distinction between them is, that that which considered positively and in itself is called virtue, when considered relatively and with respect to others, has the name of justice. But justice, being in itself a part of virtue, is confined to things simply good or evil, and consists in a man's taking such a proportion of them as he ought.

Toullier exposes the want of utility and exactness in this division of distributive and commutative justice, adopted in the compendium or abridgments of the ancient doctors, and prefers the divisions of internal and external justice,—the first being a conformity of our will, and the latter a conformity of our actions, to the law, their union making perfect justice. Exterior justice is the object of jurisprudence; interior justice is the object of morality. Droit Civ. Fr. tit. prél. n. 6, 7.

According to the Frederician Code, part 1, book 1, tit. 2, s. 27, justice consists simply in letting every one enjoy the rights which he has acquired in virtue of the laws. And, as this definition includes all the other rules of right, there is properly but one single general rule of right, namely: Give every one his own.

Justice, in the language of Webster, "is the greatest interest of man on earth. It is the ligament which holds civilized nations together. Wherever her temple stands, and as long as it is duly honored, there is a foundation for social security, general happiness, and the improvement and the progress of our race. And whoever labors on this edifice with usefulness and distinction, whoever clears its foundations, strengthens its pillars, adorns its entablatures, or contributes to raise its august dome still higher in the skies, connects himself in name, and fame, and character, with that which is, and must be, as durable as the frame of human society."

In Norman French. Amenable to justice. Kelham, Dict.

In Feudal Law. Feudal jurisdiction, divided into high (alta justitia), and low (simplex inferior justitia), the former being a jurisdiction over matters of life and limb, the latter over smaller causes. Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 26; Du Cange. Sometimes high, low, and middle justice or jurisdiction were distinguished.

An assessment; Du Cange; also, a judicial fine. Du Cange.

At Common Law. A title given in England and America to judges of common-law courts, being a translation of justitia, which was anciently applied to common-law judges, while judex was applied to ecclesiastical judges and others; e. g. judex fiscalis. Leges Hen. I. §§ 24, 63; Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Index; Co. Litt. 71 b.

The judges of the federal and state supreme courts are properly styled "justices."

"Justice of the High Court" is the title of judges of the High Court of Justice in the King's Bench and Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Divisions.

The term justice is also applied to the lowest judicial officers: e. g. a trial justice; a justice of the peace.

JUSTICE, DEPARTMENT OF. The act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. L. 92), organized the judicial business of the United States, made provision for an attorney-general, and charged him with the duty of prosecuting all suits in the supreme court in which the United States was in anywise interested, and of furnishing advice and opinions upon all questions of law when called upon to do so by the president or the heads of the other executive departments of the government. The federal constitution provides that "the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States," and although it does not specify any subordinate ministerial or administrative officers, yet there is an inferential recognition of such officers in the provision that the president may require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the executive departments upon any subject relating to the duties of his department, and in the provision for the appointment of certain inferior officers "by the heads of departments." The organization of these departments is by the constitution left to the congress, and it was for the purpose of providing for a department which should administer the legal branch of the government that the above act was passed; 6 Op. Att. Gen. 327.

The Department of Justice was reorganized by act of June 22, 1870. The attorney-general is the head of the department; provision was made for "an officer learned in the law to assist the attorney-general in the performance of his duties, called the solicitor-general." He assists the attorney-general in the performance of his general duties, and by special provision of law, in the case of a vacancy in the office of attorney-general or in his absence, exercises all of the duties of that officer. Except when the attorney-general otherwise directs, the solicitor-general conducts and argues all cases in the supreme court and in the court of claims in which the United States is interested; and when he so directs, any such case in any court of the United States may be conducted and argued by the solicitor-general, and in the same way the solicitor-general may be sent by the attorney-general to attend to the interests of the United States in any state court or elsewhere. Provision is also made for three officers learned in the law called assistant attorneys-general, who assist the attorney-general and solicitor-general in the performance of their duties. A fourth was provided by act of July 11, 1890. By the act of March 3, 1891, an additional assistant attorney-general was created for the purpose of defending the United States in suits brought in the court of claims under that act, for Indian depredations. Of these assistant attorneys-general, one is charged with the defence of the United States in suits brought against the government in the court of claims under its special and general jurisdiction. The solicitor-general and assistant attorneys-general are appointed by the president of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the senate, while the assistant attorneys are appointed by the attorney-general.

The act creating the Department of Justice also provided for a solicitor of the treasury, an assistant solicitor of the treasury, solicitor of internal revenue, a naval solicitor (abolished June 19, 1878), and an examiner of claims for the Department of State, commonly called the solicitor of the Department of State. They are appointed by the president by and with the advice and consent of the senate, and exercise their functions under the supervision and control of the head of the Department of Justice, although they are assigned to duty in the respective departments for which they are appointed. There is also provided an assistant attorney-general for the Department of the Interior and for the Post Office Department, who likewise perform their duties under the general supervision and control of the attorney-general.

The opinions of the attorney-general are published officially and have authority the same in kind, if not in degree, with the decisions of courts of justice; 6 Op. Att. Gen. 333; but see PRECEDENT.

See EXECUTIVE POWER; CABINET.

JUSTICE, FLEEING FROM. In order to come within the exception of "fleeing from justice" in R. S. 1045, it is sufficient that there is a flight with the intention of avoiding prosecution whether a prosecution has or has not been begun. It is not necessary that there should be an intent to avoid the justice of the United States; it is enough that there is an intent to avoid the justice of the state which has jurisdiction over the same act; Streep v. U. S., 160 U. S. 128, 16 Sup. Ct. 244, 40 L. Ed. 365. See FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE; EXTRADITION; RENDITION.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE. A public officer invested with judicial powers for the purpose of preventing breaches of the peace and bringing to punishment those who have violated the laws.

A new class of officials was appointed in England in 1327 specially entrusted with the conservation of the peace. Later they were allowed to receive indictments and to send those indicted for trial to the justices of gaol delivery. In 1344 they were to hear and determine felonies and trespasses. In 1360 they were assigned to every county in England, one lord and three or four of the most worthy in the county, with some learned in the law, to keep the peace, to arrest and imprison offenders, to imprison and take surety of suspected persons and to hear and determine felonies and trespasses; and were, about this time, styled by their present name. The number varied. By one act they must be the most sufficient knights, esquires and gentlemen of the land; by another, residents in their counties. They were appointed by the crown. They were the permanent rulers of the county. More recently their administrative powers had been given to elective boards. They were subject to the control of the courts of common law by means of the prerogative writs; by certiorari, their decisions can be questioned, and by mandamus they can be ordered to hear a case falling within their jurisdiction. 1 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 124.

To the 18th century they were called justices of peace. Pollock, King's Peace; Pollock Expan. of C. L. 101. They were the king's officers appointed to aid the performance of his office in their respective counties. Id.

In People ex rel. Burby v. Howland, it was held by the New York appellate division of the supreme court that the legislature could not abolish the office of justice of the peace; 17 App. Div. 165, 45 N. Y. Supp. 347, 55 Alb. L. J. 319. The court said: "The office of justice of the peace is one of the oldest known to the English law. Originally it was merely a peace office, with no civil jurisdiction, but from a time long antedating the constitution (of New York) it was an office with both civil and criminal jurisdiction. Its most important functions are those of conservators of the peace, and administrators of the criminal law. The statutes conferring the powers and duties of the office date so far back in the history of English law that they may be said to be common-law powers, adopted by us with the office and inseparable therefrom."

The office has existed in New York for two centuries, and is a constitutional office of great importance; People v. Howland, 155 N. Y. 270, 49 N. E. 775, 41 L. R. A. 838.

At common law justices of the peace have a double power in relation to the arrest of wrong-doers: when a felony or breach of the peace has been committed in their presence, they may personally arrest the offender, or command others to do so, and, in order to prevent the riotous consequences of a tumultuous assembly, they may command others to arrest affrayers when the affray has been committed in their presence. If a magistrate be not present when a crime is committed, before he can take a step to arrest the offender, an oath or affirmation must be made, by some person cognizant of the fact, that the offence has been committed, and that the person charged is the offender, or there is probable cause to believe that he has committed the offence.

Probably the most important function of justices of the peace, in the administration of criminal law, is their power of committing magistrates. This they have always, and in most states they have also jurisdiction, either sole or concurrent, with some criminal court of petty offences.

The constitution of the United States directs that "no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation." Amendm. IV. After his arrest, the person charged is brought before the justice of the peace, and after hearing he is discharged, held to bail to answer to the complaint, or, for want of bail, committed to prison.

In some states it is held that where there are criminal courts of record in the county, justices of the peace have no trial jurisdiction in criminal causes, but can act only as committing magistrates; Jackson v. State, 33 Fla. 620, 15 South. 250; Baldwin & Co. v. Bond, 45 La. Ann. 1012, 13 South. 742.

In some of the United States, justices of the peace have jurisdiction in civil cases, given to them by local regulations. The jurisdiction is usually confined to actions of contract, express or implied, replevin, and the like, where a small amount is involved. The limit ranges from $100 to $300, and usually torts and actions for unliquidated damages are not included. The local statutes must be consulted, but the statutes regulating the jurisdiction are sufficiently similar to make the citation of a few cases fairly illustrative of the principles generally applied.

Their civil jurisdiction did not exist by the common law, but depends upon the constitutional warrant or statutory enactment; Horton v. Elliott, 90 Ala. 480, 8 South. 103.

Where a justice has no jurisdiction the filing of an answer by defendant after the overruling of a motion to dismiss will not give him jurisdiction; Rogers v. Loop, 51 Ia. 41, 50 N. W. 224. Where the appointment was void the consent of parties cannot give jurisdiction to the justice; Crawford v. Saunders, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 225, 29 S. W. 102.

Where an action would lie in either contract or tort and suit is begun before a justice, in order to sustain the jurisdiction the action will be presumed to have been brought upon the contract; Schulhofer v. R. Co., 118 N. C. 1096, 24 S. E. 709.

Jurisdiction is sufficiently shown if it appears from the entire record of the proceeding; Sappington v. Lenz, 53 Mo. App. 44.

It is no objection to the jurisdiction that plaintiff remitted a part of his claim to bring it within the jurisdiction; Hunton v. Luce, 60 Ark. 146, 29 S. W. 151, 28 L. R. A. 221, 46 Am. St. Rep. 165; McPhail v. Johnson, 115 N. C. 298, 20 S. E. 373; even where unliquidated damages are claimed. Where lumber was delivered by instalments and the total amount exceeded the jurisdiction, the claim could not be split up into separate actions for the different deliveries in order to bring it within the jurisdictional amount; McPhail v. Johnson, 109 N. C. 571, 13 S. E. 799.

Where a stipulated attorney's fee would increase the amount beyond the jurisdiction, the fee may be considered in estimating the amount in controversy; Waters v. Walker (Tex.) 17 S. W. 1085; even if the stipulation for the fee is void; Warder, Bushnell & Glessner Co. v. Raymond, 7 S. D. 451, 64 N. W. 525.

Justices of the peace have been held to have no jurisdiction in trespass for the negligent killing of an animal; Ripple v. Keast, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 548; or negligently allowing a dangerous animal to go at large; Sisco v. Miller, 2 Lack. Leg. N. (Pa.) 143; or for injuries to a horse by a defective culvert; Freedom Tp. v. Snowden, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 73; or in a suit on a foreign judgment; Baldwin v. Coyle, 7 Houst. (Del.) 327, 32 Atl. 15; in an action on the case for nuisance; Heisey v. Witmer, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 290; or for consequential damages due to negligence; Thilow v. Traction Co., 4 Pa. Dist. R. 83. But the jurisdiction was sustained in an action for the destruction of fruit in baskets, run over and crushed by the wheels of defendant's wagon, consequential damages not being involved; Conner v. Reardon, 8 Houst. (Del.) 19, 31 Atl. 878; so also there was jurisdiction of an action for killing a horse by a railroad company because of a breach of contract to maintain cattle guards; Harrow v. R. Co., 38 W. Va. 711, 18 S. E. 926.

The jurisdiction in a garnishment proceeding does not depend upon the amount the garnishee may owe; Surine v. Bank, 59 Ill. App. 329; in an attachment the jurisdiction is determined by the amount in controversy, not the value of the property attached; Fly v. Grieb's Adm'r, 62 Ark. 209, 35 S. W. 214; Gramling v. Dickey, 118 N. C. 986, 24 S. E. 671.

A justice of the peace has no power to vacate a judgment unless it be one of default or non-suit; Langford v. City of Doniphan, 61 Mo. App. 288; nor to settle a bill of exceptions; Vlasek v. Wilson, 44 Neb. 10, 62 N. W. 245; for the purpose of preserving testimony on a hearing of a motion to discharge the attachment; Donaldson v. Fisher, 43 Neb. 260, 61 N. W. 609; nor to grant a nonsuit where a case is on trial before a jury; Gunn v. Wood, 99 Ga. 70, 24 S. E. 407.

The court of a justice of the peace has been held a court of record; Pressler v. Turner, 57 Ind. 56; Fox v. Hoyt, 12 Conn. 491, 31 Am. Dec. 760; for the reason that it is bound to keep a record of its proceedings and has power to fine and imprison; Hooker v. State, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 272. But it has also been held contra; Snyder v. Wise, 10 Pa. 157; Searcy v. Hogan, Hempst. 20, Fed. Cas. No. 12,584a.

Justices of the peace are within the principle that judicial officers are not liable for damages for judicial acts, and only on ministerial acts in cases of intentional violation of law or gross negligence; Gannon v. Donn, 7 D. C. 264; Curnow v. Kessler, 110 Mich. 10, 67 N. W. 982. It was held that he is not liable for rendering a judgment and issuing an order of sale in an action on which he had no jurisdiction, unless he knowingly acted outside of it; Anderson v. Roberts (Tex.) 35 S. W. 416; or unless he did not act in good faith; Thompson v. Jackson, 93 Ia. 376, 61 N. W. 1004, 27 L. R. A. 92.

The refusal of a justice to approve an appeal is a ministerial act, for which an action will lie against him if he acted corruptly or maliciously; Legates v. Lingo, 8 Houst. (Del.) 154, 32 Atl. 80.

If the action of a justice of the peace is strictly judicial and he has jurisdiction, he is not liable to a civil action, however, it may be as to criminal prosecution, though corruption is alleged; Tyler v. Alford, 38 Me. 530; Garfield v. Douglass, 22 Ill. 100, 74 Am. Dec. 137; Furr v. Moss, 52 N. C. 525; Kress v. State, 65 Ind. 106.

All the acts of a justice of the peace from the commencement to the close of a suit seem to be considered judicial, rather than ministerial, so far as concerns questions of his responsibility; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 463, n. 3; Wertheimer v. Howard, 30 Mo. 420, 77 Am. Dec. 623; see State v. Dunnington, 12 Md. 340; but he is liable for exercising authority where he has none; Ely v. Thompson, 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 70; where he acts upon inadequate allegation, but has jurisdiction over the subject-matter, he is not liable; Stewart v. Hawley, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 552.

As to the powers of justices of the peace, see 3 Ohio, L. J. 671; their jurisdiction; 16 Am. St. Rep. 919, n.; summary jurisdiction; 3 L. Mag. & Rev. (N. S.) 1007; liability; 15 Am. L. JUSTICE SEAT. See COURT OF JUSTICE SEAT.

JUSTICES OF THE BENCH. Five justices—two clerks and three laymen—all of the king's household, selected by Henry II and ordered to hear all appeals of the kingdom and do justice and not to depart from the king's court. They took precedence of all other judges. J. R. Green, in 1 Sel. Essays in Anglo-Amer. L. H. 137.

JUSTICES' COURTS. Inferior tribunals, with limited jurisdiction, both civil and criminal. There are courts so called in the states of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and probably other states.

JUSTICES IN EYRE. Certain judges established, if not first appointed, A. D. 1176, 22 Hen. II.

England was divided into certain circuits, and three justices in eyre—or justices itinerant, as they were sometimes called—were appointed to each district, and made the circuit of the kingdom once in seven years, for the purpose of trying causes. They were afterwards, when the judicial functions assumed greater importance, directed, by Magna Charta, c. 12, to be sent into every county once a year. The itinerant justices were sometimes more justices of assize or dower, or of general jail delivery, and the like.

Speaking of the 12th century it is said that "the visitation of the counties by itinerant justices has been becoming systematic." The holding of the assize on circuit was evidently committed to judges of great prominence. "From the early years of the reign (Henry II.) we hear of pleas held on circuit by Richard Lucy the chief justiciar, by Henry of Essex the constable, and by Thomas Becket the chancellor. . . . In 1176, to execute the assize of Northampton, eighteen justices were employed, and the country was divided into six circuits; in 1179, twenty-one justices were employed, and the country was divided into four circuits; indeed from 1176 onwards hardly a year went by without there being a visitation of some part of England. These itinerant justices seem to have been chiefly employed in hearing the pleas of the crown (for which purpose they were equipped with the power of obtaining accusations from the local juries), and in entertaining some or all of the new possessory actions. The court that they held was, as already said, curia regis, but it was not capitalis curia regis, and probably their powers were limited by the words of a temporary commission. They were not necessarily members of the central court, and they might be summoned before it to bear record of their doings; still it was usual that each party of justices should include some few members of the permanent tribunal." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 134.

These justices in eyre in the reign of Henry III. are thus described: "But we may distinguish the main types of these commissions. What seems treated as the humblest is the commission to deliver a jail. This . . . is done very frequently; generally it is done by some three or four knights of the shire, and thus long before the institution of justices of the peace, the country knights had been accustomed to do high criminal justice. In order to dispose of the possessory assizes of novel disseisin and mort d'ancestor, a vast number of commissions were issued in every year. Early in Henry's reign this work was often entrusted to four knights of the shire; at a later time one of the permanent justices would usually be named and allowed to associate some knights with himself. Apparently a justice of assize had often to visit many towns or even villages in each county; he did not do all his work at the county town. It must have been heavy work, for these actions were extremely popular. In the second year of Edward's reign some two thousand commissions of assize were issued. Just at that time the practice seems to have been to divide England into four circuits and to send two justices of assize round each circuit; but a full history of the circuits would be intricate and wearisome. Above all the other commissions rank the commission for an iter ad omnia placita, or more briefly for an iter, or eyre. An eyre had come to be a long and laborious business. In the first place, if we suppose an eyre in Cambridgeshire announced, this has the effect of stopping all Cambridgeshire business in the bench. Litigants who have been told to appear before the justices at Westminster will now have to appear before the justices in eyre at Cambridgeshire. There is no business before the bench at Westminster if an eyre has been proclaimed in all the counties. Then again the justices are provided with a long list of interrogatories (capitula itineris) which they are to address to local juries. Every hundred, every vill in the county must be represented before them. These interrogatories—their number increases as time goes on—ransack the memories of the jurors, and the local records for all that has happened in the shire since the last eyre took place some seven years ago; every crime, every invasion of royal rights, every neglect of police duties must be presented. The justices must sit in the county town from week to week and even from month to month before they will have got through the tedious task and inflicted the due tale of fines and amercements. Three or four of the permanent judges will be placed in the commission; with them will be associated some of the magnates of the district; bishops and even abbots, to the scandal of strict churchmen, have to serve as justices in eyre. Probably it was thought expedient that some of the great freeholders of the country should be commissioned, in order that no man might say that his judges were not his peers.

An eyre was a sore burden; the men of Cornwall fled before the face of the justices; we hear assertions of a binding custom that an eyre shall not take place more than once in seven years. Expedients are being adopted which in course of time will enable the justices of assize to preside in the country over the trial of actions which are pending before the benches; thus without the terrors of an eyre, the trial of civil actions can take place in the counties and jurors need no longer be ever journeying to Westminster from their remote homes. But these expedients belong for the most part to Edward's reign; under his father a jury wearily travelling from Yorkshire or Devonshire towards London must have been no very uncommon sight." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 179, 180, 181.

The general eyre practically ceased by the reign of Edward III.

See 3 Bla. Com. 58; Crabb, Eng. Law 103; Co. Litt. 293.

JUSTICES OF THE JEWS. See JEWS.

JUSTICES OF THE PAVILION (justiciarii pavilionis). Certain judges of a pye-pouder court, of a most transcendent jurisdiction, authorized by the bishop of Winchester, at a fair held at St. Giles Hills near that city, by virtue of letters-patent granted by Edw. IV. Prynne's Animadv. on Coke's 4th Inst. fol. 191.

JUSTICES OF THE QUORUM. See QUORUM.

JUSTICES OF TRAILBASTON. Justices appointed by Edward I. during his absence in the Scotch and French wars, about the year 1305. They were so styled, it is said, from trailing or drawing the baston (q. v.), or staff of justice. They were a sort of justices in eyre, with large and summary powers. Their office was to make inquisition, throughout the kingdom, of all officers, and others, touching extortion, bribery, and such like grievances of intruders into other men's lands, barrators, robbers, breakers of the peace, and divers other offenders; Cowell; Toml.; Old. N. B. fol. 52; 12 Co. 25.

They are supposed to date from 1276. In Coke's time they had long ceased to exist. They were the connecting link between justices in eyre and justices of oyer and terminer. They enquired as to persons who disturb the peace, who maintain malefactors and who illtreat jurors. 1 Holdsw. H. E. L. 118.

JUSTICIABLE. Such a question or matter as may properly come before a tribunal for decision. A dispute as to the title to real estate is a justiciable question; Minnesota v. Hitchcock, 185 U. S. 373, 22 Sup. Ct. 650, 46 L. Ed. 954; see also Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 46, 27 Sup. Ct. 655, 51 L. Ed. 956.

JUSTICIAR, JUSTICIER. In Old English Law. A judge or justice. Baker, fol. 118; Mon. Angl. One of several persons learned in the law, who sat in the aula regis, and formed a kind of court of appeal in cases of difficulty.

The chief justiciar (capitalis justiciarius totius Angliæ) was a special magistrate, who presided over the whole curia regis, who was the principal minister of state, the second man in the kingdom, and by virtue of his office, guardian of the realm in the king's absence. 3 Bla. Com. 37; Spelman, Gloss. 330; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 6. The last who bore this title was Philip Basset, in the time of Hen. III. After 1234, the office fell into abeyance; Harcourt, Lord Steward 116. The powers of the office went to the chief justice of the King's Bench and the steward of the household. Id. 128.

JUSTICIARII ITINERANTES (Lat.). Justices in eyre (q. v.).

JUSTICIARII RESIDENTES (Lat.). Justices or judges who usually resided in Westminster: they were so called to distinguish them from justices in eyre. Co. Litt. 293.

JUSTICIARY. Another name for a judge. In Latin, he was called justiciarius, and in French, justicier. Not used. Bacon, Abr. Courts (A).

JUSTICIES (from verb justiciare, do you do justice to). In English Law. A special writ, in the nature of a commission, empowering a sheriff to hold plea in his county court of a cause which he could not take jurisdiction of without this writ: e. g. trespass vi et armis for any sum, and all personal actions above forty shillings. 1 Burn, Just. 449. So called from the Latin word justicies, used in the writ, which runs, "præcipimus tibi quod justicies A B," etc.; we command you to do A B right, etc. Bracton, lib. 4, tr. 6, c. 13; Kitch. 74; Fitzh. N. B. 117; 3 Bla. Com. 3, 6.

JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE. That which is committed with the intention to kill, or to do a grievous bodily injury, under circumstances which the law holds sufficient to exculpate the person who commits it. A judge who, in pursuance of his duty, pronounces sentence of death, is not guilty of homicide; for it is evident that, as the law prescribes the punishment of death for certain offences, it must protect those who are intrusted with its execution. A judge, therefore, who pronounces sentence of death, in a legal manner, on a legal indictment, legally brought before him, for a capital offence committed within his jurisdiction, after a lawful trial and conviction of the defendant, is guilty of no offence; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 496.

Magistrates, or other officers intrusted with the preservation of the public peace, are justified in committing homicide, or giving orders which lead to it, if the excesses of a riotous assembly cannot be otherwise repressed; 4 Bla. Com. 178, 179. So a homicide is justifiable, when committed by an officer in defending a judge of the United States, engaged in the discharge of his judicial duties; In re Neagle, 135 U. S. 1, 10 Sup. Ct. 658, 34 L. Ed. 55.

An officer intrusted with a legal warrant, criminal or civil, and lawfully commanded by a competent tribunal to execute it, will be justified in committing homicide, if in the course of advancing to discharge his duty he be brought into such perils that without doing so he cannot either save his life or discharge the duty which he is commanded by the warrant to perform. And when the warrant commands him to put a criminal to death, he is justified in obeying it; Cl. Cr. L. 134. See, State v. Rollins, 113 N. C. 722, 18 S. E. 394. In endeavoring to make an arrest an officer has the right to use all the force that is necessary to overcome all resistance, even to the taking of life; State v. Dierberger, 96 Mo. 666, 10 S. W. 168, 9 Am. St. Rep. 380.

A soldier on duty is justified in committing homicide, in obedience to the command of his officer, unless the command was something plainly unlawful.

A man may be justified in killing another to prevent the debauching of his wife; Futch v. State, 90 Ga. 472, 16 S. E. 102.

A private individual will, in many cases, be justified in committing homicide while acting in self-defence; Fields v. State, 134 Ind. 46, 32 N. E. 780; Lovett v. State, 30 Fla. 142, 11 South. 550, 17 L. R. A. 705; Keith v. State, 97 Ala. 32, 11 South. 914; Garello v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 56, 20 S. W. 179. If a trespass on the person or property of another amounts to a felony, the killing of the trespasser will be justifiable, if necessary in order to prevent it; Crawford v. State, 90 Ga. 701, 17 S. E. 628, 35 Am. St. Rep. 242. It is not true as a general proposition that one who is assaulted by another with a dangerous weapon is justified in taking the life of the party so assaulting him; State v. West, 45 La. Ann. 14, 12 South. 7. The same circumstances that will justify or excuse the homicide where the assault is upon one's self, will also excuse or justify the slayer if the killing is done in defence of his family or servant; Hathaway v. State, 32 Fla. 56, 13 South. 592. See DEFENCE.

An instruction to a jury requiring a justification of homicide to be established beyond a reasonable doubt is erroneous; People v. Hill, 65 Hun 420, 20 N. Y. Supp. 187.

To establish a case of justifiable homicide it must appear that the assault upon the prisoner was such as would lead a reasonable person to believe that his life was in peril; Allen v. U. S., 164 U. S. 492, 17 Sup. Ct. 154, 41 L. Ed. 528.

See ARREST; HOMICIDE; JUSTIFICATION.

JUSTIFICATION. In Pleading. The allegation of matter of fact by the defendant, establishing his legal right to do the act complained of by the plaintiff.

Justification admits the doing of the act charged as a wrong, but alleges a right to do it on the part of the defendant, thus denying that it is a wrong. Excuse merely shows reasons why the defendant should not make good the injury which the plaintiff has suffered from some wrong done. See AVOWRY.

Justification is said to be the law's permission to injure others because of some countervailing benefit to society outweighing the harm done; 26 Harv. L. Rev. 741. The benefit may assume many forms, as prevention of crime, freedom of speech, free competition, or the free beneficial use of property by the owner, etc.; id.

It is said that all justifications will fall into one of two classes: 1. Where the objects sought for are so important that motive must be ignored; 2. Where the objects are not so important but that the presence of ill will may turn the scale; Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. D. 588; McLaughlin v. Cowley, 127 Mass. 316.

Trespasses. A warrant, regular on its face, and issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, is a complete justification to the officer to whom it is directed for obeying its command, whether it be really valid or not. But where the warrant is absolutely void, or apparently irregular in an important respect, or where the act done is one which is beyond the power conferred by the warrant, it is no justification. See ARREST; TRESPASS. So, too, many acts, and even homicide committed in self-defence, or defence of wife, children, or servants, are justifiable; Archb. Cr. P. by Pom. 681, n.; see SELF-DEFENCE; DEFENCE; JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE; or in preserving the public peace; see ARREST; TRESPASS; or under a license, express or implied; Case v. De Goes, 3 Cai. (N. Y.) 261; Robson v. Jones, 2 Bail. (S. C.) 4; U. S. v. Gear, 3 McLean 571, Fed. Cas. No. 15,195; including entry on land to demand a debt, to remove chattels; Chambers v. Bedell, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 225, 37 Am. Dec. 508; Richardson v. Anthony, 12 Vt. 273; to ask lodgings at an inn, the entry in such cases being peaceful; to exercise an incorporeal right; Hayward v. Pilgrim Society, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 272; or for public service in case of exigency, as pulling down houses to stop a fire; Year B. 13 Hen. VIII. 16 b; destroying the suburbs of a city in time of war; Year B. 8 Edw. IV. 35 b; entry on land to make fortifications or in preservation of the owner's rights of property; Sterling v. Peet, 14 Conn. 255; 4 D. & B. 110; Fiske v. Small, 25 Me. 453; King v. Kline, 6 Pa. 318; Almy v. Grinnell, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 53, 45 Am. Dec. 238.

Libel and slander may be justified in a civil action, in some cases, by proving the truth of the matter alleged, and generally by showing that the defendant had a right upon the particular occasion either to write and publish the writing or to utter the words: as, when slanderous words are found in a report of a committee of congress, or in an indictment, or words of a slanderous nature are uttered in the course of debate in the legislature by a member, or at the bar by counsel when properly instructed by his client on the subject. Comyns, Dig. Pleader. See SLANDER.

Matter in justification must be specially pleaded, and cannot be given in evidence under the general issue. See LICENSE. A plea of justification to an action for slander, oral or written, should state the charge with the same degree of certainty and precision as is required in an indictment. The object of the plea is to give the plaintiff, who is in truth an accused person, the means of knowing what are the matters alleged against him. It must be direct and explicit. It must in every respect correspond with, and be as extensive as the charge in, the declaration.

The justification, however, will be complete if it covers the essence of the libel. But it must extend to every part which could by itself form a substantive ground of action. Where the slander consists in an imputation of crime, the plea of justification must contain the same degree of precision as is requisite in an indictment for the crime, and must be supported by the same proof that is required on the trial of such an indictment. It is a perfectly well-established rule that where the charge is general in its nature, yet the plea of justification must state specific instances of the misconduct imputed to the plaintiff. And, even for the purpose of avoiding prolixity, a plea of justification cannot make a general charge of criminality or misconduct, but must set out the specific facts in which the imputed offence consists, and with such certainty as to afford the plaintiff an opportunity of joining issue precisely upon their existence. Heard, Lib. & Sl. § 240. See LIBEL.

When established by evidence, it furnishes a complete bar to the action.

In Practice. The proceeding by which bail establish their ability to perform the undertaking of the bond or recognizance.

It must take place before an authorized magistrate; Jones v. Badger, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 461; Fenn v. Smith, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 124; 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 422; and notice must, in general, be given by the party proposing the bail, to the opposite party, of the names of the bail and the intention to justify; Jaques v. Hemphill, 3 Harr. (Del.) 503. See Cade v. Young, 8 N. J. L. 369.

It is a common provision that bail must justify in double the amount of the recognizance if exceptions are taken; Louis v. Mitchell, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 379; otherwise, a justification in the amount of the recognizance is, in general, sufficient.

It must be made within a specified time, or the persons named cease to be bail; People v. Judges, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 54. See Stockton v. Throgmorton, Baldw. 148, Fed. Cas. No. 13,463.

JUSTIFICATORS. A kind of compurgators, or those who, by oath, justified the innocence or oaths of others, as in the case of wages of law.

JUSTIFYING BAIL. In Practice. The production of bail in court, who there justify themselves against the exception of the plaintiff. See BAIL; JUSTIFICATION.

JUSTITIUM. In Civil Law. A suspension or intermission of the administration of justice in courts; vacation time. Calv. Lex.

JUSTS, or JOUSTS. Exercises between martial men and persons of honor, with spears, on horseback; different from tournaments, which were military exercises between many men in troops. 24 Hen. VIII. c. 13.

JUVENILE COURTS. Courts having special jurisdiction, of a paternal nature, over delinquent and neglected children.

The thought that the child who has begun to go wrong, who has broken a law or ordinance, is to be taken in hand by the state, not as an enemy, but as a protector, led to the principle which was first fully declared in the act under which the juvenile court in Chicago was opened July 1, 1899. Colorado soon followed, and since that time similar legislation has been adopted in over 30 states, as well as in Great Britain and Ireland, Canada and the Australian colonies. Juvenile court legislation has assumed two aspects: In New York and a few other jurisdictions, protection is accomplished by suspending sentence, or in the case of removal from the home, sending the child to a school instead of a jail. But in Illinois and in most jurisdictions, the designated age of criminal responsibility is advanced from the common law age of 7 to some higher age, as 17 or 18, and under most juvenile court acts a child under the designated age is to be proceeded against criminally only when, in the judgment of the judge presiding, the interest of the state and of the child requires this to be done; In re Powell, 6 Okl. Cr. 495, 120 Pac. 1022; State v. Reed, 123 La. 411, 49 South. 3.

Objection has been made that this is nevertheless a criminal proceeding and therefore the child is entitled to a trial by jury and to all the constitutional rights that hedge about a criminal. The act, according to Com. v. Fisher, 213 Pa. 48, 62 Atl. 198, 5 Ann. Cas. 92, is but an exercise by the state of its supreme power over the welfare of its children. But if the proceedings against the individual are criminal, his constitutional rights must be carefully safeguarded. Such penal acts are strictly construed; State v. Dunn, 53 Or. 304, 99 Pac. 278, 100 Pac. 258. For over two centuries the courts of chancery in England have exercised jurisdiction for the protection of the unfortunate child. The proposition that this court could not act unless the child had property is wholly unsupported by either principle or authority; [1892] 2 Chan. 496; [1909] 2 Ch. 260.

A juvenile court has jurisdiction of an offence by a child punishable by hard labor; State v. Reed, 123 La. 41, 49 South. 3. The jurisdiction to hear such cases is generally vested in an existing court having equity powers. In some cities, however, special courts have been provided. By Colorado Act of 1909, provision is made for hearings before masters in chancery to be appointed by a juvenile court judge and acting under his direction. The legislature cannot confer on circuit court commissioners powers with reference to juvenile offenders which require proceedings within the power of courts of record only; Hunt v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 142 Mich. 93, 105 N. W. 531, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 564, 7 Ann. Cas. 821.

See an article in 23 Harv. L. Rev. 104, by Julian Mack.

The legislature cannot confer on circuit court commissioners powers with reference to juvenile offenders which require proceedings within the power of courts of record only; Hunt v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 142 Mich. 93, 105 N. W. 531, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 564, 7 Ann. Cas. 821. A Pennsylvania statute designated the court of quarter sessions as a juvenile court; it was contended that the tribunal was an unconstitutional body and without jurisdiction, but it was held that "the court of quarter sessions is not simply a criminal court. The constitution recognizes it, but says nothing as to its jurisdiction. Its existence antedates our colonial times, and by the common law and statutes, both here and in England, it has for generations been a court of broad general police powers in no way connected with its criminal jurisdiction. . . . With its jurisdiction unrestricted by the constitution, it is for the legislature to declare what shall be exercised by it as a general police court, and, instead of creating a distinctly new court, the act of 1903 does nothing more than confer additional powers upon the old court and clearly define them. . . . It is a mere convenient designation of the court of quarter sessions to call it when caring for children a juvenile court, but no such court as an independent tribunal is created. It is still a court of quarter sessions before which the proceedings are conducted . . . and the records are still those of the court of quarter sessions;" Com. v. Fisher, 213 Pa. 48, 62 Atl. 198, 5 Ann. Cas. 92. An earlier act in that state had been held unconstitutional (1901) as creating a classification which offended against the provision forbidding the passage of any special law regulating practice and jurisdiction in judicial proceedings or granting to any individual any special privilege or immunity; Mansfield's Case, 22 Pa. Super. Ct. 224.

A Missouri act relating to neglected and delinquent children was upheld, though it provided a rule of procedure and punishment for such children which was not applicable to the same class of children in other counties, upon the ground that the conditions which prevail in thickly settled districts reasonably justified the distinction; Ex parte Loving, 178 Mo. 194, 77 S. W. 508.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS. See JUVENILE COURTS.

JUXTA CONVENTIONEM. According to the covenant. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 16, § 6.

JUXTA TENOREM SEQUENTEM. According to the tenor following. 2 Salk. 417. A phrase used in the old books when the very words themselves referred to were set forth. Id.; 1 Ld. Raym. 415.

KANSAS. The name of one of the states of the United States of America.

The state was carved out of a portion of the Louisiana purchase, and a small portion of the territory ceded to the United States by Texas.

The territory of Kansas was organized by an act of congress, dated May 30, 1854.

The constitution was adopted at Wyandotte July 29, 1859, and Kansas was admitted into the Union as a state, by an act of the congress, approved, January 20, 1861. An amendment providing for woman suffrage was adopted in 1912.

"The body of the laws of England as they existed in the fourth year of the reign of James I. (1607) constitutes the common law of this state." Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. Nichols, 9 Kan. 252, 12 Am. Rep. 494.

KEELAGE. The right of demanding money for the bottom of ships resting in a port or harbor. The money so paid is also called keelage.

KEELS. This word is applied, in England, to vessels employed in the carriage of coals. Jacob, Law Dict.

KEEP. To heed; observe; regard; attend to.

When it is said that a certain man keeps a woman, the popular inference is, that the relation is one which involves illicit intercourse; Downing v. Wilson, 36 Ala. 717. See Barrett v. R. Co., 3 Allen (Mass.) 101; Cummings v. Riley, 52 N. H. 368. To keep a street in safe condition, means to have it so; to make and remake it so; City of Atlanta v. Buchanan, 76 Ga. 585. To keep premises in repair is to have them at all times in that condition; 1 B. & Ald. 585.

Keep down interest. To pay interest periodically as it becomes due, but the phrase does not extend to the payment of all arrears of interest which may have become due on any security from the time when the instrument was executed. 4 El. & Bl. 211.

KEEPER. To warrant the conviction of one as the keeper of a common gaming house, he need not be the proprietor or lessee; it is sufficient if he has the general superintendence. Stevens v. People, 67 Ill. 587.

KEEPER OF THE FOREST (called, also, the chief warden of the forest). An officer who had the principal government over all officers within the forest, and warned them to appear at the court of justice-seat on a summons from the lord chief-justice in eyre. Manw. For. Law, part 1, p. 156. See FOREST LAW.

KEEPER OF THE GREAT SEAL (lord keeper of the great seal). A judicial officer who is by virtue of his office a member of the privy council. Through his hands pass all charters, commissions, and grants of the crown, to be sealed with the great seal, which is under his keeping. The office was consolidated with that of lord chancellor by 5 Eliz. c. 18. Co. 4th Inst. 87; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 171, 174; 3 Bla. Com. 47.

At times the great seal is "put in commission"; i. e. is entrusted to one or more officials who act under a special commission from the crown. Such is the case when the lord chancellor is absent from the country; there was an instance in the last century between the resignation of the lord chancellor and the appointment of his successor.

See CANCELLARIUS; CHANCELLOR.

KEEPER OF THE KING'S CONSCIENCE. The lord high chancellor is the keeper of the king's conscience. Historically it relates to the fact that the king in early times referred to such official the duty of redressing wrongs. See CHANCELLOR.

KEEPER OF THE PRIVY SEAL. The officer through whose hands go all charters, pardons, etc., signed by the king before going to the great seal, and some which do not go there at all. He is of the privy council virtute officii. He was first called clerk of the privy seal, then guardian, then lord privy seal, which is his present designation. 12 Ric. II. c. 12; Rot. Parl. 11 Hen. IV.; Stat. 34 Hen. VIII. c. 4; 4 Inst. 55; 2 Bla. Com. 347. See PRIVY SEAL.

KEEPING. In an insurance policy a clause prohibiting the keeping or having benzine in insured premises, was held to be intended to prevent the permanent and habitual storage of the prohibited articles, and that taking it on the premises for the purpose of cleaning machinery was not within the prohibition; Mears v. Ins. Co., 92 Pa. 15, 37 Am. Rep. 647.

KEEPING BOOKS. Preserving an intelligent record of a merchant's or tradesman's affairs with such reasonable accuracy and care as may properly be expected from a man in that business. An intentional omission, or repeated omissions, evincing gross carelessness will vitiate; an accidental failure to make a proper entry will not; 16 Bankr. Reg. 152.

KEEPING OPEN. A statute prohibiting shops to be kept open on Sunday is violated where one allows general access to his shop for purposes of traffic, though the outer entrances are closed. Com. v. Harrison, 11 Gray (Mass.) 308; Lynch v. People, 16 Mich. 472.

KEEPING TERM. In English Law. A duty performed by students of law, consisting in eating a sufficient number of dinners in hall to make the term count for the purpose of being called to the bar. Moz. & W.

KEEPING THE PEACE. See SURETY OF THE PEACE.

KELP-SHORE. The land between high and low water mark. Stroud. Jud. Dict.

But when the conveyance, "with the kelp-shore" by the metes and bounds given, manifestly excluded the land between high and low water mark, it was held to be excluded, and parol proof could not be received of the intention to include it; 10 Ir. C. L. 150.

KENNING TO THE TERCE. In Scotch Law. The ascertainment by a sheriff of the just proportion of the husband's lands which belongs to the widow in virtue of her terce or third. An assignment of dower by sheriff. Erskine, Inst. 11. 9. 50; Bell, Dict.

KENTLEDGE or KINTLEDGE. The permanent ballast of a ship. Ab. Sh. 6.

KENTUCKY. The name of one of the United States of America.

This state was formerly a part of Virginia, which by an act of its legislature, passed December 18, 1789, consented that the district of Kentucky within the jurisdiction of the said commonwealth, and according to its actual boundaries at the time of passing the act aforesaid, should be formed into a new state. By the act of congress of February, 1791, 1 Story, Laws 168, congress consented that, after the first day of June, 1792, the district of Kentucky should be formed into a new state, separate from and independent of the commonwealth of Virginia. And by the second section it is enacted, that upon the aforesaid first day of June, 1792, the said new state, by the name and style of the state of Kentucky, shall be received and admitted into this Union, as a new and entire member of the United States of America.

The present constitution of this state was adopted September 28, 1891. An act was passed in 1914 proposing an amendment allowing the employment of convict labor upon public roads and bridges.

KEROSENE. A rock or earth oil. Morse v. Ins. Co., 30 Wis. 534, 11 Am. Rep. 587.

It is, in a commercial sense, a refined coal or earth oil, and is embraced within those terms as used in an insurance policy. Bennett v. Ins. Co., 81 N. Y. 273, 37 Am. Rep. 501. It is not petroleum, but made from the latter by a process of a distillation and refinement. Bennett v. Ins. Co., 81 N. Y. 273, 37 Am. Rep. 501.

A court will not take judicial notice that kerosene is an "inflammable fluid" within the meaning of an insurance policy, it must be proved as a fact; Wood v. Ins. Co., 46 N. Y. 421; nor that it comes under the words "burning fluid"; Mark v. Ins. Co., 24 Hun (N. Y.) 565. See Morse v. Ins. Co., 30 Wis. 534, 11 Am. Rep. 587.

It is a question for the jury whether kerosene is a burning fluid or chemical oil; Mears v. Ins. Co., 92 Pa. 15, 37 Am. Rep. 647; or a drug; Carrigan v. Ins. Co., 53 Vt. 418, 38 Am. Rep. 687; where the court, after quoting Webster's definition of a drug, as "any mineral substance used in chemical operations," declined to say as matter of law that benzine is not included in that term. See RISKS AND PERILS; OIL; NEGLIGENCE; MINES AND MINING; GAS.

KEY. An instrument made for closing and opening a lock.

The keys of a house are considered as real estate, and descend to the heir with the inheritance; 11 Co. 50 b; 30 E. L. & Eq. 598; but although they follow the inheritance, they are not fixtures, so far as that the taking of them is not larceny; Hoskins v. Tarrence, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 417, 35 Am. Dec. 129; 5 Taunt. 518.

When the keys of a warehouse are delivered to a purchaser of goods locked up there, with a view of effecting a delivery of such goods, the delivery is complete. The doctrine of the civil law is the same; Dig. 41. 1. 9. 6; 18. 1. 74; Benj. Sales, 6th Am. ed. § 1043; 3 Term 464. See DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA; GIFT.

Keys are implements of housebreaking within statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, § 1; for, though commonly used for lawful purposes they are capable of being employed for purposes of housebreaking; and it is a question for the jury whether the person found in possession of them by night had them without lawful excuse, with the intention of using them as implements of housebreaking; 3 C. & K. 250; and the statute was held to include skeleton, or any other kind of key used for purposes of housebreaking; id. Entering by a key left in the door locked on the outside is not housebreaking; 1 Swint. Jus. Cas. 433. See BURGLARY.

KEYAGE. A toll paid for loading and unloading merchandise at a quay or wharf.

KEYS. The twenty-four chief commoners in the Isle of Man who form the local legislature. 1 Steph. Com., 100.

KIDEL or KIDDLE. An open weir whereby fish are caught. 2 Inst. 38.

"Weirs (kidelli or gurgites) were the means usual in ancient times for appropriating and enjoying several fisheries in tidal waters." Lord Selborne, L. C., in 8 App. Cas. 144.

KIDNAPPING. The forcible abduction or stealing away of a man, woman, or child from their own country and sending them into another. 4 Bla. Com. 219. At common law it is a misdemeanor; Comb. 10.

There is no wide difference in meaning between kidnapping, false imprisonment, and abduction. The better view seems to be that kidnapping is a false imprisonment, which it always includes, aggravated by the carrying of the person to some other place; Archb. Cr. P. by Pom. 984; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 750. See Ex parte Keil, 85 Cal. 309, 24 Pac. 742. It has been held that transportation to a foreign country is not necessary, though this conflicts with Blackstone's definition, supra; State v. Rollins, 8 N. H. 550. See 1 East, P. C. 429. The consent of a mature person of sound mind prevents any act from being kidnapping; otherwise as to a young child; a child of nine years has been held too young to render his consent available as a defence; Cl. Cr. L. 221; State v. Farrar, 41 N. H. 53; Com. v. Nickerson, 5 Allen (Mass.) 518; Gravett v. State, 74 Ga. 191; U. S. v. Ancarola, 17 Blatchf. 423, 1 Fed. 676; but a female fourteen years of age is not kidnapped, if taken away with her consent for the purpose of marriage, and she actually marries; Cochran v. State, 91 Ga. 763, 18 S. E. 16; so, going away by previous arrangement with an unmarried woman who, becoming intoxicated, remained for some days, in illicit intercourse, and was then brought back at her request, was not kidnapping; Eberling v. State, 136 Ind. 117, 35 N. E. 1023. Physical force need not be applied, threats will suffice; Payson v. Macomber, 3 Allen (Mass.) 69; or fraudulently acquiring consent; People v. De Leon, 109 N. Y. 226, 16 N. E. 46, 4 Am. St. Rep. 444. The crime may be effected by means of menaces; Moody v. People, 20 Ill. 315; or by getting a man drunk; Hadden v. People, 25 N. Y. 373. Where the custody of a child is assigned to one of two divorced parents, and the other, or a third person employed for the purpose, carries it off, it is kidnapping; State v. Farrar, 41 N. H. 53; Com. v. Nickerson, 5 Allen (Mass.) 518. It was held that within the meaning of the statute against kidnapping, any place where a child has a right to be is its residence; Wallace v. State, 147 Ind. 621, 47 N. E. 13. In this case two children who were acrobats had been sent away from home for the purpose of giving exhibitions to raise money with which to relieve the necessities of the family. While absent from their parents they were decoyed away by defendant, who was indicted for kidnapping under the Indiana statute. The court held that they had not acquired a permanent residence, but they were at a place they had a right to be—to which they had been sent by their parents, engaged in the business for which they had been sent. "The purpose of the statute here under consideration certainly was not that a child might be kidnapped at its father's house, but not if it were on a visit at a friend's in a near or distant city. The evident purpose was rather to provide against the kidnapping of a person from any place where he has a right to be, whether that be the place of his 'temporary sojourn or permanent domicile.' A child may be kidnapped, not only from its domicile or the home of its parents, but likewise from a neighbor's house, from church or school, or hotel, from a hall of public entertainment, or, in fact, from any place where it has a right to be; and it is in that sense that the word 'residence' is here used." 17 N. Y. L. J. 842.

One who takes his child of tender years out of the state, with its consent and with the consent of the mother to whom its custody has been awarded in divorce proceedings, to prevent its presence at a criminal trial in which it had been subpœnaed as a witness, is not guilty of kidnapping; John v. State, 6 Wyo. 203, 44 Pac. 51. New York, Illinois, and other states have passed statutes on kidnapping. See ABDUCTION; 1 Russ. Cr. 962; Click v. State, 3 Tex. 282; Com. v. Blodgett, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 56; People v. De Leon, 47 Hun (N. Y.) 308; Com. v. Myers, 146 Pa. 24, 23 Atl. 164. Where defendant procured an adjudication that the person alleged to have been kidnapped was insane, and, without using force, publicly conveyed her to a lunatic asylum, though she was not insane at the time, he was not guilty of the offence of kidnapping; People v. Camp, 139 N. Y. 87, 34 N. E. 755.

The indictment must be found in the county in which the person was seized and not in one through which he was carried; State v. Whaley, 2 Harring. (Del.) 538.

It has been held, however, that the carrying away is not essential; State v. Rollins, 8 N. H. 550. The crime includes a false imprisonment; 2 Bish. Cr. Law § 671. See ABDUCTION.

It has been held that in order to rescue a kidnapped person his friends may use such force as will be necessary, and that where there is an attack upon the rescuers, a killing of the kidnapper in self-defence is excusable homicide; Delaney v. Com., 25 S. W. 830.

KILL (Dutch). Originally the bed of a river or creek, and by relation used to mean the stream itself. It is so used in Delaware and New York, but has been said to have no distinct legal signification. French v. Carhart, 1 N. Y. 96.

KIN. Legal relationship; properly relations by blood, but often including those by marriage. It has been held to include a son-in-law under a statute disqualifying a justice of the peace, in cases to which his kin were parties; Hibbard v. Odell, 16 Wis. 635; and a second cousin, of a mother under a statute disqualifying jurors in cases where persons of kin were parties; State v. Walton, 74 Mo. 271. See NEXT OF KIN.

KIND. The agreement that a collector of taxes was to receive his commission "in kind" means the same kind of funds in which the tax is collected; Wilson v. State, 51 Ark. 213, 10 S. W. 491.

Another kind quoted is not synonymous with another quality quoted; 3 Q. B. D. 341. In this case the reference was to seed. As to loans of property to be repaid "in kind," see IN KIND; LOAN FOR CONSUMPTION.

KINDRED. Relations by blood. 2 Jarm. Wills 643; Wetter v. Walker, 62 Ga. 144, quoting 2 Wms. Ex. 815. It is in some cases, however, used to include relations in law, as children by adoption in a statute; Power v. Hafley, 85 Ky. 671, 4 S. W. 683; but not a grandson adopted as a son, so as to make kindred include the adopting parent; Delano v. Bruerton, 148 Mass. 619, 20 N. E. 308, 2 L. R. A. 698. It was held that as the word kindred in the statute of descents means lawful kindred, that term did not include the mother of a bastard, when the right accrued prior to the act enabling illegitimate children to inherit; Hughes v. Decker, 38 Me. 153. See Humphries v. Davis, 100 Ind. 280, 50 Am. Rep. 788; Wunderle v. Wunderle, 144 Ill. 40, 33 N. E. 195, 19 L. R. A. 84. See BASTARD; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

The kindred of every one are divided into three principal classes. 1. His children, and their descendants. 2. His father, mother, and other ascendants. 3. His collateral relations; which include, in the first place, his brothers and sisters, and their descendants; and, secondly, his uncles, cousins, and other relations of either sex, who have not descended from a brother or sister of the deceased. All kindred, then, are descendants, ascendants, or collaterals. A husband or wife of the deceased, therefore, is not his or her kindred; 14 Ves. 372. See Wood. Inst. 50; Ayliffe, Parerg. 425; Dane, Abr.; Toullier, Ex. 382, 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 516, n.; Pothier, Des Successions, c. 1, art. 3.

KING. The ruler of a kingdom. See REGNAL YEARS; SOVEREIGN.

KING CAN DO NO WRONG. This maxim means that the king is not responsible legally for aught he may please to do, or for any omission. Aust. Jur. sect. VI. It does not mean that everything done by the government is just and lawful, but that whatever is exceptionable in the conduct of public affairs is not to be imputed to the king; 2 Steph. Com., 11th. ed. 486.

The king could not be sued in his own court; it was therefore held that he must act through a servant; otherwise, in case of a wrongful act, the subject would have no remedy. But the theory that the king can do no wrong, and therefore cannot authorize a wrong, and that, if wrong is done, it is the act of his servant (see 2 B. & S. 257), is a later refinement; 3 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 311.

This maxim has no place in the system of constitutional law of the United States, as applicable either to the government or any of its officers, or of the several states or any of their officers; Langford v. U. S., 101 U. S. 343, 25 L. Ed. 1010. Our government is not liable for the wrongful and unauthorized acts of its officers, however high their place, and though done under a mistaken zeal for the public good; Gibbons v. U. S., 8 Wall. (U. S.) 269, 19 L. Ed. 453. See Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 290, 5 Sup. Ct. 903, 962, 29 L. Ed. 185.

KING OF ARMS. See HERALD.

KING'S BENCH. See COURTS OF ENGLAND.

KING'S CHAMBER. A term applied to fauces terræ (q. v.). See 1 Phill. Int. Law 239; Halleck, Int. Law 139.

KING'S or QUEEN'S COUNSEL. Barristers or serjeants who have been called within the bar and selected to be the king's counsel. They answer in some measure to the advocati fisci, or advocates of the revenue, among the Romans. They must not be employed against the crown without special leave, which was, however, always granted, at a cost of about nine pounds; 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 27, note.

See BARRISTER; SERJEANTS-AT-LAW.

KING'S EVIDENCE. An accomplice in a felony, who, on an implied promise of pardon if he fully and fairly discloses the truth, is admitted as evidence for the crown against his accomplices. 1 Phill. Ev. 81. A jury may, if they please, convict on the unsupported testimony of an accomplice; Tayl. Ev. 830; 4 Steph. Com. 398. On giving a full and fair confession of truth, the accomplice has a strong claim to a recommendation to mercy. He cannot be admitted to testify as king's evidence after judgment against him; 2 Russ. Cr. 956. In the United States, this is known as state's evidence. See ACCOMPLICE.

KING'S PEACE. See CONSERVATOR OF THE PEACE; PEACE.

KING'S REMEMBRANCER. See REMEMBRANCER.

KING'S SERJEANT. See SERJEANT.

KING'S SILVER. A fine or payment due to the king for leave to agree in order to levy a fine (finalis concordia). 2 Bla. Com. 350; Dy. 320, pl. 19; 1 Leon. 249, 250; 2 id. 56, 179, 233, 234; 5 Co. 39.

KING'S WIDOW. A widow of the king's principal tenant, who was obliged to take oath in chancery not to marry without the king's consent. Whart. Lex.

KINGDOM. A country where an officer called a king exercises the powers of government, whether the same be absolute or limted. Wolff. Inst. Nat. § 94. In some kingdoms, the executive officer may be a woman, who is called a queen.

KINSBOTE (from kin, and bote, a composition). In Saxon Law. A composition for killing a kinsman. Anc. Laws & Inst. of Eng. Index, Bote.

KINSMAN. A man of the same race or family; one related by blood. Webster.

KIRBY'S QUEST. An ancient record remaining with the remembrancer of the English exchequer; so called from being the inquest of John de Kirby, treasurer to Edward I.

KISSING THE BOOK. A ceremony used in taking the corporal oath, the object being, as the canonists say, to denote the assent of the witness to the oath in the form it is imposed. The witness kisses either the whole Bible, or some portion of it; or a cross in some countries. See the ceremony explained in Oughton's Ordo. tit. lxxx.; Consitt. on Courts, part 3, sect. 1, § 3; Junkin, Oath 173, 180; 2 Pothier, Obl., Evans ed. 234. In Pennsylvania, by act of 1895, the witness places his right hand on the Bible, but does not kiss it.

KLEPTOMANIA. Insanity in the form of an irresistible propensity to steal. Wharton. See Looney v. State, 10 Tex. App. 520, 38 Am. Rep. 646. A form of insanity which is said to manifest itself by a propensity to acts of theft. Tayl. Med. Jur., Bell's ed. 766. A weakening of the will power to such an extent as to leave the afflicted one powerless to control his impulse to appropriate the personal property of others. State v. McCullough, 114 Ia. 532, 87 N. W. 503, 55 L. R. A. 378, 89 Am. St. Rep. 382.

It is said to be often shown in cases of women, laboring under their peculiar diseases or of those far advanced in pregnancy. There have been instances of well-educated persons who have taken articles of no value and without apparent motive. If it appears that the accused was incompetent to know that the act was wrong, the facts may establish a plea of insanity; id., quoting Tindal, C. J.

A sharp distinction is made between kleptomania and the tendency to steal so commonly observed in the well defined forms of insanity; the former is a defective mental characteristic approaching the confines of insanity on one subject alone, while the individual, on all other subjects, is perfectly sane. It differs from shoplifting in that the shoplifter steals for a purpose, and only those articles which are of value, while the kleptomaniac takes goods of any description, often of no use to herself and with no motive for their possession; 4 Am. Lawy. 533.

In determining the responsibility of such persons for their acts, the principal subjects to be considered are the absence of any real motive, the knowledge of previous acts of a similar character, the history of hereditary taint, and the presence of a neurotic condition; 3 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 279.

Kleptomania is regarded as similar to homicidal insanity; Harris v. State, 18 Tex. App. 287; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 388; and it has been held a valid defence; Harris v. State, 18 Tex. App. 287; but when it was rejected as a defence, the court would not disturb the verdict; Com. v. Fritch, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 164.

As to irresistible impulse as a defence in criminal cases, see INSANITY.

A charge to a jury to apply the "right and wrong" test to the particular facts is a sufficient charge in a kleptomania case, since, if it is a disease depriving one of the sense of right and wrong as to theft, it met the test, and if it is merely an irresistible impulse to steal, it is no defence; Lowe v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 224, 70 S. W. 206.

Taylor (1 Med. Jurispr. 820) points out that in most of the cases there has appeared: 1. A perfect consciousness of the act and of its illegality. 2. The article, though of trifling value, has still been of some use to the person (for instances, articles of female use, or on which money could be raised). 3. There has been act and precaution in endeavoring to conceal the theft. 4. Either a denial, when detected, or some evasive excuse. He adds that "it is now not recognized as a type of insanity by itself," and gives an instance of an acquittal of a kleptomaniac upon the ground that, though not insane, there was an absence of felonious intent.

In an English case, tried in 1875, a clergyman charged with stealing, had taken goods when the shopkeeper's back was turned and concealed them in his pocket. He at first denied taking them, then offered to pay for them, and then attempted to leave. At the trial there was medical evidence that he had suffered from brain disease, and had been quite deranged at times. The opinion of medical experts was that the accused did not know the nature or quality of the act he had committed, at the time he had committed it, and he was acquitted. Tayl. Med. Jur., Bell's ed. 767.

It approaches the confines of insanity, but while, as physicians, we might claim immunity, as jurists, we "can only believe that the best interests of society are subserved by holding the person responsible"; 3 Witth. & Becker, Med. Jurispr. 253.

KNACKER. One who slaughters useless or diseased animals or deals in such. Cent. Dict. A regular occupation in London and other large cities, regulated by act of parliament August 18, 1911.

KNAVE. A false, dishonest, or deceitful person. This signification of the word has arisen by a long perversion of its original meaning, which was merely servant or attendant.

To call a man a knave has been held to be actionable; 1 Rolle, Abr. 52; 1 Freem. 277; Harding v. Brooks, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 244.

KNEEL. To bend the knees in worship without resting on them is to kneel. 36 L. J. Ecc. 10.

KNIGHT. In English Law. The next personal dignity after the nobility.

In the administration of royal justice, much of the work was formerly done by the knights; as for the more solemn, ancient, and decisive processes. To swear to a question of possession, free and lawful men were required, but to give the final and conclusive verdict about a matter of right, knights were necessary. In administrative law, therefore, knights were liable to special burdens, but in no other respect did he differ from the mere free man; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 394.

Of knights there are several orders and degrees. The first in rank are knights of the Garter, instituted by Edward III. in 1344; next follows, a knight banneret; then come knights of the Bath instituted by Henry IV., and revived by George I.; and they were so called from a custom of bathing the night before their creation. The other orders are the Thistle, St. Patrick, St. Michael and St. George, the Star of India, and the Indian Empire. The last order are knights bachelors, who, though the lowest, are yet the most ancient, order of knighthood; for we find that King Alfred conferred this order upon his son Athelstan. 1 Bla. Com. 403. These are sometimes called knights of the chamber, being such as are made in time of peace, and so called because knighted in the king's chamber, and not in the field. Co. 2d Inst. 666. Knights were called equites, because they always served on horseback; aurati, from the gilt spurs they wore; and milites, because they formed the royal army, in virtue of their feudal tenures.

Knights have precedence next after baronets; the wife of a knight has the legal designation of Dame, for which Lady is usually substituted. Cent. Dict.

See BARONET.

KNIGHT-MARSHAL. See MARSHALSEA.

KNIGHT'S FEE was anciently so much of an inheritance in land as was sufficient to maintain a knight; and every man possessed of such an estate was obliged to be knighted, and attend the king in his wars, or pay a pecuniary sum in lieu thereof, called escuage. In the time of Henry II. the estate was estimated at twenty pounds a year; but Lord Coke, in his time, states it to be an estate of six hundred and eighty acres. Co. Litt. 69 a. See 1 Poll. & Maitl. 232.

KNIGHT'S SERVICE. Upon the Norman conquest, all the lands in England were divided into knight's fees, in number above sixty thousand; and for every knight's fee, a knight was bound to attend the king in his wars forty days in a year, in which space of time a campaign was generally finished. If a man only held half a knight's fee, he was only bound to attend twenty days; and so in proportion. But this personal service, in process of time, grew into pecuniary commutations, or aids; until at last, with the military part of the feudal system, it was abolished at the restoration, by the statute of 12 Car. II. c. 24. 1 Bla. Com. 410; 2 id. 62; Will. Real. Pr. 144; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 230.

KNOCKED DOWN. A phrase used with reference to an auction, when the auctioneer by the fall of his hammer, or by any other audible or visible announcement, signifies to the bidder that he is entitled to the property on paying the amount of his bid, according to the terms of the sale. Sherwood v. Reade, 7 Hill (N. Y.) 439.

See AUCTION.

KNOW. To have knowledge; to possess information, instruction, or wisdom. State v. Ransberger, 106 Mo. 135, 17 S. W. 290.

"It may fairly be assumed that one who has reason to believe a fact exists, knows it exists. Certainly if he be a reasonable being." Strong, J., in Shaw v. R. Co., 101 U. S. 557, 25 L. Ed. 892.

KNOW ALL MEN BY THESE PRESENTS. See PRESENTS.

KNOWINGLY. In a statute imposing a penalty upon any one who shall knowingly sell, supply, etc., actual personal knowledge. Verona Cent. Cheese Factory v. Murtaugh, 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 17. In an indictment, a charge that one willfully testified falsely, includes the assertion that he knowingly so testified; State v. Stein, 48 Minn. 466, 51 N. W. 474. The word "knowingly," or "well knowing," will supply the place of a positive averment, in an indictment or declaration, that the defendant knew the facts subsequently stated; if notice or knowledge be unnecessarily stated, the allegation may be rejected as surplusage. See Com. Dig. Indictment (G 6); Com. v. Kirby, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 577; 2 East 452; 1 Chitty, Pl. 367.

KNOWLEDGE. Information as to a fact. The act of knowing; clear perception of the truth; firm belief; information. Knowledge "is not confined to what we have personally observed or to what we have evolved by our own cognitive faculties." State v. Ransberger, 106 Mo. 135, 17 S. W. 290. Where in a charge in a homicide case the court used the expression "knowledge to explain," circumstances proven "tending to show that the defendant was connected with the homicide," it was held to be synonymous with "ability to explain"; Adams v. State, 28 Fla. 511, 10 South. 106.

"Knowledge is information and information knowledge." 1 Heming 1; 5 Esp. 53.

"Absolute knowledge can be had of but few things." Story v. Buffum, 8 Allen (Mass.) 35.

"In a legal sense it may be classified as positive and imputed—imputed, when the means of knowledge exist, known and accessible to the party, and capable of communicating positive information. When there is knowledge, notice, as legally and technically understood, becomes immaterial. It is only material when, in the absence of knowledge, it produces the same results. However closely actual notice may, in many instances, approximate knowledge and constructive notice may be its equivalent in effect, there may be actual notice without knowledge; and when constructive notice is made the test to determine priorities of right, it may fall far short of knowledge and be sufficient." Cleveland Woolen Mills v. Sibert, 81 Ala. 140, 1 South. 773.

Many acts are perfectly innocent when the party performing them is not aware of certain circumstances attending them; for example, a man may pass a counterfeit note, and be guiltless, if he did not know it was so; he may receive stolen goods, if he were not aware of the fact that they were stolen. In these and the like cases it is the guilty knowledge which makes the crime.

Such guilty knowledge is made by the statute a constituent part of the offence; and therefore it must be averred and proved as such. But it is in general true, and may be considered as a rule almost necessary to the restraint and punishment of crimes, that when a man does that which by the common law or by statute is unlawful, and in pursuing his criminal purpose does that which constitutes another and different offence, he shall be held responsible for all the legal consequences of such criminal act. When a man, without justifiable cause, intends to wound or maim another, and in doing it kills him, it is murder, though he had no intention to take life. It is true that in the commission of all crimes a guilty purpose, a criminal will and motive, are implied. But, in general, such bad motive or criminal will and purpose, that disposition of mind and heart which is designated by the generic and significant term "malice," is implied from the criminal act itself. But if a man does an act, which would be otherwise criminal, through mistake or accident, or by force or the compulsion of others, in which his own will and mind do not instigate him to the act or concur in it, it is matter of defence, to be averred and proved on his part, if it does not arise out of the circumstances of the case adduced on the part of the prosecution. Per Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Elwell, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 192, 35 Am. Dec. 398. Thus, it is not necessary, in an indictment against an unmarried man for adultery with a married woman, to aver that he knew, at the time when the offence was committed, that she was a married woman; nor is it necessary to prove such knowledge at the trial; Com. v. Elwell, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 190, 35 Am. Dec. 398.

See, as to the proof of guilty knowledge, 1 B. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 185–191. See INTENT; IGNORANCE. As to the doctrine of imputed knowledge, see NOTICE.

KNOWN HEIRS. In a statute relating to the sale of property of unknown heirs, it has been held to mean those persons who are known, and whose right to inherit, or the extent of whose right, to inherit, is dependent on the non-existence of other persons nearer or as near as the ancestor in the line of descent. People v. Ryder, 65 Hun 175, 19 N. Y. Supp. 977.

L

L. The twelfth letter of the alphabet. As a Roman numeral it stands for 50. In the English money the small l is the sign for pounds. It is also an abbreviation for liber (book), law, lord. L. 5. means Long Quinto, which is the designation of one of the parts of the Year Books.

L. S. See LOCUS SIGILLI.

LA CHAMBRE DES ESTEILLES. The Star chamber. See COURT OF STAR CHAMBER.

LABEL. A slip of ribbon, parchment, or paper, attached to a deed or other writing to hold the appended seal.

In the ordinary use of the word, it is a slip of paper attached to articles of manufacture for the purpose of describing them or specifying their quality, etc., or the name of the maker. The use of a label has been distinguished from a trade-mark proper; Browne, Trade-Marks §§ 133, 537, 538. The use of labels will be protected by a court of equity under some circumstances; id. 538. See TRADE-MARK; INFRINGEMENT; UNION LABEL LAWS.

A copy of a writ in the English Exchequer. Tidd, Pr. *156.

LABOR. Work requiring exertion or effort, either physical or mental; toil.

Labor and business are not synonymous; labor may be business, but it is not necessarily so, and business is not always labor.

The labor and skill of one man are frequently used in a partnership, and valued as equal to the capital of another.

The contract labor prohibition in the immigration act of February 20, 1907, makes it a misdemeanor "in any manner whatsoever, to prepay the transportation or in any way to assist or encourage the importation or migration of any contract laborer or contract laborers into the United States," unless exempted under the provisos of sec. 2 of the act; which exceptions are skilled labor of any kind which cannot be found unemployed in this country, professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, ministers of any religious denomination, professors of colleges or seminaries, or persons belonging to any recognized learned profession, or persons employed strictly as personal domestic servants; U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, 503. A provision of a similar character was contained in the act of February 26, 1885, but that was superseded by the act of March 3, 1903, which was re-enacted with some change in the act of 1907 above stated.

The decisions here given, though most, if not all of them, are under the old statute, are doubtless equally applicable to the later one, so entirely similar are their provisions. By sec. 6 of the act, advertisements promising employment to aliens are made violations of the act, as also is solicitation of immigration by transportation companies, vessel owners, etc. Section 8 provides for the punishment of any person, including masters, owners, etc., of vessels, who brings aliens into the country in violation of the act.

The act is a constitutional exercise of the power to regulate commerce; U. S. v. Craig, 28 Fed. 795; In re Florio, 43 Fed. 114; it was passed to protect the health, morals, and safety of the people of this country; Warren v. U. S., 58 Fed. 559, 7 C. C. A. 368, 5 U. S. App. 656. The purpose of the statute was to stay the influx of cheap unskilled labor, and it does not include the case of one engaged as a draper, window dresser and dry goods clerk; U. S. v. Gay, 95 Fed. 226, 37 C. C. A. 46. It must appear that the alien did in fact emigrate, and that the person who assisted him knew that he was under contract; U. S. v. Borneman, 41 Fed. 751; there must have been a contract made previously to the importation, to perform labor here; Moller v. U. S., 57 Fed. 490, 6 C. C. A. 459, 13 U. S. App. 472. Where an alien writes to a resident proposing to come here and enter the service of the resident and the latter accepts the offer and pays his passage, it is not within the act; U. S. v. Edgar, 48 Fed. 91, 1 C. C. A. 49, 4 U. S. App. 41, affirming 45 Fed. 44.

A laborer on a dairy farm is not a domestic servant; In re Cummings, 32 Fed. 75; a milliner is not a professional artist; U. S. v. Thompson, 41 Fed. 28; a clergyman brought to this country under contract to take charge of a church as a rector is not within the act; Church of Holy Trinity v. U. S., 143 U. S. 457, 12 Sup. Ct. 511, 36 L. Ed. 226; nor are alien seamen using our ports for their ships; U. S. v. Burke, 99 Fed. 895.

One is not liable to deportation as a laborer who at the time of the passage of the act requiring alien laborers to register, was a merchant and who subsequently performed labor on a fruit farm which he leased; U. S. v. Sing Lee, 71 Fed. 680; nor is a chemist on a sugar plantation, though his expenses are paid; U. S. v. Laws, 163 U. S. 258, 16 Sup. Ct. 998, 41 L. Ed. 151. Expert accountants imported under contract were held not members of a recognized learned profession and not entitled to entry; In re Ellis, 124 Fed. 637. One who came to this country upon promise of employment at stipulated wages by one who advanced money for his passage, secured by mortgage, and worked for the person at the stipulated wages and designated occupation, repaid the advance out of his wages and continued so employed for a year, was within the act; Ex parte George, 180 Fed. 785.

As to new industries, excepted in the act, it has been held that the manufacture of fine lace curtains, which had been carried on in this country for only about three years and was still confined to two or three establishments, was such; U. S. v. Bromiley, 58 Fed. 554; as was also the manufacture of "French silk stockings"; U. S. v. McCallum, 44 Fed. 745.

A clause in the constitution of California forbidding the employment by a corporation of any Chinese or Mongolian has been held in conflict with the treaty of the United States with China and void; In re Tiburcio Parrott, 1 Fed. 481; so in New York a statute forbidding a contractor on public work to employ an alien was held a violation of the treaty with Italy and void; People v. Warren, 13 Misc. 615, 34 N. Y. Supp. 942. See ALIEN; CITIZEN.

The provision of the New York Penal Code declaring it to be a misdemeanor to require as a condition of employment that the employé shall not belong to a labor organization violates the state constitution and the fourteenth amendment by infringing the right of contract; People v. Marcus, 110 App. Div. 255, 97 N. Y. Supp. 322; and the court of appeals in that state, reversing the appellate division, held valid a contract providing that only union members should be employed, to which the parties were the employer, his employés and the labor union; Jacobs v. Cohen, 183 N. Y. 207, 76 N. E. 5, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 292, 111 Am. St. Rep. 730, 5 Ann. Cas. 280; and see note on this subject; 19 Harv. L. R. 368.

LABOR A JURY. To tamper with a jury; to persuade jurymen not to appear. It seems to come from the meaning of labor, to prosecute with energy, to urge: as to labor a point. Dy. 48; Hob. 294; Co. Litt. 157 b; 14 & 20 Hen. VII. 30, 11. The first lawyer that came from England to practice in Boston was sent back for laboring a jury. Washb. Jud. Hist.

LABOR ARBITRATION. The investigation and determination of disputed matters between employers and employés.

The subject of "arbitration and conciliation" with respect to the settlement of labor disputes is at the time of writing one of very present consideration throughout the world. The words quoted are constantly used together, but arbitration strictly applies to cases where the parties agree beforehand to abide by the award, while conciliation is the term used where there is no agreement, but the efforts are made by some indifferent party as a mediator to promote an agreement between the parties.

In Great Britain the subject of the peaceable settlement of trade disputes has progressed much more than in this country and in some of the British colonies the subject has reached a very advanced stage.

It is a curious fact that during the struggle in this country to devise some effective system of labor arbitration, little attention seems to have been paid till recently to very successful efforts in that direction in England which long antedated any American legislation. At a very early period the regulation of wages was controlled by two masters and two journeymen, or, in default of agreement, by a magistrate after hearing both sides, but this was terminated by the separation of the masters and journeymen into two classes, and thereafter wages were fixed either by the employers or the magistrates. The latter system prevailed under the apprenticeship law of Elizabeth, and this continued until early in the eighteenth century, except in the cotton factories, which were not within the law. In this industry, there was satisfactory regulation by a joint committee of laborers and employers, but towards the latter end of the eighteenth century, the latter obtained general control and the apprentice law was repealed. From then until about 1860, this condition remained undisturbed except by frequent petitions to parliament, although in the book printing business the trades unions secured an arrangement for settling price lists by a joint committee of employers and laborers, which was in operation with good success since 1805.

In 1860 the system of arbitration and agreement originated by a manufacturer, Mr. Mundella, successfully dealt with the labor problem in the various branches of trade involved in the stocking weaving and glove industries of the three counties of Nottingham, Leicestershire, and Derbyshire. The system, in brief, provided for a court of arbitration and agreement to decide every question relative to wages. It consisted of nine employers and nine laborers, selected respectively by an assembly of their own class for one year. The court had a regular organization with a standing executive committee by which all disputes were disposed of so far as practicable, the final judgment, however, being entered by the court. The two interests involved negotiated with each other on perfect equality and the decisions were binding. Under this system, there was no umpire and no provision for the execution of the judgment, the reliance being entirely upon the moral force of the statute, conscience, and the pressure of public opinion. The practical working of these courts was very successful and, quoting Mr. Mundella, July 4, 1868, "during eight years we had not a single strike, and never in the history of our city and our industry did there exist such a hearty good understanding between employers and laborers as now." The rules may be found in detail in chap. 18 of The Relation of Labor to the Law of To-day, by Brentano, translated by Porter Sherman, from which the historical facts here stated are mainly taken.

Another system of courts of arbitration and agreement was that of Rupert Kettle, a judge of the county court of Worcestershire; the statutes drawn by him were adopted by the employers and laborers in the building trades in Wolverhampton. They were in their main features similar to the Mundella courts, but differed from the latter in the fundamental point of providing an impartial umpire, and through legal provisions, the judgments were made binding in law. These provisions, however, were but seldom required in practice, as the presence of an impartial umpire had a tendency to produce an agreement without calling upon him; id. The result of the actual working of these two systems for many years is that they have approached each other, in that those of Kettle have become mere courts of agreement and those of Mundella have in most cases elected an impartial umpire who decides in case of a tie. The relation between the trades unions and the courts of arbitration in many districts has become very intimate, the former making provision in their organization for the labor representation in the latter, paying the laborer's share of the expenses of the courts and enforcing the judgments by expelling members who do not obey them. The courts are similarly supported by societies of employers; id.

The work cited sums up the result: "And from those industries at Nottingham and Wolverhampton since that time the organization of peace has exended from industry to industry and from city to city, until the system has been adopted in a greater or less degree in the most important centres of British industry. But everywhere, where in an industry a court of arbitration according to one or the other of the two systems has been established, there has been since that time neither a strike nor a lockout."

In Great Britain the instrumentality which seems to be of most importance is found in voluntary trade boards, which are permanent joint boards representing employés and work people in particular trades. The organization of such bodies dates as far back as 1849; the first which attained success was in 1860; since that time joint committees or boards have been formed in various trades and occupations until in 1890 the first general district board was formed in London through the chamber of commerce, being a result of a committee of mediation in the great London dock strike in 1889. In 1907 the threat of a general railway strike caused the formation of boards of conciliation for railway companies and their employés. These joint boards usually consist of equal numbers representing employers and employed with either an independent person as chairman, or, as is more frequent, the chairman being an employer and the vice-chairman a workman or their representatives respectively. If the chairman is independent he may cast a vote, otherwise there is apt to be an umpire provided for; and if one cannot be agreed upon, he is selected under the regulations by some named neutral body or individual. A common provision is that there shall be equality of voting between the two bodies represented without respect to the actual number of either present.

Prior to 1896, whatever was done in this direction was voluntary, although various attempts had been made to promote arbitration and conciliation by legislation. The conciliation act of 1896 empowered the board of trade, in case of differences, to take steps to promote a settlement. Their powers are defined with much detail, and the proceedings, designed to lead up to a binding agreement, are voluntary and have in the main been reasonably successful. During eleven years the number of cases in which action was taken by the board of trade were a yearly average of 21, out of which the settlements average 15, and of these three-quarters were effected by arbitration and one quarter by conciliation. During the ten years commencing with 1897 the number of cases considered by the various standing boards of arbitration and conciliation averaged annually about 1,500, of which one-half were settled and the remainder withdrawn or otherwise settled. Of the cases settled, about three-quarters were by the boards and one-quarter by umpires. The whole subject in England is still in a formative state and has not reached the stage of compulsory arbitration. The Trades Disputes Act, 1906, as to granting civil actions, appears to be the latest act.

In the British colonies, however, the subject is further advanced and in some of them very much so. In Canada a conciliation act was passed in 1900, and in 1903 another act had special reference to the settlement of railway disputes. These two acts having been consolidated in 1907, there was legislation providing for a board to deal with industrial disputes on the application of either side whenever a strike involving more than ten employés is threatened. The provisions of the act may be availed of in other industries, the original act having applied to mines and public utilities. Lockouts are made unlawful as are also strikes on account of a dispute prior to or during a reference of the dispute to the board, but there is no provision as to subsequent strikes or lockouts.

In New Zealand compulsory arbitration is in force and effect under the industrial, conciliation and arbitration act of 1894. Provision is made for the incorporation of associations of employers or workmen, termed industrial unions, and for the creation of joint district conciliation boards with an impartial chairman, elected by the board, to which disputes may be referred to by either party. If either party refuses to accept the decision, it is passed on to a court of arbitration consisting of two representatives of each side and a judge of the supreme court, whose award is enforcible by legal process with financial penalties for default. Strikes and lockouts are equally illegal. It is said that thus far the success of the system has been only partial.

In Australia there had been previous acts in 1901, in New South Wales and in Western Australia in 1901 and 1902, which were somewhat like the New Zealand system with modifications as to details; but in 1904 the commonwealth of Australia passed a compulsory arbitration law based mainly on the previous ones of New Zealand and New South Wales, and it may safely be said that the laws of this island continent on the subject are more stringent than any others in force throughout the world.

In France a law of conciliation and arbitration was passed in 1892 under which either party to a labor dispute may apply to the juge de paix, who notifies the other party, and, if they concur, a joint committee of conciliation is formed of not more than five on each side who meet in the presence of the juge, who has no vote. In default of agreement the parties are asked to appoint arbitrators and they agree on an umpire if possible, otherwise the president of the civil tribunal appoints one. In case of a strike and no application, the juge de paix may invite the parties to act. The results of the action of these authorities are placarded by the mayors of the communes affected and the parties are free to accept or reject the action indicated by the law. In ten years beginning with 1897, there were 1809 cases, of which 916 were on application of workmen, 49 of employers, 40 of both, and 804 of neither; and of these 616 were settled, 549 by conciliation and 67 by arbitration.

In Germany they have industrial courts termed gewertegerichten, which may under certain conditions offer their services as mediators in ordinary labor disputes. The principal law was passed in 1890 and amended in 1901. The court intervenes on the application of both parties or may do so on the invitation of one side or its own initiative in case of strike or lockout. The conciliation board consists, under the amended law, of the president of the court and representatives of equal numbers named by the parties respectively, but not concerned in the dispute, or, in default of such appointment by the president. A certain time is allowed for the acceptance of the decision, but there is no power to compel its observance. In five years, commencng with 1902, there were 1139 applications for intervention and 492 agreements, with 107 decisions of the courts, of which 64 were accepted by both sides.

In Switzerland there are laws looking to negotiation, conciliation or arbitration of trade disputes, in Geneva (1900) and in Basel (1897). Both contemplate provisions merely for voluntary conciliation; the first law was, to the end of 1904, applied only to seven cases, and under the second, during four years beginning with 1902, eighteen disputes were submitted and ten settled. Under a similar law in St. Gall (1902), in three years ten disputes were submitted and three settled.

In Sweden under the law of 1907 there are seven district conciliators, named by the crown, whose duty is to promote the settlement of labor disputes and to advise employers and workmen in framing agreements designed to promote good relations and prevent stoppage of work.

In this country there has been legislation on the subject, the first act being that of 1883 in Pennsylvania which proved ineffective. In at least twenty-four states there are constitutional or statutory provisions for mediation in labor disputes and in at least seventeen of these the formation of permanent state boards is contemplated. There are state boards of arbitration in Massachusetts and New York, both founded in 1886. In the former the board consists of one employer, one employé, and one independent person mutually chosen; in the latter it consists of two representatives of different political parties and one member of a bona fide trade organization of the state. In both states the boards proceed, with or without application, to investigate labor disputes on the spot and if possible to promote a settlement. Their services may be declined, but the board may issue a report and hold an inquiry on the application from either side and publish its decision, which in Massachusetts is effectual for six months unless sixty days' notice to the contrary is given by one side to the other. In Massachusetts, during 1906 the state board dealt with 158 disputes of which the board was asked to arbitrate in 95 cases; of 80 cases in which awards were rendered, 12 were withdrawn and 3 were unsettled at the end of the year. In New York a like number of cases were entered. In many states there are provisions not only for state, but also for local, boards.

In some states, as New Hampshire and Georgia, the commissioner of labor is authorized to investigate and institute efforts for the amicable settlement of labor disputes. In Wisconsin there is provision for compulsory investigation by a state industrial commission and publication of results; and as in Canada, there is reliance on public opinion to enforce their findings. The creation of a similar body has been publicly agitated in Massachusetts.

Without attempting to give in detail the state legislation, these instances are referred to as illustrating the trend of public thought on the subject.

The federal legislation necessarily is limited to disputes affecting interstate commerce; an act was passed June 1, 1898 (Erdman act), providing that in case of a dispute resulting in various interruptions of business on railways engaged in interstate commerce the chairman of the interstate commerce commission and the commissioner of labor shall, on application of either party, make an effort to bring about a settlement or induce the parties to consent to arbitration, and while an arbitration is pending strikes and lockouts are made unlawful. By act of March 4, 1911, the president is authorized to designate from time to time any other member of the interstate commerce commission or of the court of commerce to exercise the powers in the Erdman act devolved on the chairman. Comp. Stat. 1911, 1385.

By the act of March 4, 1913, creating a department of labor, it was provided in sec. 8 "that the secretary of labor shall have power to act as mediator and to appoint commissioners of conciliation in labor disputes whenever in his judgment the interests of industrial peace may require it to be done"; 37 Stat. L. 738.

The act of July 15, 1913 (Newlands act), provides that whenever a controversy concerning wages, hours of labor or conditions of employment shall arise between a common carrier engaged in interstate or foreign commerce wholly by railroad or partly by railroad and partly by water, and its employés, which is interrupting or threatening to interrupt the business of the carrier to the serious detriment of public interest, then either party may apply to the board of mediation and conciliation created by this act, and invoke its services for the purpose of bringing about an amicable adjustment of the controversy. If it cannot be settled by mediation and conciliation, then the board shall induce the parties to submit the controversy to arbitration of a board of three or six members to be chosen by the employer and employés. The award of the board and the papers and proceedings, including the testimony relating thereto, shall be filed with the clerk of the district court for the district where the arbitration is entered into or wherein the controversy arises, and judgment shall be entered on the award at the expiration of ten days from such filing, unless within that time either party shall file exceptions, and then judgment will be entered when the exceptions have been disposed of. This act repeals the act of June 1, 1898, relating to the mediation and arbitration of controversies between railway companies and certain classes of their employés.

The whole subject is well discussed and summarized in the title "Arbitration and Conciliation" in the Encyc. Brit. from which much of the foregoing information is derived and in which will be found a detailed discussion and statement of the history of the subject so far as the action of different countries is concerned.

LABOR UNION. A combination or association of laborers for the purpose of fixing the rate of their wages and hours of work, for their mutual benefit and protection, and for the purpose of righting grievances against their employers.

In England when the rate of wages was fixed by law or by the determination of a magistrate, and when there was a statutory provision against conspiracies and covenants among workmen not to make or do their work except at a certain rate or price, it was held a criminal conspiracy for a combination of workmen to refuse to work for so much per diem, though the matter about which they conspired might be lawful for one of them or for any of them to do had they not conspired to do it; the Journeymen Tailors case, 8 Mod. 11; but in the United States, though this decision was followed in the case of the Boot and Shoemakers of Philadelphia; Pamphlet 1806; the Pittsburg Cordwainers; Pamphlet, 1816; and in People v. Fisher, 14 Wend. (N. Y.) 9, 28 Am. Dec. 501, and People v. Melvin, 2 Wheel. Cr. Cas. (N. Y.) 262; yet they were decided by inferior courts, and in the first case before the supreme court of Pennsylvania (Com. v. Carlisle) that court held that a combination of employers to reduce the wages of their employés was not unlawful; Bright. 36. In the case of the Master Stevedores v. Walsh, Daly, J., upheld this principle and denied the authority of the English case; Master Stevedores' Ass'n v. Walsh, 2 Daly (N. Y.) 1; as did Shaw, J., in Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 38 Am. Dec. 346; and these cases may be considered as having definitely settled the law in this country that a combination of laborers for a lawful purpose does not amount to a conspiracy.

In England, however, the Journeymen Tailors case, supra, was followed as late as 1855, when it was held that a bond signed by eighteen employers to conduct their business as to rates of wages, time of work, etc., was a combination in restraint of trade and null and void at common law; 6 El. & Bl. 47; and in 1869 the court was divided as to whether a labor union whose by-laws countenanced strikes was not thereby rendered illegal; L. R. 4 Q. B. 602. In 1824 the first act was passed in England which legalized the combination of workmen; 5 Geo. IV. c. 99; but this was repealed the following year, and by the repealing act the combination of workmen was made lawful for the purpose of agreeing upon the prices which they might demand and the hours during which they would work, but making punishable any attempt to enforce the laws of the combining workmen by violence and intimidation; 6 Geo. IV. c. 129. In 1871 two acts were passed for the purpose of consolidating and settling the law; 34 & 35 Vict. c. 31; and these were supplemented by the Trades Union Amendment Act of 1876; these statutes going so far as to declare such combinations lawful even when acting (peaceably) in restraint of trade, the statute providing that no agreement or combination of two or more to do, or procure to be done, any act in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute between employer and workmen shall be indictable as a conspiracy, if such act would not be criminal if committed by one; 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86. In this country some states have enacted an exact copy of the English statute; in others the common law of conspiracy seems to be repealed, and in others it is modified. For legislation on the subject and the course of decisions concerning it, see Stimson, Lab. Law sec. 55.

The right of entering and leaving the service of an employer is one that every man possesses and is one of the corollaries of personal liberty, and it has almost uniformly been held that the same right might be exercised by any number of men jointly, if conducted in a peaceable and orderly manner and attended with no infringement of the rights of others; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319; contra, State v. Donaldson, 32 N. J. L. 151, 90 Am. Dec. 649. It has been held that such unions have an entire right to seek to compel employers to deal solely with men belonging to their union by all proper means, as by persuasion or even by a properly conducted strike; Jacobs v. Cohen, 183 N. Y. 207, 76 N. E. 5, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 292, 111 Am. St. Rep. 730, 5 Ann. Cas. 280; they may by their representative present to a concern against which a strike has been declared an agreement for signature embodying the conditions upon which union men will re-enter its service; Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 Pac. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165. They may agree that they will not work for or deal with certain classes of men or work at less than a certain price or without certain conditions; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 14, 8 Am. Rep. 287; Rogers v. Evarts, 17 N. Y. Supp. 264; U. S. v. Moore, 129 Fed. 630; Rohlf v. Kasemeier, 140 Ia. 182, 118 N. W. 276, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1284, 132 Am. St. Rep. 261, 17 Ann. Cas. 750; or arrange for a committee and officer of the union to represent them in conference for adjusting differences; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Switchmen's Union, 158 Fed. 541.

If the means are not unlawful, they have a right to endeavor to persuade those who have been accustomed to deal with an employer to withdraw their trade; Sinsheimer v. Garment Workers, 77 Hun 215, 28 N. Y. Supp. 321; they may agree not to teach their trade to others; Snow v. Wheeler, 113 Mass. 179; and where the combination is peaceable and without intimidation, employés may peacefully assemble to argue and persuade concerning a reduction of wages with the expectation of a strike, and the employés will not be charged with any loss resulting from their quitting work; Arthur v. Oakes, 63 Fed. 310, 11 C. C. A. 209, 24 U. S. App. 240, 25 L. R. A. 414; and they may lawfully pay the expenses of those who leave their employment and may post in their places of assembly the names of those who have contributed to the fund for the support of the workmen who have left; Rogers v. Evarts, 17 N. Y. Supp. 264; or induce others to strike; [1903] 2 K. B. 573.

But other cases have held differently: A labor union may not prevent an employer from employing certain workmen; State v. Stewart, 59 Vt. 273, 9 Atl. 559, 59 Am. Rep. 710; or from obtaining workmen; Blindell v. Hagan, 54 Fed. 40; or prevent workmen from obtaining work; 5 Cox, C. C. 162; People v. Walsh, 110 N. Y. 633, 17 N. E. 871; or threaten a boycott; Barr v. Trades Council, 53 N. J. Eq. 101, 30 Atl. 881; State v. Glidden, 55 Conn. 46, 8 Atl. 890, 3 Am. St. Rep. 23; Casey v. Typographical Union, 45 Fed. 135, 12 L. R. A. 193; or carry out a boycott; Thomas v. Ry. Co., 62 Fed. 803; Sherry v. Perkins, 147 Mass. 212, 17 N. E. 307, 9 Am. St. Rep. 689; or strike with the intention of forcing others to join the union; People v. Smith, 10 N. Y. St. Rep. 730; or picket the premises of an employer during a strike with the usual accompaniments of insulting and threatening words and gestures to those who work for him; 10 Cox, C. C. 592; 84 L. T. N. S. 58; Murdock v. Walker, 152 Pa. 595, 25 Atl. 492, 34 Am. St. Rep. 678; [1896] 1 Ch. 811. They may not coerce others pursuing the same calling as themselves to join their society or to adopt their views or rules; Quinn v. Leathem [1901] A. C. 495; [1902] K. B. 737; [1903] 2 K. B. 620; they may not intimidate an employer by threats, if the threats are sufficient to induce him to discharge an employé whom he desired to retain and would have retained but for such unlawful threats; id.; Perkins v. Pendleton, 90 Me. 166, 38 Atl. 96, 60 Am. St. Rep. 252; Lucke v. Clothing Cutters' & Trimmers' Assembly, 77 Md. 396, 26 Atl. 505, 19 L. R. A. 408, 39 Am. St. Rep. 421.

A labor union conducting a strike to force a particular plant to unionize may be enjoined from paying those having or seeking employment to leave or not to enter its service; Tunstall v. Coal Co., 192 Fed. 808, 113 C. C. A. 132; from combining to compel an employer to permit representatives of a union to adjust differences between employer and men; Reynolds v. Davis, 198 Mass. 294, 84 N. E. 457, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 162; from placing the name of a concern on its "unfair" or "we don't patronize" list with the sole intention, and the probable result, of coercing its customers not to deal with it, although the object sought is a benefit to union members and no physical coercion is practiced; American Federation of Labor v. Stove & Range Co., 33 App. D. C. 83, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 748. This decision was appealed, but the parties having settled their differences, the appeals were dismissed; Buck's Stove & Range Co. v. Federation of Labor, 219 U. S. 581, 31 Sup. Ct. 472, 55 L. Ed. 345.

A strike to compel employers to unionize their shop will be enjoined where the object is not to secure a direct benefit to the employés, but to enable the union to obtain a monopoly of the labor market; Folsom v. Lewis, 208 Mass. 336, 94 N. E. 316, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 787.

A combination of employers to resist an effort to increase wages artificially (otherwise than as regulated by supply and demand) is not an unlawful conspiracy; Cote v. Murphy, 159 Pa. 420, 28 Atl. 190, 23 L. R. A. 135, 39 Am. St. Rep. 686; Purvis v. Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, 214 Pa. 348, 63 Atl. 585, 112 Am. St. Rep. 757, 6 Ann. Cas. 275, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 642. There is a note to the last citation on the right of a labor union to forbid its members to handle the product of a particular factory, which was the method adopted by the labor union, in this case, to increase wages. The illegality of the action and the irreparable nature of the injury must be clearly alleged; Reynolds v. Everett, 144 N. Y. 189, 39 N. E. 72; Longshore Printing Co. v. Howell, 26 Or. 527, 38 Pac. 547, 28 L. R. A. 464, 46 Am. St. Rep. 640. Leaders of a labor union who receive money from an employer for ending a boycott are guilty of extortion; People v. Barondess, 133 N. Y. 649, 31 N. E. 240; and it has been held unlawful for an officer of a labor union to order the members thereof not to work for an employer; [1893] 1 Q. B. 715 (but in this case the officer was supplying the employer with goods, and his action was for the purpose of forcing his customer to refrain from acts which he had a right to do, and the action of the officer was held to be induced by malice); or for a delegate (requested by some of the members of the union) to induce an employer to discharge workmen; [1895] 2 Q. B. 21. If, by threats and intimidation, a labor union drives away the customers of an employer and destroys his trade, it thereby injures him by an unlawful act and is liable for damages to him whether the action was malicious or not; Payne v. R. Co., 13 Lea (Tenn.) 521, 49 Am. Rep. 666; and if such union compels a non-union man to leave his employment and prevents him from securing another situation, it is civilly liable for damages to him; Lucke v. Clothing Cutters' & Trimmers' Assembly, 77 Md. 396, 26 Atl. 505, 19 L. R. A. 408, 39 Am. St. Rep. 421.

An officer of a labor union may be enjoined from ordering the members to carry out one of the rules of the union; Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 54 Fed. 730, 19 L. R. A. 387; and equity may compel a labor union to recall an order to its members; id.

Unions cannot legally strike merely because the contractors employing union men were working on a building on which work was being done by nonunion pointers employed by the owners, as organized labor's right of coercion is limited to strikes on persons with whom the organization has a trade dispute; Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 78 N. E. 753, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638.

A district delegate appointed by the members of a labor union to confer with and advise them in disputes is not the servant or agent of the officers or of the members of the union; [1895] 2 Q. B. 21; and the chairman and secretary of a labor union will not be liable for the action of the district delegate in causing non-union men to be discharged from employment, or for threats of calling upon all union men to strike; id.

In the case of Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C 1 (reversing [1895] 2 Q. B. 21, sub nom. Flood v. Jackson), a trades-union district delegate notified a corporation that if it did not discharge certain of its employés, certain other employés would strike; the former were thereupon discharged and sued the district delegate. The jury found for the plaintiffs and also that the defendant maliciously induced the company to discharge the plaintiffs. Judgment thereon was affirmed by the court of appeals, but was reversed by the house of lords, by a majority of six to three; it was held that malice does not constitute a cause of action in such a case, unless there is some act of actual unlawfulness; that an act lawful in itself is not made unlawful by a malicious motive.

Sir Frederick Pollock says of this: "The House of Lords never deserved better of the common law;" 14 L. Q. R. 1. Another English law journal says that the decision "is accepted by the profession as sound. . . . In spite of numbers, the weight of judicial opinion is preponderatingly in favor of the law as now stated. The two ablest judges in courts of first instance agreed with the four greatest lawyers in the House of Lords—perhaps we should say of our generation. This is enough. It is curious that politics took sides—perhaps involuntarily; and it is also curious that trades unionism should have to be thankful that there is a House of Lords." 104 Law Times 143.

The later case of Quinn v. Leathem, [1901] A. C. 495, differed from Allen v. Flood in the facts presented. The defendants, in order to compel the plaintiff to discharge some of his men, threatened to put the plaintiff and his customers and persons lawfully working for them to all the inconvenience they could, without violence. It was said that one man, exercising the same control over others as these defendants had, could have acted as they did, and, had he done so, would have committed an actionable wrong. In Allen v. Flood there was nothing more than peaceable persuasion. In Quinn v. Leathem there was much more coercion, intimidation, molestation and annoyance, without justification. Lord Lindley, at p. 536. That the use of undue influence to compel or bring about the action of one person, to the injury of a third person, is the use of illegal means to that end, is held in many cases; Thomas v. R. Co., 62 Fed. 818; O'Brien v. People, 216 Ill. 354, 75 N. E. 108, 108 Am. St. Rep. 219, 3 Ann. Cas. 966; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. McConnell, 82 Fed. 65; Hopkins v. Stave Co., 83 Fed. 918, 28 C. C. A. 99; Boutwell v. Marr, 71 Vt. 1, 42 Atl. 607, 43 L. R. A. 803, 76 Am. St. Rep. 746; Jackson v. Stanfield, 137 Ind. 592, 36 N. E. 345, 37 N. E. 14, 23 L. R. A. 588.

Under the interstate commerce act and the anti-trust act of 1887 and 1890 respectively a labor union may be guilty of criminal conspiracy or forming a combination in restraint of trade if their actions tend to obstruct interstate or foreign commerce, though they consist in merely quitting the service of an employer or preventing others from working for him; U. S. v. Workingmen's Amalgamated Council, 54 Fed. 994, 26 L. R. A. 158; Waterhouse v. Comer, 55 Fed. 149, 19 L. R. A. 403; U. S. v. Elliott, 62 Fed. 801; U. S. v. Agler, 62 Fed. 824; U. S. v. Elliott, 64 Fed. 27; or in delaying a train carrying the mails; U. S. v. Debs, 65 Fed. 210; U. S. v. Cassidy, 67 Fed. 698; In re Grand Jury, 62 Fed. 840; and equity will interfere to compel striking railroad employés to perform their duties "so long as they remain in the employment of the company;" Southern California R. Co. v. Rutherford, 62 Fed. 796. That a labor union was in its origin lawful was held no ground of defence; U. S. v. Workingmen's Amalgamated Council, 54 Fed. 994, 26 L. R. A. 158. But in the circuit court for the district of Massachusetts, it was held that it is not sufficient for an indictment to allege a purpose to drive certain competitors out of the field; it must show a conspiracy in restraint of trade by engrossing or monopolizing the market; U. S. v. Patterson, 55 Fed. 605; but see U. S. v. Elliott, 62 Fed. 801, where the former case was expressly disapproved.

The Sherman act applies to combinations of laborers as well as to capitalists; Loewe v. Lawlor, 208 U. S. 274, 28 Sup. Ct. 301, 52 L. Ed. 488, 13 Ann. Cas. 815; it makes illegal every combination by which competition is ended or suspended, between two or more persons engaged in interstate or foreign trade or commerce; U. S. v. American Tobacco Co., 164 Fed. 700.

Where the action of a labor union becomes a criminal conspiracy, the remedy is by injunction; and the equitable jurisdiction to prevent conspiracies by combinations of organized labor is justified upon the ground that, though equity will not interfere to prevent the commission of a crime, as such, yet where the acts complained of amount to an infringement of a property right, the court may act; 3 De G. F. & J. 232; or to a nuisance; Sherry v. Perkins, 147 Mass. 212, 17 N. E. 307, 9 Am. St. Rep. 689; or to a boycott; Woodruff v. Min. Co., 45 Fed. 130; or to an intimidation; Cœur d'Alene Consol. & Min. Co. v. Miners' Union, 51 Fed. 260, 19 L. R. A. 382. One apprehending injury from such a combination may bring a bill against one or more persons, and obtain at once without waiting for any hearing, or answer by the defendant, a preliminary injunction against not only the defendants named, but all other agents, servants, and subordinates named or unnamed; and, finally, against any person whatever who may have knowledge that such injunction has been granted; Ex parte Lennon, 64 Fed. 320, 12 C. C. A. 134. As to awarding an injunction in a strike, an important element is the character of the dominant element in the union; Goldfield Consol. Mines Co. v. Miners' Union, 159 Fed. 500. A disregard of such an injunction amounts to a contempt and subjects the offender to fine and imprisonment, and such offender is not entitled to a jury trial; Bellows v. Bellows, 58 N. H. 60; Garrigus v. State, 93 Ind. 239; Eilenbecker v. District Court, 134 U. S. 31, 10 Sup. Ct. 424, 33 L. Ed. 801; and from an order in contempt there is no appeal from the court issuing it to a higher court; Verbeck v. Scott, 71 Wis. 64, 36 N. W. 600; although it has been held in some jurisdictions that there may be an appeal where the injunction was issued to protect private interests and not the public; Dodd v. Una, 40 N. J. Eq. 672, 5 Atl. 155; but even this appeal only goes so far as to give the appellate court the right to investigate and see whether the court below had jurisdiction of the subject-matter; In re Wood, 82 Mich. 75, 45 N. W. 1113. The person in contempt may, in some jurisdictions, take the matter up by writ of certiorari; State v. District Court, 13 Mont. 347, 34 Pac. 39; he may not have a writ of habeas corpus; In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 15 Sup. Ct. 900, 39 L. Ed. 1092; U. S. v. Debs, 64 Fed. 724. Jurisdiction was expressly conferred upon the United States circuit court by the anti-trust act of 1890.

A receiver appointed to take charge of property is an officer of the court; any interference with his possession is an interference with the possession of the court and is a contempt, so that a strike by a labor union which tends to interfere with the traffic of a railroad in the hands of a receiver is a contempt; In re Doolittle, 23 Fed. 544; U. S. v. Kane, 23 Fed. 748; In re Wabash R. Co., 24 Fed. 217; and it was further held that while the employés of receivers may freely quit their employment, they cannot do it in such a way as intentionally to disable the property, nor can they combine nor conspire to quit without notice, with the object and intent of crippling the property and its operation; Lafauci v. Kinler, 27 Fed. 443, where the object of the strike was to compel recognition of a secret labor organization and the right of its officers to control the operations of a railroad, the officers being not even employés; Pardee, J., said: "This intolerable conduct goes beyond criminal contempt of court into the domain of felonious crimes."

A contract between an employer, a labor union and employés, which provided that only union members in good standing should be employed and that on the request of the union the employer should discharge all others, was sustained in Jacobs v. Cohen, 183 N. Y. 207, 76 N. E. 5, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 292, 111 Am. St. Rep. 730, 5 Ann. Cas. 280. The decision was held to involve the questions: (1) Whether an employer can make with laborers or with a third party, a binding agreement to limit his expectancy in the labor market; (2) whether laborers may engage themselves to destroy the expectancy of other laborers. See 19 Harv. L. Rev. 368.

To discharge the members of a labor union or refuse to employ them was held not to be an unlawful conspiracy to destroy it; Boyer v. Telegraph Co., 124 Fed. 246. The statutes in several states and the act of congress imposing a penalty upon the employer for discharging an employee for being a member of a labor union have been held unconstitutional as impairing the liberty of contract; Adair v. U. S., 208 U. S. 161, 28 Sup. Ct. 277, 52 L. Ed. 436, 13 Ann. Cas. 764; People v. Marcus, 185 N. Y. 257, 77 N. E. 1073, 113 Am. St. Rep. 902, 7 Ann. Cas. 118, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 282, note, the conclusion of which is that in all other jurisdictions in which the questions have been raised such statutes have been held void. Such cases are; State v. Julow, 129 Mo. 163, 31 S. W. 781, 29 L. R. A. 257, 50 Am. St. Rep. 443; Gillespie v. People, 188 Ill. 176, 58 N. E. 1007, 52 L. R. A. 283, 80 Am. St. Rep. 176; State v. Kreutzberg, 114 Wis. 530, 90 S. W. 1098, 58 L. R. A. 748, 91 Am. St. Rep. 934. One case in the Ohio common pleas, decided before the question had been raised in other states, held such a statute constitutional, but this case was repudiated in a later common pleas case; State v. Bateman, 10 Ohio S. C. P. 68, 7 Ohio N. P. 487. An act making it unlawful to discharge employees for belonging to a labor organization and providing for the recovery of damages therefor was held unconstitutional; Coffeyville Vitrified Brick & Tile Co. v. Perry, 69 Kan. 297, 76 Pac. 848, 66 L. R. A. 185, 1 Ann. Cas. 936; and in Wallace v. Ry. Co., 94 Ga. 732, 22 S. E. 579, an analogous statute was held unconstitutional. The United States supreme court held that it is not within the power of congress to make it a criminal offense against the United States for a carrier engaged in interstate commerce to discharge an employee simply because of his membership in a labor organization; Adair v. U. S., 208 U. S. 161, 28 Sup. Ct. 277, 52 L. Ed. 436, 13 Ann. Cas. 764.

LABORERS, STATUTES OF. The Stat. 23 Edw. III. passed in 1349 by the king in council. After reciting in the preamble that many of the operative class had died of the plague, and the survivors seeing the necessity to which the masters were reduced for want of servants, refused to work unless for excessive wages, it was enacted that all able-bodied persons (free or bond) under the age of three-score years, not exercising any craft, nor having the means of living or land of his own, should if required to serve in a station suiting his condition be bound to serve for the wages usual in the 20th year of the king under penalty of imprisonment. It was also provided that victuals should be sold at reasonable rates, and that no person should give to a beggar who was able to work and preferred to live in idleness, under pain of imprisonment. This statute was partially repealed by stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4; see infra; and finally repealed in 1863. 2 Stat. 12 Rich. 2, which was passed at Cambridge in 1388, forbidding a servant at the end of his term to go out of his district without a letter under the king's seal, on pain of being put in the stocks. The amount of wages was regulated and penalties inflicted on masters who gave more than the legal amount. There was also provision for the punishment of beggars except religious people and approved hermits, who had testimonial letters from their ordinaries. 3 Stat. 5 Eliz. c. 4, passed 1562, repealing most of the before mentioned statutes, and regulating workmen and apprentices. The justices of the peace were required to hold special sessions for fixing rates of wages, and a justice absenting himself without any lawful excuse was to be fined £10. For giving more wages than the legal amount masters were to be imprisoned for ten days and to forfeit £5. This statute was substantially repealed by subsequent ones; Moz. & W.

LAC, or LAKH. One hundred thousand. It is used in India, as—a lac of rupees is 100,000 rupees, or about £10,000 or $50,000; Wils. Glos. Ind.; Moz. & W.

LACEY ACT. An act of congress, May 25, 1900, under which the states may enforce game laws against animals, birds, etc., imported from other states or countries. See GAME LAWS.

LACHES (Fr. lacher). Unreasonable delay; neglect to do a thing or to seek to enforce a right at a proper time.

The neglect to do that which by law a man is obliged or in duty bound to do. Anderson v. Northrop, 30 Fla. 612, 12 South. 318.

The neglect to do what in law should have been done, for an unreasonable and unexplained length of time and under circumstances permitting diligence. Babb v. Sullivan, 43 S. C. 436, 21 S. E. 277.

Unlike a limitation, it is not a mere matter of time, but principally a question of the inequity of permitting the claim to be enforced; an inequity founded upon some change in the condition or relation of the property of the parties; Lemoine v. Dunklin County, 51 Fed. 487, 2 C. C. A. 343, 10 U. S. App. 227; Galliher v. Cadwell, 145 U. S. 368, 12 Sup. Ct. 873, 36 L. Ed. 738. It has been said to involve the idea of negligence; the neglect or failure to do what ought to have been done under the circumstances to protect the rights of the parties to whom it is imputed, or involving injury to the opposite party through such neglect to assert rights within a reasonable time; Ripley v. Seligman, 88 Mich. 177, 50 N. W. 143.

In general, laches is neglect to do what should have been done for an unreasonable or unexplained length of time under circumstances permitting diligence; mere lapse of time before bringing suit without change of circumstances will not constitute laches; Newberry v. Wilkinson, 199 Fed. 673, 118 C. C. A. 111. Not only must there have been unnecessary delay, but it must appear that, by reason of the delay, some change has occurred in the condition or relations of the property which would make it inequitable to enforce the claim; London & San Francisco Bank v. Dexter, Horton & Co., 126 Fed. 593, 601, 61 C. C. A. 515; Demuth v. Bank, 85 Md. 326, 37 Atl. 268, 60 Am. St. Rep. 322; Halstead v. Grinnan, 152 U. S. 412, 14 Sup. Ct. 641, 38 L. Ed. 495.

Courts of equity withhold relief from those who have delayed the assertion of their claims for an unreasonable time, and the mere fact that suit was brought within a reasonable time does not prevent the application of the doctrine of laches when there is a want of diligence in the prosecution; Hagerman v. Bates, 5 Cal. App. 391, 38 Pac. 1100; Alsop v. Riker, 155 U. S. 449, 15 Sup. Ct. 162, 39 L. Ed. 218. The question of laches depends not upon the fact that a certain definite time has elapsed since the cause of action accrued, but upon whether, under all the circumstances, the plaintiff is chargeable with want of due diligence in not instituting the proceedings sooner; Townsend v. Vanderwerker, 160 U. S. 171, 16 Sup. Ct. 258, 40 L. Ed. 383; McIntire v. Pryor, 173 U. S. 38, 19 Sup. Ct. 352, 43 L. Ed. 606; it is not measured by the statute of limitations; Alsop v. Riker, 155 U. S. 449, 15 Sup. Ct. 162, 39 L. Ed. 218; but depends upon the circumstances of the particular case; Griswold v. Hazard, 141 U. S. 260, 11 Sup. Ct. 972, 999, 35 L. Ed. 678. Where injustice would be done in the particular case by granting the relief asked, equity may refuse it and leave the party to his remedy at law; Abraham v. Ordway, 158 U. S. 416, 15 Sup. Ct. 894, 39 L. Ed. 1036; or where laches is excessive and unexplained; Halsey v. Cheney, 68 Fed. 763, 15 C. C. A. 656, 34 U. S. App. 50. In the absence of negligence by the plaintiff, in the prosecution of his claim, no period short of the legal statute of limitations will bar an action on an equitable claim; Houck's Adm'r v. Dunham, 92 Va. 211, 23 S. E. 238; and see The Queen, 78 Fed. 155, where it was held that "mere delay, for the full period of four years allowed by a state statute of limitations, in bringing a suit in rem to recover damages to a cargo, is not of itself, and in the absence of exceptional circumstances from which laches would be imputable, sufficient to justify the court in declining to entertain the suit;" but where the complainant has remained silent for a longer time, after the discovery of the material facts than the time limited by the statute of limitations, it is laches; Kinne v. Webb, 54 Fed. 34, 4 C. C. A. 170, 12 U. S. App. 137. Where a statute provides that no claim is barred until the limitation of the statute has accrued, a complainant cannot be denied relief because the action lacks but a few days of being barred by limitation, on the ground of gross laches; Hill v. Nash, 73 Miss. 849, 19 South. 707. Where an equitable right of action is analogous to a legal right of action, and there is a statute of limitations fixing a limit of time for bringing an action at law to enforce such claims, a court of equity will, by analogy, apply the same limit of time to proceedings taken to enforce the equitable right; L. R. 6 H. L. 384. One in possession of land may wait until his title and possession are attacked before setting up equitable demands, without being chargeable with laches; Massenburg v. Denison, 71 Fed. 618, 18 C. C. A. 280; as where an unauthorized franchise in a street is given, adjoining property owners are not required to attack the validity of the franchise until their rights are actually invaded; Hart v. Buckner, 54 Fed. 925, 5 C. C. A. 1, 2 U. S. App. 488. Mere lapse of time not sufficient to bar the corresponding legal remedy will not constitute laches barring a suit, there having been no change in the condition or relation of the property or parties which renders the enforcement of the claim inequitable; First Nat. Bank v. Nelson, 106 Ala. 535, 18 South. 154; Ward v. Sherman, 192 U. S. 168, 24 Sup. Ct. 227, 48 L. Ed. 391.

Laches in seeking to enforce a right will, in many cases in equity, prejudice such right, for equity does not encourage stale claims nor give relief to those who sleep upon their rights; 4 Wait, Act. & Def. 472; Lane & B. Co. v. Locke, 150 U. S. 193, 14 Sup. Ct. 78, 37 L. Ed. 1049; In re Whittemore, 157 Mass. 46, 35 N. E. 93; this doctrine is based upon the grounds of public policy which requires for the peace of society, the discouragement of stale claims; Mackall v. Casilear, 137 U. S. 556, 11 Sup. Ct. 178, 34 L. Ed. 776. The question whether one is precluded from equitable relief by the staleness of his demand is for the court and not for the jury; Raymond v. Flavel, 27 Or. 219, 40 Pac. 158.

It has been held to be inexcusable for thirty-six years; Fuller v. Montague, 59 Fed. 212, 8 C. C. A. 100, 16 U. S. App. 391; twenty-seven years, unexplained; Felix v. Patrick, 145 U. S. 317, 12 Sup. Ct. 862, 36 L. Ed. 719; twenty-three years; Ware v. Galveston City Co., 146 U. S. 102, 13 Sup. Ct. 33, 36 L. Ed. 904; 22 years during which the defendant company spent much labor and money in improvements; Gildersleeve v. Min. Co., 161 U. S. 573, 16 Sup. Ct. 663, 40 L. Ed. 812; twenty-two years after knowledge of the facts; Halstead v. Grinnan, 152 U. S. 412, 14 Sup. Ct. 641, 38 L. Ed. 495; nineteen years, on a bill to establish a trust; Hinchman v. Kelley, 54 Fed. 63, 4 C. C. A. 189, 7 U. S. App. 481; fourteen years, in the assertion of title to lands which meantime had been sold to settlers; St. Paul, S. & T. F. Ry. Co. v. Sage, 49 Fed. 315, 1 C. C. A. 256, 4 U. S. App. 160; ten years, in proceedings to enforce a trust in lands; Abraham v. Ordway, 158 U. S. 416, 15 Sup. Ct. 894, 39 L. Ed. 1036; ten years, after the foreclosure and sale of a railroad in a bill by a stockholder to set aside the sale for collusion and fraud which were patent on the face of the proceedings; Foster v. R. Co., 146 U. S. 88, 13 Sup. Ct. 28, 36 L. Ed. 899; nine years in a suit to have a deed declared a mortgage on the ground that it was obtained by taking advantage of the grantor's destitute condition; De Martin v. Phelan, 51 Fed. 865, 2 C. C. A. 523, 7 U. S. App. 233; nine years to annul a foreclosure where the plaintiff was an ignorant negro whose confidence was abused; McIntire v. Pryor, 173 U. S. 38, 19 Sup. Ct. 352, 43 L. Ed. 606; eight years' acquiescence in a trademark for metallic paint, during which the defendant had built up an extended market for his product; Princes' Metallic Paint Co. v. Mfg. Co., 57 Fed. 938, 6 C. C. A. 647, 17 U. S. App. 145; eight years in proceedings where complainant in consideration of $10,000 had released certain claims and sought to set the release aside on the ground that it was entitled to a much larger sum than it received; Thorn Wire Hedge Co. v. Mfg. Co., 159 U. S. 423, 16 Sup. Ct. 94, 40 L. Ed. 205; three years, where a person bought property of uncertain value and after three years brought suit to rescind the contract on the ground of fraudulent representation; Sagadahoc Land Co. v. Ewing, 65 Fed. 702, 13 C. C. A. 83, 31 U. S. App. 102. Twelve years' unexplained delay in suing for the infringement of a patent precludes the recovery of profits or damages; Safety Car Heating & Lighting Co. v. Car Heating Co., 174 Fed. 658, 98 C. C. A. 412; five years' delay, after discovery of a fraud, to file a bill to set aside a divorce decree for such fraud, is a bar; Horton v. Stegmyer, 175 Fed. 756, 99 C. C. A. 332, 20 Ann. Cas. 1134.

To constitute laches to bar a suit there must be knowledge, actual or imputable, of the facts which should have prompted action or, if there were ignorance, it must be without just excuse; Bausman v. Kelley, 38 Minn. 197, 36 N. W. 333, 8 Am. St. Rep. 661; see Hilliard v. Wood Carving Co., 173 Pa. 1, 34 Atl. 231; Johnston v. Min. Co., 148 U. S. 360, 13 Sup. Ct. 585, 37 L. Ed. 480; but where there is ignorance of the party's right, laches may be excused; 2 Ball & B. 104; Gross v. Mfg. Co., 48 Fed. 35; Foster v. R. Co., 146 U. S. 88, 13 Sup. Ct. 28, 36 L. Ed. 899; Dice v. Brown, 98 Ia. 297, 67 N. W. 253. Evidence that complainant had arranged to dispose of land bequeathed to her, is evidence that she knew of the existence of a will, and a delay of twenty years in bringing an action to set aside its probate is laches; Corby v. Trombley, 110 Mich. 292, 68 N. W. 139. Defence of laches, on the ground that plaintiff might by inquiry have learned the facts relied on, is not available to defendant, who was under obligation to disclose such facts without inquiry, defendant having suffered no harm; Krohn v. Williamson, 62 Fed. 869.

One who seeks to impeach a transaction on the ground of fraud must seek redress promptly; Hilliard v. Wood Carving Co., 173 Pa. 1, 34 Atl. 231; Houston v. Hazzard, 2 Del. Ch. 247; Scheftel v. Hays, 58 Fed. 460, 7 C. C. A. 308. Mere lapse of time will sometimes render a fraudulent transaction unimpeachable; Brown v. Brown, 142 Ill. 409, 32 N. E. 500; Day v. Imp. Co., 153 Ill. 293, 38 N. E. 567; but when the fraud is secret and suit is begun within a reasonable time after its discovery, laches is not a defence; Hodge v. Palms, 68 Fed. 61, 15 C. C. A. 220, 37 U. S. App. 61. Laches was held not imputable to a delay of more than ten years in filing a bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance; Murphy v. Nilles, 62 Ill. App. 193. See McKneely v. Terry, 61 Ark. 527, 33 S. W. 953. It is not so much the duty of a suitor in equity to be diligent in discovering his rights as to be prompt in asserting them after they become known; Wetzel v. Transfer Co., 65 Fed. 23, 12 C. C. A. 490, 27 U. S. App. 594; and a delay of eleven months in asking for the reformation of a mortgage on the ground of mutual mistakes was held not such laches as to bar the right of a subsequent mortgagee with knowledge of the mistake; Citizens' Nat. Bank of Attica v. Judy, 146 Ind. 322, 43 N. E. 259. Laches in assailing a fraud will not be imputed until the discovery of the fraud by the party affected thereby; Lee v. Patten, 34 Fla. 149, 15 South. 775; and it has been held that delay will not defeat the right to relief in case of fraud, unless the fraud is known or ought by due diligence to have been known; Mudsill Min. Co. v. Watrous, 61 Fed. 163, 9 C. C. A. 415, 22 U. S. App. 12. Ignorance of facts complained of as fraud has been held no excuse for laches when the facts were evidenced by public records accessible to all, unless some affirmative act of deception be shown or some misleading device intended to prevent inquiry and exclude suspicion; Lant v. Manley, 71 Fed. 7.

Laches may also be excused from the obscurity of the transaction; 2 Sch. & L. 487; see Chase v. Boughton, 93 Mich. 285, 54 N. W. 44; by the pendency of a suit; 1 Sch. & L. 413; and where the party labors under a legal disability, as insanity; Craig v. Leiper, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 193, 24 Am. Dec. 479; infancy; McMillan v. Rushing, 80 Ala. 402; Hudson v. White, 17 R. I. 519, 23 Atl. 57; or coverture; Wilson v. McCarty, 55 Md. 277; Black v. Whitall, 9 N. J. Eq. 572, 59 Am. Dec. 423; 19 Ves. 640; poverty is no excuse for laches; Leggett v. Oil Co., 149 U. S. 287, 13 Sup. Ct. 902, 37 L. Ed. 737; nor are ignorance and absence from the country; Naddo v. Bardon, 51 Fed. 493, 2 C. C. A. 335, 4 U. S. App. 642; no laches can be imputed to the public; In re County Com'rs of Hampshire, 143 Mass. 424, 9 N. E. 756; County of Piatt v. Goodell, 97 Ill. 91. Laches on the part of its officers cannot be imputed to the government and no period of delay on the part of the sovereign power will serve to bar its right either in a court of law or equity when it sees fit to enforce it for the public benefit; Gaussen v. U. S., 97 U. S. 584, 24 L. Ed. 1009; U. S. v. R. Co., 67 Fed. 969, 15 C. C. A. 117; but though not ordinarily a defence to a suit brought by the government, yet where such suit is brought solely to benefit a private individual or where the government sues to enforce a right of its own, growing out of some ordinary commercial transaction, it may be set up as a defence; U. S. v. Beebe, 127 U. S. 338, 8 Sup. Ct. 1083, 32 L. Ed. 121; Union Pac. R. Co. v. U. S., 67 Fed. 975, 15 C. C. A. 123. It is not a rule of universal application that laches cannot be set up in defence of a suit to enforce a charitable trust; Church of Christ at Independence, Mo., v. Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, 71 Fed. 250. 17 C. C. A. 397. Laches of a testator will be imputed to his executor; Halsey v. Cheney, 68 Fed. 763, 15 C. C. A. 656, 34 U. S. App. 50.

The defence of laches may be raised by a general demurrer; Meyer v. Saul, 82 Md. 459, 33 Atl. 539; Cammack v. Carpenter, 3 App. D. C. 219; Kerfoot v. Billings, 160 Ill. 563, 43 N. E. 804; or by plea or answer, or presented by argument either upon a preliminary or final hearing; Woodmanse & Hewitt Mfg. Co. v. Williams, 68 Fed. 489, 15 C. C. A. 520, 37 U. S. App. 109. That the defence to laches must be made by answer and not by demurrer, see Sage v. Culver, 147 N. Y. 241, 41 N. E. 513. Even though laches is not pleaded or the bill demurred to, courts of equity may withhold relief from those who have delayed the assertion of their claims for an unreasonable time; Willard v. Wood, 164 U. S. 502, 17 Sup. Ct. 176, 41 L. Ed. 531. See INJUNCTION.

LACTA. A lack of weight; deficiency in the weight of money. The verb lactare said to have been used in an assize in the sixth year of King John. Spel. Gloss.

LACUS. In Old English Law. An alloy of silver with base metal. Fleta l. 22, § 6. In Civil Law. A lake, a receptacle for water which is never allowed to get dry. Dig. 43, 14, 1, 3.

LADA. A method of trial by purgation. In vogue among the Saxons by which a person was purged of an accusation, as of an oath or ordeal. Spel. Gloss. In Old English Law. A lade or load. A water course, a trench or canal for draining marshy lands. Spel. Gloss.

A court of justice. A lade or lath. Cowell.

LADEN IN BULK. Having the cargo loose in the hold, and not enclosed in boxes, bales, bags, or casks.

LADY. In England, the proper title of any woman whose husband is higher in rank than baronet or knight, or who is the daughter of a nobleman not lower than an earl, though the title is given by courtesy also to the wives of baronets and knights. Cent. Dict.

See DAME; KNIGHT.

The word lady is derived from hloef dig (loaf day), which being applied to the mistress of a house came to be softened into the familiar term lady. On that day, it was the custom for the mistress of the manor to distribute bread to her poorer neighbors. Townsend, Manual of Dates, title Lady; 1 Chamb. Book of Days 154.

LADY-DAY. The 25th of March, the feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary. In parts of Ireland, however, they so designate the 15th of August, the festival of the Assumption of the Virgin.

Upon a parol demise, rent to take place from the following Lady day, evidence of the custom of the country is admissible to show that by Lady day the parties meant Old Lady Day; 4 B. & Ald. 588.

LADY'S FRIEND. Previous to the act of 1857, abolishing parliamentary divorces, a functionary in the British house of commons. When the husband sued for a divorce, or asked the passage of an act to divorce him from his wife, he was required to make a provision for her before the passage of the act; it was the duty of the lady's friend to see that such a provision was made. Macq. H. & W. 213.

LÆN (Anglo-Saxon). A loan. See BENEFICIUM.

LÆNLAND. Land held of a superior whether much or little. 1 Poll. & Maitl. 38.

Land given to the lessee and to two or three successive heirs of his; synonymous with loan land. This species of tenure seems to have been replaced by that of holding by book or bocland. See Maitl. Doomsday Book and Beyond 318. See FOLCLAND.

LÆSA MAJESTAS (Lat.). Læse-majesty, or injured majesty; high treason. It is a phrase taken from the civil law, and anciently meant any offence against the king's person or dignity, defined by 25 Edw. III. c. 6. See Glanv. lib. 5, c. 2; 4 Bla. Com. 75; Br. 118; CRIMEN LÆSÆ MAJESTATIS.

LÆSIO ENORMIS. The injury sustained by a party to an owner's contract who is overreached by the other to the extent of more than one-half the value of the thing sold. A rescript of Diocletian permitted a rescission of the sale by a vendor unless the purchaser agreed to the additional amount required to make up the value of the thing sold. Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 69.

It was sometimes called læsio ultra dimidium. Colq. C. L. § 2094.

LÆSIONE FIDEI, SUITS PRO. Proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts for spiritual offences against conscience, for non-payment of debts, or breaches of civil contracts. This attempt to turn the ecclesiastical courts into courts of equity was checked by the Constitutions of Clarendon, A. D. 1164; 3 Bla. Com. 52.

LAET. In Old English Law. One of a class between the servile and free. 1 Palg. Rise & Prog. 334.

Of this class it is said: "Thus degrees of servility are possible. A class may stand, as it were, halfway between the class of slaves and the class of free men. The Kentish law of the seventh century as it appears in the dooms of Æthelbert, like many of its continental sisters, knows a class of men who perhaps are not free men and yet are not slaves; it knows the laet as well as the theow. From what race the Kentish laet has sprung, and how, when it comes to details, the law will treat him—these are obscure questions, and the latter of them cannot be answered unless we apply to him what is written about the laeti, liti, and lidi of the continent. He is thus far a person that he has a small wergild, but possibly he is bound to the soil. Only in Æthelbert's dooms do we read of him. From later days, until Domesday Book breaks the silence, we do not obtain any definite evidence of the existence of any class of men who are not slaves but none the less are tied to the land." Maitl. Domesd. 27. The laete were afterwards termed by the Normans buiri, burs or coliberti; id. 36. "His services, we are told, vary from place to place; in some districts he works for his lord two days a week and during harvest-time three days a week; he pays gafol in money, barley, sheep, and poultry; also he has ploughing to do besides his week-work; he pays hearth-penny; he and one of his fellows must between them feed a dog. It is usual to provide him with an outfit of two oxen, one cow, six sheep, and seed for seven acres of his yardland, and also to provide him with household stuff; on his death all these chattels go back to his lord. Thus the boor is put before us as a tenant with a house and a yardland or virgate, and two plough oxen. He will therefore play a more important part in the manorial economy than the cottager who has no beasts. But he is a very dependent person; his beasts, even the poor furniture of his house, his pots and crocks, are provided for him by his lord. Probably it is this that marks him off from the ordinary villanus or 'townsman' and brings him near the serf. In a sense he may be a free man." id. 37.

In an earlier work of the same author it is said: "Once and only once, in the earliest of our Anglo-Saxon text (Æthelb. 26), we find mention, under the name of laet, of the half-free class of persons called litus and other like names in continental documents. To all appearance there had ceased to be any such class before the time of Alfred: it is therefore needless to discuss their condition or origin." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 13.

LAGA. The Law.

LAGAN (Sax. liggan, cubare). See LIGAN.

LAGEMAN or LAGA MAN. A juror. Cowell. In Old English Law. A man vested with or at least qualified for the exercise of jurisdiction, or sac and soc. Co. Litt. 58 a. See LAWMAN.

LAGEN or LAGENA. A measure of six sextarii. Fleta l. 2, c. viii. It was generally used as a measure of ale.

LAGHDAY or LAHDY. A day of open court; a day of the county court. Cowell; Toml.

LAGHSLITE or LASHLSLIT (Sax.). A breach of law. Cowell. A mulct for an offence, viz.: twelve "ores." 1 Anc. Inst. & Laws of Eng. 169.

LAGU. See LAGA.

LAHMAN. Anciently a lawyer. Maitl. Domesd. 189. It seems to be another form of lage man, which see.

LAICUS (Eccl. Lat.). A layman; laic; one not belonging to the priesthood. Harper's Lat. Dic.

LAID OUT. Used in reference to ways, it describes all conditions of a way, such as a way voted to be built, a way being built, or a way built. The context usually determines the meaning of the expression. Mansur v. County Com'rs, 83 Me. 514, 22 Atl. 358.

LAIRWITE (from the Sax. legan, to lie together, and wite, a fine, etc.). A fine for the offence of adultery and fornication which the lords of some manors had the privilege of imposing on their tenants. Co. 4 Inst. 206; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 47.

LAIS GENTS (O. Fr.). Secular people; laymen; a jury.

LAITY. Those persons who do not make a part of the clergy. They are divided into three states: 1. Civil, including all the nation, except the clergy, the army, and navy, and subdivided into the nobility and the commonalty. 2. Military. 3. Maritime, consisting of the navy. Whart. Lex. In the United States the division of the people into clergy and laity is not authorized by law, and is merely conventional.

LAIZ, LEEZ (O. Fr.). A legate. Kelh.

LAKE. A body of water surrounded by land, or not forming part of the ocean, and occupying a depression below the ordinary drainage level of the region. Cent. Dict.

The fact that there is a current from a higher to a lower level does not make that a river which would otherwise be a lake; and the fact that a river swells out in broad pond-like sheets with a current does not make that a lake which would otherwise be a river; State v. Town of Gilmanton, 14 N. H. 477.

The earlier decisions in this country tended to support the doctrine that no riparian owner could acquire title to the bed of any lake however small; Waterman v. Johnson, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 261; Wood v. Kelley, 30 Me. 47; but they were based upon the Massachusetts ordinance of 1647 (when the territory of Maine was a part of Massachusetts) which provided that all lakes more than ten acres in extent should be the property of the state for the benefit of the public. Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. City of Fall River, 147 Mass. 548, 18 N. E. 465, 1 L. R. A. 466. Other state courts followed these decisions, however, and while it is a recognized principle in this country that the title to the soil below the waters of a navigable lake is in the state and not in the owner of the abutting soil; Champlain & St. L. R. Co. v. Valentine, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 484; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 13, 14 Sup. Ct. 548, 38 L. Ed. 331; Morris v. U. S., 174 U. S. 196, 19 Sup. Ct. 649, 43 L. Ed. 946; Austin v. R. Co., 45 Vt. 215; it has been also held that this principle applies to the bed of a non-navigable lake; Edwards v. Ogle, 76 Ind. 302; Noyes v. Collins, 92 Ia. 566, 61 N. W. 250, 26 L. R. A. 609, 54 Am. St. Rep. 571; but see as to the last case, Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 838, 35 L. Ed. 428, which held that the Illinois case did not establish in that state the doctrine that the bed of small lakes does not belong to riparian owners, there being another ground on which the decision was also based; therefore, although it is the practice of the federal courts to follow the decisions of the state courts, they refused in this instance so to do, reversing Hardin v. Jordan, 16 Fed. 823.

In Hardin v. Shedd, 190 U. S. 508, 23 Sup. Ct. 685, 47 L. Ed. 1156, it is said that the law of Illinois has been settled since Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 838, 35 L. Ed. 428, that conveyances of the upland do not carry adjoining land below the water line, citing Fuller v. Shedd, 161 Ill. 462, 44 N. E. 286, 33 L. R. A. 146, 52 Am. St. Rep. 380; Hardin v. Shedd, 177 Ill. 123, 52 N. E. 380; Hammond v. Shepard, 186 Ill. 235, 57 N. E. 867, 78 Am. St. Rep. 274. Whether a patentee of the United States to land bounded on a non-navigable lake belonging to the United States takes title to the adjoining submerged land is determined by the law of the state where the land lies; Hardin v. Shedd, 190 U. S. 508, 23 Sup. Ct. 685, 47 L. Ed. 1156.

Later decisions in New York also overruled the case of Wheeler v. Spinola, 54 N. Y. 377; and hold that the bed of a non-navigable inland lake belongs to the abutting riparian owner; Gouverneur v. Ice Co., 134 N. Y. 355, 31 N. E. 865, 18 L. R. A. 695, 30 Am. St. Rep. 669, reversing 57 Hun 474, 11 N. Y. Supp. 87; and see in support of this doctrine, Webber v. Boom Co., 62 Mich. 626, 30 N. W. 469; Cobb v. Davenport, 32 N. J. L. 369; Ridgway v. Ludlow, 58 Ind. 248; Olson v. Huntamer, 6 S. D. 364, 61 N. W. 479.

Adjacent owners of land on a lake own the land under water fronting their premises to the "thread of the lake"—which, where there is no outlet, passes through the center point of the lake on its longest diameter; Calkins v. Hart, 64 Misc. 149, 118 N. Y. Supp. 1049.

Where a non-navigable inland lake is the subject of private ownership, neither the public nor an adjacent land owner has a right to boat upon it or to fish in its waters; Lembeck v. Nye, 47 Ohio St. 336, 24 N. E. 686, 8 L. R. A. 578, 21 Am. St. Rep. 828; and such an owner may lease his interest in the bed of the lake for a term of years, reserving to himself the right of fishing therein; Bass Lake Co. v. Hollenbeck, 11 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 508.

It is held that riparian rights do not extend beyond access to navigable water and this is subject to a general right of navigation; Stuart v. Greanyea, 154 Mich. 132, 117 N. W. 655, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 257.

In North Carolina it has been held that the bed of a lake may be the subject of private ownership, but if the waters are navigable in their natural state, the public have an easement of navigation in them which cannot be obstructed; State v. Narrows Island Club, 100 N. C. 477, 5 S. E. 411, 6 Am. St. Rep. 618. The riparian proprietor upon a navigable lake has the exclusive right of access to and from the lake in front of his land and of building wharves in aid of navigation not interfering with the public rights; Delaplaine v. Ry. Co., 42 Wis. 214, 24 Am. Rep. 386; Rice v. Ruddiman, 10 Mich. 125. See Austin v. R. Co., 45 Vt. 215. In England, a non-tidal lake is the subject of private ownership; L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641.

Where the ownership of the bed of the lake is in the state, it has no power arbitrarily to destroy the rights of the riparian owner on such lake without his consent and without due process of law, for the sole purpose of benefiting some other riparian owner or for any other merely private purpose; and an act authorizing the drainage of such a lake without the consent of a riparian owner is unconstitutional; Priewe v. Imp. Co., 93 Wis. 534, 67 N. W. 918, 33 L. R. A. 645; nor have a board of supervisors, in the absence of a statute directly conferring it, the right to construct a bridge over such a lake; Snyder v. Foster, 77 Ia. 638, 42 N. W. 506.

The water of a navigable lake cannot be withdrawn below the original low water mark for irrigation purposes, to the injury of a riparian owner who acquired his rights prior to the adoption of the constitutional provision vesting title to the navigable waters in the state; Madson v. Water Co., 40 Wash. 414, 82 Pac. 718, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 257.

In the case of a meandered lake the riparian proprietor is held entitled to the middle thereof; Olson v. Huntamer, 6 S. D. 364, 61 N. W. 479; but in Illinois the title to such waters and the land covered by them is held to be in the state in trust for the people; Fuller v. Shedd, 161 Ill. 462, 44 N. E. 286, 33 L. R. A. 146, 52 Am. St. Rep. 380. Meander lines do not cut off land between such lines and the waters of a meandered lake; Stoner v. Rice, 121 Ind. 51, 22 N. E. 968, 6 L. R. A. 387; Boorman v. Sunnuchs, 42 Wis. 233; Pere Marquette Boom Co. v. Adams, 44 Mich. 403, 6 N. W. 857; Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 838, 35 L. Ed. 428; and derelict land left by the receding waters of a meandered lake is held to belong to the riparian owners; Warren v. Chambers, 25 Ark. 120, 97 Am. Dec. 538, 4 Am. Rep. 23; Poynter v. Chipman, 8 Utah 442, 32 Pac. 690; but not where the lake is artificially drained; Noyes v. Collins, 92 Ia. 566, 61 N. W. 250, 26 L. R. A. 609, 54 Am. St. Rep. 571; and in Illinois, gradual recession of the waters of a meandered lake is held to give the riparian proprietors the right to the new land by following the recession of the waters to their edge; but a considerable body of new land suddenly or perceptibly formed by reliction is held to belong to the state; Fuller v. Shedd, 161 Ill. 462, 44 N. E. 286, 33 L. R. A. 146, 52 Am. St. Rep. 380.

Where a non-navigable pond several hundred acres in area gradually dried up, leaving a tract of fertile land, and the riparian owners, who, by the law of the state (Minnesota), owned the beds of such ponds, applied to have their boundary lines determined, it was settled that they each took triangular pieces meeting at the center of the pond; Scheifert v. Briegel, 90 Minn. 125, 96 N. W. 44, 63 L. R. A. 296, 101 Am. St. Rep. 399.

See 18 L. R. A. 695, n.; BOUNDARY; GREAT LAKES; HIGH SEAS; NAVIGABLE WATERS; PONDS; RIPARIAN RIGHTS; WATERS.

LAMBARD'S ARCHAION. A discourse upon the high court of justice in England, by William Lambard, published in 1635. Marv. Leg. Bibl.

LAMBARD'S ARCHAIONOMIA. A collection of the laws of the Anglo-Saxons, William the Conqueror and Henry I., published in 1568 by William Lambard, keeper of the records in the tower. Marv. Leg. Bibl.; Allibone, Dict. Authors.

LAMBETH DEGREE. A degree given by the archbishop of Canterbury. 1 Bla. Com. 381, n. Although he can confer all degrees given by the two universities, the holders of university degrees have many privileges not shared by the recipients of his degrees.

LAMMAS DAY. The 1st of August. Cowell. It is one of the Scotch quarter days, and is what is called a "conventional term." Moz. & W.

"This was one of the four great pagan festivals of Britain, the others being on 1st November, 1st February, and 1st May. The festival of the Gule of August, as it was called, probably celebrated the realization of the first fruits of the earth, and more particularly that of the grain-harvest. When Christianity was introduced, the day continued to be observed as a festival on these grounds, and, from a loaf being the usual offering at church, the service, and consequently the day, came to be called Hlaf-mass, subsequently shortened into Lammas. . . . This we would call the rational definition of the word Lammas. There is another, but in our opinion utterly inadmissible, derivation, pointing to the custom of bringing a lamb on this day, as an offering to the cathedral church of York. Without doubt, this custom, which was purely local, would take its rise with reference to the term Lammas, after the true original signification of that word had been forgotten." Chamb. Book of Days.

LAMMAS LANDS. Open, arable, and meadow land which was kept open and by many owners in severalty during so much of the year as was necessary to receive and remove the crop of the several owners, after which they were held and used in common, not only to the owners, but to inhabitants of the parish, manor, or borough. Since Sept. 2, 1752, such lands are open August 12th, under 24 Geo. II. c. 23, § 5; but their name was derived from the earlier practice of keeping them open from Lammas Day to Lady Day. See Elton, Commons 36.

These lands were thus defined: "Lands belonging to the owner in fee simple who is absolutely the owner in fee simple, to all intents and purposes for half the year; and the other half of the year he is still the owner in fee simple, subject to a right of pasturage over the land by other people." Jessel, M. R., in 46 L. J. Ch. 721; 6 Ch. D. 507.

LANCASTER. See COURTS OF THE COUNTY PALATINE.

LANCETI. Vassals who were obliged to work for their lord one day in the week from Michaelmas to Autumn, either with fork, spade, or flail at the lord's option. Spel. Glos.

LAND. Any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever: as, meadows, pastures, woods, waters, marshes, furzes, and heath. Kingsley v. Holbrook, 45 N. H. 313, 86 Am. Dec. 173.

An estate of frank tenement at the least. Shepp. Touch. 92.

The term terra in Latin was used to denote land from terendo quia vomere teritur (because it is broken by the plough), and accordingly, in fines and recoveries, land, i. e. terra, was formerly held to mean arable land. Cowp. 346; Co. Litt. 4 a. But see Cro. Eliz. 476; 4 Bingh. 90. See also 2 P. Wms. 458, n.; 5 Ves. 476; 20 Vin. Abr. 203.

At common law the term land has a twofold meaning. In its more general sense, it includes any ground, soil, or earth whatsoever, as meadows, pastures, woods, marshes, furze, etc.; 1 Inst. 4 a; 2 Bla. Com. 18. In its more limited sense, the term land denotes the quantity and character of the interest or estate which the tenant may hold in land. The land is one thing, and the estate in land is another thing, for an estate in land is a time in land or land for a time. Plowd. 555.

Generally, in wills, "land" is used in its broadest sense; Schoul. Wills § 498; 1 Jarm. Wills 604, n.; 1 Pow. Dev. 186; Pond v. Bergh, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 140. A freehold estate in reversion or remainder will pass under the term; 3 P. Wms. 55; Hunter v. Hunter, 17 Barb. (N. Y.) 86; or in a deed; Pond v. Bergh, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 156. But as the word has two senses, one general and one restricted, if it occur in connection with other words which either in whole or in part, supply the difference between the two senses, that is a reason for taking it in its less general sense: e. g. in a grant of lands, meadows, and pastures, the former word is held to mean only arable land. Cro. Eliz. 476, 659; Van Gorden v. Jackson, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 440.

If one be seized of some lands in fee, and possessed of other lands for years, all in one parish, and he grant all his lands in that parish (without naming them), in fee-simple, or for life, by this grant shall pass no more than the lands he hath in fee-simple; Shepp. Touchst. 92. But if a man have no freehold estate, "lands," in a will, will pass his leasehold; and now, by statute, leasehold will pass if no contrary intent is shown, and the description is applicable even if he have freehold; 1 Vict. c. 26; 2 B. & P. 303; 1 P. Wms. 286; 11 Beav. 237, 250.

Incorporeal hereditaments will not pass under "lands," if there is any other real estate to satisfy the devise; but if there is no other such real estate they will pass, by statute; Moore 359, pl. 49. See REAL PROPERTY; FIXTURES. Incorporeal hereditaments have been held not land; Boreel v. City of New York, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 552. See People v. Board, 39 N. Y. 87; contra, People v. Cassity, 46 N. Y. 46; People v. Com'rs of Taxes, 101 N. Y. 322, 4 N. E. 127. The word land does not comprehend rents which are incorporeal, which are not lands, but mere rights or profits issuing out of lands and tenements corporeal; Franciscus v. Reigart, 4 Watts (Pa.) 109; Herrington v. Budd, 5 Denio (N. Y.) 324. In a statute the term has been held to include an easement, if such construction appears to have been in accordance with the intention of the legislature; 15 L. J. Ch. 306. Land has been held to include servitudes, easements, rents, and other incorporeal hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interests therein, equitable as well as legal; Oskaloosa Water Co. v. Board, 84 Ia. 407, 51 N. W. 18, 15 L. R. A. 296; Butler v. Green, 65 Hun 99, 19 N. Y. Supp. 890; and to be synonymous with the terms real estate and real property; Black v. Min. Co., 49 Fed. 549; and to include leases for years, remainders, reversions, rent-charges, tithes, advowsons, and titles of honor; 30 Ch. Div. 136.

Land has an indefinite extent upward as well as downward; therefore, land legally includes all houses or other buildings standing or built on it, and whatever is in a direct line between the surface and the centre of the earth; 3 Kent 378, n. See Co. Litt. 4 a; Lanpher v. Glenn, 37 Minn. 4, 33 N. W. 10; Wood, Inst. 120; 2 Bla. Com. 18; 1 Cruise, Dig. 58; REAL PROPERTY.

Where adequate adverse possession of the surface gives title to it, such title will not cover mines in operation underneath; President, etc., of Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Hughes, 183 Pa. 66, 38 Atl. 568, 38 L. R. A. 826, 63 Am. St. Rep. 743. Ejectment will lie for a telephone wire strung without right over the plaintiff's premises; Butler v. Tel. Co., 109 App. Div. 217, 95 N. Y. Supp. 684.

The right to develop the natural resources of land. All land is held subject to the right, in the state, of taxation and eminent domain. The right to put his land to the most profitable use for his own benefit is one of the landowner's privileges, but how far this right extends has been the subject of much adjudication by the courts. He may develop its natural resources by mining, even if by so doing he injure the property of an adjacent landowner; Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 113 Pa. 126, 6 Atl. 453, 57 Am. Rep. 445 (overruling Sanderson v. Coal Co., 86 Pa. 401, 27 Am. Rep. 711, where Black, C. J., laid down the rule that "the necessities of one man's business cannot be the standard of another's rights in a thing belonging to both"); he may make use of springs on his land, even if he thereby drain a stream in which others have a property right; Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528, 64 Am. Dec. 721; or he may increase the volume of water in such a stream by draining his own swamp land; Kauffman v. Griesemer, 26 Pa. 407, 67 Am. Dec. 437; and if by any of these methods, he injure another, it is a damnum absque injuria.

He may not collect upon his land or suffer to accumulate there anything which, if it escape, may do injury to others, without being liable for all the resulting damage it may do; Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330 (the leading case on the subject); he may not erect upon his land a manufacturing establishment, which is not intended to develop its natural resources, without being liable for any nuisance it may create to others; Townsend v. Bell, 62 Hun 306, 17 N. Y. Supp. 210; Robb v. Carnegie Bros. & Co., 145 Pa. 324, 22 Atl. 649, 14 L. R. A. 329, 27 Am. St. Rep. 694; and he may be enjoined from maintaining a nuisance on his land, where such nuisance can be avoided, without proof of damage to plaintiff or negligence on the part of defendant. See FIRE.

He may not divert the water of a stream to an unusual course, even if the quantity of water is not diminished thereby; Amsterdam Knitting Co. v. Dean, 13 App. Div. 42, 43 N. Y. Supp. 29.

He may not obstruct a passway over his land which has been continuously used by the public for more than 15 years; Gatewood v. Cooper (Ky.) 38 S. W. 690.

He may explode nitro-glycerine for the purpose of increasing the flow of natural gas, although by so doing he draw gas from the land of another; Tyner v. Gas Co., 131 Ind. 408, 31 N. E. 61; but he is held liable in damages where he uses for that purpose an explosive so powerful as to injure the property of an adjoining owner; Morgan v. Bowes, 62 Hun 623, 17 N. Y. Supp. 22; and he may be enjoined from so doing where he can otherwise obtain the same result, although at an increased cost to himself; Hill v. Schneider, 13 App. Div. 299, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1.

In the interest of the public there has been much legislation for the regulation and preservation of the natural resources of land which necessarily has operated as a restraint upon the right of the owner to use it as he pleases. Statutes of this character which have been held valid are: For protecting the water supply of the state, forbidding the cutting or destruction of trees growing on wild and uncultivated lands or the wanton cutting of small trees on such lands; In re Opinions of Justices, 103 Me. 506, 69 Atl. 627, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 422, 13 Ann. Cas. 745; prohibiting the flow of water from private artesian wells except for certain specified beneficial purposes, as irrigation or domestic use; Ex parte Elam, 6 Cal. App. 233, 91 Pac. 811; contra, Huber v. Merkel, 117 Wis. 355, 94 N. W. 354, 62 L. R. A. 589, 98 Am. St. Rep. 933; placing restrictions on owners of private oyster beds in taking oysters from them; Windsor v. State, 103 Md. 611, 64 Atl. 288, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 869; making it unlawful for any person owning or controlling a gas or oil well to permit its flow except under certain restrictions tending to prevent waste and depletion of the general supply; Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 20 Sup. Ct. 576, 44 L. Ed. 729, affirming 150 Ind. 694, 49 N. E. 1107; or to use natural gas for illuminating purposes in what are known as flambeau lights; Townsend v. State, 147 Ind. 624, 47 N. E. 19, 37 L. R. A. 294, 62 Am. St. Rep. 477; or to transport water into another state; Hudson County Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U. S. 349, 28 Sup. Ct. 529, 52 L. Ed. 828, 14 Ann. Cas. 560, affirming 70 N. J. Eq. 695, 65 Atl. 489, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 197, 118 Am. St. Rep. 754, 10 Ann. Cas. 116; preventing the waste of petroleum, natural gas and salt water, and providing for the plugging of all abandoned wells; Com. v. Trent, 117 Ky. 34, 77 S. W. 390, 4 Ann. Cas. 209; forbidding the pumping of water and gas for sale through wells connected with a natural reservoir of mineral water to the injury of the public by causing the waste of an important and valuable natural product, imperiling the value of a large amount of property and interfering with the reasonable use by all members of the community of a common supply of the natural product; Gagnon v. Hotel Co., 163 Ind. 687, 72 N. E. 849, 68 L. R. A. 175; Willis v. City of Perry, 92 Ia. 297, 60 N. W. 727, 26 L. R. A. 124; Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35; Hathorn v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 194 N. Y. 326, 87 N. E. 504, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 436, 128 Am. St. Rep. 555, 16 Ann. Cas. 989.

The remedy can be enforced in such cases by the suit of taxpayers who own such springs; id.

LAND BOOK. See LANDBOC.

LAND CEAP, LAND CHEAP (land, and Sax. ceapan, to buy). A fine payable in money or cattle, upon the alienation of land, within certain manors and liberties. Cowell. A method of land transfer prevailing in Britain in the ninth century. The transaction although a sale, took the form of a grant. How far the practice went back to old English roots, and to what extent it was the result of Scandinavian influence, it is said to be impossible to tell. From the fact that the books frequently mention a symbolic investiture by sod, which has no necessary connection with the drawing up of a book, it may be gathered that the delivery of the sod was the characteristic symbol of tradition in the land ceap; 20 Harv. L. Rev. 532; See Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond 323.

LAND CERTIFICATE. A certificate given to a registered proprietor of freehold land under the English Land Transfer Act of 1875. A similar certificate is given to the transferee on every subsequent transfer. It contains a description of the land as it appears on the register and the name and address of the proprietor, and is prima facie evidence of the truth of the matters therein set forth.

LAND COP. The sale of land which was evidenced in early English law by the transfer of a rod or festuca (q. v.) as a symbol of possession which was handed by the seller to the reeve and by the reeve to the purchaser. The conveyance was made in court, it is supposed, for securing better evidence of it, and barring the claims of expectant heirs; Maitl. Domesd. B. 323.

LAND COURT. The name of a court which formerly existed in the city of St. Louis, state of Missouri, having sole jurisdiction in St. Louis county in suits respecting lands, and in actions of ejectment, dower, partition. As to the United States courts for the determination of public land claims, see UNITED STATES COURTS; LAND DEPARTMENT. See LANDS, PUBLIC.

LAND GABEL. A tax or duty on land. See GABEL. It is said to have been originally a penny for a house; Spel. Gloss.; and by another authority, in Domesday Book it was a quit-rent for a house site similar to the modern ground rent. Whart. L. Dict. Spelled also Land Gable. Moz. & W.

LAND GABLE. See LAND GABEL.

LAND GRANT. A legislative appropriation of a portion of the public domain either for charitable or eleemosynary purpose, or for the promotion of the construction of a railroad or other public work.

Although the public lands of the United States and of the various states have been to a great extent conveyed by deeds or patents issued in virtue of general laws, many specific grants have also been made, and were the usual method of transfer during the colonial period. See 3 Wash. R. P. 181; 4 Kent 450, 494; Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 543, 5 L. Ed. 681.

It is always to be borne in mind in construing a congressional grant that the act by which it is made is a law as well as a conveyance, and that such effect must be given to it as will carry out the intent of congress; and this intent should not be defeated by applying to the grant the common-law rule making grants applicable only to transfers between private parties; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. R. Co., 97 U. S. 491, 24 L. Ed. 1095. To ascertain that intent courts will look to the condition of the country at the time of making the grants, as well as the purpose of the grants as expressed on their face; Winona & St. P. R. Co. v. Barney, 113 U. S. 618, 5 Sup. Ct. 606, 28 L. Ed. 1109.

All government grants are to be strictly construed against the grantees. Nothing passes but what is conveyed in clear and explicit language, and nothing can be implied; Dubuque & P. R. Co. v. Litchfield, 23 How. (U. S.) 66, 16 L. Ed. 500; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Ry. Co., 23 N. J. Eq. 441; Leavenworth, L. & G. R. Co. v. U. S., 92 U. S. 733, 23 L. Ed. 634. Technical words of conveyancing are not required; Shaw v. Kellogg, 170 U. S. 341, 18 Sup. Ct. 632, 42 L. Ed. 1050.

The grant of lands to a state in aid of a railroad does not interfere with the settlement of the lands granted, but otherwise of a grant to a railroad; St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. v. Baldwin, 103 U. S. 426, 26 L. Ed. 578.

The provisions of various acts of congress that the land-grant railroads "shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the government, free from all toll or other charge for transportation of any property or troops of the United States," mean that the government may use the roads, with all fixtures and appurtenances, but not that it may compel the roads to transport property and troops without compensation; Lake Superior & M. R. Co. v. U. S., 12 Ct. Cl. 35. Such a railroad is under a perpetual contract made by the Land Grant Act of May 17, 1856, to carry the mails at such rates as congress may by law direct or the postmaster-general determine; Jacksonville, P. & M. R. Co. v. U. S., 21 Ct. Cl. 155.

Priority of grant settles the title of the railroad where the claims conflict and not the priority in filing maps of definite location; U. S. v. R. Co., 146 U. S. 570, 13 Sup. Ct. 152, 36 L. Ed. 1091; and when grants are made to two railroads, none of the land passes to the second which comes within the prospective rights of the first; U. S. v. Lime Co., 146 U. S. 615, 13 Sup. Ct. 163, 36 L. Ed. 1104.

Title does not vest until the lands are actually selected and set apart under the direction of the secretary of the interior; U. S. v. Ry. Co., 141 U. S. 358, 12 Sup. Ct. 13, 35 L. Ed. 766; Resser v. Carney, 52 Minn. 397, 54 N. W. 89.

In case of conflict between railroad land grants the elder title must prevail. So held, where the Northern Pacific Railroad claimed land in Minnesota under a grant of July 2, 1864, and the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad claimed part of the same lands under acts of congress of March 3, 1865, and March 3, 1871; St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. R. Co., 139 U. S. 1, 11 Sup. Ct. 389, 35 L. Ed. 77.

Where lands are granted by acts of congress of the same date, or by the same act, in aid of two railroads that must necessarily intersect, each grantee takes an undivided moiety of the lands within the conflicting limits; Sioux City & St. P. R. Co. v. U. S., 159 U. S. 349, 16 Sup. Ct. 17, 40 L. Ed. 177; Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. U. S., 159 U. S. 372, 16 Sup. Ct. 26, 40 L. Ed. 185.

Where congress grants the odd-numbered sections of land for a given distance on each side of a railroad, before the road is located, the title does not pass to any particular sections until the line of the road is made certain, which makes certain also the sections granted; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Smith, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 95, 19 L. Ed. 599.

Where an act of congress makes a grant of land of the odd-numbered sections within a certain distance of a railroad, the title of the corporation to the land vests at once, and can only be thereafter divested by the government for a failure to perform conditions imposed, or upon a proper proceeding instituted to revest the title in the government; Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Orton, 32 Fed. 457.

The revocation of a land grant to a corporation which has become dormant, and the transfer thereof to another corporation by an act of the state legislature, is not an invasion of private rights and does not, unless so expressed or clearly implied, burden the transfer with the debts of the dormant corporation; Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Ry. Co., 163 U. S. 31, 16 Sup. Ct. 917, 41 L. Ed. 60.

Where land is granted to a railroad company before its line is located, the title to the specific land attaches by a location of the road, and takes effect by relation as of the date of the grant, so as to cut off intervening claims of other roads, claiming under other grants, unless the lands are specially reserved in the statute; Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Ry. Co., 97 U. S. 491, 24 L. Ed. 1095.

The grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad of certain public lands was a grant in præsenti. Yet it is in the nature of a float, and the title does not attach to any specific section until capable of identification; but when once identified, the title attaches as of the date of the grant; Amacker v. R. Co., 58 Fed. 850, 7 C. C. A. 518, 15 U. S. App. 279. A railroad company takes title to the land upon complying with the act and not before; Washington & I. R. Co. v. Nav. Co., 60 Fed. 981, 9 C. C. A. 303, 15 U. S. App. 359.

A grant for a railroad right of way takes effect from the date of the act and is superior to homestead entries made subsequently, but prior to building the road; Northern P. Ry. Co. v. Hasse, 197 U. S. 9, 25 Sup. Ct. 305, 49 L. Ed. 642.

"Indemnity lands" are those selected in lieu of parcels lost from the designated lands by previous disposition or reservation; they are also called "lieu lands"; Wisconsin C. R. Co. v. Price County, 133 U. S. 496, 10 Sup. Ct. 341, 33 L. Ed. 687.

In acts making land grants to railroad companies, conditions are usually imposed which must be complied with to make the grant operative. Among such conditions are frequently named such as make the grant dependent upon the amount of net earnings, and accordingly, the phrase has been frequently the subject of construction in that connection. "Net earnings," within the meaning of such a law, are ascertained by deducting from gross earnings all ordinary expenses of organization and of operating the road, and expenditures bona fide made in improvements, and paid out of earnings, and not by the issue of bonds or stock; but not deducting interest paid on any of the bonded debt of the company; Union P. R. Co. v. U. S., 99 U. S. 402, 25 L. Ed. 274. See LANDS, PUBLIC.

LAND-MARK. A monument set up in order to ascertain the boundaries between two contiguous estates. For removing a landmark an action lies. 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 787. See MONUMENTS.

LAND OFFICE. A government bureau established in 1812, originally connected with the treasury, but since 1849 forming a division of the Department of the Interior.

The commissioner of the general land office performs, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, all executive duties appertaining to the surveying and sales of the public lands of the United States, or in any wise respecting such public lands, and also such as relate to private grants of land, and the issuing of patents for all land under the authority of the government; R. S. U. S. §§ 446–461; he has absolute jurisdiction of any particular grant of public land; Catholic Bishop of Nesqually v. Gibbon, 158 U. S. 155, 15 Sup. Ct. 779, 39 L. Ed. 931; he has the power to supervise the action of the officers of a local land office and to annul a fraudulent entry, but his action is not conclusive; U. S. v. Steenerson, 50 Fed. 504, 1 C. C. A. 552, 4 U. S. App. 332; and the courts are not concluded by the decision of the land department on a question of law; Wisconsin

Cent. R. Co. v. Forsythe, 159 U. S. 46, 15 Sup. Ct. 1020, 40 L. Ed. 71.

The general land office has charge of the record of title to the vast area known as the public domain, and all business pertaining to the survey, disposition, and patenting of the public lands of the United States is transacted through it or under its order and supervision. All questions of fact decided by the general land office are binding everywhere, and injunctions and mandamus proceedings will not lie against its officers; Litchfield v. The Register, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 575, 19 L. Ed. 681; Gaines v. Thompson, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 347, 19 L. Ed. 62; The Secretary v. McGarrahan, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 298, 19 L. Ed. 579; but a court of equity, after the title has passed from the United States, may relieve against mistakes of law in collateral proceedings, but it must be clear that a mistake of law has been committed; Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 535, 24 L. Ed. 848; and if the alleged mistake be a mixed one of law and fact so that the court cannot separate it so as to see clearly where the mistake of law is, the decision is conclusive; Marquez v. Frisbie, 101 U. S. 476, 25 L. Ed. 800.

Decisions of the land office upon questions of fact within their jurisdiction cannot be reviewed in a collateral proceeding; Stoneroad v. Stoneroad, 158 U. S. 240, 15 Sup. Ct. 822, 39 L. Ed. 966. Its construction upon an act of congress and its usage for eighteen years is entitled to considerable weight; U. S. v. Ry. Co., 148 U. S. 562, 13 Sup. Ct. 724, 37 L. Ed. 560. Its decisions upon questions of fact are conclusive; Catholic Bishop of Nesqually v. Gibbon, 158 U. S. 155, 15 Sup. Ct. 779, 39 L. Ed. 931. Its rules and regulations have the effect and force of law on the due observance of which all citizens have the right to rely; Germania Iron Co. v. U. S., 58 Fed. 334, 7 C. C. A. 256, 19 U. S. App. 10.

In all matters confided by law to their examination and decision the United States land officers act judicially, and their decisions are as final as those of other courts; State v. Bachelder, 5 Minn. 223 (Gil. 178), 80 Am. Dec. 410; and although such action is generally conclusive, the land office, up to the issuing of the patent in their divestiture of title, cannot by its subsequent action upon a fictitious claim defeat rights already vested. See LAND PATENT.

In a bill which seeks to show that a decision of the land department was procured by fraud, it must be shown that some trick or deceit was practised on the officers of the department. Where such a bill attacks such a decision on the ground that the officers of the department have misconstrued and misapplied the law, it must set out the evidence and what the department found the facts to be, so that the court can separate the department's finding of facts from its conclusions of law. It is not necessary to give notice of a contest before the land department to the predecessors in title of a claimant; Durango Land & Coal Co. v. Evans, 80 Fed. 425, 25 C. C. A. 523.

LAND PATENT. A muniment of title issued by a government or state for the conveyance of some portion of the public domain.

The issue of a land patent is the conveyance of public lands to the person or persons who, by compliance with the law, have become entitled thereto under a land grant (q. v.). It is a conveyance by the government when it has any interest to convey. Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488, 7 Sup. Ct. 985, 30 L. Ed. 1039.

A patent issued under the act of congress of March 3, 1851, to settle land titles under the Mexican grant, "is not only the deed of the United States, but it is a solemn record of the government, of its action and judgment with respect to the title of the claimant existing at the date of the cession. By it the sovereign power, which alone could determine the matter, declares that the previous grant was genuine; that the claim under it was valid and entitled to recognition and confirmation by the law of nations and the stipulations of the treaty; and that the grant was located, or might have been located, by the former government, and is correctly located by the new government, so as to embrace the premises as they are surveyed and described. Whilst this declaration remains of record, the government itself cannot question its verity, nor can parties claiming through the government by title subsequent." Field, C. J., in Teschemacher v. Thompson, 18 Cal. 11, 26, 79 Am. Dec. 151.

Nature and effect of patents generally. A grant of land is a public law standing on the statute books of the state, and is notice to every subsequent purchaser under any conflicting sale made afterward; Wineman v. Gastrell, 54 Fed. 819, 4 C. C. A. 596, 2 U. S. App. 581. The final certificate or receipt acknowledging the payment in full by a homesteader or pre-emptor is not in legal effect a conveyance of the land; U. S. v. Steenerson, 50 Fed. 504, 1 C. C. A. 552, 4 U. S. App. 332. It transfers the full equitable title; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Smith, 159 U. S. 66, 15 Sup. Ct. 994, 40 L. Ed. 77. A patent alone passes land from the United States to the grantee; Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. (U. S.) 498, 10 L. Ed. 264; not only as it was at the time of the survey, but as it is at the date of the patent; Jefferis v. Land Co., 134 U. S. 178, 10 Sup. Ct. 518, 33 L. Ed. 872; and nothing passes a perfect title to public lands but a patent, except where congress grants lands in words of present grant; Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. (U. S.) 498, 10 L. Ed. 264; though its delivery to the patentee is not essential to pass the title; U. S. v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378, 26 L. Ed. 167; and the United States cannot by authority of its own officers invalidate that patent by the issuing of a second one for the same property; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Campbell, 135 U. S. 286, 10 Sup. Ct. 765, 34 L. Ed. 155; see Morton v. Nebraska, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 660, 22 L. Ed. 639; Doe v. Winn, 11 Wheat. (U. S.) 380, 6 L. Ed. 500; or divest the title by giving a patent to another; Speck v. Riggin, 40 Mo. 406. Its office is to define the land; Owens v. Jackson, 9 Cal. 322; it has been said to be equivalent to a deed; Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 387. After land has been sold by certificate, the United States holds the legal title until the patent issues, but only in trust for the purchaser; and the officers can only act ministerially and issue it to him, and cannot act judicially and determine that another claimant is entitled to it; Arnold v. Grimes, 2 Ia. 1. A patent is conclusive against all whose rights commence subsequently to its date; Hoofnagle v. Anderson, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 212, 5 L. Ed. 437; it conveys the legal title and leaves the equities open; Brush v. Ware, 15 Pet. (U. S.) 93, 10 L. Ed. 672. It relates back to the date of purchase, and title to real estate, acquired under an execution sale, cannot be defeated by the issuing of a patent to the execution defendant, bearing date subsequent to the sale by the sheriff; Cavender v. Smith's Heirs, 5 Ia. 157. But a patent for public land will not be held to take effect by virtue of the doctrine of relation, as of the date of the initial step taken by the patentee, where it appears that the rights by him acquired under such initial step were lost by his lack of diligence, and third parties' rights had intervened; Evans v. Coal Co., 80 Fed. 433, 25 C. C. A. 531.

Where the United States has parted with title by a patent legally issued, and upon surveys legally made by itself and approved by the proper department, the title so granted cannot be impaired by any subsequent survey made by the government for its own purposes; Cage v. Danks, 13 La. Ann. 128. A patent founded on a void entry and survey nevertheless passes the legal title from the government to the patentee, but the commencement of the title is the patent; Stubblefield v. Boggs, 2 Ohio St. 216. It passes to the patentee every thing connected with the soil, forming any portion of its bed, or fixed to its surface; in short, everything connected with the term "land"; Moore v. Smaw, 17 Cal. 199, 79 Am. Dec. 123.

A patent for land is the highest evidence of title and is conclusive as against the government, and all claiming under junior patents or titles, until set aside or annulled, unless it is absolutely void on its face; U. S. v. Stone, 2 Wall. (U. S.) 525, 17 L. Ed. 765; Warren v. Van Brunt, 19 Wall. (U. S.) 646, 22 L. Ed. 219; St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636, 26 L. Ed. 875; the presumption being that it is valid and passes the legal title; Minter v. Crommelin, 18 How. (U. S.) 87, 15 L. Ed. 279. When issued upon confirmation of a claim or a previously existing title, it is documentary evidence, having the dignity of a record of the existence of that title or of such equities respecting the claim as justify its recognition and confirmation; Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488, 7 Sup. Ct. 985, 30 L. Ed. 1039; it must be interpreted as a whole; its various provisions in connection with each other, and the legal deduction drawn therefrom must be conformable with the document; Brown v. Huger, 21 How. (U. S.) 305, 16 L. Ed. 125.

A patent for unimproved lands, no part of which was in the possession of any one at the time it was issued, gives a legal seisin and constructive possession of all the lands within the survey; Peyton v. Stith, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 485, 8 L. Ed. 200. The identity of the land must be ascertained by a reasonable construction of the patent, but if rendered wholly uncertain by inaccurate description the grant is void; Boardman v. Reed, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 328, 8 L. Ed. 415.

Government documents are not evidence of titles as against parties claiming pre-existing adverse and paramount title; Sabariego v. Maverick, 124 U. S. 261, 8 Sup. Ct. 461, 31 L. Ed. 430. A patent issued by the United States cannot be avoided or impeached for fraud in a collateral action; Klein's Heirs v. Argenbright, 26 Ia. 493; but it may be collaterally impeached in any action, and its operation and conveyance defeated, by showing that the department had no jurisdiction to dispose of the lands; Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488, 7 Sup. Ct. 985, 30 L. Ed. 1039. Where issued by mistake, inadvertence, or other cause, to parties not entitled to it, they will be declared trustees of of the true owner and decreed to convey the title to him; Bernier v. Bernier, 147 U. S. 242, 13 Sup. Ct. 244, 37 L. Ed. 152. A patent is void at law, if the grantor state had no title to the premises embraced in it, or if the officer who issued the patent had no authority to do so; Knight v. Land Ass'n, 142 U. S. 161, 12 Sup. Ct. 258, 35 L. Ed. 974. In cases of ejectment, where the question is who has the legal title, the patent of the government is unassailable; Sanford v. Sanford, 139 U. S. 642, 11 Sup. Ct. 666, 35 L. Ed. 290.

The patent is conclusive evidence that the patentee has complied with the act of congress as concerns improvements on the land, etc.; Jenkins v. Gibson, 3 La. Ann. 203; it is prima facie evidence that all legal requirements have been complied with; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Cannon, 54 Fed. 252, 4 C. C. A. 303, 7 U. S. App. 507; but a patent fraudulently obtained by illegal issue is void; McGill v. McGill, 4 La. Ann. 262; Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How. (U. S.) 284, 11 L. Ed. 269; Boring's Lessee v. Lemmon, 5 Har. & J. (Md.) 223.

Patents for mines. The fee of all public mineral lands remains in the United States until patent issues therefor; Richardson v. McNulty, 24 Cal. 339; Robertson v. Smith, 1 Mont. 410; Copp's Mining Law 37. The locator possesses only the right to purchase until the payment of the purchase money and the issuance of a receipt by the register and receiver of the local land office; Hamilton v. Min. Co., 33 Fed. 562.

The method of procedure for the application for patent is provided for in U. S. R. S. § 2325. It requires that the applicant shall file under oath in the proper land office an application showing a compliance with the above-mentioned statute, together with a plat and field notes made by or under the direction of a United States surveyor general, and shall post a copy of the plat, together with a notice of the application, on the land, and then file an affidavit of the posting of such notice and copy in the land office. The act also requires that the register of the land office shall post said notice in his office for sixty days, and shall publish it for the same period in a newspaper nearest to the claim. If at the expiration of the said sixty days no adverse claim shall have been filed with the register and receiver of the local land office, the applicant shall be entitled to a patent upon the payment of $5.00 per acre for a lode location, and $2.50 per acre for a placer location, and after the expiration of said sixty days third persons cannot be heard to make objection to the issuance of the patent; see Lee v. Stahl, 9 Colo. 208, 11 Pac. 77; Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 4 Sawy. 302, Fed. Cas. No. 4,548; Golden Fleece Gold & Silver Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 12 Nev. 320. A non-resident's application may be by his agent; Act of Jan. 22, 1880.

The issuance of such a patent is conclusive as to title of land described therein upon a court of law and in controversies between individuals; Aurora Hill Consol. Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 34 Fed. 515. By the act of March 3, 1881, it is provided that if in any action brought pursuant to R. S. § 2326, title to the ground in controversy shall not be established by either party, the jury shall so find, and judgment shall be entered according to verdict. In such case no costs shall be allowed, and the claimant shall not proceed in the land office or be entitled to a patent for the land in controversy until he shall have perfected his title.

Where an application is pending for a patent to mineral lands, any adverse claim must be filed within the sixty days granted by the statute, and must be under the oath of the adverse claimant; R. S. §§ 2325–2326; Marshall Silver Min. Co. v. Kirtley, 12 Colo. 410, 21 Pac. 492. If such adverse claim be filed, proceedings upon the patent shall be stayed until the controversy shall have been determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, or the adverse claim is waived; Hamilton v. Min. Co., 33 Fed. 562; Richmond Min. Co. v. Rose, 114 U. S. 576, 5 Sup. Ct. 1055, 29 L. Ed. 273. This procedure in the court must be begun by the adverse claimant within thirty days after filing his adverse claim, or his claim will be deemed to have been waived; U. S. R. S. § 2326; Richmond Min. Co. v. Rose, 114 U. S. 576, 5 Sup. Ct. 1055, 29 L. Ed. 273. The person in whose favor a decision is rendered in such a proceeding is entitled to the patent upon compliance with the provisions of law; U. S. R. S. § 2326; and it is given to the party establishing the better title, the only question before the court being one of the right of possession of the premises; Bay State Silver Min. Co. v. Brown, 21 Fed. 167. It is necessary for an adverse claimant in such a procedure to prove right of possession as against the United States, as well as against the applicant for a patent; Gwillim v. Donnellan, 115 U. S. 45, 5 Sup. Ct. 1110, 29 L. Ed. 348; and where neither party shows title neither can receive a patent; Bay State Silver Min. Co. v. Brown, 21 Fed. 167.

How cancelled and annulled. It is not permissible for courts of law to inquire into the validity of a patent or into any question of fraud in connection with its issuance; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Sullivan, 16 Fed. 829; see St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636, 26 L. Ed. 875. This, of course, applies only to the cases where the department has jurisdiction to act. If such jurisdiction was wanting or if the patent be void upon its face, it may, of course, be collaterally impeached; St. Louis Smelting & Ref. Co v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 636, 26 L. Ed. 875. The United States may bring an action to set aside a patent upon allegations of fraud, and such action is triable under the same principles and rules which would obtain between individuals; U. S. v. Minor, 114 U. S. 233, 5 Sup. Ct. 836, 29 L. Ed. 110; U. S. v. Min. Co., 128 U. S. 673, 9 Sup. Ct. 195, 32 L. Ed. 571; s. c. 16 Fed. 810; that is when the question arises as to patenting the land to the wrong person; in which case the government merely becomes the instrument by which the right of the individuals can be established and is merely a formal complainant; but if the patent has been obtained from the government by fraud or covers lands which were not subject to patent, the government sues in its sovereign capacity; U. S. v. Telephone Co. (Berliner Case) 167 U. S. 224, 17 Sup. Ct. 809, 42 L. Ed. 144, where the subject is fully discussed and all the cases cited. See PATENT.

It may proceed by bill in equity for a decree of nullity, and an order of cancellation of a patent issued by the government itself, ignorantly, or in mistake, for lands reserved from sale by law, and a grant of which by a patent was therefore void; U. S. v. Stone, 2 Wall. (U. S.) 525, 17 L. Ed. 765; or where a patent issued in mistake, and the government has a direct interest or is under an obligation respecting the relief invoked; U. S. v. R. Co., 141 U. S. 358, 12 Sup. Ct. 13, 35 L. Ed. 766; or when the patent was issued by mistake or obtained by fraud; San Pedro & C. Del A. Co. v. U. S., 146 U. S. 120, 13 Sup. Ct. 94, 36 L. Ed. 911; the initiation and control of such a suit lies with the attorney-general; U. S. v. Tin Co., 125 U. S. 273, 8 Sup. Ct. 850, 31 L. Ed. 747; U. S. v. Beebe, 127 U. S. 338, 8 Sup. Ct. 1083, 32 L. Ed. 121.

Misrepresentations knowingly made by the applicant for a patent will justify the government in proceeding to set it aside, as it has a right to demand a cancellation of a patent obtained by false and fraudulent representations; U. S. v. Min. Co., 128 U. S. 673, 9 Sup. Ct. 195, 32 L. Ed. 571; see U. S. v. Coking Co., 137 U. S. 161, 11 Sup. Ct. 57, 34 L. Ed. 640; but courts of equity cannot set aside, annul, or correct patents or other evidence of title obtained from the United States by fraud or mistake, unless on specific averments of the mistake or fraud, supported by clear and satisfactory proof; Maxwell Land-Grant Case, 121 U. S. 325, 7 Sup. Ct. 1015, 30 L. Ed. 949. A bill in equity is the proper remedy; U. S. v. Hughes, 11 How. (U. S.) 552, 13 L. Ed. 809; although a patent fraudulently obtained by one knowing at the time that another person has a prior right to the land may be set aside by an information in the nature of a bill in equity filed by the attorney of the United States for the district in which the land lies; id. A court of equity, upon a bill filed for that purpose, will vacate a patent of the United States for a tract of land obtained by mistake from the officers of the land office, in order that a clear title may be transferred to the previous purchaser; Hughes v. U. S., 4 Wall. (U. S.) 232, 18 L. Ed. 303; but a patent for land of the United States will not be declared void merely because the evidence to authorize its issue is deemed insufficient by the court; Milliken v. Starling's Lessee, 16 Ohio 61. A state can impeach the title conveyed by it to a grantee only by a bill in chancery to cancel it, either for fraud on the part of the grantee or mistake of law; and until so cancelled, it cannot issue to any other party a valid patent for the same land; Chandler v. Min. Co., 149 U. S. 79, 13 Sup. Ct. 793, 37 L. Ed. 657.

After the issue of a patent, assignment and transfers of the pre-emption right will not be inquired into; Morgan v. Curtenius, 4 McLean 366, Fed. Cas. No. 9,799. The issue of a patent of public lands to a person not equitably entitled to it does not preclude the owner of the equitable title from enforcing it in a court of equity; Monroe Cattle Co. v. Becker, 147 U. S. 47, 13 Sup. Ct. 217, 37 L. Ed. 72; and fraud on the part of a grantee under a patent does not prevent the legal title from passing to a bona fide purchaser; U. S. v. Land Co., 49 Fed. 496, 1 C. C. A. 330, 7 U. S. App. 128; unless the purchaser had sufficient information to put him on inquiry of fraud, in which case he is not a bona fide purchaser; San Pedro & C. Del A. Co. v. U. S., 146 U. S. 120, 13 Sup. Ct. 94, 36 L. Ed. 911. A patent to a deceased person is void; Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 264, 9 L. Ed. 1079; Wood v. Lessee of Ferguson, 7 Ohio St. 288. On the acquisition of the territory from Mexico, the United States acquired the title to lands under tidewater, in trust for future states that might be erected out of the territory; but this doctrine does not apply to lands that had been previously granted to other parties by the former government; Knight v. Land Ass'n, 142 U. S. 161, 12 Sup. Ct. 258, 35 L. Ed. 974. See LANDS, PUBLIC; LAND WARRANT; LAND GRANT.

LAND POOR. A phrase used to indicate the possession of a large quantity of unproductive lands, the payment of taxes and loss of interest on which keeps the owner poor. "A man land-poor may be largely responsible;" Matteson v. Blackmer, 46 Mich. 397, 9 N. W. 445.

LAND REEVE. One whose business it is to overlook parts of an estate. Moz. & W.

LAND REGISTRY. See LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER; REGISTRATION; RECORDING.

LAND REVENUES. An income derived from crown lands in Great Britain. These lands have been so largely granted away to subjects that they are now contracted within very narrow limits. The crown was so much impoverished in this manner by William III. that the stat. 1 Anne, c. 7, § 5, was passed, which, with stat. 34 George III. c. 75, which amends and continues it, makes void all grants or leases from the ground of royal manors or other possessions connected with land for a period exceeding thirty-one years, or three lives. Long prior to this a Scottish stat. 1455, c. 41, had made necessary the consent of parliament in case of the alienation of crown property. It is said that none of these statutes have succeeded in checking the practice. Early at the beginning of the reign of George III. the hereditary crown revenues derived from escheats, manors held in capite, estrays, fines, etc., were surrendered by the king to the general funds, and in the place of them he received a specified sum annually for the civil list.

The supervision of such property as still belongs to the crown is vested in commissioners appointed for the purpose, called the commissioners of woods, forests, and land revenues.

LAND STEWARD. An agent who has the management and control of landed estate belonging to an individual or state.

LAND TAX. A tax on the beneficial proprietor of land such as is imposed in many of the states; so far as a tenant is beneficial proprietor and no farther, does it rest on him. It was first imposed in 1693, a new valuation of the lands in the kingdom having been made in 1692, which has not since been changed. In 1798 it was made perpetual, at a rate of four shillings in a pound of valued rent. Under the provisions of the stat. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 74, this tax is now generally redeemed. See Encyc. Brit. Taxation.

LAND TENANT (commonly called terre tenant, q. v.). He who actually possesses the land.

LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER. The existing system of land transfer is a long and tedious process involving the observance of many formalities and technicalities, a failure to observe any one of which may defeat title. Even where these have been most carefully complied with, and where the title has been traced to its source, the purchaser must buy at his peril, there always being, in spite of the utmost care and expenditure, the possibility that his title may turn out bad. Yeakle, Torrens System 209.

For the past 50 years the project of simplifying land titles and transfer has been agitated in England. For the purpose of considering the best method of so doing, a royal commission was appointed in 1854, and its report in 1857 recommended a limited plan of registration of title. In 1862 the Lord Westbury Act provided for the registration of indefeasible titles, but they were confined to good marketable titles. In 1875 the Lord Cairns Act was passed, which provided for the permissive use of a scheme for the registration of title, and was a modified form of the Torrens system, but, as the friends of that system pointed out, the provisions of the bill were not stringent enough, and comparatively little use has been made of it.

This act was amended in several particulars by the Land Transfer Act, 1897. In addition to these changes this amendatory act of 1897 makes some very vital changes in the real estate law of England; it provides as follows: "Where real estate is vested in any person without a right in any other person to take by survivorship, it shall, on his death, notwithstanding any testamentary disposition, devolve to and become vested in his personal representative or representatives from time to time as if it were a chattel real vesting in them or him." This applies to any real estate over which the testator "has a general power of appointment." Probate and letters of administration may be granted in respect of real estate only, although there is no personal estate. Subject to the powers, rights, duties, and liabilities imposed in the act, the "personal representatives hold the real estate as trustee for the persons by law beneficially entitled thereto, and those persons shall have the same power of requiring a transfer of real estate as persons beneficially entitled to personal estate have of requiring a transfer of such personal estate." "All enactments and rules of law relating to the effect of probate or letters of administration as respects chattels real, and as respects the dealing with chattels real before probate or administration, and as respects the payment of costs of administration, etc., of personal estate and the powers, rights, etc., of personal representatives in respect of personal estate, shall apply to real estate so far as the same are applicable, as if that real estate were a chattel real, etc., save that some or one only of such joint personal representatives" cannot sell or transfer the real estate without the authority of court.

"In the administration of the assets of a person dying after the commencement of the act, his real estate shall be administered in the same manner, subject to the same liabilities for debts, costs, and expenses, etc., as if it were personal estate, provided that nothing herein contained shall alter or affect the order in which real and personal assets respectively are now applicable in and towards the payment of funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, or legacies, or the liability of real estate to be charged with the payment of legacies." In granting letters of administration the court "shall have regard to the rights and interests of the persons interested in the real estate, and his heir-at-law, if not one of the next of kin, shall be equally entitled to the grant with the next of kin."

At any time after the death of the owner "his personal representative may assent to any devise contained in his will, or may convey the land to any person entitled thereto as heir, devisee, or otherwise, . . . either subject to a charge for the payment of any money which the personal representatives are liable to pay, or without any such charge; and on such assent or conveyance, subject to a charge for all moneys (if any) which the personal representatives are liable to pay, all liabilities of the personal representatives in respect of the land shall cease, except as to any acts done or contracts entered into by them before such assent or conveyance." After the expiration of a year from the owner's death, "if the personal representatives have failed on the request of the person entitled to the land to convey the land to that person, the court may, if it thinks fit, on the application of that person and after notice to the personal representatives, order that the conveyance be made, or in case of registered land, that the person so entitled be registered as proprietor of the land, either solely or jointly, with the personal representatives. The production of an assent by the personal representatives to the registrar is authority to him to register the transfer. The personal representatives, etc., may, in the absence of any express provision to the contrary . . . with the consent of the person entitled to any legacy . . . or to a share in his residuary estate, etc., appropriate any part of the residuary estate in or towards satisfaction of that legacy or share," placing their own valuation on "the whole or any part of the property of the deceased person," first giving notice to all persons interested in the residuary estate. In case of registered land such appropriation is authority to the registrar to register the person to whom the property is appropriated as proprietor. The act provides that the title to registered land, adverse to or in derogation of the title of the register proper, shall not be acquired by any length of possession.

It also repeals the act of 32 Hen. VIII, c. 9, which prohibits sales and other dispositions of land of which the grantor or his predecessor in title had not been in possession for one whole year previously to the dispossession's being made.

It provides that the crown may, by an order in council, as respects any county or part of a county, declare registration of title to be compulsory on sale.

Six months' notice before the order in council is made is required to be given to the council of the county in question, and if within three months after receipt of notice with a draft of the proposed order, two-thirds of the members of the county council notify the Privy Council that, in their opinion, compulsory registration of title would not be desirable, the order in council shall not be made. The first order in council made under this act shall not affect more than one county. The act reserves to parliament certain rights to disapprove of any order in council by which it shall become void. The act makes provision for an indemnity payable thereunder by setting apart a portion of the receipts from fees taken in the land register. If the indemnity fund is insufficient the deficiency is charged to the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom.

Provision is made for regulations by the lord chancellor, with the advice and assistance of certain officials, for the conduct of official searches, and for enabling the registered proprietor to apply for such searches, etc., by telegraph and to receive reply by telegraph. The act went into effect January 1, 1898.

The system of registration of deeds prevails in Scotland, in Middlesex and Yorkshire, in Ireland, France, Belgium, Italy, Spain, part of Switzerland, and the British colonies, excepting Australasia and most of Canada, and in the South American republics, as well as in the United States. The system of registration of title prevails in Germany, Austria-Hungary, Australasia, part of Switzerland, and the greater part of Canada; 9 Jurid. Rev. 155. The Torrens system, so called from its author, Sir Robert Torrens, has been in use in New South Wales and Victoria since 1862; in South Australia, 1858; Queensland, 1861; Tasmania, 1863; New Zealand and British Columbia, 1871; Western Australia, 1874; Ontario, 1885; Manitoba, 1883; Duffy & Eggleston, Land Transfer Act, 1890, 3. See infra.

The essential point of this system is an official guarantee of title; it is the registration of title as distinct from the registration of deeds. The latter ascertains the deeds which must be examined under every transfer, while the former renders such examination unnecessary; 9 Jurid. Rev. 155. Under the Torrens system the registrar holds the same relation to the landowner that a company or bank holds to the shareholder.

In Germany the state keeps what may be called a ledger account for each property, and pledges itself to keep it correctly and in such plain fashion that any person of ordinary intelligence can at once, and without examining any deed of any kind, ascertain who stands as owner of the property (which means that his title is perfect), and what debts or other incumbrances exist. In Prussia all transfers are made by word of mouth, without any deed or conveyance. The simplest way is to have both parties to appear before the registrar, and declare their contract, and the purchaser is then entered as owner; 9 Jurid. Rev. 155. For a detailed account of the system of registration of title in Central Europe, see 2 Jour. Com. Leg. 112 (June, 1897).

In the United States the subject of registration of land titles has been considered in many of the states. In New York City the accumulation of record books has become so great in the registry of deeds that searches of title can no longer be carried on by private persons. In that state an attempt was made to simplify and classify these records, by adopting what is known as a block system of registration by which deeds and other instruments are classified and indexed according to the location of the property. While this is a partial relief, it by no means remedies the evils due to a lengthening chain of title, where no part is stronger than its weakest link; Yeakle, Torrens System 215. See Rep. Am. Bar Assn. (1890) 265.

With some modifications, in order to obviate the constitutional questions which might arise under it in this country, the Torrens system has been adopted in ten states, and in Hawaii and the Philippines. The acts were not uniform, and most of them have been amended once or more: California (1897); Colorado (1903); Illinois (the act of 1895 was declared unconstitutional; an act passed in 1897 was held valid; a compulsory act was adopted in 1910); Massachusetts (1898); Minnesota (1901, and a new act in 1905); New York (1908, which was passed after an elaborate study and report by a special commission); North Carolina (1913, in effect January 1, 1914); Ohio (1913, in effect July 1, 1914); Oregon (1901); Washington (1907); Hawaii (1903); Philippines (1908). Hawaii and the Philippines followed the Massachusetts act.

Acts have been held constitutional in Robinson v. Kerrigan, 151 Cal. 40, 90 Pac. 129, 121 Am. St. Rep. 90, 12 Ann. Cas. 829; People v. Crissman, 41 Colo. 450, 92 Pac. 949; People v. Simon, 176 Ill. 165, 52 N. E. 910, 44 L. R. A. 801, 68 Am. St. Rep. 175 (it is said that the Illinois act has been before the supreme court of that state 61 times); Tyler v. Judges, 175 Mass. 71, 55 N. E. 812, 51 L. R. A. 433, see also 179 U. S. 405, 21 Sup. Ct. 206, 45 L. Ed. 252 (numerous other Massachusetts cases have followed Tyler v. Judges, from Minot v. Cotting, 179 Mass. 325, 60 N. E. 610, down to Cohasset v. Moors, 204 Mass. 173, 90 N. E. 978); State v. Westfall, 85 Minn. 437, 89 N. W. 175, 57 L. R. A. 297, 89 Am. St. Rep. 571. The first act in Illinois (1895) was declared unconstitutional in People v. Chase, 165 Ill. 527, 46 N. E. 454, 36 L. R. A. 105. An earlier Ohio act was declared unconstitutional; State v. Guilbert, 56 Ohio St. 575, 47 N. E. 551, 38 L. R. A. 519, 60 Am. St. Rep. 756.

A state act requiring persons (including non-residents) owning land to establish title by judicial proceedings before properly constituted tribunals is valid under the inherent power of the state to legislate as to the title to the soil within its confines; American Land Co. v. Zeiss, 219 U. S. 47, 31 Sup. Ct. 200, 55 L. Ed. 82 (a California act passed after the San Francisco fire).

See also Ochoa v. Hernandez y Morales, 230 U. S. 139, 33 Sup. Ct. 1033, 57 L. Ed. 1427.

See William C. Niblack, An Analysis of the Torrens System, written as the result of many years' experience in titles under the Torrens System, but from a standpoint somewhat critical of it.

The first Canadian act was British Columbia (1871), then Ontario (1885), but only as to part of the province. There are acts in all the provinces except Quebec, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Newfoundland. The Irish System exists under the act of 1891. Registration is compulsory in London, but is voluntary in other parts of England and in Wales.

See the Report of the Uniform Law Commissioners on the Torrens System in Amer. Bar Assoc. Rep. 1913, giving the above summary.

A state commission fully considered the introduction of the system into Pennsylvania and reported in favor of it, but as requiring an amendment to the constitution.

LAND TRANSFER ACT. See LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER.

LAND WAITER. In English Law. A custom-house officer who superintends the landing of goods, and who examines, measures, tastes, or weighs them and takes account of it. They are also sometimes required to superintend the shipment of goods where drawbacks are allowed, and to certify the shipping of them on the debentures. They are sometimes called Coast Waiters or Landing Waiters.

LAND WARRANT. A transferable government certificate entitling its holder to be put in possession of a designated quantity of public land, under a land grant or other appropriation of land by congress.

The possession of a warrant at the land office is sufficient authority to make locations under it, and letters of attorney are unnecessary; Galt v. Galloway, 4 Pet. (U. S.) 332, 7 L. Ed. 876. The locator of a warrant undertakes himself to find waste and unappropriated land, and his patent issues under his information to the government and at his own risk; he cannot be considered as a purchaser without notice; Taylor v. Brown, 5 Cra. (U. S.) 234, 3 L. Ed. 88. A power of attorney given by the holder of a land warrant from the general court authorities, the attorney to locate the land for his own sole use and benefit, and to sell the same and receive payment therefor, is manifestly designed to transfer the interest of the holder of the warrant in violation of the act of congress in that respect, and is void; Nichols v. Nichols, 3 Chand. (Wis.) 189. Evidence of the payment of the purchase money due the state of Pennsylvania on a land warrant clothes the person paying it with the ownership of the warrant and with the right to maintain ejectment for the land; Murphy v. Packer, 152 U. S. 398, 14 Sup. Ct. 636, 38 L. Ed. 489. Land warrants are not to be regarded as real estate in a probate settlement; Moody v. Hutchinson, 44 Me. 57. See LANDS, PUBLIC; LAND PATENT.

LANDBOC. A charter or deed whereby lands or tenements were given under early English law. Cowell. See BOCLAND.

Occasionally it is said a bishop or abbot in support of claims of the highest jurisdictional powers "would rely on the vague large words of some Anglo-Saxon land book. But to do this was to make a false move; the king's lawyers were not astute palæographers or diplomatists, but any charter couched in terms sufficiently loose to pass for one moment as belonging to the age before the conquest could be met by the doctrine that the king was not to be deprived of his rights by 'obscure and general words.'" 1 Poll. & Maitl. 571. See 3 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 191.

LANDDAG. A convention of the Dutch in New Amsterdam. See 1 Fiske, Dutch & Quaker Colonies 328.

LANDED. As used in a revenue act levying tolls on goods, the clear meaning and purport is "substantially imported," and stones shot from boats to the shore below high-water mark, there to remain until shipped for exportation, were not landed. L. R. 4 Ex. 260.

Timber, floated into a salt water creek, where the tide ebbs and flows, leaving the ends resting in mud at low water and prevented from floating away at high water by booms, is landed; Brown v. U. S., 8 Cra. (U. S.) 110, 3 L. Ed. 504.

When merchandise is sent on shore, and afterwards, being in the ship's boat for the purpose of being re-shipped, it is violently seized and detained, either by the orders of a sovereign or by thieves, it is not safely landed, under an insurance on the goods, until the same should be discharged and safely landed; Parsons v. Ins. Co., 6 Mass. 197, 204, 4 Am. Dec. 115.

LANDED ESTATE OR PROPERTY. A colloquial or popular phrase to denote real property. Landed estate ordinarily means an interest in and pertaining to lands. Police Jury of Parish of St. Mary v. Harris, 10 La. Ann. 676. In a tax law it "clearly embraces not only the land, but all houses, fixtures, and improvements of every kind thereon, and all machinery, neat cattle, horses, and mules, when attached to and used on a plantation or farm." Id.

A person holding such an estate is termed a landed proprietor, and it is immaterial whether the lands are improved or not; 10 La. Ann. 676. A devise of "all my landed property" carries the fee; Fogg v. Clark, 1 N. H. 163; and so does "my landed estate"; Bradstreet v. Clarke, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 602; but a devise of "all my landed estate," followed by a particular description of tracts devised, does not include a lot not enumerated, which descends to the heir at law, though excluded from all testator's estate with a shilling legacy; Myers v. Myers, 2 McCord, Ch. (S. C.) 214, 264, 16 Am. Dec. 648.

Landed securities are mortgages or other incumbrances affecting land, and this is what must be implied from the direction in a will to lay out a fund in some real security; 3 Atk. 805, 808.

LANDED ESTATES COURT. In English Law. Tribunals established by statute for the purpose of disposing more promptly and easily than could be done through the ordinary judicial machinery, of incumbered real estate. These courts were first established in Ireland by the act of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 48, which being defective was followed by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 77. The purpose of these was to enable the owner, or a lessee for any less than 63 years unexpired, of land subject to incumbrance, to apply to commissioners who constituted a court of record to direct a sale. This court was called the Incumbered Estates Court. A new tribunal called the Landed Estates Court was created by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 72, which abolished the former court and established a permanent tribunal. It is said that these statutes facilitated a great revolution in the tenure of land in Ireland, supplying the means by which a great part of the soil passed rapidly from cottier tenants and an embarrassed and non-resident gentry to capitalist farmers and to landlords who cultivated the soil themselves. The result was agricultural prosperity, but great hardship to the tenants, upon whom in Ireland rested the burden of permanent improvements which elsewhere would be borne by the landlord. The sales under the Landed Estates Act deprived the tenants of opportunity to make claim for compensation in the adjustment of rent. Demands for increased rent under penalty of eviction compelled small farmers to emigrate, move to the towns, or remain as servants on their old farms. The acts of retaliation for these changes led to the passage of the Irish Land Act of 1870, followed by that of 1881. Under the latter the tenant farmers obtained very unexampled privileges, and a new court was created for fixing rent. See Int. Cyc., tit. Incumbered Estates Court, and authorities there cited.

A similar court was established for West Indian estates by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 117, the sittings of which were held at Westminster.

LANDEFRICUS, LANDAGENDE. The lord of the soil; a landlord.

LANDEGANDMAN. An inferior tenant of a manor. Spel. Gloss.

LANDGRAVE. In Germany, in the middle ages a graf or count entrusted with special judicial functions, extending over a large extent of territory; later, the title of sovereign princes of the empire who inherited certain estates called land-gravates, of which they were invested by the emperor. Cent. Dict.

LANDHLAFORD. A proprietor of land; lord of the soil. Anc. Inst. Eng. See LANDEFRICUS.

LANDIMERS. Measures of land. Cowell.

LANDING. A place for loading or unloading boats, but not a harbor for them. Hays v. Briggs, 74 Pa. 373. See WHARF.

LANDING PLACE. A place laid out by a town as a common landing place and used as such, but not designated as for the particular benefit of the town, is a public landing place. It is not, however, a townway and liable to be discontinued as such by the town. If a public landing place is no longer of use the power to discontinue it is in the legislature; Com. v. Tucker, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 44.

The public use of the land of an individual, adjoining navigable waters, as a landing place, for a period of twenty years, with the knowledge of the owner, will not confer a right, nor raise a presumption of a dedication; Pearsall v. Post, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 111; Post v. Pearsall, 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 425; Hewlett v. Pearsall, id. 559. When a highway is extended to navigable waters, the riparian owner has no exclusive right of landing; Fowler v. Mott, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 204.

Under authority to regulate landings and watering places, commissioners of highways have no right to lay out and establish a new landing place; Commissioners of Highways of North Hempstead v. Judges, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 9; but when a road has been laid out and used as a highway to a public landing place for twenty years prior to March 21, 1797, but not sufficiently described, they may ascertain, describe, and enter of record such road, if it was constantly worked and used for six years next preceding; id. The selectmen of a town have no authority to lay out a public landing; Bethum v. Turner, 1 Greenl. (Me.) 111, 10 Am. Dec. 36.

LANDIRECTA. Rights charged upon land. Toml. See TRINODA NECESSITAS.

LANDLOCKED. Wholly surrounded by land of some other person or persons, as when the owner of a close surrounded by his own land grants the land and reserves the close. L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 798. In that case it was held that the implied right to a way of necessity operated by way of a regrant from the grantor of the land, and was limited by the necessity which created it; it was not a way of necessity for all purposes, but only such as the close was used for in the condition it happened to be at the time of the grant. Semble, the same rule applies if the grant is of the landlocked close with an implied grant of a way of necessity over the surrounding land; id.

LANDLORD. The lord or proprietor of land, who, under the feudal system, retained the dominion or ultimate property of the feud, or fee of the land; while his grantee, who had only the possession and use of the land, was styled the feudatory, or vassal, which was only another name for the tenant or holder of it. In the popular meaning of the word, however, it is applied to a person who owns lands or tenements which he rents out to others.

LANDLORD AND TENANT. A term used to denote the relation which subsists by virtue of a contract, express or implied, between two or more persons, for the possession or occupation of lands or tenements either for a definite period, from year to year, for life, or at will.

When this relation is created by an express contract, the instrument made use of for the purpose is called a lease. See LEASE. But it may also arise by necessary implication from the circumstances of the case and the relative position of the parties to each other; for the law will imply its existence in many cases where there is an ownership of land on the one hand and an occupation of it by permission on the other; and in such cases it will be presumed that the occupant intends to compensate the owner for the use of the premises; Carver v. Jackson, 4 Pet. (U. S.) 84, 7 L. Ed. 761; Dunne v. Trustees of Schools, 39 Ill. 578; Larned v. Hudson, 60 N. Y. 102.

In an action for possession of land and damages for holding over after expiration of a term, proof that plaintiff was owner, that defendant paid rent to him, and that he was duly notified to surrender possession, establishes the relation of landlord and tenant; Duffy v. Carman, 3 Ind. App. 207, 29 N. E. 454. A tenancy is created by the occupation or temporary possession of land, the title to which is in another; Ins. Co. of Pennsylvania v. O'Connell, 34 Ill. App. 357.

The intention to create. This relation may be inferred from a variety of circumstances; but the most obvious acknowledgment of its existence is the payment of rent; and this principle applies even after the expiration of a lease for a definite term of years; for if a tenant continues to hold over, after his term has run out, the landlord may, if he chooses, consider him a tenant, and he is, in fact, understood to do so, unless he proceeds to eject him at once. If the landlord suffers him to remain, and receives rent from him, or by any other act acknowledges him still as tenant, a new tenancy springs up, usually from year to year, regulated by the same covenants and stipulations entered into between the parties at the creation of the original term in so far as they are applicable to the altered nature of the tenancy; Abeel v. Radcliff, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 505; Dorrill v. Stephens, 4 McCord (S. C.) 59; Right v. Darby, 1 T. R. 159; [1893] 1 Q. B. 736; Thiebaud v. Bank, 42 Ind. 212; Hall v. Myers, 43 Md. 446; Stoppelkamp v. Mangeot, 42 Cal. 316. Until some act of recognition by the landlord the holding over tenant is a tenant at will. Emmons v. Scudder, 115 Mass. 367.

It is at the option of the landlord to treat him as a tenant or he "is a wrong-doer and may be treated as such by the owner, his landlord." His tenancy may be continued by consent, either express or implied, but without such new contract, the tenant continues a wrong-doer and is liable to be treated as such. "The mere unbroken silence and inaction of the owner will not improve or enlarge the character of the tenant's possession;" Den v. Adams, 12 N. J. L. 99. Each holding over by a tenant constitutes a new term; Kennedy v. City of New York, 196 N. Y. 19, 89 N. E. 360, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 847, and note; Borman v. Sandgren, 37 Ill. App. 160 (a monthly letting); Donk Bros. Coal & Coke Co. v. Leavitt, 109 Ill. App. 385; Griffith v. Lewis, 17 Mo. App. 605; contra, Bowen v. Anderson [1894] 1 Q. B. 164 (a weekly letting); Ward v. Hinkleman, 37 Wash. 375, 79 Pac. 956; Hull v. Sherrod, 97 Ill. App. 298; Hett v. Janzen, 22 Ont. Rep. 414.

A tenant for a year or more, who holds over, becomes a tenant from year to year, even though the rent is made payable quarterly or monthly; Amsden v. Atwood, 69 Vt. 527, 38 Atl. 263; Belding v. Texas Produce Co., 61 Ark. 377, 33 S. W. 421; Schneider v. Lord, 62 Mich. 141, 28 N. W. 773; Intfen v. Foster, 8 Kan. App. 336, 56 Pac. 1125. But in Kaufman v. Mastin, 66 W. Va. 99, 66 S. E. 92, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 855; White v. Sohn, 65 W. Va. 409, 64 S. E. 442, where the lease was for a year and the rent was payable monthly, the renewal was held to be for a month. If the tenant holds over by consent of the landlord, either express or implied, the new term is equal to that previously held; Rothschild v. Williamson, 83 Ind. 387; Ketcham v. Ochs, 74 App. Div. 626, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1130, affirming 34 Misc. 470, 70 N. Y. Supp. 268; Schneider v. Curran, 19 Ohio Cir. Ct. 224; Simmons v. Jarman, 122 N. C. 195, 29 S. E. 332. If the term be for less than a year, the renewal is for another equal term, on the same conditions, even though the rental payments were at intervals less than the original term. It is said that the question may depend upon the use to which the property is put; Kaufman v. Mastin, supra.

Since the presumption of a new tenancy from year to year rests upon an implied intention of the parties, if, after or prior to the termination of the lease, the landlord demands greater rent, and the tenant holds over without reply, he is presumed to have assented to pay the advanced rental; Hunt v. Bailey, 39 Mo. 257; Roberts v. Hayward, 3 C. & P. 432; and he will be liable for it until such agreement is modified by some other one; Moore v. Harter, 67 Ohio St. 250, 65 N. E. 883; Thompson v. Sanborn, 52 Mich. 141, 17 N. W. 730; and the same result is reached if the tenant protest that he is only remaining until he secures another place; Brinkley v. Walcott, 10 Heisk. (Tenn.) 22. In such case the original lease has expired and the tenant could not be sued for the breach of any covenant in it; Monck v. Geekle, 9 Ad. & El. 841. The presumption of holding over upon the terms of the original lease is not rebutted by proof of a different intention on the part of the tenant which is not communicated to the landlord and assented to by him; City of Chicago v. Peck, 196 Ill. 260, 63 N. E. 711, affirming 98 Ill. App. 434; nor is the presumption rebutted where the holding over is caused by action of the board of health in the regulation of persons ill with a contagious disease; Haynes v. Aldrich, 133 N. Y. 287, 31 N. E. 94, 28 Am. St. Rep. 636; Herter v. Mullen, 9 App. Div. 593, 41 N. Y. Supp. 708.

The payment of money, however, is only a prima facie acknowledgment of the existence of a tenancy; for if it does not appear to have been paid as rent, but has been paid by mistake or stands upon some other consideration, it will not be evidence of a subsisting tenancy; 3 B. & C. 413; 4 M. & G. 143. Neither does a mere participation in the profits of land, where the owner is not excluded from possession, nor the letting of land upon shares, unless the occupant expressly agrees to pay a certain part of the crop as rent, in either case amount to a tenancy; Hoskins v. Rhodes, 1 Gill & J. (Md.) 266; Fry v. Jones, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 11; Warner v. Hoisington, 42 Vt. 94; Kerrains v. People, 60 N. Y. 221, 19 Am. Rep. 158; Alwood v. Ruckman, 21 Ill. 200. The relation of landlord and tenant did not exist where the occupancy was simply by military force during the war of the rebellion; Madison Female Institute v. U. S., 23 Ct. Cl. 188.

But the relation of landlord and tenant will not be implied when the acts and conduct of the parties are inconsistent with its existence, as where a railroad company entered upon the land of a ferry company under a contract permitting its use and occupation for the purposes of its business; Wiggins Ferry Co. v. R. Co., 142 U. S. 396, 12 Sup. Ct. 188, 35 L. Ed. 1055; or where the relation of vendor and purchaser exists and the latter remains in possession after the agreement fails; White v. Livingston, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 259; Henry v. Perry, 110 Ga. 630, 36 S. E. 87; Brown v. Randolph, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 66, 62 S. W. 981; Ripley v. Yale, 16 Vt. 257; Ayer v. Hawkes, 11 N. H. 148; Ball v. Cullimore, 2 Cr., M. & R. 120; Carpenter v. U. S., 17 Wall. (U. S.) 489, 21 L. Ed. 680; Fall v. Hazelrigg, 45 Ind. 576, 15 Am. Rep. 278; even where a note is given for an installment of the purchase money reciting that it is in part payment for rent; Quertermous v. Hatfield, 54 Ark. 16, 14 S. W. 1096; but an occupation under an agreement for sale if a title could be made creates a tenancy; Doe dem. Newby v. Jackson, 2 D. & R. 514; but if, under an absolute agreement for sale, the vendor fails to make a good title, the vendee, being in possession under the contract, is not liable as a tenant; Winterbottom v. Ingham, 7 Q. B. 611; Garvin v. Jennerson, 20 Kan. 371; Bardsley's Appeal, 4 Sadl. (Pa.) 584, 10 Atl. 39; Griffith v. Collins, 116 Ga. 420, 42 S. E. 743.

Where the vendee refused to surrender the title bond and the vendor retained the notes for the purchase money, proof that the former had agreed to pay rent was not alone evidence of abandonment, but that question was for the jury; Taylor v. Taylor, 112 N. C. 27, 16 S. E. 924; and the vendee becomes a tenant on his refusal to pay installments as due because of the vendor's inability to make title; Sievers v. Brown, 36 Or. 218, 56 Pac. 171; nor is a tenancy implied as between mortgagor and mortgagee in possession, or an assignee of the latter; Way v. Raymond, 16 Vt. 371; Hobbs v. Ontario Loan & Deb. Co., 18 Can. St. 483 (although in that case the mortgage contained a clause for a lease from the mortgagee to the mortgagor, the rent to correspond with the installments of purchase money, but the instrument was not executed by the mortgagee); Wood v. Felton, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 171; nor where the mortgagee gave notice to the tenant to pay the rent to him and the tenant remained in possession; Towerson v. Jackson, L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 484 (C. A.); nor when the mortgagor is in possession and agrees to pay $300 a year for interest and part principal which is called rent; Sadler v. Jefferson, 143 Ala. 669, 39 South. 380.

Where the statute requires the recording of leases, one in possession of real estate under an unrecorded lease has no rights as against an attaching creditor; Flower v. Pearce, 45 La. Ann. 853, 13 South. 150.

One who takes a secret lease from a third party without the knowledge of his landlord will not thereby change his possession; Voss v. King, 33 W. Va. 236, 10 S. E. 402.

A tenant who rents his half of the premises to his co-tenant is his landlord and entitled to such rights as pertain to the relation; Grabfelder v. Gazetti (Tex.) 26 S. W. 436.

A tenant of a life estate may dispose of the whole or any part of it by deed or parol lease; if he conveys it all, it is an assignment; if he grants a term for years, it is a lease; King v. Sharp, 6 Humph. (Tenn.) 55; McCampbell v. McCampbell, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 92, 15 Am. Dec. 48; but he may contract for his life, reserving an annual rent, without parting with his estate by merely creating a tenancy; Sykes v. Benton, 90 Ga. 402, 17 S. E. 1002. At common law upon the death of the life tenant his lease for a term ends; Hoagland v. Crum, 113 Ill. 365, 55 Am. Rep. 424; unless he had power so to lease, and the term is not revived by the acceptance of rent by the remainderman; Doe, dem. Simpson v. Butcher, 1 Doug. 50; but the receipt of rent, coupled with acts amounting to a recognition of a tenancy, may amount to a new demise by the remainderman; Lowrey v. Reef, 1 Ind. App. 244, 27 N. E. 626. Rents are not apportionable between the administrator of the tenant for life and the remainderman, but the payment of rent is due to either, according to the time at which it accrued; Noble v. Tyler, 61 Ohio St. 432, 56 N. E. 191, 48 L. R. A. 735.

The relation of landlord and tenant has been held to exist, where a ranch was let, by a written covenant for a term of years, for a share of the produce, with provision for the sale of stock and produce, and division of profits; Jones v. Durrer, 96 Cal 95, 30 Pac. 1027; also under an agreement between the owner of stone quarry and another person that the latter shall work the quarry, sell the stone, and pay one-fifth of the proceeds to the former; Barry v. Smith, 1 Misc. 240, 23 N. Y. Supp. 129; where one had purchased land under a power of sale in a mortgage, which provided that the completion of the sale shall entitle the purchaser to immediate possession of the premises, and any holding of the same thereafter should be as tenant; Brewster v. McNab, 36 S. C. 274, 15 S. E. 233. The relation of landlord and tenant exists, so as to authorize a forcible detainer against a tenant in possession, whose lease was not enforceable because the premises were leased knowingly for immoral purposes; Murat v. Micand (Tex.) 25 S. W. 312. So where mortgagees of a stock of goods in a leased store building took possession of the goods therein, by permission of the mortgagors, and used the building to display and sell the goods; Hatch v. Van Dervoort, 54 N. J. Eq. 511, 34 Atl. 938.

The relation does not exist where a father deeds lands in fee-simple to his son, who is to give the father one-third of his crops until the latter should be in better financial condition, the son meanwhile to go ahead and improve the land as his own; Starkey v. Starkey, 136 Ind. 349, 36 N. E. 287; or where the owner of a farm rented a house for one year for the use of his tenant who farmed on shares, and at the end of his term held over for a few weeks and then rented the farm under a new lease from the grantee, the latter was held not liable for the rent of the tenant-house for the new year; Wilson v. Marshall, 34 Ill. App. 306. Occupation of lands by a person without recognizing the owner as his landlord, or any agreement to hold under and in subordination to him, is merely a trespass and does not create the relation of landlord and tenant; Dixon v. Ahern, 21 Nev. 65, 24 Pac. 337. One in possession and use of premises under an agreement to keep off trespassers is practically a tenant; Shaw v. Hill, 79 Mich. 86, 44 N. W. 422. Where the crop growing on leased premises was sold under execution, the purchaser, who was also assignee of the judgment for rent under which the crop was sold, did not become a tenant of the lessor and could go upon the land to harvest the crop without incurring any liability to the lessor for the use of the land while the crop was ripening; McClellan v. Krall, 43 Kan. 216, 23 Pac. 100. The lessee of a mere occupant (the title being in a third person) could recover possession under proceedings for forcible entry and detainer against the lessor who had entered upon the premises; Thomas v. Black, 8 Houst. (Del.) 507, 18 Atl. 771.

Occupancy, incident to employment does not create tenancy, as superintendence of the cultivation of land; Davis v. Williams, 130 Ala. 530, 30 South. 488, 54 L. R. A. 749, 89 Am. St. Rep. 55; Zinnel v. Bergdoll, 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 522; in charge of a ranch; Todhunter v. Armstrong, 121 Cal. xviii, 53 Pac. 446; servant; Mead v. Pollock, 99 Ill. App. 151; but it must appear that the occupancy is accessory to his services; Snedaker v. Powell, 32 Kan. 396, 4 Pac. 869; a condition that is variously described in the cases by the terms ancillary, or auxiliary, or incidental to, and inseparable from, the service or connected with it or required by it expressly or impliedly; King v. Kelstern, 5 M. & S. 136; Queen v. Bishopton, 9 Ad. & El. 824; Smith v. Leghill, L. R. 10 Q. B. 1022; Bowman v. Bradley, 151 Pa. 351, 24 Atl. 1062, 17 L. R. A. 213; School District No. 11 v. Batsche, 106 Mich. 330, 64 N. W. 196, 29 L. R. A. 576; Hart v. O'Brien, 15 L. Can. Jur. 42.

The question of the relation of the occupancy to the service or employment was properly left to the jury; Ofschlager v. Surbeck, 22 Misc. 595, 50 N. Y. Supp. 862; Hughes v. Chatam, 5 Mann. & G. 54; the terms of the contract or the character of the occupation are for the jury, but those being fixed, their legal import is for the court to declare upon consideration of the nature and character of the business; Bowman v. Bradley, 151 Pa. 351, 24 Atl. 1062, 17 L. R. A. 213; Kerrains v. People, 60 N. Y. 221, 19 Am. Rep. 158.

A priest holding his place at the will of the bishop and occupying church property which included a dwelling house, was held not to be a tenant, his possession being more like that of a servant; Chatard v. O'Donovan, 80 Ind. 20, 41 Am. Rep. 782.

Rights of the Landlord. The relation begins and the obligations accrue from the time stipulated in the lease, if there be one (see LEASE), or the entry of the tenant into possession under an agreement express or implied to pay rent or the actual payment of it; Kemp v. Derrett, 3 Camp. 510. After the making of a lease the right of possession remains in the landlord until the contract is consummated by the entry of the lessee, when he acquires the right of possession with all its incidents; Herrmann v. Curiel, 3 App. Div. 511, 38 N. Y. Supp. 343. The rights of the landlord in the premises are confined to those derived expressly or impliedly from the lease or essential to the protection of his reversion; Sully v. Schmitt, 147 N. Y. 248, 41 N. E. 514, 49 Am. St. Rep. 659; he usually reserves the right to go upon the premises peaceably to ascertain whether there is waste or injury, but unless it is so reserved, he has no such right; State v. Piper, 89 N. C. 551. He may, however, enter when the tenant has abandoned the land; Maclary v. Turner, 1 Marv. (Del.) 24, 32 Atl. 325; but it is an eviction if the landlord enter for the purpose of rebuilding; Heller v. Ins. Co., 151 Pa. 101, 25 Atl. 83; or repair; Peterson v. Edmonson, 5 Harring. (Del.) 378; and if the rent is payable in produce he cannot enter and take it until it is delivered by the tenant or severed from the farm and set apart for him; Dockham v. Parker, 9 Greenl. (Me.) 137, 23 Am. Dec. 547; Woodruff v. Adams, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 317, 35 Am. Dec. 122; or to remove an obstruction from a way; Proud v. Hollis, 1 B. & C. 8. He may maintain actions for such injuries as affect his reversion; Starr v. Jackson, 11 Mass. 519; Ray v. Ayers, 5 Duer (N. Y.) 494; but they must be of a permanent character; Little v. Palister, 3 Greenl. (Me.) 6.

The landlord's responsibilities in respect to possession, also, are suspended as soon as the tenant commences his occupation; Cheetham v. Hampson, 4 Term 318; City of New York v. Corlies, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 301; City of St. Louis v. Kaime, 2 Mo. App. 66. But he is liable to a stranger who is injured by reason of the defective condition of the premises at the time of their demise, or any fault in their construction, or nuisance thereon, though created by the tenant's ordinary use of the premises; Godley v. Hagerty, 20 Pa. 387, 59 Am. Dec. 731; Whalen v. Gloucester, 4 Hun (N. Y.) 24; or if an injury is caused by the neglect of the landlord to do repairs, which he undertook to do, or if he renews the lease with a nuisance on the premises; King v. Pedley, 1 Ad. & El. 822. He may be liable for not disclosing a concealed danger, not discoverable by the tenant, but known to the landlord or condemned by common experience as dangerous; Cutter v. Hamlen, 147 Mass. 471, 18 N. E. 397, 1 L. R. A. 429. And even when there is no express covenant to repair, where the defect was in a sidewalk, the owner was under an implied duty to inspect and repair which could be enforced by the municipality; Trustees of Village of Canandaigua v. Foster, 156 N. Y. 354, 50 N. E. 971, 41 L. R. A. 554, 66 Am. St. Rep. 575. And the landlord is liable for injuries incurred by third persons in parts of the building of which he retains the possession and control, as: An elevator; Burner v. Higman & Skinner Co., 127 Ia. 580, 103 N. W. 802; or opening in the side-walk; Jennings v. Van Schaick, 108 N. Y. 530, 15 N. E. 424, 2 Am. St. Rep. 459; or outside steps, or a platform for common use of tenants; Coupe v. Platt, 172 Mass. 458, 52 N. E. 526, 70 Am. St. Rep. 293.

The foundations and walls of a building, the different floors of which are leased to different tenants, cannot be regarded as in the possession of the landlord within the rule that he is liable for injuries to the tenants through defects in portions of the building remaining within his possession; Miles v. Tracey, 89 S. W. 1128, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 621, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1142. Such a landlord is not liable to the tenant of the lower floor for injuries to his stock from water from a closet which overflows because of the tenant's negligent use of it; Lebensburger v. Scofield, 155 Fed. 85, 86 C. C. A. 105, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1025. The landlord of a tenement building is liable to the tenant for the defective condition of the roof, where such tenant was obliged to use it for the purpose of drying clothes; Karlson v. Healy, 38 App. Div. 486, 56 N. Y. Supp. 361; where the main wall of a tenement house fell and injured the property of one of the tenants, it was held that such tenant might not recover in the absence of an express covenant that the landlord will keep the leased premises in repair; Ward v. Fagin, 101 Mo. 669, 14 S. W. 738, 10 L. R. A. 147, 20 Am. St. Rep. 650.

The duty of the owner of an office building to keep in proper condition the common portions retained in his possession does not extend to keeping outer doors unlocked on Sunday to enable tenants to remove large pieces of furniture in case of fire; Whitcomb v. Mason, 102 Md. 275, 62 Atl. 749, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 565; tenants occupying offices on the second floor of an office building are entitled to enjoin the tenant on the ground floor from obstructing the entrance to the block by the erection of signs and showcases; Miller v. Dry Goods Co., 62 Neb. 270, 86 N. W. 1078. A landlord is not liable for a hidden defect in a gutter on the property; Shute v. Bills, 191 Mass. 433, 78 N. E. 96, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 965, 114 Am. St. Rep. 631. In an action by lessee for breach of a covenant in a lease, to repair, the measure of damages is the diminished rental value by reason of the failure to make the repairs; Biggs v. McCurley, 76 Md. 409, 25 Atl. 466.

The principal obligations on the part of the landlord are: (1) That the tenant shall enjoy quiet possession of the premises, which means that he shall not be evicted by one having a title paramount to the landlord, or the latter shall not render his occupation uncomfortable by causing or maintaining a nuisance on or about the premises. This covenant is implied from the operative words of a lease and is sometimes specially inserted; Mayor, etc., of New York v. Mabie, 13 N. Y. 151, 64 Am. Dec. 538; Crouch v. Fowle, 9 N. H. 219, 32 Am. Dec. 350; Bayes v. Loyd [1895] 2 Q. B. 610; under this covenant the landlord is not liable if the tenant be ousted by a stranger; Moore v. Weber, 71 Pa. 429, 10 Am. Rep. 708; Kimball v. Masters of Grand Lodge of Masons, 131 Mass. 59. But in Mershon v. Williams, 63 N. J. L. 398, 44 Atl. 211, it was held that such an implied covenant will arise only from the words "demise" or "grant" and not from the words "to let" and "to lease" or from the mere relation of landlord and tenant. (2) The payment of all arrears of ground rent or interest on liens, for which the tenant has no liability unless he expressly assumes it; Earle v. Arbogast, 180 Pa. 409, 36 Atl. 923; and the same rule applies to taxes, which are usually chargeable to the landlord; Leache v. Goode, 19 Mo. 501; and as to which special covenants are not uncommon; such covenant was held to cover such taxes as were chargeable on the premises at the time of making the lease; Watson v. Atkins, 3 B. & Ald. 647; but in another case a covenant to pay all rates, taxes, etc., was held to cover an extraordinary assessment for sewers; Waller v. Andrews, 3 M. & W. 312.

There is no implied warranty on the part of the landlord that the premises are safe or reasonably fit for habitation, for the purpose for which they are intended; Roth v. Adams, 185 Mass. 341, 70 N. E. 445; Dutton v. Gerrish, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 89, 55 Am. Dec. 45; Bennett v. Sullivan, 100 Me. 118, 60 Atl. 886; Howell v. Schneider, 24 App. D. C. 532 (it is for the tenant to examine); Carey v. Kreizer, 26 Misc. 755, 57 N. Y. Supp. 79; Doyle v. R. Co., 147 U. S. 413, 13 Sup. Ct. 333, 37 L. Ed. 223 (where it was held that the lessor was not bound to notify the tenant of the danger of snow slides); unless the building constitutes a public nuisance or the lessor conceals defects so as to amount to fraud; Steefel v. Rothschild, 179 N. Y. 273, 72 N. E. 112, 1 Ann. Cas. 676; Wilcox v. Cate, 65 Vt. 478, 26 Atl. 1105; but the landlord may be liable for an injury to a passer-by due to a defect existing when the house was let; Bowen v. Anderson, [1894] 1 Q. B. 164; and see Perrett v. Dupré, 3 Rob. (La.) 52, where it was held that a lessor is bound to keep the premises in a condition fit for the purpose for which they were leased, and if he fail to make the necessary repairs the tenant may make them and charge them. But where a building is let to different tenants the landlord is charged with the duty of keeping the halls and those portions of the building which are for the common use of the tenants in safe condition and properly furnished with light at night; Gleason v. Boehm, 58 N. J. L. 475, 34 Atl. 886, 32 L. R. A. 645; but he was held not required under all circumstances to light the halls; Gorman v. White, 19 App. Div. 324, 46 N. Y. Supp. 1; nor is he under any general duty to do so unless their construction is unusual or peculiar so as to render light necessary; Brugher v. Buchtenkirch, 29 App. Div. 342, 51 N. Y. Supp. 464. So he must guard an elevator shaft if rented to different tenants; Malloy v. Real Estate Ass'n, 13 Misc. 496, 34 N. Y. Supp. 679; or retains control of a portion of the premises; Davis v. Power Co., 107 Cal. 563, 40 Pac. 950, 48 Am. St. Rep. 156. He is liable where the premises were let with a nuisance which caused an injury to a third person; City of Denver v. Soloman, 2 Colo. App. 534, 31 Pac. 507; McGrath v. Walker, 64 Hun 179, 18 N.

Y. Supp. 915; or where one was injured by the falling of a fire wall and cornice in the part under the lessor's control; O'Connor v. Curtis (Tex.) 18 S. W. 953; but he was not liable for injury caused by defective steps to one who had no reasonable excuse for entering the house; Hart v. Cole, 156 Mass. 475, 31 N. E. 644, 16 L. R. A. 557; nor to one who fell into a coal hole neither faulty in construction nor out of repair; Adams v. Fletcher, 17 R. I. 137, 20 Atl. 263, 33 Am. St. Rep. 859; contra, where the defect was not proved to have existed at the beginning of the tenancy; 57 L. J. Q. B. 507; but this decision was questioned; 55 Alb. L. J. 27.

Subject to these exceptions, the occupant and not the owner is liable for injuries for failure to keep the premises in repair; Caldwell v. Slade, 156 Mass. 84, 30 N. E. 87; to third persons rightfully upon the premises; City of Peoria v. Simpson, 110 Ill. 294, 51 Am. Rep. 683; Campbell v. Sugar Co., 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503; whether such third persons be in a hotel kept by the tenant; Fellows v. Gilhuber, 82 Wis. 639, 52 N. W. 307, 17 L. R. A. 577; Hutchinson v. Cummings, 156 Mass. 329, 31 N. E. 127; or persons visiting the tenant socially; Montieth v. Finkbeiner, 66 Hun 633, 21 N. Y. Supp. 288; or servants of the tenant; Johnson v. Tacoma Cedar Lumber Co., 3 Wash. 722, 29 Pac. 451; McCarthy v. Foster, 156 Mass. 511, 31 N. E. 385; but where the landlord is in control of machinery within the leased building and furnishes the power for it, and is negligent in that regard, an employee of the tenant is entitled to recover; Poor v. Sears, 154 Mass. 539, 28 N. E. 1046, 26 Am. St. Rep. 272. See APARTMENT; FLAT.

The landlord, in the absence of any express covenant or agreement, is under no obligation to make any repairs; Weber v. Lieberman, 47 Misc. 593, 94 N. Y. Supp. 460; Turner v. Townsend, 42 Neb. 376, 60 N. W. 587; Huber v. Baum, 152 Pa. 626, 26 Atl. 101; and a promise to repair made by the landlord prior to the execution of the lease is merged in the latter and is not binding; Hall v. Beston, 16 Misc. 528, 38 N. Y. Supp. 979. A provision that repairs should be made at the tenant's expense, unless by special agreement the lessor agrees to pay for them binds the latter by a subsequent agreement to make them; Peticolas v. Thomas, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 442, 29 S. W. 166; and where the lessee agrees to do repairs with material to be furnished by the lessor he is bound by his undertaking, and performance is not excused by the lessor's failure to furnish the material; Wood v. Sharpless, 174 Pa. 588, 34 Atl. 319, 321. So a covenant by the lessor to keep the outside of the building in good repair obliges him to put it so; Miller v. McCardell, 19 R. I. 304, 33 Atl. 445, 30 L. R. A. 682.

In Philadelphia, by custom, certain substantial repairs are to be made by the landlord; Scheerer v. Dickson, 7 Phila. (Pa.) 472; and it is said that a covenant by the lessor to repair includes the duty of rebuilding in case of fire; Reno v. Mendenhall, 58 Ill. App. 87; McKinley v. Jutte & Co., 230 Pa. 122, 79 Atl. 244, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 452. And it is not in the power of a tenant to make repairs at the expense of his landlord, unless there be a special agreement to that effect; Powell v. Beckley, 38 Neb. 157, 56 N. W. 974; Mumford v. Brown, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 475, 16 Am. Dec. 440; Heintze v. Bentley, 34 N. J. Eq. 562; but if there is an agreement and a breach of it, the tenant may make the repairs and charge the expense to the landlord; Hexter v. Knox, 63 N. Y. 561; Diggs v. Maury, 23 La. Ann. 59; Ross v. Stockwell, 19 Ind. App. 86, 49 N. E. 50. At common law, in the absence of an express covenant in the lease, the lessor was not bound to rebuild structures which had become unfit for use; Felton v. Cincinnati, 95 Fed. 336, 37 C. C. A. 88; by reason of destruction by fire or accident; Jackson v. Doll, 109 La. 230, 33 South. 207; Arbenz v. Exley, Watkins & Co., 52 W. Va. 476, 44 S. E. 149, 61 L. R. A. 957; Ducker v. Del Genovese, 93 App. Div. 575, 87 N. Y. Supp. 889. Even if the premises have become uninhabitable by fire, and the landlord, having insured them, has recovered the insurance money, the tenant cannot compel him to expend the money so recovered in rebuilding, unless he has expressly engaged to do so; nor can he, in such an event, protect himself from the payment of rent during the unexpired part of the term; Jack. & G. L. & T. § 1049; Witty v. Matthews, 52 N. Y. 512; Loft v. Denis, 1 E. & E. 474; Leads v. Cheetham, 1 Sim. 146.

It has been held that even where the owner of a building had recovered on a fire policy the full loss sustained by the burning of his building caused by the storage of cotton by his tenants in violation of their lease, he may sue and recover from the lessees for the damage to the building; Anderson v. Miller, 96 Tenn. 35, 33 S. W. 615, 31 L. R. A. 604, 54 Am. St. Rep. 812.

On the part of the tenant, we may observe that on taking possession he is at once invested with all the rights incident to possession, and is entitled to the use of all privileges and easements appurtenant to the premises.

He has the implied right to use the appurtenances of a building, as an easement in a chimney on an adjoining lot; Buss v. Dyer, 125 Mass. 287; a light and air space; Case v. Minot, 158 Mass. 577, 33 N. E. 700, 22 L. R. A. 536; the use of streets for access; Edmison v. Lowry, 3 S. D. 77, 52 N. W. 583, 17 L. R. A. 275, 44 Am. St. Rep. 774; the use of elevators, but if one is in fact maintained in the building by the landlord, he is not required to run it without an agreement to do so, express or implied; Cummings v. Perry, 169 Mass. 150, 47 N. E. 618, 38 L. R. A. 149.

The tenant may also maintain an action against any person who disturbs his possession or trespasses upon the premises, though it be the landlord himself; Cook v. Transp. Co., 1 Den. (N. Y.) 91; Dickinson v. Goodspeed, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 119; or under the landlord's authority; Crowell v. R. Co., 61 Miss. 631; or a third person against whom, if he is ousted, he may recover the possession and also have an action for damages; Tobias v. Cohn, 36 N. Y. 363; Schmoele v. Betz, 212 Pa. 32, 61 Atl. 525, 108 Am. St. Rep. 845; Stebbins v. Demorest, 138 Mich. 297, 101 N. W. 528. He is entitled to an injunction to restrain a nuisance affecting health and comfort in the use of the premises; State v. King, 46 La. Ann. 78, 14 South. 423 (for a collection of cases as to what are such nuisances, see 1 Taylor L. & T. 9th Ed. § 201, note); and may sue for damages to his crops, and the overflow of his lands caused by the wrongful act of another; Bannon v. Mitchell, 6 Ill. App. 17; Baltimore & S. P. R. Co. v. Hackett, 87 Md. 224, 39 Atl. 510; St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Trigg, 63 Ark. 536, 40 S. W. 579; or the obstruction of a way appurtenant to the premises; Morrison v. R. Co., 117 Ia. 587, 91 N. W. 793.

One who enters upon land by the permission, sufferance, or consent of the tenant, is at once charged by the law with the allegiance due from the tenant to his lessor; Springs v. Schenck, 99 N. C. 551, 6 S. E. 405, 6 Am. St. Rep. 552. So a railroad company lessee is liable for injury to a passenger, though the lease was illegal and void; Feital v. R. Co., 109 Mass. 398, 12 Am. Rep. 720; and in such case the lessee may be considered as operating the road as the agent of the lessor, who, if the lease were void, would continue to be liable; Lee v. R. Co., 116 Cal. 97, 47 Pac. 932, 38 L. R. A. 71, 58 Am. St. Rep. 140. The tenant is also answerable for any neglect to make such repairs as he is chargeable with; supra; and is liable for injuries to third persons, his liability being precisely like that of any other occupant of immovable property; Taylor, L. & T. § 192; his responsibility springs rather from his actual possession than from his relation as tenant; Feital v. R. Co., 109 Mass. 398, 12 Am. Rep. 720. He is liable for the negligence of his servant or of anyone assisting the servant in performing his duties at the request of the latter; Althorf v. Wolfe, 22 N. Y. 355; Killion v. Power, 51 Pa. 429, 91 Am. Dec. 127; Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black (U. S.) 418, 17 L. Ed. 298; Randleson v. Murray, 8 Ad. & El. 109; or for maintaining a nuisance upon the premises; Ball v. Nye, 99 Mass. 582, 97 Am. Dec. 56; or for an injury which is occasioned by his negligence in repairing the building without sufficiently guarding against accidents to passers-by; Sexton v. Zett, 44 N. Y. 430; Wright v. Saunders, 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 214, affirmed 36 How. Prac. 136, *42 N. Y. 323. He may also be liable for injuries to persons resorting to the premises on his invitation, resulting from faults in the construction of the building of which he has knowledge or reason to apprehend and fails to exercise reasonable care to prevent accident or to give warning; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Kerr, 25 Md. 521; Carleton v. Steel Co., 99 Mass. 216; Nickerson v. Tirrell, 127 Mass. 236; but the visitor must himself exercise due care, and if he fails to do so he cannot recover; Wilkinson v. Fairrie, 1 H. & C. 633.

Another obligation which the law imposes upon the tenant, independent of any agreement, is so to use the premises as not to injure them unnecessarily and this implied covenant has been said to be in effect a covenant against voluntary waste and nothing more, and it does not make the tenant answerable for accidental damages; U. S. v. Bostwick, 94 U. S. 53, 24 L. Ed. 65. If the lessee covenants to return the premises in good repair he cannot require the lessor to make any repairs; Hays v. Moody, 2 N. Y. Supp. 385; so also, if there be no stipulation on the subject of repairs, the tenant is bound to keep the premises in ordinary repair; Hitner v. Ege, 23 Pa. 305. Except where the lease contains a special exemption, the tenant is responsible for any waste committed on the premises; Consolidated Coal Co. v. Savitz, 57 Ill. App. 659; such as the removal of stairways, elevators, etc., from the building; Palmer v. Young, 108 Ill. App. 252; or of fences from the land; Brown v. Hord, 15 S. W. 874, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 916; or of a portion of a building; Bass v. R. Co., 82 Fed. 857, 27 C. C. A. 147, 39 L. R. A. 711; the undertaking to deliver up the premises at the end of the term in as good condition as when they were taken is subject to the limitation of such wear and tear as is incident to the use of which the premises is put; Jennings v. Bond, 14 Ind. App. 282, 42 N. E. 957; and the tenant is not obliged under such covenant to replace fixtures which have become useless from ordinary wear and tear; Fox v. Lynch, 71 N. J. Eq. 537, 64 Atl. 439.

The covenant to keep in repair means only in as good repair as when the lease was made; St. Joseph & St. L. R. Co. v. Ry. Co., 135 Mo. 173, 36 S. W. 602, 33 L. R. A. 607; he is not bound to improve a building which was old and dilapidated when he took possession; Stultz v. Locke, 47 Md. 562. Under an agreement to keep the house in "good and tenantable repair" and to leave the same at the expiration of the term, the tenant's obligation is to keep and put the premises in such repair, having regard for the age, character and locality of the house, as would make it reasonably fit for the occupation of the class that would be likely to take it; Pridefoot v. Hart, 59 L. J. Q. B. D. 43; in construing such a covenant the age and general condition of the premises must be considered; Willcock v. Due, 1 F. & F. 337.

Where the tenant had a covenant that the premises were to be kept in a cleanly and healthy condition, he was justified in abandoning them when the landlord rendered them uninhabitable by maintaining a nuisance; Sully v. Schmitt, 147 N. Y. 248, 41 N. E. 514, 49 Am. St. Rep. 659.

But the tenant is not bound to rebuild premises which have accidentally become ruinous during his occupation; nor is he answerable for ordinary wear and tear, nor for an accidental fire, nor to put a new roof on the building, nor to make what are usually called general or substantial repairs; Eagle v. Swayze, 2 Daly (N. Y.) 140; Street v. Brewing Co., 101 App. Div. 3, 91 N. Y. Supp. 547. Neither is he bound to do painting, whitewashing, or papering, except so far as they may be necessary to preserve exposed timber from decay; Wise v. Metcalfe, 10 B. & C. 299. In general he need do nothing which will make the inheritance better than he found it; Torvians v. Young, 6 C. & P. 8; Long v. Fitzimmons, 1 W. & S. (Pa.) 530.

There is no implied contract binding the lessee to restore buildings which have been destroyed by accident; Earle v. Arbogast, 180 Pa. 409, 36 Atl. 923. Under a covenant by the lessee to deliver up the premises in as good condition as when the lease was made, unavoidable (or inevitable) accident excepted, the landlord is not liable for the repairs to a window broken by a storm; Turner v. Townsend, 42 Neb. 376, 60 N. W. 587; or for one broken by a stone kicked by a passing horse; Peck v. Mfg. Co., 43 Ill. App. 360. If there be an express covenant by the tenant to repair, he must do so though the premises be destroyed by fire; Hoy v. Holt, 91 Pa. 88, 36 Am. Rep. 659; Phillips v. Stevens, 16 Mass. 238; contra, if there is no express covenant to repair; U. S. v. Bostwick, 94 U. S. 53, 24 L. Ed. 65. Where the lease required the tenant to "cash any repairs" on the leased premises to a specified amount, the landlord acquires no right to charge the tenant with repairs made by himself; Schrage v. Miller, 44 Neb. 818, 62 N. W. 1091. Under a covenant that the tenant shall "make the necessary repairs," he is liable for the breaking of a plate glass in the building, though without his fault; Cohn v. Hill, 9 Misc. 326, 39 N. Y. Supp. 209. Where an explosion occurred in a leased building, the landlord was not relieved of the burden of showing negligence of the lessee; Easby v. Easby, 180 Pa. 429, 36 Atl. 923.

Where the tenant had covenanted to make the repairs but the landlord authorized his agent to do some repairing in the course of which, by reason of unskilful workmanship, the wall fell upon a tenant's goods, the landlord was liable; Lynch v. Ortleib & Co., 87 Tex. 590, 30 S. W. 545; id.; 28 S. W. 1017.

With respect to farming leases, a tenant is under a similar obligation to repair; but it differs from the general obligation in this, that it is confined to the dwelling-house which he occupies,—the burden of repairing and maintaining the out-buildings and other erections on the farm being sustained either by the landlord, or the tenant, in the absence of any express provision in the lease, by the particular custom of the country in which the farm is situated. He is always bound, however, to cultivate the farm in a good and husband-like-manner, to keep the fences in repair, and to preserve the timber and ornamental trees in good condition; Standen v. Cristmas, 10 Q. B. 135; and for any violation of any of these duties he is liable to be proceeded against by the landlord for waste, whether the act of waste be committed by the tenant or, through his negligence, by a stranger; Co. Litt. 53; Atersoll v. Stephens, 1 Taunt. 198; Cook v. Transp. Co., 1 Denio (N. Y.) 104; Aughinbaugh v. Coppenheffer, 55 Pa. 347; Walker v. Tucker, 70 Ill. 527; U. S. v. Bostwick, 94 U. S. 53, 24 L. Ed. 65; 5 Term 373; to till a farm contrary to the usual rotation of crops and to the usage of the country is waste; Wilds v. Layton, 1 Del. Ch. 226, 12 Am. Dec. 91. As to what constitutes waste, see that title, and see also Taylor, Landlord & Tenant § 346 et seq.

The tenant's general obligation to repair also renders him responsible for any injury a stranger may sustain by his neglect to keep the premises in a safe condition; as, by not keeping the covers of his vaults sufficiently closed, so that a person walking in the street falls through, or is injured thereby. If he repairs or improves the building, he must guard against accident to the passers-by in the street, by erecting a suitable barricade, or stationing a person there to give notice of the danger; Althorf v. Wolfe, 22 N. Y. 366; L. R. 2 C. P. 311; L. R. 5 Q. B. 501. For any unreasonable obstruction which he places in the highway adjoining his premises, he may be indicted for causing a public nuisance, as well as rendered liable to an action for damages, at the suit of any individual injured. Nor may the tenant keep dangerous animals on the premises; Buckley v. Leonard, 4 Den. (N. Y.) 500; Coggswell v. Baldwin, 15 Vt. 404, 40 Am. Dec. 686. At common law, if a fire began in a dwelling-house and spread to neighboring buildings, the tenant of the house where the fire began was liable in damages to all whose property was injured. But by a statute of Queen Anne, amended by stat. 14 Geo. III. c. 78, this right of action has been taken away. The statute is generally re-enacted in the United States; vide Tayl. L. & T. § 196.

The tenant's chief duty, however, is the payment of rent, the amount of which is either fixed by the terms of the lease, or, in the absence of an express agreement, is such a reasonable compensation for the occupation of the premises as they are fairly worth. If there has been no particular agreement between the parties, the tenant pays rent only for the time he has had the beneficial enjoyment of the premises; but if he has entered into an express agreement to pay rent during the term, no casualty or injury to the premises by fire or otherwise, nothing, in fact, short of an eviction, will excuse him from such payment; Gates v. Green, 4 Paige (N. Y.) 355, 27 Am. Dec. 68; Barrett v. Boddie, 158 Ill. 479, 42 N. E. 143, 49 Am. St. Rep. 172; Wagner v. White, 4 Har. & J. (Md.) 564; 10 M. & W. 321; Fowler v. Bott, 6 Mass. 63. The same rule applies when the rent is paid in advance; Diamond v. Harris, 33 Tex. 634; Cross v. Button, 4 Wis. 468; or the lessor has collected insurance money and refuses to rebuild after destruction of the premises; Bussman v. Ganster, 72 Pa. 285; and a guarantor of the lessee is likewise held; Kingsbury v. Westfall, 61 N. Y. 356.

In England the same rule applies where the tenant has only part of a house; Izon v. Gorton, 5 Bing. N. C. 501; and also in Kentucky; Helburn v. Mofford, 7 Bush (Ky.) 169; but it is not the rule generally in this country; Kerr v. Exch. Co., 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 315; Winton v. Cornish, 5 Ohio 477; McMillan v. Solomon, 42 Ala. 356, 94 Am. Dec. 654; though the rent was paid in advance; Shawmut Nat. Bank v. Boston, 118 Mass. 125; Ainsworth v. Ritt, 38 Cal. 89. In South Carolina the rule as to liability for rent is otherwise; Bayly v. Lawrence, 1 Bay (S. C.) 499; Ripley v. Wightman, 4 McCord (S. C.) 447; and so it is in Louisiana, where also if the premises are destroyed or become untenantable the lease is determined; Coleman v. Haight, 14 La. Ann. 564; Meyers v. Henderson, 49 La. Ann. 1547, 16 South. 729. In New York the same result is effected by statute; Fleischman v. Toplitz, 134 N. Y. 349, 31 N. E. 1089; and in Washington when the building is destroyed by fire; Porter v. Tull, 6 Wash. 408, 33 Pac. 965, 22 L. R. A. 613, 36 Am. St. Rep. 172.

It has been said that an eviction must be by process of law in order to release the tenant from payment of rent; Greenby v. Wilcocks, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 1, 3 Am. Dec. 379; but this has been characterized as a dictum and it is now generally held otherwise; Greenvault v. Davis, 4 Hill (N. Y.) 643; Edmison v. Lowry, 3 S. D. 77, 52 N. W. 583, 17 L. R. A. 275, 44 Am. St. Rep. 774; Green v. Irving, 54 Miss. 450, 28 Am. Rep. 360. An eviction, however actually enforced, constitutes a good excuse from payment; Heinrich v. Mack, 25 Misc. 597, 56 N. Y. Supp. 155; Royce v. Guggenheim, 106 Mass. 201, 8 Am. Rep. 322; Barnes v. Bellamy, 44 U. C. Q. B. 303; but there must be an eviction in good faith and not by collusion; Mattoon v. Munroe, 21 Hun (N. Y.) 74. And if he has been deprived of his tenancy by the act, omission or agency of the landlord either on the rented or adjoining property, he is discharged from payment of rent; Leopold v. Judson, 75 Ill. 536; Colburn v. Morrill, 117 Mass. 262, 19 Am. Rep. 415; Poston v. Jones, 37 N. C. 350, 38 Am. Dec. 683; Upton v. Townsend, 17 C. B. 30 (a leading case on what amounts to eviction); Conlon v. McGraw, 66 Mich. 194, 33 N. W. 388. So the tenant is discharged from payment of rent by an ouster under a paramount title; Blair v. Claxton, 18 N. Y. 529; University of Vermont v. Joslyn, 21 Vt. 52.

What amounts to eviction is a difficult question to answer generally and must be determined by the facts of each case. Actual force is not necessary; Tallman v. Murphy, 120 N. Y. 345, 24 N. E. 716; but it includes any wrongful act of the lessor which results in an entire or partial interference with the tenant's occupation and enjoyment; Oakford v. Nixon, 177 Pa. 76, 35 Atl. 588, 34 L. R. A. 575. The eviction may be constructive and, if by the bona fide assertion of a paramount title, the lessee may yield without waiting for force and his attornment or purchase without change of possession will be sufficient as an eviction; Moore v. Vail, 17 Ill. 190; Loomis v. Bedel, 11 N. H. 74; Holbrook v. Young, 108 Mass. 83; but an attornment must be shown; Hawes v. Shaw, 100 Mass. 187. If, however, part only of the premises be recovered by paramount title, the rent is apportioned, and the tenant remains liable in proportion to the part from which it has not been evicted; Woodf. L. & T. 1115; 2 East 575; Carter v. Burr, 39 Barb. (N. Y.) 59; Leishman v. White, 1 Allen (Mass.) 489. See RENT. A tenant's liability for rent is not affected by condemnation of part of the demised premises; Stubbings v. Village of Evanston, 136 Ill. 37, 26 N. E. 577, 11 L. R. A. 839, 29 Am. St. Rep. 300; but it ceases where the estate in the entire premises is extinguished; Corrigan v. City of Chicago, 144 Ill. 537, 33 N. E. 746, 21 L. R. A. 212; it amounts to eviction by paramount right; id. Where upper rooms or an apartment are rented and the building is destroyed by fire the tenancy is terminated there being no interest in the soil so as to rebuild; Graves v. Berdan, 26 N. Y. 498; contra, Izen v. Gorton, 5 Bing. N. C. 501. The erection of a building on an adjoining lot causing deprivation of light and ventilation and dampness was not an eviction of the tenant of a room in an office building; Hilliard v. Coal Co., 41 Ohio St. 662, 52 Am. Rep. 99; but the common law rule requiring the tenant, under a covenant to repair, to rebuild in case of fire was held not in force and where the premises were destroyed by a hurricane the rent may be apportioned; Wattles v. Coal Co., 50 Neb. 251, 69 N. W. 785, 36 L. R. A. 424, 61 Am. St. Rep. 554. A lessee of a saloon must continue to pay rent after the passage of a prohibition law; O'Byrne v. Henley, 161 Ala. 620, 50 South. 83, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 496.

The obligation to pay rent may be apportioncd; for, as rent is incident to the reversion, it will become payable to the assignees of the respective portions thereof whenever that reversion is severed by an act of the parties or of the law. Daniels v. Richardson, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 569; Nellis v. Lathrop, 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 121, 34 Am. Dec. 285; Hare v. Proudfoot, 6 U. C. Q. B. O. S. 617. But the tenant's consent is necessary for an apportionment when made by the landlord, unless the proportion of rent chargeable upon each portion of the land has been otherwise determined; Bliss v. Collins, 5 B. & Ald. 876; Roberts v. Snell, 1 M. & G. 577; Farley v. Craig, 11 N. J. L. 262; Ryerson v. Quackenbush, 26 N. J. L. 236. When the reversion is severed by act of the law there is an apportionment without the consent of tenants; Buffum v. Deane, 4 Gray (Mass.) 385; Crosby v. Loop, 13 Ill. 625; Cole v. Patterson, 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 456; and where lands held under lease were severed by the conveyance of a portion thereof from the lessor to a stranger it was held that the rent was apportioned between the several owners of the reversion; Gribbie v. Toms, 70 N. J. L. 522, 57 Atl. 144, affirmed 71 N. J. L. 338, 59 Atl. 117. A tenant, however, cannot get rid of or apportion his rent by transferring the whole or a part of his lease; for if he assigns it, or underlets a portion of it, he still remains liable to his landlord for the whole; Cro. Eliz. 633; Van Rensselaer v. Chadwick, 24 Barb. (N. Y.) 333. Instances of an apportionment by act of law occur where there is a descent of the reversion among a number of heirs, or upon a judicial sale of a portion of the premises; for in such cases the tenant will be bound to pay rent to each of the parties for the portion of the premises belonging to them respectively. So, if a man dies, leaving a widow, she will have a right to receive one-third of the rent, while the remaining two-thirds will be payable to his heirs; so, if a part of the demised premises be taken for public purposes, the tenant is entitled to an apportionment; Co. Litt. 148 a; Cole v. Patterson, 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 456; Crosby v. Loop, 13 Ill. 625; Schuylkill & D. Imp. & R. Co. v. Schmoele, 57 Pa. 271. At common law rent could not be apportioned as to time; 2 Ves. Sr. 672; Bank of Pennsylvania v. Wise, 3 Watts (Pa.) 394. But various statutes, such as 11 Geo. II. c. 19, both in England and the United States, have mitigated the hardships resulting from an enforcement of this rule. See Tayl. L. & T. § 389.

A tenant is estopped to deny the validity of his landlord's title; Hacket v. Marmet Co., 52 Fed. 268, 3 C. C. A. 76, 8 U. S. App. 149; Dixon v. Stewart, 113 N. C. 410, 18 S. E. 325; Ricketson v. Galligan, 89 Wis. 394, 62 N. W. 87; Knowles v. Murphy, 107 Cal. 107, 40 Pac. 111; Elliott v. Smith, 23 Pa. 131; Hamill v. Jalonick, 3 Okl. 223, 41 Pac. 139; Pappe v. Trout, 3 Okl. 260, 265, 41 Pac. 397; Sexton v. Carley, 147 Ill. 269, 35 N. E. 471; Vernam v. Smith, 15 N. Y. 327; unless he first surrender to him the possession; McKissick v. Ashby, 98 Cal. 422, 33 Pac. 729; Bertram v. Cook, 32 Mich. 518. Under this rule one who goes into possession under the guardian or minor heirs cannot question their title; Wolf v. Holton, 104 Mich. 107, 62 N. W. 174; even after the expiration of the lease, the tenant is bound by the same rule, unless he surrender possession or give notice that he will thereafter claim under another and valid title; Kiernan v. Terry, 26 Or. 494, 38 Pac. 671; this applies to persons who have entered by the owner's permission, and while in possession never denied his title, and their assignees are likewise estopped; McLennan v. Grant, 8 Wash. 603, 36 Pac. 682. After the termination of the lease, the lessee may, without a surrender of possession, assert a claim to a superior title; Dodge v. Phelan, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 441, 21 S. W. 309; but a tenant in possession under a lease, who afterwards obtains an outstanding title to an undivided interest in the premises, cannot sue the lessor for partition without first surrendering the possession to the lessor; Barlow v. Dahm, 97 Ala. 414, 12 South. 293, 38 Am. St. Rep. 192. Where a widow joined in a lease with heirs, who conveyed to the tenant, the latter was still estopped to deny the tenancy as to the widow and was liable to her for her share of the rents; Sommer v. Brewing Co., 6 Misc. 413, 26 N. Y. Supp. 865. A lessee who takes a lease from an adverse claimant to the title is estopped to deny the title of the latter when sued for rent; Hamilton v. Pittock, 158 Pa. 457, 27 Atl. 1079. The tenant is not estopped from showing that the title under which he entered has expired or been extinguished by operation of law; Winn v. Strickland, 34 Fla. 610, 16 South. 606; or that the landlord has parted with his title; West Shore Mills Co. v. Edwards, 24 Or. 475, 33 Pac. 987; although one who enters under a tenant cannot deny the title of the landlord without surrendering possession, yet if he enters under a valid lease, he is not estopped from defending his possession under it, but the landlord is estopped in such a case from denying the right of the lessee to possession under a lease expressly conferring such a right; Flynn v. Hite, 107 Cal. 455, 40 Pac. 749; nor is the lessee estopped to deny the lessor's title where the land was public domain, not the subject of lease without right from the state; Welder v. McComb, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 85, 30 S. W. 822.

The payment of rent by mistake after the termination of the tenancy does not continue it; Robinson v. Min. Co., 55 Mo. App. 662. The rule of estoppel does not apply where the relation of landlord and tenant has been brought about by fraud or mistake; Suddarth v. Robertson, 118 Mo. 286, 24 S. W. 151; nor where they combined to evade the homestead laws; McKinnis v. Mortg. Co., 55 Kan. 259, 39 Pac. 1018; nor does it apply to a stranger who brought goods upon the land by permission of the tenant not claiming possession; Padman v. Henman [1893] 2 Q. B. 168.

A tenant "may buy the title of his landlord, or, if the title be assigned or transferred to another during his lease, he may set this up in bar of the landlord's right to recover" possession of the property; Smith v. Mundy, 18 Ala. 182, 52 Am. Dec. 221. He may, if it be done without fraud, purchase the landlord's reversion; Stout v. Merrill, 35 Ia. 47. He may show, in an action for rent, that since the lease he has acquired the title of his landlord, or one superior to it; Van Etten v. Van Etten, 69 Hun 499, 23 N. Y. Supp. 711. He may not controvert his landlord's title at the time he entered, but he may show that it afterwards passed to another person; Ryerss v. Farwell, 9 Barb. (N. Y.) 615; or was subsequently extinguished, or expired during the term; Den v. Ashmore, 22 N. J. L. 261; Sherman v. Fisher, 138 Mich. 391, 101 N. W. 572; Duff v. Wilson, 69 Pa. 316; and he may dispute his landlord's title as against the vendee of the latter; Tewksbury v. Magraff, 33 Cal. 237. So he may show that the landlord's title, and with it his right of action, has terminated without the tenant's fault; Franklin County Grammar School v. Bailey, 62 Vt. 467, 20 Atl. 820, 10 L. R. A. 405. The rule of estoppel does not prevent the tenant from acquiring at or through a judicial sale, during the tenancy, the title which the landlord held at the commencement of the tenancy, or from holding that title in his own right and adversely to the landlord; Elliott v. Smith, 23 Pa. 131; Tilghman v. Little, 13 Ill. 239. But the relation of landlord and tenant is so far one of trust and confidence as to render it inequitable for the tenant to purchase the property at a sale of which the landlord had not notice, under a judgment recovered by the tenant himself against a former owner upon a bond secured by a mortgage on the land; Matthew's Appeal, 104 Pa. 444; or by unfair practices at the sale to secure the property at an inadequate price; Cocks v. Izard, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 559, 19 L. Ed. 275.

The tenant of a dowress will after her death be tenant at sufferance of the reversioners and cannot purchase the lands at a sale for taxes, but will be held to have redeemed the property in favor of the landlord; Lyebrook v. Hall, 73 Miss. 509, 19 South. 348.

A tenant who is under no obligation or duty to pay taxes on the property may purchase at a tax sale during his term; Weichselbaum v. Curlett, 20 Kan. 709, 27 Am. Rep. 204; Higgins v. Turner, 61 Mo. 249; such purchase not only extinguishes the landlord's title, but cuts off the lease; Ferguson v. Etter, 21 Ark. 160, 76 Am. Dec. 361; but where the tenant in possession is liable under statute to pay the taxes, he cannot acquire a title as against the owner by purchasing a tax title based on a sale for taxes during the tenancy; Smith v. Specht, 58 N. J. Eq. 47, 42 Atl. 599; and it has been held that, even if the tenant is not under any contractual or statutory duty to pay the taxes, a purchase of land by him under a tax sale operates only as a payment, and confers no title on him as against the landlord, or one claiming under the latter, nor can he acquire title as against the landlord by purchasing the certificate of sale issued to another person as purchaser, and subsequently procuring a deed as assignee; Bailey's Adm'r v. Campbell, 82 Ala. 342, 2 South. 646. A defendant entitled to a homestead in certain lands, sold under execution against him, is not estopped from claiming his homestead, by accepting a lease for the same land from the purchaser at the execution sale; Abbott v. Cromartie, 72 N. C. 293, 21 Am. Rep. 457; but the right to the homestead is no defence to the suit for the land and the tenant must wait until his term expires before asserting his claim to the homestead; id.

The rights of the landlord and tenant are not confined to the immediate parties to the contract, but attach to all persons who may succeed either of them as assignees. In case of sale by the landlord the tenant retains the rights and his assignee in turn assumes his liabilities and is entitled to the same protection from the assignee of the reversion; Van Rensselaer v. Hays, 19 N. Y. 68, 75 Am. Dec. 278; Fennell v. Guffey, 155 Pa. 38, 25 Atl. 785. The original lessee is not, by the transfer, discharged from his obligations under express covenants, if any, even if the lessor assent to the assignment; Shaw v. Partridge, 17 Vt. 626; Ranger v. Bacon, 3 Misc. 95, 22 N. Y. Supp. 551; Dewey v. Dupuy, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 553; Charless v. Froebel, 47 Mo. App. 45; Auriol v. Wills, 4 Term 94. In case of implied covenants he is discharged if the landlord specially accept the assignee as his tenant; Kimpton v. Walker, 9 Vt. 191; 3 Rep. 22; Spencer's Case, 1 Sm. L. Cas. *176; and the liability of the assignee may be at any time terminated by him, by a transfer of the estate assigned, even if the transfer be made to a pauper with express intent to evade liability; Fagg v. Dosie, 3 Y. & C. 96; Armstrong v. Wheeler, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 88; Kimpton v. Walker, 9 Vt. 191. A tenant who accepts a lease from and attorns to one who succeeds to the ownership of the land, is estopped, in an action to recover possession, from setting up any defence under a lease from a former owner, under which he had entered; Vallette v. Billinski, 167 Ill. 564, 47 N. E. 770, affirming 68 Ill. App. 361. And it has been held that a tenant is under a legal obligation to pay rent to one to whom the lease is assigned by the landlord, without any formal act of attornment; Kelly v. Bowerman, 113 Mich. 446, 71 N. W. 836. A lessor who accepts rent from an assignee of the lease thereby waives a provision of the lease that it shall be void if assigned without the lessor's consent; Koehler v. Brady, 78 Hun 443, 29 N. Y. Supp. 388.

The relation of landlord and tenant may be terminated in several ways. If it is a tenancy for life, it will of course terminate upon the decease of him upon whose life the lease depends; McIntyre v. Clark, 6 Misc. 377, 26 N. Y. Supp. 744; but if it be for life, or for a certain number of years, and depend upon some particular event, the happening of that event will determine the tenancy. So if it be for a certain number of years, independent of any contingency, it will expire at the last moment of the last day of the tenancy. See Finkelstein v. Herson, 55 N. J. L. 217, 26 Atl. 688; Buchanan v. Whitman, 76 Hun 67, 27 N. Y. Supp. 604. And in all these cases depending upon the express conditions of the lease, no notice to quit will be necessary in order to dissolve the relation of the parties to each other; Co. Litt. 216; 9 Ad. & E. 879; Jackson v. Parkhurst, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 128; Ellis v. Paige, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 43; Bedford v. McElherron, 2 S. & R. (Pa.) 49; Clapp v. Paine, 18 Me. 264; Den v. Adams, 12 N. J. L. 99. A tenant after the expiration of his term becomes a trespasser, though his holding is in good faith under a color and reasonable claim of right; and the landlord without legal process may forcibly enter, therefore, and eject him; Freeman v. Wilson, 16 R. I. 524, 17 Atl. 921; and by holding over after the expiration of the term, a tenant for years does not become a tenant for another year, unless the landlord so elects; Condon v. Brockway, 157 Ill. 90, 41 N. E. 634; if he holds over after a notice of increase of rent, the effect is to make him a tenant for another year upon the terms of the old lease with the single exception of the increased rent; Rand v. Purcell, 58 Ill. App. 228; and a tenant for one year, with the privilege of three, is bound for the latter if he elected to hold over; Curtis v. Sturges, 2 Mo. App. Rep. 1047.

But a tenancy from year to year, or at will, can only be terminated on the part of the landlord by a notice to quit. This notice might at common law be by parol; Doe v. Kightley, 7 Term 63; Thamm v. Hamberg, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 528; but it is frequently regulated by statute; it must be explicit, and require the tenant to remove from the premises; Steward v. Harding, 2 Gray (Mass.) 335; Dougl. 175; 5 Ad. & E. 350; it must be served upon the tenant, and not upon an under tenant; it must run in the name of the landlord, and not of his agent; Jackson v. Baker, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 270. But personal service of the notice on the tenant is not absolutely essential, and it is sufficient if the notice be left at the tenant's usual residence with his wife or servant; 4 Term 464; L. R. 5 H. L. 134; Walker v. Sharpe, 103 Mass. 154. An estate at will must be mutual; if one party can terminate the lease at any time, so can the other; Cowan v. Iron Co., 83 Va. 547, 3 S. E. 120. Such a tenancy is terminated by the alienation of the premises, without notice to the tenant; Seavey v. Cloudman, 90 Me. 536, 38 Atl. 540. Whether a tenant from year to year is in any event bound to give notice to determine the tenancy seems doubtful. See the authorities collected in Cooke v. Neilson, Bright. Pa. 463. At common law this notice was required to be one of half a year, ending with the period of the year at which the tenancy commenced; 1 W. Bla. 596; 7 Q. B. 638; and this rule prevails in some states, while in others a notice required to terminate the tenancy from year to year varies and the statutes must be consulted with respect to any particular state, or case. See NOTICE TO QUIT.

In case of such a tenancy, in default of notice, the landlord has no right of entry until the term granted has terminated by legal notice, and in default of such notice, the tenant may hold over; Thomas v. Black, 8 Houst. (Del.) 507, 18 Atl. 771. The subject is in general governed by statutory rules too numerous and complicated to set forth. Where a lease provides for the termination of a tenancy upon the tenant's ceasing to work for the landlord and the tenant voluntarily ceases so to work, no notice of the termination of the lease to the tenant is necessary; Hackett v. Marmet Co., 52 Fed. 268, 3 C. C. A. 76, 8 U. S. App. 149.

The relation of landlord and tenant will also be dissolved when the tenant incurs a forfeiture of his lease by the breach of some covenant or condition therein contained. At common law a forfeiture was incurred if the tenant did any act which was inconsistent with his relation to his landlord; as if he impugned the title of his lessor by affirming by matter of record the fee to be in a stranger, claimed a greater estate than he was entitled to, or undertook to alienate the estate in fee; Co. Litt. 251 b, 252 a; 12 East 444. But these causes of forfeiture, founded upon strict feudal principles, have been generally abolished in the United States; and a forfeiture of a term of years now only occurs in consequence of a breach of some express stipulation contained in the lease, as for the commission of waste, nonpayment of rent, or the like; Baxter v. Lansing, 7 Paige Ch. (N. Y.) 350; 5 B. & C. 855; Chapman v. Wright, 20 Ill. 125. In order to work a forfeiture for non-payment of rent, a demand must be made for the rent, though such demand may be in the form of a notice to quit; Haynes v. Inv. Co., 35 Neb. 766, 53 N. W. 979; Henderson v. Coke Co., 140 U. S. 25, 11 Sup. Ct. 691, 35 L. Ed. 332. A delay of a few days in declaring a lease forfeited for non-payment of rent does not constitute a waiver of the right of forfeiture; Williams v. Vanderbilt, 145 Ill. 238, 34 N. E. 476, 21 L. R. A. 489, 36 Am. St. Rep. 486. A provision of a lease that failure of the lessee to make a payment when due should render the lease null and void, and not binding on either party, does not make the lease void, except at the option of the lessor; Cochran v. Pew, 159 Pa. 184, 28 Atl. 219. A forfeiture may be waived by an acceptance of, or distraining for, rent which became due after a breach committed by the tenant, or by giving a notice to quit, or by any other act which acknowledges the continuance of the tenancy; Newman v. Rutter, 8 Watts (Pa.) 51; Coon v. Brickett, 2 N. H. 163; Gomber v. Hackett, 6 Wis. 323, 70 Am. Dec. 467; L. R. 7 Q. B. 344; Garnhart v. Finney, 40 Mo. 449, 93 Am. Dec. 303; Jones v. Durrer, 96 Cal. 95, 30 Pac. 1027; Michel v. O'Brien, 6 Misc. 408, 27 N. Y. Supp. 173; and will be relieved against by the courts in all cases where it happened accidentally, or where the injury is capable of compensation, the damages on equitable principles being a mere matter of computation; 12 Ves. Ch. 475; 2 Price 206; Story, Eq. § 1314; Giles v. Austin, 62 N. Y. 486; Hagar v. Buck, 44 Vt. 285, 8 Am. Rep. 368; and it is always at the election of the lessor to avail himself of his right of re-entry for conditions broken or not as he pleases; 6 B. & C. 519; and vide Davis v. Moss, 38 Pa. 346; Bowman v. Foot, 29 Conn. 331; Dermott v. Wallach, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 64, 17 L. Ed. 680.

Another means of dissolving a tenancy is by an operation of law, termed a merger,—which happens where a tenant purchases the fee of the reversion, or the fee descends to him as heir at law, the lease becoming thereby merged in the inheritance, the lesser estate being absorbed in the greater. To produce this result, however, it is necessary that the two estates should meet in the same person and in the same right; for if he who has the reversion in fee marries the tenant for years, or if a tenant makes the landlord his executor, the term of years is in neither case merged, because in either case he holds the fee for his own benefit, while the term of years is taken in one case for his wife's use, and in the other for the benefit of the estate he represents as executor; Woodf. L. & T. 1188; Co. Litt. 288 b; 1 Washb. R. P. 354; Charnley v. Hansbury, 13 Pa. 16; Sheldon v. Edwards, 35 N. Y. 279. See Pickett v. Ferguson, 86 Tenn. 642, 8 S. W. 386. But the universal current of opinion now sets against the operation of the doctrine of merger wherever a result will be produced contrary to the intentions of the parties or prejudicial to the interests of third parties; Bascom v. Smith, 34 N. Y. 320; Buffum v. Deane, 4 Gray (Mass.) 385; 4 De G. M. & G. 474.

In addition to the several methods of putting an end to a tenancy already mentioned, we may add that it is, of course, competent for a tenant at any time to surrender his lease to the landlord; Livingston v. Potts, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 28; Jungerman v. Bovee, 19 Cal. 354; but a mere agreement to surrender a lease is inoperative unless accompanied by the act; National Union Bldg. Ass'n v. Brewer, 41 Ill. App. 223. An express surrender can only be made by deed in England, since the Statute of Frauds, and this provision is in some of the states re-enacted; 8 Taunt. 270; Rowan v. Lytle, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 616; Farson v. Goodale, 8 Allen (Mass.) 202; Bailey v. Wells, 8 Wis. 141, 76 Am. Dec. 233. But a surrender by operation of law is a case excepted out of the statute; as, for example, where, during the period of the old lease, a new one, inconsistent with it in its terms, is accepted, the old lease is at an end; Jackson v. Gardner, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 394; Bowen v. Haskell, 53 Minn. 480, 55 N. W. 629; Tayl. L. & T. 512. If the subject-matter of the lease wholly perishes; Graves v. Berdan, 26 N. Y. 498; Shawmut Nat. Bank v. City of Boston, 118 Mass. 125; Russell v. Mallon, 38 Cal. 259; or is required to be taken for public uses; Barclay v. Picker, 38 Mo. 143; Schuylkill & D. Imp. & R. Co. v. Schmoele, 57 Pa. 271; O'Brien v. Ball, 119 Mass. 28; or the tenant disclaims to hold under his landlord, and therefore refuses to pay his rent, asserts the title to be in himself or unlawfully attorns to another, the tenancy is at an end, and the landlord may forthwith resume the possession; Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. (U. S.) 43, 7 L. Ed. 596; Jackson v. Vincent, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 633; Van Winkle v. Hinckle, 21 Cal. 342; Newman v. Rutter, 8 Watts (Pa.) 55; Leonard v. Henderson, 23 Gratt. (Va.) 332.

Where there is no covenant against subletting, the lessee cannot by a surrender to the lessor affect the rights of the undertenant; Mitchell v. Young, 80 Ark. 441, 97 S. W. 454, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 221, note, 117 Am. St. Rep. 89, 10 Ann. Cas. 423; Eten v. Luyster, 60 N. Y. 252; Hessel v. Johnson, 129 Pa. 173, 18 Atl. 754, 5 L. R. A. 851, 15 Am. St. Rep. 716; and this is true of a tenant from year to year; Brown v. Butler, 4 Phila. (Pa.) 71; and a surrender will not affect the rights of the purchaser of a building on the leased land which the tenant had the right to remove; Adams v. Goddard, 48 Me. 212; or a mortgage; Allen v. Brown, 5 Lans. (N. Y.) 280; or a mechanic's lien; Gaskill v. Trainer, 3 Cal. 334; or the right to remove fixtures; Morrison v. Sohn, 90 Mo. App. 76; on the leased premises. The lessor commits trespass if he enters upon the subtenant after a surrender; Krider v. Ramsay, 79 N. C. 354; Brown v. Butler, supra, where it was also held that the right of the subtenant, was not affected by a covenant against subletting in the original lease; but see Trauerman v. Lippincott, 39 Mo. App. 478.

Where the tenant, by consent of his landlord, continues in possession after the expiration of his term, in the absence of a new agreement, the law will imply a tacit renewal of the former one; Schilling v. Klein, 41 Ill. App. 209; Cavanaugh v. Clinch, 88 Ga. 610, 15 S. E. 673. [1893] 1 Q. B. 736.

After the tenancy has ended, the right of possession reverts to the landlord, who may re-enter upon the premises if he can do so without violence. But if the tenant holds over and the landlord takes possession forcibly, so as to endanger a breach of the peace, he runs the risk of being punished criminally for a forcible entry (see FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER) as well as of suffering the consequences of an action of trespass; Low v. Elwell, 121 Mass. 309, 23 Am. Rep. 272; Stearns v. Sampson, 59 Me. 568, 8 Am. Rep. 442; 4 Am. Law Rev. 429; 1 M. & G. 644; Overdeer v. Lewis, 1 W. & S. (Pa.) 90, 37 Am. Dec. 440. The landlord should, therefore, in all such cases, call in the law to his assistance, and receive possession at the hands of the sheriff.

The tenant, on his part, is bound quietly to yield up the possession of the entire premises; Poppers v. Meagher, 148 Ill. 192, 35 N. E. 805. And for refusal to perform this duty he will be liable for rent; Schuyler v. Smith, 51 N. Y. 309, 10 Am. Rep. 609; Clapp v. Noble, 84 Ill. 62; Bonney v. Foss, 62 Me. 248; E., B. & E. 326.

If the tenant, after surrendering possession, resumed it under any agreement with his landlord or his agent, though made by the latter without authority, he is not liable for holding over; Frost v. Iron Co., 1 App. Div. 449, 37 N. Y. Supp. 374; and where a tenant vacated a building and delivered up the key, leaving a press on the premises, which was used by his employés, who had entered the building some days after without his knowledge, he did not hold over; Excelsior Steam Power Co. v. Halsted, 5 App. Div. 124, 39 N. Y. Supp. 43. Where the lessee holds over, he may be treated by the landlord at his option as a tenant or a trespasser; Kaier v. Leahy, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 243; Frost v. Iron Co., 12 Misc. 348, 33 N. Y. Supp. 654. The tenant cannot avoid his responsibility for the rent of another term by notice that he is going to quit, and then not doing it; Graham v. Dempsey, 169 Pa. 460, 32 Atl. 408. Where the agent of the lessor failed to make an answer to the tenant's proposition to hold over as tenant by the month, he was not thereby relieved from the consequences of holding over; Smith v. Snyder, 168 Pa. 541, 32 Atl. 64. The burden is on the tenant to relieve himself from an action for unlawful detainer by showing the agreement for the renewal of the tenancy; Jefferson v. Ummelmann, 56 Mo. App. 440.

But where a tenant for years had planted a crop, after a decree foreclosing a mortgage on the leased land under which the land was sold before the crop matured, and the purchaser having notified the tenant that he would expect rent in money or in kind, the latter was held entitled to the crop; Monday v. O'Neil, 44 Neb. 724, 63 N. W. 32, 48 Am. St. Rep. 760. Upon the abandonment of a farm by a tenant before the end of the term, the possessory right in whatever property is on the farm, including harvested crops, reverts to the lessor; Maclary v. Turner, 9 Houst. (Del.) 281, 32 Atl. 325.

The tenant has a reasonable right of egress and regress for the purpose of removing his goods and chattels; 2 Bla. Com. 14; Moore v. Boyd, 24 Me. 242; L. R. 5 C. P. 334. He may, also, in certain cases, take such estovers as are attached to the estate and the emblements or annual profits of the land after his tenancy is ended, as to which his rights are largely affected by local customs (see ESTOVERS; EMBLEMENTS); Gardner v. Lanford, 86 Ala. 508, 5 South. 879; Bradley v. Bailey, 56 Conn. 374, 15 Atl. 746, 1 L. R. A. 427, 7 Am. St. Rep. 316; but a tenant for years is not entitled to them; Gossett v. Drydale, 48 Mo. App. 430; nor where the landlord reenters and takes possession because of the failure of the tenant to pay rent; Gregg v. Boyd, 69 Hun (N. Y.) 588, 23 N. Y. Supp. 918; and, unless restricted by some stipulation to the contrary, may remove such fixtures as he has erected during his occupation for his comfort and convenience, particularly if for trade purposes. As between landlord and tenant, whatever is affixed to the land by the tenant for the purpose of trade, whether it be made of wood or brick, is removable at the end of the term; Wiggins Ferry Co. v. Ry. Co., 142 U. S. 396, 12 Sup. Ct. 188, 35 L. Ed. 1055; Friedland v. Myers, 139 N. Y. 432, 34 N. E. 1055. See FIXTURES.

Advertising. An agreement to permit the erection of a wooden sign on vacant land, not to touch or be fastened to the wall of the house, is a license; Wilson v. Tavener, [1901] 1 Ch. 578; but an agreement to give the use of the roof of a building which involves the erection and maintenance of a wooden structure upon it, is a lease and not a license; Pocher v. Hall, 50 Misc. 639, 98

N. Y. Supp. 754; and so is the hiring of the outer wall for such purpose; Oakford v. Nirdlinger, 196 Pa. 162, 46 Atl. 374; but an agreement by a lessee to permit a third person, for an annual sum, to hang a sign on the outer wall, was held a license; Lowell v. Strahan, 145 Mass. 1, 12, 13, 12 N. E. 401, 1 Am. St. Rep. 422; and it was not a breach of a covenant not to underlet; id.

A tenant from month to month cannot lease the wall of the building for advertising purposes; Louisville Gunning System v. Parks, 126 Ky. 532, 104 S. W. 331, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 587; or the roof; O. J. Gude Co. v. Farley, 28 Misc. 184, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1036; though he has a right to sublet other portions of the building; id. Where there is a lease of the wall of a building to an advertising company, the tenant could be held liable for holding over because of failure to obliterate the advertisement at the expiration of the specified period of occupancy; Goldman v. Advertising Co., 29 Misc. 133, 60 N. Y. Supp. 275. The advertiser is not liable for injuries caused by the sign board's blowing down; Reynolds v. Van Beuren, 155 N. Y. 120, 123, 49 N. E. 763, 42 L. R. A. 129. See Underhill, Land. & Ten. 288, § 204.

The ordinary common-law remedy by which a landlord proceeds to recover the possession of his premises is by an action of ejectment, and in these cases it is a general rule that the tenant is never permitted, for reasons of sound public policy, to controvert his landlord's title, or to set up against him a title acquired by himself during his tenancy which is hostile in its character to that which he acknowledged in accepting the demise. The authorities for this rule and the exceptions to it are fully stated supra.

But the slow and measured progress of the action of ejectment in most cases affords a very inadequate remedy to the landlord; and in order, therefore, to obviate the evils arising from its delays, the statutes of the different states provide a summary proceeding, by which a landlord may be speedily reinstated, upon short notice, in cases where a tenant abandons the premises before the end of the term without surrendering the lease, leaving rent in arrear, or continues to hold over after the expiration of his term, or has become unable or unwilling to pay rent for the use of the premises; Stratton v. Lord, 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 611; Tayl. L. & T. § 713.

See LEASE; DISTRESS; ADVERSE POSSESSION.

LANDLORD'S WARRANT. A warrant of distress. A written authority from a landlord to a constable or bailiff authorizing him to make a distress upon the tenant's goods and chattels in order to force the payment of rent or some covenant in a lease. See DISTRESS; LANDLORD & TENANT.

LANDMARKS. The president may declare historic landmarks and structures, etc. on government lands, to be national monuments; Act of June, 8, 1906. See ANTIQUITIES.

LANDS. See LAND; LANDS, PUBLIC.

LANDS CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACTS. Important acts, beginning in 1845, and last amended by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 18, the object of which was to provide legislative clauses in a convenient form for incorporation, by reference in future special acts of parliament, for taking lands, with or without the consent of their owners, for the promotion of railways, and other public undertakings. Moz. & W.

These statutes or some designated part thereof are incorporated in all acts of parliament, authorizing public works which require the acquisition of land, and they correspond to the grant of the delegated right of eminent domain in legislative charters in the United States.

LANDS, PUBLIC. Such lands of the United States as are open to sale or other disposition under general laws. Bardon v. R. Co., 145 U. S. 538, 12 Sup. Ct. 856, 36 L. Ed. 806; Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 763, 23 L. Ed. 769; Heydenfeldt v. Min. Co., 10 Nev. 290. In a statute authorizing location of script, it does not include tidelands; Mann v. Land Co., 153 U. S. 273, 14 Sup. Ct. 820, 38 L. Ed. 714. Nor does the term include lands to which any claims or rights of others have attached; Bardon v. R. Co., 145 U. S. 538, 12 Sup. Ct. 856, 36 L. Ed. 806.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP. The public domain embraces lands known in the United States as "public lands," lying in certain states and territories known as "land states and territories," and was acquired by the government of the United States by treaty, conquest, cession by states or other nations, and purchase, and is disposed of under and by authority of the national government, when the Indian title thereto (which is one of possession merely) has been extinguished by treaty stipulations or otherwise.

The fee in unsold lands is either in the federal or state governments. The Indians have only a right of use, which, however, cannot be divested, except by purchase or war; Godfrey v. Beardsley, 2 McLean, 412, Fed. Cas. No. 5,497.

They have the unquestionable right to the lands which they occupy until extinguished by a voluntary cession to the government; Leavenworth, L. & G. R. Co. v. U. S., 92 U. S. 733, 23 L. Ed. 634; while the claim of the government extends to the complete ultimate title, charged with the right of possession by the Indians, and to the exclusive power of acquiring that title of possession; Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 603, 5 L. Ed. 681; Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cra. (U. S.) 87, 3 L. Ed. 162; Holden v. Joy, 17 Wall. (U. S.) 211, 21 L. Ed. 523; Beecher v. Wetherby, 95 U. S. 517, 24 L. Ed. 440.

The English possessions in America were not claimed by right of conquest, but by right of discovery. The discoveries were made by persons acting under the authority of the government for the benefit of the nation; and the crown, according to the principles of the British constitution, was the proper organ to dispose of the public domain; Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 409, 10 L. Ed. 997. The United States holds the public lands within the new states by force of the deeds of cession and the statutes connected with them and not by any municipal sovereignty which it may be supposed they possess or have reserved by compact with the new states, for that particular purpose; Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How. (U. S.) 224, 11 L. Ed. 565.

The interest of the United States in lands held by it within state boundaries is simply proprietary, the sovereignty residing within the state, and its rights differ from those of any ordinary land-holder in the state, only as provided in the constitution of the United States, and by the terms of the compact between the general and the state government at the time of the admission of the latter into the Union; State v. Bachelder, 5 Minn. 223 (Gil. 178), 80 Am. Dec. 410.

All lands in the territories not appropriated by competent authority before they were acquired are, in the first instance, the exclusive property of the United States, to be disposed of to such persons, at such times and in such modes and by such titles, as the government may deem most advantageous to the public; Irvine v. Marshall, 20 How. (U. S.) 561, 15 L. Ed. 994.

The United States is the sole owner of the soil, and has entire and complete jurisdiction over it. Through congress, it provides the methods of disposition under grants, settlement laws, or sales, public or private; may prevent trespasses, and in all methods retain the entire control over it until sold or otherwise disposed of. Congress has the same power over it as over any other property belonging to the United States, and this power is vested in congress without any limitation; U. S. v. Railroad Bridge Co., 6 McLean 517, Fed. Cas. No. 16,114; Gibson v. Chouteau, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 92, 20 L. Ed. 534; Irvine v. Marshall, 20 How. (U. S.) 558, 15 L. Ed. 994; U. S. v. Gratiot, 14 Pet. (U. S.) 526, 10 L. Ed. 573; and any change of political condition, as in a territory becoming a state, or change of boundary of a territory or state, in no wise affects the absolute and complete proprietary power of the national government over the public domain. It remains until the last acre is disposed of. It cannot be taxed by a state; Jourdan v. Barrett, 4 How. (U. S.) 169, 11 L. Ed. 924; nor can a state exercise any power or control over the public lands which may lie within its limits; Turner v. Missionary Union, 5 McLean 344, Fed. Cas. No. 14,251; U. S. v. Gratiot, 14 Pet. (U. S.) 526, 10 L. Ed. 573; Jourdan v. Barrett, 4 How. (U. S.) 169, 11 L. Ed. 924; U. S. v. Bridge Co., 6 McLean 517, Fed. Cas. No. 16,114.

The control of the United States over its own property is independent of locality, and no state or territory can interfere with their control, enjoyment, or disposal of such property; nor are the contracts of the government with respect to subjects within its constitutional competency, local, or confined in their effect and operation strictly to the situs of the subjects to which they relate; Irvine v. Marshall, 20 How. (U. S.) 558, 15 L. Ed. 994.

For the amount of the public lands and the manner in which it was acquired by the national government, see Donaldson's History of the Public Domain, p. 10; H. R. Misc. Docs. No. 45, part 4, 2d Sess. 47th Cong., vol. 10.

The secretary of the treasury has power to sell lands devised to the United States; act of March 3, 1903.

NATIONAL CONTROL AND DISPOSITION. The constitution of the United States (article 4, sec. 3, par. 2) provides that: "The congress shall have the power to dispose of and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," the word "property" in the above quotation meaning lands; U. S. v. Bridge Co., 6 McLean 517, Fed. Cas. No. 16,114. Under the authority thus conferred upon it, the congress has provided a complete system for the regulation and disposal of the public domain. In the early stages of the history of the government the public domain was put within the jurisdiction and control of the secretary of the treasury, but on March 3, 1849, congress created the home, now the interior department, and by section 3 of that law provided that "the secretary of the interior shall perform all the duties in relation to the general land office of supervision and appeal now discharged by the secretary of the treasury." Thereafter the general land office became and still continues to be a bureau in the interior department. The secretary of the interior is now charged with the supervision of the public business relating to the public lands, including mines and pension and bounty lands. R. S. chaps. 2 and 3, title 11. See LAND OFFICE.

Under the supreme control which has been vested in it by the constitution, the congress has divided the public domain into various land districts, and has provided for the appointment of a surveyor general for the states and territories, and of certain deputy surveyors; U. S. R. S. §§ 2207–2233. It has also provided for the appointment of various registers and receivers, and the creation of what is known as local land offices in the various land districts. The duties of these officers is to receive applications to enter the public lands under the various land laws, and to hear contests concerning the same, with rights of appeal to the general land office and from thence to the secretary of the interior. See U. S. R. S. §§ 2234–2247. For the various land districts and their creation, see U. S. R. S. § 2248.

KINDS OF LAND AND METHODS OF ACQUIRING SAME. The public lands may be divided with respect to their character into, first, agricultural lands, which are acquired under the various laws, such as pre-emption, homestead, etc., at the price of $1.25 per acre when they lie without, and $2.50 per acre when they lie within, the limits of any grant made by congress in aid of the construction of a railroad; U. S. R. S. § 2357; U. S. v. Healey, 160 U. S. 136, 16 Sup. Ct. 247, 40 L. Ed. 369; second, mineral lands, which are sold at $5.00 per acre, under which term we include lands containing placer deposits of minerals, which are sold at $2.50 per acre; third, coal lands, which are sold at $20.00 per acre when situated within 15 miles of any completed railroad, otherwise at $10.00 per acre; fourth, desert lands, which are sold at $1.25 per acre, provided they do not lie within the limits of a railroad grant; U. S. v. Healey, 160 U. S. 136, 16 Sup. Ct. 247, 40 L. Ed. 369; and fifth, saline lands, sold at $1.25 per acre.

Various methods for the sale or other disposition of the public domain have been enacted from time to time, a very interesting history of which may be found in Donaldson's History of the Public Domain 196, 208, 676. The provisions of law which formerly existed relative to the acquisition of public lands by private entry and public sale and through the timber culture laws have been repealed; R. S. 1 Supp. pp. 682, 940. The methods of acquiring the agricultural lands of the United States are now, through the operation of the pre-emption law, superseded by the provisions of the amended homestead law and the desert land act.

Pre-emptions. The provisions of the law formerly existing with relation to the acquisition of title under the pre-emption laws were repealed and superseded by the act of March 3, 1891; Rev. Stat. 1 Supp. pp. 939, 940, especially section 3 of said act, p. 942. The acts of March 3, 1877, 19 Stat. L. 404, May 27, 1878, and June 14, 1878, 20 Stat. L. 63–113, permitting pre-emptioners who have changed to homestead entries to credit their time from original settlement, are superseded as to future permanent operations by the act of March 3, 1891, supra. See also act of March 2, 1889; R. S. 1 Supp. p. 682. Various other acts contain provisions common to pre-emption and homestead entry, and are by this act superseded as to the former. This act, however, does not affect entries made under the pre-emption laws prior to its passage. See sec. 4 of said act, and 15 Land Decisions 482.

Desert Land Act. Desert lands are such as will not, without artificial irrigation, raise an agricultural crop. These lands are confined to what is known as the arid regions which are situated in certain western states and territories. Provision is made for the acquisition of lands of this character by conducting water thereon, and performing certain other requirements, as provided in the act of March 3, 1877; R. S. 1 Supp. p. 137. For sections 4 and 8 added to this act, see act of March 3, 1891, R. S. 1 Supp. pp. 940, 941.

Saline lands. Provision for the sale of land of this character is made by the act of January 12, 1877; R. S. 1 Supp. 127. Under its provisions a hearing is ordered and witnesses are examined as to the character of the land in question, and the testimony taken at the hearing is transmitted to the general land office for its decision. Should the tract be adjudged agricultural, it will be subject to disposition as such. Should the tract be adjudged to be of saline character it will be offered at public sale to the highest bidder for cash at a price of not less than $1.25 per acre. In case it is not sold, it is subject to private sale at a price not less than $1.25 per acre, in the same manner as other public lands are sold. Quære: Whether this act is repealed by section 9 of the act of March 3, 1891? U. S. R. S. 1 Supp. 943.

Coal lands. For the provisions relating to the acquisition of lands of this character, see Rev. Stat. U. S. § 2347. See also Donaldson's History of the Public Domain 1277.

MINERAL LANDS, RESOURCES, AND CLAIMS; location of, under U. S. Laws. The existing provisions and regulations relative to the acquisition of mineral lands, the title of which is in the government, are to be found in U. S. R. S. §§ 2318–2352, and in 1 Supp. R. S. pp. 166–7; 276, 62, 324, 948, 950. For a history of the attempted legislation prior to the passage of the act of 1866 (the first mining law), see Yale on Mining Claims 340 and Weeks on Mineral Lands, Addenda, chap. 1, for the act of 1866.

Requisites of location. All valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, are "free and open to exploration and purchase by citizens of the United States, or those who have declared their intention to become such" (R. S. § 2319), and citizenship or declared intention is a condition precedent to the right of location; Crœsus Mining, M. & S. Co. v. Mineral Co., 19 Fed. 82; Rosenthal v. Ives, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 265, 12 Pac. 904. A state corporation is a citizen for this purpose, provided the members thereof are citizens and qualified to make the location; Thomas v. Chisholm, 13 Colo. 105, 21 Pac. 1019; McKinley v. Wheeler, 130 U. S. 630,

6 Sup. Ct. 638, 32 L. Ed. 1048. Upon declaring his intention to become a citizen, an alien may have advantage of work previously done, and of a record previously made; Crœsus Mining, M. & S. Co. v. Mineral Co., 19 Fed. 78; and an alien locator may convey to a citizen so as to give title from date of conveyance, provided no third person acquires rights prior to such conveyance; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Mining Co., 1 Fed. 537. See Osterman v. Baldwin, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 122, 18 L. Ed. 730. A location made jointly by aliens and citizens is a good location by the citizens; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Mining Co., 1 Fed. 537.

A mineral location can only be made on the unsold, unappropriated and unoccupied lands of the United States; Merced Min. Co. v. Boggs, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 304, 18 L. Ed. 245; Taylor v. Middleton, 67 Cal. 656, 8 Pac. 594; Armstrong v. Lower, 6 Colo. 393; but the right to possession is derived solely from a valid location; McKinstry v. Clark, 4 Mont. 370, 1 Pac. 759; Noyes v. Black, 4 Mont. 527, 2 Pac. 769; and cannot be held as "occupied" so as to defeat a subsequent location unless all the laws, including the yearly assessment work, etc., are complied with; Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 284, 26 L. Ed. 735; Sparks v. Pierce, 115 U. S. 408, 6 Sup. Ct. 102, 29 L. Ed. 428; Funk v. Sterrett, 59 Cal. 613; Garfield, M. & M. Co. v. Hammer, 6 Mont. 53, 8 Pac. 153. The act describes mineral lands as "valuable mineral deposits." This means lands which may be profitably mined in the usual manner; Copp's Mining Lands 324. Lands containing minerals, but not in profitable quantities, are not mineral lands; Deffeback v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 392, 6 Sup. Ct. 95, 29 L. Ed. 423; U. S. v. Reed, 28 Fed. 482; Alford v. Barnum, 45 Cal. 482. But non-mineral lands, to the extent of 5 acres, may be located as mill sites, when in connection with a lode location or separately; Rev. Stats. § 2337. Title to mineral lands can only be acquired in the precise manner provided by the laws relating to such lands; and a patent obtained under the provisions of any other law is void; R. S. § 2318; Morton v. Nebraska, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 660, 22 L. Ed. 639; Deffeback v. Hawke, 115 U. S. 392, 6 Sup. Ct. 95, 29 L. Ed. 423; Sparks v. Pierce, 115 U. S. 408, 6 Sup. Ct. 102, 29 L. Ed. 428. If a patent issue for agricultural land on which there is a known lode, title to such lode does not pass; Gold Hill Quartz Min. Co. v. Ish, 5 Or. 104; but contra if subsequently discovered; Copp's Min. Lands 124; Moore v. Smaw, 17 Cal. 199, 79 Am. Dec. 123. The right to locate is initiated by discovery and appropriation, which forms the source of title; development being the requisite of continued possession; Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 537, 5 Sup. Ct. 565, 28 L. Ed. 1116; O'Reilly v. Campbell, 116 U. S. 418, 6 Sup. Ct. 421, 29 L. Ed. 669; Richards v. Dower, 81 Cal. 44, 22 Pac. 304. A location before an actual discovery confers no rights upon the locator; North Noonday Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 1 Fed. 530; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 11 Fed. 676.

No specific time is designated by the statutes within which the location must be completed; but if one begin a location and then depart he cannot return and complete the location so as to hold it against one who, during such absence, has made a complete location; Newbill v. Thurston, 65 Cal. 419, 4 Pac. 409. A location is dependent, primarily, upon what is found in the discovery shaft, the discovery of ore elsewhere being, as a rule, unavailing; Van Zandt v. Min. Co., 8 Fed. 725; but see Harrington v. Chambers, 3 Utah 94, 1 Pac. 362; Armstrong v. Lower, 6 Colo. 581; Southern Cross Gold & Silver Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 15 Nev. 383, where evidence was admitted in proof of discovery to show the existence of a vein other than at the location point. The work leading up to the discovery need not have been done by the locator, provided the existence of the vein was known to him at the time of location; Wenner v. McNulty, 7 Mont. 30, 14 Pac. 643.

It is not priority of discovery, but priority of compliance with the various requirements of the law that gives the right to the mine; Gleeson v. Mining Co., 13 Nev. 455. As to the proper manner of staking out a claim so as to conform to the lode or vein, see Flagstaff Silver Min. Co. v. Tarbet, 98 U. S. 463, 25 L. Ed. 253. See also Armstrong v. Lower, 6 Colo. 393; Gleeson v. Mining Co., 13 Nev. 442. Laws and regulations for the location, development, and working of mines may be made by the states and by the miners themselves; R. S. §§ 2319–2324.

As to the extent of ground open to location and the method of staking it off, see R. S. § 2320, and for the provisions relating to placer locations, see R. S. §§ 2329, 2333. See U. S. v. Mining Co., 128 U. S. 673, 9 Sup. Ct. 195, 32 L. Ed. 571; Copp's Min. Lands 52.

The term "placer claim," as used in R. S. § 2329, means "ground between defined boundaries which contains mineral in its earth, sand, or gravel; ground that includes valuable deposits not in place, that is, not fixed in rock, but which are in a loose state, and may, in most cases, be collected by washing or amalgamation, without milling." U. S. v. Mining Co., 128 U. S. 679, 9 Sup. Ct. 195, 32 L. Ed. 571.

It is incumbent upon one in possession of a placer claim whereon is a vein or lode, to state that fact in his application for a patent, or the patent will not carry such vein or lode. If discovered subsequent to the issuance of the patent, however, such vein or lode is covered by the placer patent; R. S. § 2333; Clary v. Hazlitt, 67 Cal. 286, 7 Pac.

The statutory requirements concerning the description of the location, R. S. §§ 2318, 2324, are: (1) that the location shall be along the vein or lode; (2) that it shall be distinctly marked on the ground so that the boundaries can be readily traced and that such description shall be by reference to some permanent object for the identification of the claim; (3) that all the lines shall be parallel—the last requirement being directory only, the object being to prevent a party from claiming more width of vein outside his surface lines than within them; Doe v. Sanger, 83 Cal. 203, 23 Pac. 365. All other details of location are governed by the rules and regulations of miners and state laws; R. S. § 2324.

Although the federal laws do not require the posting of any notice of location on the claim, but only require the recording of such notice in the mining district, yet the posting of a notice is almost universally required by the miners' regulations, and by state laws; Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 537, 5 Sup. Ct. 565, 28 L. Ed. 1116; Johnson v. Parks, 10 Cal. 446; Cheesman v. Shreeve, 40 Fed. 787. See LODE; VEIN.

Re-location. A mining claim is subject to re-location where the owner has failed to comply with the statutory requirements, or has failed to observe local rules; R. S. § 2324; Morgan v. Tillottson, 73 Cal. 520, 15 Pac. 88; Golden Fleece Gold & Silver Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 12 Nev. 312. But the forfeiture must have actually occurred before re-location, otherwise the re-location is invalid and the re-locator a trespasser; Jupiter Mining Co. v. Mining Co., 11 Fed. 680; Lockhart v. Rollins, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 540, 21 Pac. 413; Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. Ed. 735. A re-location is made in the same manner and carries the same rights as original location; Armstrong v. Lower, 6 Colo. 393; Wills v. Blain, 5 N. M. 238, 20 Pac. 798.

Annual work. It is provided by federal statute that during each year, after location and until a patent issues, there shall be performed on the claim not less than $100 worth of labor on improvements; R. S. § 2324; and this provision is applicable alike to placer claims and to lode claims; Carney v. Min. Co., 65 Cal. 40, 2 Pac. 734. The work may be done anywhere upon the surface of the claim within its surface lines or below the surface within the lines extended vertically downward, but it must be done as a necessary means of extracting ore; Mt. Diablo Mill & Min. Co. v. Callison, 5 Sawy. 439, Fed. Cas. No. 9,886; Remmington v. Baudit, 6 Mont. 138, 9 Pac. 819. See also Jackson v. Roby, 109 U. S. 440, 3 Sup. Ct. 301, 27 L. Ed. 990. By act of February 11, 1875, U. S. R. S. 1 Supp. 62, it is provided that where a tunnel has been run for the purpose of developing a lode, the tunnel shall be considered as expended on said lode, and that it shall not be required to perform work on the surface of the lode as required in R. S. § 2324. See Chambers v. Harrington, 111 U. S. 355, 4 Sup. Ct. 428, 28 L. Ed. 452.

This work may be done by any party in interest, whether such party have a legal or equitable claim; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 11 Fed. 680. The amount of work required by the statute cannot be decreased by any state law or miners' regulation; Sweet v. Webber, 7 Colo. 443, 4 Pac. 752; Original Co. of Williams & Kellinger v. Min. Co., 60 Cal. 631; and may be done at any time within the year; Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. Ed. 735; McGinnis v. Egbert, 8 Colo. 41, 5 Pac. 652.

Failure to perform the work will be excused if brought about by actual existing fear of bodily harm, or prevented by coercion or duress actually and presently existing; Slavonian Min. Co. v. Perasich, 7 Fed. 331; Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 527, 5 Sup. Ct. 560, 28 L. Ed. 1113.

Where claims are held in common, this annual work may be done on any one claim; R. S. § 2324; Chambers v. Harrington, 111 U. S. 350, 4 Sup. Ct. 428, 28 L. Ed. 452.

The apex rule. Ordinarily the locator would be confined to the limits of his surface measurements both as to surface possession and beneath it, but by the apex rule the locator is entitled not only to the surface included within the lines of his location, but also to all of the veins, lodes, and ledges throughout their entire depth, the apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extending downward vertically, albeit such veins, lodes, or ledges may depart from a perpendicular course in such wise as to extend outside of the side lines of the location, provided such right shall not extend beyond the entire lines of the location projecting in their own line or until they intersect the veins or ledges; R. S. § 2322; Jupiter Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 11 Fed. 670; Gilpin v. Min. Co., 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 696, 23 Pac. 547, 1014; Montana Co. v. Clark, 42 Fed. 626. But this right does not carry with it power to follow into the lands of an adjoining proprietor holding title to agricultural lands; Amador Medean Gold Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 36 Fed. 668. But see Cheesman v. Hart, 42 Fed. 98. This rule of the apex has been a fruitful source of litigation, the following being a few of the more important cases: Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Smelting Co., 118 U. S. 196, 6 Sup. Ct. 1177, 30 L. Ed. 98; Champion Min. Co. v. Min. Co., 75 Cal. 78, 16 Pac. 513; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Murphy, 3 Fed. 368; Van Zandt v. Min. Co., 8 Fed. 725; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Cheesman, 8 Fed. 297; Cheesman v. Hart, 42 Fed. 98; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Murphy, 2 McCrary 121, 3 Fed. 368; Richmond Min. Co. v. Rose, 114 U. S. 576, 5 Sup. Ct. 1055, 29 L. Ed. 273; Flagstaff Silver Min. Co. v. Tarbet, 98 U. S. 463, 25 L. Ed. 253; Cheesman v. Hart, 42 Fed. 98; Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Cheesman, 8 Fed. 297; Tombstone Mill. & Min. Co. v. Mining Co., 1 Ariz. 426, 25 Pac. 794; McCormick v. Varnes, 2 Utah 355.

PRIVATE ACQUISITION. The rule is well settled, that when public lands have been surveyed and placed in the market, or otherwise opened to private acquisition, a person who complies with all the requisites necessary to entitle him to a patent in a particular tract or lot is to be regarded as the equitable owner thereof, and the land is no longer open to location. Any subsequent grant of the same land to another party is void, unless the first location or entry be vacated and set aside; Wirth v. Branson, 98 U. S. 121, 25 L. Ed. 86; see Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. (U. S.) 498, 10 L. Ed. 264; and when different grants cover the same premises, the earlier takes the title; St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. R. Co., 139 U. S. 1, 11 Sup. Ct. 389, 35 L. Ed. 77.

The legal title to land acquired from the government passes only on the delivery of a patent, and until it so passes the inquiry as to all equitable rights comes within the cognizance of the land department, and the courts do not interfere with it; accordingly they have refused both mandamus to compel the issuing of a patent; U. S. v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378, 26 L. Ed. 167; and an injunction to restrain action by the officers of the land department; Brown v. Hitchcock, 173 U. S. 473, 19 Sup. Ct. 485, 43 L. Ed. 772.

Public lands of the United States may be granted by statute or by treaty, as well as by patent; Stockton v. Williams, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 546. As to the latter method, see LAND PATENT.

After public lands have been entered at the land office and a certificate of entry obtained, they are private property, the government agreeing to make a conveyance as soon as it can, and in the meantime holding the naked legal fee in trust for the purchaser, who has the equitable title; Wisconsin C. R. Co. v. Price County, 133 U. S. 496, 10 Sup. Ct. 341, 33 L. Ed. 687; and they cease to be public; Hastings & D. R. Co. v. Whitney, 132 U. S. 357, 10 Sup. Ct. 112, 33 L. Ed. 363.

Courts have power to protect the private rights of a party who has purchased in good faith from the government, against the interference or appropriations of corrective resurveys made by the land department subsequently to such purchase; Cragin v. Powell, 128 U. S. 699, 9 Sup. Ct. 203, 32 L. Ed. 566. The power to make and correct surveys of the public lands belongs to the political department of the government, and while the lands are subject to the supervision of the general land office, its decisions in such cases are unassailable by the courts, except by a direct proceeding; Cragin v. Powell, 128 U. S. 699, 9 Sup. Ct. 203, 32 L. Ed. 566; Knight v. Land Ass'n, 142 U. S. 161, 12 Sup. Ct. 258, 35 L. Ed. 974.

The land department has full jurisdiction over matters involving the rights of parties to a patent for public lands selected under the act of Congress of June 4, 1897, in lieu of lands relinquished in a forest reservation; Cosmos Exploration Co. v. Oil Co., 190 U. S. 301, 23 Sup. Ct. 692, 47 L. Ed. 1064. By virtue of this jurisdiction, the general land department has power to review and set aside (though not arbitrarily) the decision of local officers relating to those questions where such officers have power to make those decisions in the first instance; id.; Guaranty Sav. Bank v. Beadow, 176 U. S. 448, 20 Sup. Ct. 425, 44 L. Ed. 540; Hawley v. Diller, 178 U. S. 476, 20 Sup. Ct. 986, 44 L. Ed. 1157.

Persons entering on lands, whether "vacant" or "public land," or land acquired by the government of the United States under a foreign grant, are to be deemed trespassers; Boyreau v. Campbell, 1 McAll. 119, Fed. Cas. No. 1,760; and an agreement to sell and transfer their possession and improvements is an illegal and void agreement to continue the trespass, and a note given for the purchase money of an improvement on vacant lands of the United States is for an illegal consideration, and no action will lie upon it; Merrell v. Legrand, 1 How. (Miss.) 150; Stafford v. Anders, 8 Fla. 34; and a trespasser of land from the government is entitled to improvements thereon at the time of the purchase, and if the party who made them should afterwards remove them he is liable in an action of trespass; Welborn v. Spears, 32 Miss. 138. The occupancy of the public lands of the United States constitutes, at least so far as trespasses by a stranger are concerned, a tenancy at will, and not a tenancy from year to year; Duncan v. Potts, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 82, 24 Am. Dec. 766. A person cultivating public lands to which he has no title is not protected by the doctrine of emblements, and a purchaser from the United States is entitled to all crops growing upon the land at the time; Boyer v. Williams, 5 Mo. 335, 32 Am. Dec. 324; but a person by entry upon such land acquires no title to timber cut prior to, and lying upon the land at, the time of his entry; Keeton v. Audsley, 19 Mo. 362, 61 Am. Dec. 560.

In addition to the methods of disposing of the public domain to actual purchasers or settlers upon it, congress has disposed of immense quantities of land in various other ways. For example, grants made in aid of the construction of railroads, either granted directly to the road itself or to a state as a trustee for the use of the road. Large quantities of land have also been granted to the states as they were admitted into the Union, for educational, charitable, and other purposes. A large amount of the public domain has also been taken up under land bounties for military and naval services prior to 1861 and subsequent, and also by the granting of lands for town sites and county seat purposes. An interesting account of this legislation will be found in Donaldson's History of the Public Domain. LANDS, TENEMENTS, AND HEREDITAMENTS. A phrase used in early English law to express all sorts of property of the immovable class, as goods and chattels did the movable class. Wms. R. P. 5.

LANGUAGE. The medium for the communication of perceptions and ideas.

Spoken language is that wherein articulate sounds are used. See Stevenson v. State, 90 Ga. 456, 16 S. E. 95.

Written language is that wherein written characters are used, and especially the system of characters called letters and figures.

At the Conquest, the French-Norman language was substituted in all law proceedings for the ancient Saxon, which, according to Blackstone, 3 Com. 317, was the language of the records, writs, and pleadings until the time of Edward III. Stephen thinks Blackstone has fallen into an error, and says the record was, from the earliest period to which that document can be traced, in the Latin language. Plead. Appx. note 14. The history of legal language in England is further stated by Blackstone as follows: By statute (1362) it was enacted that for the future all pleas should be pleaded, shown, defended, answered, debated, and adjudged in the English tongue, but be entered and enrolled in Latin. The Norman or law French, however, being more familiar as applied to the law than any other language, the lawyers continued to employ it in making their notes of the trial of cases, which they afterwards published in that barbarous dialect under the name of Reports.

After the enactment of this statute, on the introduction of paper pleadings, they followed, in the language as well as in other respects, the style of the records, which were drawn up in Latin. This technical language continued in use till the time of Cromwell, when by a statute the records were directed to be in English; but this act was repealed at the restoration by Charles II., the lawyers finding it difficult to express themselves as well and as concisely in the vernacular as in the Latin tongue; and the language of the law continued as before till about the year 1730, when the statute of 4 Geo. II. c. 26, was passed. It provided that both the pleadings and the records should thenceforward be framed in English. The ancient terms and expressions which had been so long known in French and Latin were now literally translated into English. The translations of such terms and phrases were found to be exceedingly ridiculous. Such terms as nisi prius, habeas corpus, fieri facias, mandamus, and the like, are not capable of an English dress with any degree of seriousness. They are equally absurd in the manner they are employed in Latin; but use, and the fact that they are in a foreign language, have made the absurdity less apparent.

By statute of 6 Geo. II. c. 14, passed two years after the last-mentioned statute, the use of technical words was allowed to continue in the usual language,—which defeated almost every beneficial purpose of the former statute. In changing from one language to another, many words and technical expressions were retained in the new, which belonged to the more ancient language; and not seldom they partook of both. This, to the unlearned student, has given an air of confusion and disfigured the language of the law. It has rendered essential, also, the study of the Latin and French languages. This, perhaps, is not to be regretted, as they are the keys which open to the ardent student vast stores of knowledge. In the United States, the records, pleadings, and all law proceedings are in the English language, except certain technical terms which retain their ancient French and Latin dress. 3 Bla. Com. 317.

From the Conquest until 1731, says Prof. F. W. Maitland, the solemnest language of the law was Latin, and even in the Anglo-Saxon time, though English was the language in which the laws were published and causes pleaded, Latin was the language in which the kings made grants of land. In 1016 the learned men of both races could write and speak in Latin. French was then little more than a vulgar dialect of Latin, and a language in which the people could not write anything. The Conqueror used both Latin and English in his laws, charters, and rights, but Latin soon got the upper hand and became for a while the one written language of the law. In Chancery there was nothing but Latin, and the judgments of the courts were in that language. This continued until 1731. Meantime in the twelfth or early in the thirteenth century, ordinances and statutes written in French began to appear. Under Edward I. French became the language in which laws were published and law books written and continued to be the language of the statute books until the end of the middle ages. Under Henry VII. English became the speech in which English lawgivers addressed their subjects. As the oral speech of litigants and their advisers, French prevailed from the Conquest onwards, but in the local courts a great deal of English must long have been spoken. The jurisprudence of a French-speaking court became the common law, the measure of all rights and duties, and was carried throughout the land by the journeying justices. In the thirteenth century French was used in pleading and the professional lawyer wrote and thought in French. In 1362 a statute endeavored to make English instead of French the spoken language of the law courts, but law writing was still in French. Gradually in the sixteenth century the lawyers began to write in English, though many French law terms still continued to be used; 1 Soc. Eng. 278; and see 1 Poll. & Maitl. 58.

The effect of the Norman conquest of England is still apparent in the technical, legal words in ordinary use. "At the present day," says a learned writer, "it would hardly be too much to say that all our words having a definite legal import are in a certain sense French words. A German jurist is able to expound the doctrines of Roman law in genuinely German words. On many a theme an English man of letters may by way of exploit write a paragraph or a page and use no word that is not in every sense a genuinely English word; but an English lawyer who attempted a similar puritanical feat would find himself doomed to silence. . . . It is worthy of remark that within the sphere of public law we have some old terms that have come down to us from unconquered England. Earl was not displaced by count, sheriff was not displaced by viscount, our king, our queen, our lords, our knights of the shire are English; our aldermen are English if our mayors are French: but our parliament and its statutes, our privy council and its ordinances, our peers, our barons, the commons of the realm, the sovereign, the state, the nation, the people are French; our citizens are French and our burgesses are more French than English. So too a few of the very common legal transactions of daily life can be described by English verbs. A man may give, sell, buy, let, hire, borrow, bequeath, make a deed, a will, a bond, and even be guilty of manslaughter or of theft, and all this is English. But this is a small matter. . . . Let us look elsewhere and observe how widely and deeply the French influence has worked. Contract, agreement, covenant, obligation, debt, condition, bill, note, master, servant, partner, guarantee, tort, trespass, assault, battery, slander, damage, crime, treason, felony, misdemeanor, arson, robbery, burglary, larceny, property, possession, pledge, lien, payment, money, grant, purchase, devise, descent, heir, easement, marriage, guardian, all are French. We enter a court of justice; court, justices, judges, jurors, counsel, attorneys, clerks, parties, plaintiff, defendant, action, suit, claim, demand, indictment, count, declaration, pleadings, evidence, verdict, conviction, judgment, sentence, appeal, every one and every thing, save the witnesses, writs and oaths, have French names. In the province of justice and police with its fines, its gaols, and its prisons, its constables, its arrests, we must, now that outlawry is a thing of the past, go as far as the gallows if we would find an English institution. Right and wrong we have kept, and though we have received tort we have rejected droit but even law probably owes its salvation to its remote cousin the French lei." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 58.

Agreements, contracts, wills, and other instruments may be made in any language, and will be enforced. Bac. Abr. Wills (D 1). An English court, having to construe a contract made in a foreign country and foreign language, must obtain a translation of the instrument and an explanation of the terms of art, if any; 10 H. L. C. 624. And a slander spoken in a foreign language, if understood by those present, or a libel published in such language, will be punished as if spoken or written in the English language; Newell, Def. Sland. & L. 231; Bac. Abr. Slander (D 3); 1 Rolle, Abr. 74; 6 Term 163. See FOREIGN LANGUAGES. For the construction of language, see articles CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION; Jacob, Intr. to the Com. Law Max. 46.

At an early period, the Latin was the diplomatic language in use in Europe. Towards the end of the fifteenth century that of Spain gained the ascendancy, in consequence of the great influence which that country then exercised in Europe. The French, since the age of Louis XIV., has become the almost universal diplomatic idiom of the civilized world; though some states use their national language in treaties and diplomatic correspondence. It is usual in these cases to annex to the papers transmitted a translation in the language of the opposite party, wherever it is understood this comity will be reciprocated. This is the usage of the Germanic Confederation, of Spain, and of the Italian courts. When nations using a common language, as the United States and Great Britain, treat with each other, such language is used in their diplomatic intercourse.

It is believed that the first departure from the rule that the French language should be used in all diplomatic conferences and congresses was in the Berlin conference of 1889, held between the representatives of Germany, Great Britain, and the United States, with reference to the affairs of Samoa. As appears by a protocol of the first session, the proposal was made by the representatives of the United States, and assented to by those of Germany and Great Britain, that the proceedings of the conference should be conducted in the English language. The president of the conference, however, though a German, reserved to himself the right to use the French language at any time if he should find difficulty in expressing himself satisfactorily in the English, but he did not find it necessary to avail himself of that right. Accordingly, the protocols of the first of these sittings were in French, and after that in English.

LANIS DE CRESCENTIA WALLIÆ TRADUCENDIS ABSQUE CUSTUMA, etc. An ancient writ that lay to the customer of a port to permit one to pass wool without paying custom, he having paid it before in Wales. Reg. Orig. 279.

LANNS MANUS (Old Fr.). A lord of the manor. Kelham.

LANO NIGER. A sort of base coin, formerly current in England. Cowell.

LANZAS. In Spanish Law. A certain contribution in money paid by the grandees and other high officers in lieu of the soldiers they ought to furnish government in time of war.

LAPIDATION. The act of stoning a person to death. Webster.

LAPSE. In Ecclesiastical Law. The transfer, by forfeiture, of a right to present or collate to a vacant benefice from a person vested with such right to another in consequence of some act of negligence by the former. Ayl. Par. 331.

Upon six months' neglect of the patron, the right lapses to the bishop; upon six months' neglect of bishop, to archbishop; upon his six months' neglect, to king. The day on which the vacancy occurs is not counted, and the six months are calculated as a half-year. 2 Burn, Ec. L. 355.

To glide; to pass slowly, silently, or by degrees. To slip; to deviate from the proper path. Webster, Dict. See LAPSED DEVISE; LAPSED LEGACY.

LAPSE PATENT. A patent issued to a petitioner for land. A patent for which land to another party has lapsed through neglect of patentee. The lapse patent relates to date of original patent, and makes void all mesne conveyances. Wilcox v. Calloway, 1 Wash. (Va.) 39. See LAND PATENT.

LAPSED DEVISE. A devise which has lapsed, or does not take effect because of the death of the devisee before that of the testator.

The subject-matter of the lapsed devise will, if no contrary intention appear, be included in the residuary clause (if any) contained in the will. In England, by stat. 1 Vict. c. 26, if the devise be to children or other issue of the devisor, and the issue of the devisee be alive, the devise will not lapse, if no such intention appear in the will. A devise always lapses at common law if the devisee dies before the testator, and such was the general rule in this country; Prowitt v. Rodman, 37 N. Y. 54; Robinson v. Martin, 2 Yeates (Pa.) 525; but in many if not all the states, if made to a son or grandson of the testator, it takes effect, by force of statute, in favor of his heirs, if he die before the testator. In North Carolina, a devise to a child dying before the testator does not lapse, but goes to the issue of such child; Cox v. Ward, 107 N. C. 507, 12 S. E. 379; so in Massachusetts, in the case of a devise to a child or other relative; 3 Washb. R. P. *523; Esty v. Clark, 101 Mass. 38, 3 Am. Rep. 320.

In Maryland, the provision against lapse goes much further, and it is provided that no devise or bequest shall fail by reason of the death of the devisee or legatee before the testator, and it takes effect in like manner as if they had survived him; Craycroft v. Craycroft, 6 Har. & J. (Md.) 54. See 1 Jarm. Wills, 6th Am. ed. *307, n.; 4 Kent 541. In regard to a lapsed devise, where the devisee dies during the life of the testator, the heir of the devisee will not take; Gore v. Stevens, 1 Dana (Ky.) 201, 25 Am. Dec. 141; but the estate will go to the testator's heir, notwithstanding a residuary devisee. But if the devise be void, as where the devisee is dead at the date of the will, or is made upon a condition precedent which never happens, the estate will go to the residuary devisee, if the words are sufficiently comprehensive; 15 Ves. 589; In re Woolmer's Estate, 3 Whart. (Pa.) 477; Ferguson v. Hedges, 1 Harring. (Del.) 524; 4 Kent 541. But some of the courts hold in that case even, that the estate goes to the heir; Greene v. Dennis, 6 Conn. 293, 16 Am. Dec. 58; Lea v. Brown, 56 N. C. 141; Tongue's Lessee v. Nutwell, 13 Md. 415, where it was said that there was no solid distinction between a lapsed and a void devise, and that in both cases the heir at law should take, and not the residuary devisee.

When the devise is to the person deceased, with such words as "and his heirs" added, they are generally held to be words of limitation, and not of description. So a devise of the proceeds of land to three persons, one-third to each, and to "their heirs respectively for ever," lapsed on the death of one as to his share, the word heirs designating the estate, not the takers; Estate of Worsley, 36 W. N. C. (Pa.) 247; so where a residuary devise was to two persons, "their heirs and assigns"; Horton v. Earle, 162 Mass. 448, 38 N. E. 1135. The rule that devises lapse by the death of the devisee is not changed by adding to the devise the words "to have and to hold the same to them, their heirs and assigns for ever"; In re Wells, 113 N. Y. 396, 21 N. E. 137, 10 Am. St. Rep. 457. And where land was devised to a daughter for life and then to be "equally divided among the lawful heirs of" another daughter, it was held that the word heirs must be taken in a technical sense, and as the last mentioned daughter was alive at the death of the first, the devise to the heirs lapsed; Clark v. Mosely, 1 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 396, 44 Am. Dec. 229.

In case of gifts to a class, the rule is that there is no lapse, but they go to the other members of the class; Theobald, Wills 643. It is, however, held that the gift is not to a class if the members of the class are named; 11 Sim. 397; 2 J. & H. 656; nor if to "five daughters of A" or "my nine children"; 9 Ch. D. 117; 15 Ch. D. 84; and where the residue was given to sons named, there being nothing to show that testator intended otherwise, they took as individuals and not as a class, and the share of the son who died before his father's death lapsed, and passed as intestate real estate; Church v. Church, 15 R. I. 138, 23 Atl. 302. See LAPSED LEGACY.

In case of a devise to two as joint tenants, if one die before the testator, where survivorship in a joint tenancy has been abolished, his share has been held to fall in the residue; Wins. Eq. 89. Where land was devised to a son who was also appointed executor, and he died and the testator by codicil appointed another executor, referring to the death of his son, it was held that the devise did not lapse, and should be construed as a devise to the son's heirs; Davis' Heirs v. Taul, 6 Dana (Ky.) 51.

A devise to one for life with a remainder does not lapse by the death of the first taker before that of the remainderman; West v. Williams, 15 Ark. 682. The refusal or incapacity of the first taker of a devise or legacy to several in succession does not cause it to lapse, but it passes to the next; Brown v. Brown, 43 N. H. 17. If one is appointed by will to take in case of the death of the first devisee and on that event, the appointee can take as contemplated by the will, there will be no lapse, although the devisee dies before the testator, but the ulterior gift will take effect immediately on testator's decease as a direct unconditional gift; Armstrong v. Armstrong, 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 333.

A devise in trust for a son, and "in the event of the son dying childless" then over, lapsed by the death of the son in the lifetime of the testatrix, and the devise over did not take effect; McGreevy v. McGrath, 152 Mass. 24, 25 N. E. 29.

A devise made to a wife for life, with remainder to the daughter, and with power to the wife to sell and invest the proceeds for the benefit of the daughter, does not lapse during the lifetime of the wife, being for the benefit of the latter as well as the former; Cotton v. Burkelman, 142 N. Y. 160, 36 N. E. 890, 40 Am. St. Rep. 584.

With a single important exception, the same principles apply to devises and legacies with respect to lapse, and as to that difference, and also for other cases on the subject, see LAPSED LEGACY.

LAPSED LEGACY. A legacy which, on account of the death of the legatee before the period arrives for the payment of the legacy, lapses or deviates from the course prescribed by the testator, and falls into the residuum. 1 Wms. Ex., 7th Am. ed. *1071; Craighead v. Given, 10 S. & R. (Pa.) 351.

A legacy which has never vested or taken effect; one which, originally valid, afterwards fails, because the capacity or willingness of the donee to take has ceased to exist before he obtained a vested interest in the gift. Booth v. Baptist Church of Christ, 126 N. Y. 215, 28 N. E. 238.

A distinction exists between a lapsed devise and a lapsed legacy. A devise which lapses does not fall into the residue unless so provided by the will, but descends to the heir at law; on the contrary, personal property passes by the residuary clause, where it is not otherwise disposed of; 15 Ves. 709; 3 Whart. 477. See LAPSED DEVISE.

A lapsed legacy passes by a general residuary clause; Kimball v. Chappel, 18 N. Y. Supp. 30; so also did a legacy which lapsed because it was void; Hulin v. Squires, 63 Hun 352, 18 N. Y. Supp. 309. A lapsed or void legacy goes to the residuary legatee unless an intention to the contrary clearly appear; Hamberlin v. Terry, 1 Sm. & M. Ch. (Miss.) 589; King v. Woodhull, 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 79.

The reason assigned for this difference is that a bequest of personal property refers to the state of the property at the time of the death of the testator, and that a devise operates only on land of which the testator was seised when he made his will; and it is not to be presumed he intended to devise by a residuary clause, a contingency which he could not have foreseen, nor to embrace in it lands contained in a lapsed devise; Greene v. Dennis, 6 Conn. 293, 16 Am. Dec. 58; Lingan v. Carroll, 3 Harr. & McH. (Md.) 333. "How far the alteration of the law of those states where after-acquired lands may be devised will destroy this distinction, it is difficult to say." 1 Bouv. Inst. 2150.

The Pennsylvania act of June 4, 1879, P. L. 88, made the law respecting the devolution of a lapsed devise the same as that of a lapsed legacy, but it was held that this applied only to lapsed specific devises in the body of the will, and that as to lapsed shares of the residue no change was intended; Everman v. Everman, 15 W. N. C. (Pa.) 417. And the same provision exists, except where the will requires a different construction, in Virginia, North Carolina, West Virginia; but in the last state, if there is no residuary devisee, it goes to the heir at law.

The common-law distinction between lapsed devises and lapsed legacies with reference to falling into the residuum has been abrogated by statute in New York, and lapsed devises as well as lapsed legacies fall into the residuum; Moffett v. Elmendorf, 152 N. Y. 475, 46 N. E. 845, 57 Am. St. Rep. 529.

Where a testator gave a share of his residuary personal estate to his widow who took under the will, and another share to a daughter who died before him without issue, it was held that the testator died intestate as to the share given to the daughter, and that the widow was entitled to one-third of it under the intestate laws; In re Reed's Estate, 82 Pa. 428.

Where the rent of a house was given for life to testator's daughter, and at her death to be sold, the proceeds to go to her children when twenty-one years of age, and the income meanwhile to be applied to their maintenance, it was held that the legacy to the children was vested, and on their death in the lifetime of the mother there was no lapse, but the property vested in the life-tenant in fee as the heir of her children as against the heir at law of the original testator; Cropley v. Cooper, 19 Wall. 167, 22 L. Ed. 109, reversing 7 D. C. 226.

If a legacy is payable out of real estate in consequence of a deficiency of personal property, it will go to the heir at law in case of lapse, and if the personal estate is sufficient to pay debts and legatees, it will go to the residuary legatee; King v. Strong, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 94. A legacy to one for life with remainder to another does not lapse upon the death of the first taker during the testator's life; Richmond v. Vanhook, 38 N.

C. 581. If a legacy is payable out of a particular debt due the testator, it does not fail on failure of payment of the debt; Gallagher v. Gallagher, 6 Watts (Pa.) 473.

Unless the legatee survive the testator, as a rule neither he nor his representatives have any claim to the legacy; Comfort v. Mather, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 450, 37 Am. Dec. 523; Ballard v. Ballard, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 41; Hatcher v. Robertson, 4 Strobh. Eq. (S. C.) 179; Bill v. Payne, 62 Conn. 140, 25 Atl. 354; and the same rule applies where a legacy is given to a man and his executors, etc.; 3 Bro. C. C. 128; Kimball v. Story, 108 Mass. 382; Bolles v. Smith, 39 Conn. 219; though the testator may expressly provide otherwise; L. R. 14 Eq. 343. A declaration that a legacy shall not lapse is not sufficient to prevent it unless the intention is clear that it shall go to the estate of the legatee; 27 Beav. 418; 4 D. M. & G. 633; but gifts to A and his executors and administrators with the direction that it shall not lapse is sufficient; 2 Atk. 572. A direction that a legacy should vest from the date of the will is not sufficient to prevent lapse; 14 Eq. 343. From a devise of the remainder of an estate in distinct parcels there arises an inference that the testator did not intend that lapsed legacies should fall into the residue; Silcox v. Nelson, 24 Ga. 84.

A gift to A, and in case of his death to his executors and administrators, will go to A's executors in the event of his death before the testator; 54 L. J. Ch. 648, aff'g 32 W. R. 516 and overruling 1 Myl. & K. 470.

Where a testator bequeathed his estate to several legatees, and having learned of their death, interlined in his will between the words "as follows" and the list of the legatees the words "or to their heirs," and after the names added words signifying their decease and republished the will, the legacies did not lapse; Gilmor's Estate, 154 Pa. 523, 26 Atl. 614, 35 Am. St. Rep. 855, distinguishing Sloan v. Hanse, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 28, and Appeal of Barnett, 104 Pa. 342. Where a legacy was given to one in trust for his wife, the income for her life, with power of appointment by will, and in default thereof "it shall be equally divided among my children or their legal representatives," the words legal representatives meant executors and administrators, and not next of kin, and the legacy to any child who died without issue in the lifetime of the testator lapsed; Norwood v. Mills, 1 Ohio N. P. 314. A bequest of personal property to one and "heirs and assigns" are words of limitation, and the legacy lapsed on the death of the legatee before that of the testator; Bryson v. Holbrook, 159 Mass. 280, 34 N. E. 270; so also to one and "his heirs"; Kimball v. Chappel, 18 N. Y. Supp. 30.

Where a legacy is given to a class it is generally held that the death of one of the class before the testator does not create a lapse, but simply reduces the number of the class; Stires v. Van Renssalaer, 2 Bradf. (N. Y.) 172; in such a case, when one in whom the right is vested dies before distribution, his interest goes to his representatives; Knight v. Wall, 19 N. C. 125; Hocker v. Gentry, 3 Metc. (Ky.) 463. See LAPSED DEVISE.

Where a residue was devised in trust for four sons, the intention was clear that their enjoyment was to be several and not joint, and the share of one who died before the testator was held not to go to the survivors, but to be disposed of as intestate real estate; Lombard v. Boyden, 5 Allen (Mass.) 249; but where an estate was bequeathed to all the children in a family by name, the tenor of the whole will indicating that they were intended to take as a class, the share of one who died without issue before the testator went to the survivors; Schaffer v. Kettell, 14 Allen (Mass.) 528. It was early provided by statute in Alabama that the death of a devisee or legatee, leaving a descendant, before the testator, should not cause a lapse, but the gift would vest in the descendant; Jones v. Jones' Ex'r, 37 Ala. 646.

Under a Maine statute making an adopted child the same as a lawful child, such child is a lineal descendant of its adopting parents within the meaning of the statute to prevent the lapse of legacies to such descendants; Warren v. Prescott, 84 Me. 483, 24 Atl. 948, 17 L. R. A. 435, 30 Am. St. Rep. 370.

Where there was a legacy to executors in trust for a person for life, afterwards to be divided into four equal parts for four named residuary legatees, the title to the residue vested subject to the trust estate, and the share of a residuary legatee did not lapse on his death before the time of distribution; In re Gardner, 140 N. Y. 122, 35 N. E. 439.

Where separate sums are bequeathed to two named persons who take also the residuary estate, no intention appearing on the will to make them joint tenants, the separate estate and the share of the residue of the one who died before the testator were held to lapse; Stetson v. Eastman, 84 Me. 366, 24 Atl. 868.

Where property is bequeathed to collateral relatives named, shares of those who died during the lifetime of the testator lapse; Bill v. Payne, 62 Conn. 140, 25 Atl. 354.

The doctrine of lapse applies to an appointment by will; L. R. 3 Eq. 658; 47 L. J. Ch. 65; or an appointment under a covenant; 3 Ch. 182; or a gift to a debtor of his debt, —whether the debt be given or forgiven; 1 P. Wms. 83; 3 Ves. 231.

If there is a gift to a charitable society by name and it has existed, but at the time of the testator's death has ceased to do so, the legacy fails; 29 Ch. Div. 560; [1895] 1

Ch. 19. If the charity existed at the death of the testator and expired before administration of the estate, the cy pres doctrine is applied; [1891] 2 Ch. 236. A gift for a clearly defined and particular charitable use will fail if the subject becomes impossible; 1 Myl. & C. 123; 56 L. T. 147; and see as to the limits of the doctrine, L. R. 6 P. C. 96; 35 Ch. 460; 58 L. T. 538. See, generally, as to failure of charitable bequests, Theobald, Wills 304. See CHARITABLE USE.

A residuary bequest operates upon all the personal estate which the testator is possessed of at the time of his death, and will include such as would have gone to pay specific legacies which lapse or are void; 4 Ves. Jr. 708, 732; see James v. James, 4 Paige (N. Y.) 115; Gore v. Stevens, 1 Dana (Ky.) 206, 25 Am. Dec. 141; Reed's Estate, 82 Pa. 428; 1 Jarm. Wills, 6th Am. ed. *716.

See LAPSED DEVISE; LEGACY; WILL.

LARBOARD. The left side of a ship or boat when one stands with his face towards the bow. The opposite term is starboard, which is the right-hand side looking forward. The word is now, however, no longer used, the term port having been substituted for it. The change was made by order of the English admiralty, for the very obvious reason that larboard was apt to be confused with the opposite term.

LARCENOUS. Thieving; pertaining to, characterized by, or tainted with, larceny; as a larcenous taking.

Larcenous purpose, an intention to commit larceny. See LARCENY.

LARCENY. The felonious taking of the property of another without his consent and against his will, with the intent to convert it to the use of the taker. 2 Leach 1089.

The felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. 4 Bla. Com. 299.

The appropriation, either to the use of the taker or to that of any other person, of money or personal property with intent to deprive or defraud the true owner of its use and benefit, or the withholding or secreting of the same. Van Keuren v. Miller, 71 Hun 72, 24 N. Y. Supp. 580.

The wrongful and fraudulent taking and carrying away by one person of the mere personal goods of another from any place, with a felonious intent to convert them to his, the taker's, use, and make them his property without the consent of the owner. 2 East, Pl. Cr. 553; U. S. v. Clew, 4 Wash. C. C. 700, Fed. Cas. No. 14,819; State v. Gray, 37 Mo. 463.

This definition was criticised by Parke, B., who said: "Perhaps this was the more accurate definition; but it needed some addition; the taking should be not only wrongful and fraudulent, but also 'without any color of right';" 1 Den. C. C. 370; but the words "felonious intent" are considered by an authoritative text writer to exclude any color of right; 2 Russ. Cr., 9th Am. ed. 146.

That this offence is the most technical in its distinctions of all the common-law felonies is, perhaps, to be found in the fact that inasmuch as the higher grade of the offence was, until Blackstone's time, punishable capitally, the courts were inclined to find technical reasons to avoid the infliction of that penalty for mere wrong done with reference to the property. By reason of the depreciation of money and the consequent appreciation of the money value of property which took place within two centuries and a half after the passage of the Statute of Westminister I. (A. D. 1275), ch. 15; which made grand larceny to consist of the stealing of property above the value of twelve pence, cases of larceny became capital which would not have been such at the time the statute was passed; and therefore Lord Coke suggests that the valuation of property in determining whether the offense was grand larceny ought to be reasonable; 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 534.

Larceny was formerly in England, and still is, perhaps in some states, divided into grand and petit or petty larceny, according as the value of the property taken was great or small; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 736; State v. Wilson, 3 McCord (S. C.) 187; Ward v. People, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 395; State v. Goode, 8 N. C. 463; State v. Murphy, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 498. In England this distinction is now abolished, by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, § 2; and the same is true of many of the states, although in some a difference is made, similar in theory, between cases where the amount stolen is more and where it is less than one hundred dollars or some fixed sum.

Compound larceny is larceny under circumstances which, in view of the law, aggravate the crime. The law in relation to this branch of larceny is to a great extent statutory.

The property of the owner may be either general; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 449; or special; Palmer v. People, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 165, 25 Am. Dec. 551; Jones v. State, 13 Ala. 153; 9 C. & P. 44.

There must be an actual removal of the article; 7 C. & P. 552; Williams v. State, 63 Miss. 58; and at least a temporary possession in the taker; State v. Higgins, 88 Mo. 354; Madison v. State, 16 Tex. App. 435; People v. Meyer, 75 Cal. 383, 17 Pac. 431; but the having the property under control even for a short space of time is sufficient, though it is abandoned before being effectually appropriated by the wrong-doer; State v. Gray, 106 N. C. 734, 11 S. E. 422; State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779, 46 Am. Rep. 550; State v. Higgins, 88 Mo. 354. The taking and carrying away may be committed by setting in motion an agency, innocent or otherwise, by which the property is asported from the possession of the owner to that of the thief or his accomplice; Com. v. Barry, 125 Mass. 390; 11 Q. B. D. 21; State v. Hunt, 45 Ia. 673.

To secure a reward offered for the arrest of any persons stealing goods from a certain store, a detective, through a confederate, induced an employee in the store to steal a watch and bring it to him, whereupon he at once returned it to its owner; held that the detective was guilty of larceny of the watch, the animus furandi being found in the intent to secure and keep the reward,

Slaughter v. State, 113 Ga. 284, 38 S. E. 854, 84 Am. St. Rep. 242.

The trespass necessary to constitute larceny is absent where a property owner, upon being informed of a design to steal his property, assists the thief in taking the property by affording him the aid of his agents in carrying out his plan; Topolewski v. State, 130 Wis. 244, 109 N. W. 1037, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 756, 118 Am. St. Rep. 1019, 10 Ann. Cas. 627.

A person who is seen to thrust his hand into the pocket of another and withdraw it empty can be convicted of an attempt to commit larceny, even though the pocket is empty; People v. Moran, 123 N. Y. 254, 25 N. E. 412, 10 L. R. A. 109, 20 Am. St. Rep. 732. See ATTEMPT.

The mere unlawful taking and carrying away of the property of another is not larceny unless it is done with criminal intent or animo furandi; Phelps v. People, 55 Ill. 334; State v. Campbell, 108 Mo. 611, 18 S. W. 1109; Waidley v. State, 34 Neb. 250, 51 N. W. 830; Holsey v. State, 24 Tex. App. 35, 5 S. W. 523; People v. Devine, 95 Cal. 227, 30 Pac. 378; but see State v. Davenport, 38 S. C. 348, 17 S. E. 37. The question whether the goods were taken animo furandi is one of fact for the jury; [1895] 2 Q. B. 484. If the taking is under a bona fide claim of right, there can be no larceny; Miller v. People, 4 Col. 182; as where the purpose of taking is to test a right; 2 Doug. 517; or to protect one's own property; 4 B. & S. 189; McPhail v. State, 9 Tex. App. 164. One is not guilty of larceny in selling an article under the belief that it is his own property, though it belong to another; Black v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 58, 41 S. W. 606; or in taking property in the belief that he has a right so to do; Graves v. State, 25 Tex. App. 333, 8 S. W. 471; Causey v. State, 79 Ga. 564, 5 S. E. 121, 11 Am. St. Rep. 447; Mead v. State, 25 Neb. 444, 41 N. W. 277; but the belief of a right must be an honest belief and not a mere impression or pretence; State v. Bond, 8 Ia. 540; State v. Thompson, 95 N. C. 596. See supra. Secrecy is not such an essential accompaniment of larceny that an attempt to conceal the taking must be shown; State v. Hill, 114 N. C. 780, 18 S. E. 971.

An intent to convert to the thief's own use is not necessary; all that is required is the intent to deprive the owner of his property; People v. Juarez, 28 Cal. 380; Dignowitty v. State, 17 Tex. 521, 67 Am. Dec. 670; Hamilton v. State, 35 Miss. 214; Keely v. State, 14 Ind. 36; but see U. S. v. Durkee, 1 McAll. 196, Fed. Cas. No. 15,009, where the accused took and carried away muskets to prevent others from using them against himself and his friends, and it was held larceny.

It is not an essential element of the crime that the taking should be lucri causa, for the sake of gain; State v. Caddle, 35 W. Va. 73, 12 S. E. 1098.

The property must be of some value, though it be slight; State v. Smart, 4 Rich. (S. C.) 356, 55 Am. Dec. 683; State v. Dobson, 3 Harring. (Del.) 563; Com. v. Rand, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 475, 41 Am. Dec. 455; but the fact that the thief treated the property as of value will amount to proof of such value by inference; State v. Harris, 64 N. C. 127; Houston v. State, 13 Ark. 66. Any intrinsic value whatever is sufficient; Com. v. Riggs, 14 Gray (Mass.) 376, 77 Am. Dec. 333; and it is not necessary that the value should be of some particular coin; Wolverton v. Com., 75 Va. 909.

There must be a taking against the consent of the owner; 8 C. & P. 291; Wright v. Lindsay, 20 Ala. 428; State v. Harmon, 106 Mo. 635, 18 S. W. 128; State v. Verry, 36 Kan. 416, 13 Pac. 838; Wright v. State, 18 Tex. App. 358; and the taking will not be larceny if consent be given, though obtained by fraud; Lewer v. Com., 15 S. & R. (Pa.) 93; 9 C. & P. 741; but see Frazier v. State, 85 Ala. 17, 4 South. 691, 7 Am. St. Rep. 21. But where one retains money paid by mistake, it is larceny, for the consent of the owner in parting with his property was only apparent, not real; State v. Ducker, 8 Or. 394, 34 Am. Rep. 590; Wolfstein v. People, 6 Hun (N. Y.) 121. Where one gave another a sovereign, supposing it to be a shilling, and the receiver kept the money, his conviction was affirmed by an evenly divided court; 16 Q. B. D. 190; a similar conviction was quashed in 16 Q. B. D. 643. To the same effect, 29 Ir. L. Times 323. See 8 Harv. L. Rev. 317. One Leech gave the prisoner a £10 note, both supposing it was at the time a £1 note. A substantial period of time after this, the prisoner discovered the mistake and appropriated it; held that the prisoner was not guilty of larceny, as the taking was with Leech's consent; 29 Ir. L. T. 323, four judges out of nine dissenting.

Whenever the defendant can be regarded in the light of the servant or agent of the owner, he is guilty of larceny; People v. Call, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 120, 43 Am. Dec. 655; Whart. Cr. Law (9th Ed.) § 956; Crocheron v. State, 86 Ala. 64, 5 South. 649, 11 Am. St. Rep. 18; People v. Perini, 94 Cal. 573, 29 Pac. 1027. Where a master paid his servant a £10 note, thinking it was a £1 note, and the servant took it innocently, but afterwards discovered the mistake and made up his mind to appropriate the note, it was held by a divided court that this was not larceny; [1895] 2 I. R. 709.

By Stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, a bailee who fraudulently converts the property entrusted to him to his own use is guilty of larceny; Cox & Saunders, Cr. L. 26. The possession of the bailee is the possession of the owner, and a larceny thereof from the former is a larceny from the owner; State v. Moore, 101 Mo. 316, 14 S. W. 182. When the possession of an article is entrusted to a person, who carries it away and appropriates it, this is no larceny; 4 C. & P. 545; Com. v. James, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 375; Wright v. Lindsay, 20 Ala. 428; Nichols v. People, 17 N. Y. 114; see Norton v. State, 4 Mo. 461; State v. Haskell, 33 Me. 127; White v. State, 11 Tex. 769; but when the custody merely is parted with, such misappropriation is a larceny; People v. Call, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 120, 43 Am. Dec. 655; 11 Q. B. 929. One who obtains possession of property by fraud, from one who intends to retain the ownership, and subsequently carries it away, is guilty of larceny, though he would not be if he obtained both possession and ownership by fraud; State v. Will, 49 La. Ann. 1337, 22 South. 378. There is no consent to possession sufficient to prevent a prosecution for larceny where a transportation company permits a thief to take property under the mistaken assumption that he is entitled to it where he has placed the wrong check upon it; Aldrich v. People, 224 Ill. 622, 79 N. E. 964, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1149, 115 Am. St. Rep. 166, 8 Ann. Cas. 284.

The crime of larceny may be committed by a finder of lost money or goods, who, knowing or having reason to know who is the owner of the same, instead of restoring them to him, conceals or fraudulently appropriates them to his own use; Kennedy v. Woodrow, 6 Houst. (Del.) 46; Perrin v. Com., 87 Va. 554, 13 S. E. 76.

Where the finder of a bank check handed it to a person who falsely represented that he expected to see the owner and would give it to him, and thereupon converted it to his own use, it was held larceny; State v. Levine, 79 Conn. 714, 66 Atl. 529, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 286. One with whose wife money is left by a finder for his inspection, on her suggestion that it may be his, is guilty of larceny if he wrongfully retains it under the claim that he is the true owner; Williams v. State, 165 Ind. 472, 75 N. E. 875, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 248.

Where a dealer in waste paper appropriated a few stamped envelopes found in a crate of waste paper purchased by him, he was held not guilty of larceny; People v. Hoban, 240 Ill. 303, 88 N. E. 806, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1132, 16 Ann. Cas. 226. So where one renting a store found two barber's bottles in some rubbish, which he washed and placed on a shelf and afterwards sold; Siemers v. State (Tex.) 55 S. W. 334; contra, where one bought a trunk not knowing that it contained articles of clothing and appropriated such articles, provided that the criminal intent was formed at the time he discovered them in the trunk; Robinson v. State, 11 Tex. App. 403, 40 Am. Rep. 790. So of money found in a bureau bought at auction; 7 M. & W. 623.

Abandoned property having no owner cannot be the subject of larceny; U. S. v. Smiley, 6 Sawy. 640, Fed. Cas. No. 16,317; Debbs v. State, 43 Tex. 650.

Lost property, as distinguished from mislaid, cannot, it is said, be the subject of larceny; Lawrence v. State, 1 Humph. (Tenn.) 228, 34 Am. Dec. 644.

See FINDER.

The decisions have not been entirely uniform as to whether the fraudulent retention of money delivered to be changed is larceny. It has been held in England not to be so, but here the contrary view has been taken; Hildebrand v. People, 56 N. Y. 394, 15 Am. Rep. 435; State v. Anderson, 25 Minn. 66, 33 Am. Rep. 455, n. See 9 C. & P. 741; 11 Cox, Cr. Cas. 32.

Where a livery stable in possession of horses had a lien thereon for their keep and the owner broke and entered the stable, etc., held that it was burglary (statutory); State v. Nelson, 36 Wash. 126, 78 Pac. 790, 68 L. R. A. 283, 104 Am. St. Rep. 945, citing 19 Am. & Eng. Encyc. L. 499.

The taking must be in the county where the criminal is to be tried; 9 C. & P. 29. But when the taking has been in the county or state, and the thief is caught with the stolen property in another county than that where the theft was committed, he may be tried in the county where arrested with the goods; as, by construction of law, there is a fresh taking in every county in which the thief carries the stolen property; Com. v. Rand, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 475, 41 Am. Dec. 455; Stinson v. People, 43 Ill. 397; State v. Grant, 76 Mo. 236; and the court of the latter county has jurisdiction of the offence; Thomas v. Com. (Ky.) 15 S. W. 861. One who steals property in a foreign country, and brings it into this, is guilty of larceny here, on the ground that as the legal possession remains in the owner when the first taking is felonious, every asportation of the property is a fresh taking; and on a prosecution for such an offence the courts will presume that the laws of the foreign country are the same as our own, and that the original taking there was criminal, upon proofs of acts which would make it criminal here; State v. Morrill, 68 Vt. 60, 33 Atl. 1070, 54 Am. St. Rep. 870. Whether an indictment for larceny can be supported where the goods were proved to have been originally stolen in another state, and brought thence into the state where the indictment was found, is a point on which the decisions are contradictory. Where property was stolen in one of the British Provinces and brought by the thief into Massachusetts, it was held not larceny there; Com. v. Uprichard, 3 Gray (Mass.) 434, 63 Am. Dec. 762. See contra, State v. Bartlett, 11 Vt. 650.

The property must be personal; there can be no larceny of things fixed to the soil; 1 Hale, P. C. 510; but as the taking and carrying away would necessarily terminate the character of the property as realty even if it were such, the important point of this distinction is that if the severance from the realty of anything which is a part thereof, or annexed thereto so as to go with the realty by descent, or in case a severance is made by the wrongdoer himself, so that the taking and carrying away is a continuous act, the offence is not larceny, because the taking and carrying away is not of the personal property of another, that which was severed not having been in his possession as a chattel, but only as the portion of a realty; ore which has not been mined or otherwise severed, so as to convert it into a chattel, is not the subject of larceny; State v. Burt, 64 N. C. 619; State v. Berryman, 8 Nev. 262; nor is water or ice, unless the ice is cut or stored in an ice-house; Ward v. People, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 144; State v. Pottmeyer, 33 Ind. 402, 5 Am. Rep. 224; or the water is pumped into supply pipes; 11 Q. B. D. 21; sea-weed lying ungathered on the shore is part of the realty and not the subject of larceny; 4 Ir. R. C. L. 6 (but see Com. v. Steimling, 156 Pa. 400, 27 Atl. 297, where waste coal was carried upon land by a stream and deposited there and the appropriator was held guilty of larceny). It is not larceny to detach any portion of a building and carry it away; Smith v. Com., 14 Bush (Ky.) 31, 29 Am. Rep. 402; Langston v. State, 96 Ala. 44, 11 South. 334; 3 Taunt. 48; but the courts have expressed their disapproval of a doctrine so technical even while compelled to follow it; People v. Williams, 35 Cal. 671; and in many cases of constructive annexation, have held the taking and carrying away to be larceny, such as window sashes not permanently annexed to the building; 1 Leach 20; chandeliers; Smith v. Com., 14 Bush. (Ky.) 31, 29 Am. Rep. 402; doors taken from their hinges; Ex parte Willke, 34 Tex. 155; rails in a fence; Harberger v. State, 4 Tex. App. 26, 30 Am. Rep. 157; belts belonging to a mill; Jackson v. State, 11 Ohio St. 104; valves in a portable pump; Langston v. State, 96 Ala. 44, 11 South. 334; the key of a door; Hoskins v. Tarrence, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 417, 35 Am. Dec. 129; 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 536.

If once severed by the owner, a third person, or the thief himself, as a separate transaction, any part of the realty becomes the subject of larceny; State v. Moore, 33 N. C. 70; Ward v. People, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 395; 7 Taunt. 188.

The common-law rule has been modified from time to time in England, so as to afford protection to things fixed to the freehold. The rule was never satisfactory, and the courts in modern times have been inclined to confine it within the narrowest limits; 30 Am. Rep. 159, n.; Harberger v. State, 4 Tex. App. 26, 30 Am. Rep. 157. At common law there can be no larceny of animals, in which there is neither an absolute nor a qualified property, as beasts ferœ naturæ; Gillet v. Mason, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 16; State v. Jenkins, 78 N. C. 481; 1 C. & K. 494; but otherwise of animals reclaimed or confined, as deer, or rabbits in a park, fish in a tank, pheasants, etc., in a mew; State v. House, 65 N. C. 315, 6 Am. Rep. 744; all valuable domestic animals, and all animals domitæ naturæ, which serve for food. But all other animals which do not serve for food, as dogs, unless taxed, are not subjects of larceny. But oysters, when planted for use, are so, as is the flesh of dead animals; 1 Whart. Cr. Law § 864. But under statute in some of the states there may be a larceny of dogs, and actions may be maintained for injury to them; People v. Campbell, 4 Parker, C. C. (N. Y.) 386; Parker v. Mise, 27 Ala. 480, 62 Am. Dec. 776; Harrington v. Miles, 11 Kan. 480, 15 Am. Rep. 355, n; Com. v. Hazelwood, 84 Ky. 681, 2 S. W. 489; a horse is a subject of larceny, although at the time he has been removed or strayed from the premises of his owner; Burger v. State, 83 Ala. 36, 3 South. 319. Statutes exist in many states making the stealing of electric current larceny.

See BREAKING BULK; RING-DROPPING.

LARD. The clarified semi-solid oil of hog's fat. Cent. Dict. The pure fat of healthy swine. State v. Snow, 81 Ia. 642, 47 N. W. 777, 11 L. R. A. 355.

LARDING MONEY. A small yearly rent paid by the tenants in the manor of Bradford in Wilts, for liberty to feed their hogs with the masts (acorns) of the lord's wood. Also a commutation for some customary service in connection with the word larder as carrying salt or meat. Whart. Lex.

LARGE (L. Fr.). Broad; having much size; complete; ample; at large, free from restraint or confinement; at liberty. It was formerly written at his large.

LAS PARTIDAS. The name of a code of Spanish law. It is sometimes called las siete partidas, or the seven parts, from the number of its principal divisions. It is a compilation of the civil law, the customary law of Spain, and the canon law. It was compiled by four Spanish jurisconsults, by the direction of Alfonso X., A. D. 1250, and published in Castile in 1263, but first promulgated as the law by Alfonso XI., A. D. 1348. The maritime law contained in it is given in vol. 6 of Pardess. Col. of Mar. Law. He follows the editions of 1807, at Paris. It has been translated into English. Such of its provisions as are applicable are in force in Florida, Louisiana, and Texas.

See Escriche; CODE.

LASCIVIOUS CARRIAGE. A term including those wanton acts between persons of different sexes, who are not married to each other, that flow from the exercise of lustful passions, and which are not otherwise punished as crimes against chastity and public decency. 2 Swift, Dig. 343; 2 Swift, Syst. 331. It includes, also, indecent acts by one against the will of another. Fowler v. State, 5 Day (Conn.) 81.

LASCIVIOUS COHABITATION. The act or state of a man and woman, not married, who dwell together in the same house, behaving themselves as man and wife.

In statutes forbidding unlawful cohabitation that term involves the idea of habitual sexual intercourse, or living together in such a way as to hold out the appearance of being husband and wife, and it is the scandal resulting therefrom which constitutes the mischief against which the statutes are directed; Luster v. State, 23 Fla. 339, 2 South. 690; and proof of occasional acts of illicit intercourse is not sufficient; Pruner v. Com., 82 Va. 115; State v. Miller, 42 W. Va. 215, 24 S. E. 882; Brown v. State (Miss.) 8 South. 257; but it has been held that such occasional acts may constitute the offence, unless there was no intention of continuing the intercourse, as desire and opportunity might arise; Wright v. State, 108 Ala. 60, 18 South. 941. To constitute the offence there must be both lewd and lascivious intercourse and living together; Jones v. Com., 80 Va. 20; Pinson v. State, 28 Fla. 735, 9 South. 706; though it is said that there need not be actual assertion of the existence of marriage; Kinard v. State, 57 Miss. 132; Sullivan v. State, 32 Ark. 187; and where the dwelling together is a lawful relation, as that of master and servant, the offence is not established; State v. Osborne, 39 Mo. App. 372. It is not sustained by evidence of acts of secret adultery or mere familiarity; State v. Phillips, 49 Mo. App. 325; nor where a man and woman stopped for one night only at a house and assumed marital relations; Turney v. State, 60 Ark. 259, 29 S. W. 893; Com. v. Calef, 10 Mass. 153; State v. Crowner, 56 Mo. 147; but it is said that it is not necessary that the cohabitation should be notorious; State v. Cagle, 2 Humph. (Tenn.) 414. General reputation in the neighborhood is not admissible to prove the fact of cohabitation; Overstreet v. State, 3 How. (Miss.) 328. Whether the facts proved constituted a living together in such relation is a question for the jury; Pinson v. State, 28 Fla. 735, 9 South. 706.

There must be averment and proof of habitual sexual intercourse which is the gist of the offence; Newman v. State, 69 Miss. 393, 10 South. 580. In Massachusetts, the words "abide and cohabit" are sufficient where the statute used the word "associated"; Com. v. Dill, 159 Mass. 61, 34 N. E. 84. An indictment alleging fornication and adultery, and that the parties lived together and were not married, was held sufficient, the language of the statute that they should "lewdly and lasciviously associate" being implied; State v. Stubbs, 108 N. C. 774, 13 S. E. 90. The offence may be proved by admission made out of court, and proved by two witnesses; U. S. v. Schow, 6 Utah 381, 24 Pac. 30. Evidence of previous lascivious cohabitation is sometimes admitted in support of other crimes, as on prosecution for incest; People v. Skutt, 96 Mich. 449, 56 N. W. 11; Burnett v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 86, 22 S. W. 47. It is not essential in a prosecution against one to prove that both parties had a guilty intent; State v. Cutshall, 109 N. C. 764, 14 S. E. 107, 26 Am. St. Rep. 599. When the charge is of such cohabitation of a married man with an unmarried woman, the marriage must be strictly proved, and it cannot be established by reputation; State v. Coffee, 39 Mo. App. 56. It has been held that a man and woman living together as man and wife, in the belief that they are married, cannot be convicted of "open lewdness"; Com. v. Munson, 127 Mass. 459, 34 Am. Rep. 411; Schoudel v. State, 57 N. J. L. 209, 30 Atl. 598. See 111 U. C. 725.

Under the United States anti-polygamy act of March 22, 1882, on prosecution for cohabitation with two women as wives, proof of the existence of the marriage relation is pertinent, and it may be proved by general reputation; U. S. v. Higgerson, 46 Fed. 750; U. S. v. Harris, 5 Utah 436, 17 Pac. 75; but evidence of general repute of guilt is not sufficient; the facts must be proved, and inferences left to the jury; U. S. v. Langford, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 561, 21 Pac. 409. In an indictment under the act it is sufficient to use the word cohabit and not to set out its meaning; U. S. v. Kuntze, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 480, 21 Pac. 407; U. S. v. Langford, 2 Idaho (Hasb.) 561, 21 Pac. 409; it need not allege that defendant was a male person; U. S. v. Cannon, 4 Utah 122, 7 Pac. 369.

LASCIVIOUS LEWDNESS. Lewd and lascivious conduct in public, or at least practised with such publicity as to be punishable as contra bonos mores.

It is an offence sometimes distinguished from lascivious cohabitation (q. v.), and is described as open and lascivious lewdness; McClain, Cr. L. § 1135. The specific characterization of the offence is the openness and publicity of the act as distinct from a secret act; Com. v. Wardell, 128 Mass. 52, 35 Am. Rep. 357. The offence need not be a joint one,—one person only may be guilty therein; State v. Caldwell, 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 576; and when two are charged so that both must have been guilty if one was, one may be convicted and the other acquitted; State v. Miller, 81 Ia. 72, 46 N. W. 751.

An indictment should follow the statute; Com. v. Parker, 4 Allen (Mass.) 313; and it must be averred that the parties were not married to each other and that the offence was open and public; State v. Moore, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 136. The crime cannot be established by general reputation; Buttram v. State, 4 Coldw. (Tenn.) 171; but it may be by circumstantial evidence; Peak v. State, 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 99; and proof has been admitted of similar acts proved at a previous trial for the same offence; Mynatt v. State, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 47.

LASCIVIOUSNESS. Lascivious desires or conduct; lustfulness; wantonness; lewdness.

That form of immorality which has reference to sexual impurity; U. S. v. Males, 51 Fed. 41. See the titles next preceding.

Lasciviousness and lewdness are generally treated as interchangeable if not synonymous terms. In both cases the principal use of the two words is now in each case in a secondary or derived meaning. The primary meaning of lascivus, from which the first is derived, is sportiveness, and its use in a bad sense is said to be post-Augustine, and never by Cicero; the other is derived from the Anglo-Saxon laewed, lay or unlearned.

LAST. The same as last court (q. v.). Cent. Dict. A burden; and a measure of weight for bulky commodities, such as leather, wool, corn. Whart. L. Lex.

Where the plaintiff added new defendants after answer, the last answer was held to mean the last answer of the original defendants; 13 L. J. Ch. 99; 2 Hare 632.

LAST CLEAR CHANCE. See NEGLIGENCE.

LAST COURT. A court held by the twenty-four jurats in the marshes of Kent and summoned by the bailiffs. It made orders for levying taxes, and imposing penalties for the preservation of marshes. M. & W.; Ency. Lond.

LAST HEIR. He to whom the lands come if they escheat for want of lawful heirs: viz., sometimes the lord of whom the lands are held, sometimes the king. Bract. lib. 5, c. 17.

LAST RESORT. The highest court in any jurisdiction, beyond which there is no appeal, is termed court of last resort.

LAST SICKNESS. That of which a person dies.

The expenses of this sickness are generally entitled to a preference in payment of debts of an insolvent estate.

To prevent impositions, the statute of frauds requires that nuncupative wills can be made only during the testator's last sickness. Roberts, Frauds 556; Prince v. Hazleton, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 502, 11 Am. Dec. 307.

LAST WILL. A disposition of real estate to take effect after death.

Generally speaking, last will means the one latest in date, though there may be two or more wills, all speaking from the death of the testator; L. R. 1 Eq. 510; 55 Beav. 321. The phrase "This is my last will, and testament" does not, of itself, revoke a former will; 9 Moo. P. C. 131; but may be confirmatory proof of an intention to revoke; 16 Beav. 173; 22 L. J. Ch. 185. Revoking "my last will dated," etc., giving the date of the first will, was held to mean the last will in fact, the date given being rejected as a mistake; 46 L. J. P. D. & A. 30; 2 P. D. 111.

It is strictly distinguishable from testament, which is applied to personal estate; 1 Wms. Exec., 7th Am. ed. *4, n.; but the words are generally used together, "last will and testament," in a will, whether real or personal estate is to be disposed of. See WILL.

LASTAGE. A custom anciently exacted in some fairs and markets to carry things where one will; also a custom paid for goods sold by the last (a certain weight or measure); the ballast of a ship. Cowell. Stowage room for goods in a vessel. Young, Naut. Dict.

LATA CULPA. Gross neglect. See BAILMENT.

LATE. "Existing not long ago, but now departed this life." Pleasant v. State, 17 Ala. 190. See Beckett v. Selover, 7 Cal. 215, 68 Am. Dec. 237; Bordine v. Service, 16 N. J. L. 47.

LATELY. This word has come to have "a very large retrospect," as we say, lately deceased of one dead ten or twenty years; 2 Show. 294.

LATENS (Lat.). Latent (q. v.).

LATENT. Hidden; concealed; not appearing on the surface or face of a thing.

LATENT AMBIGUITY. One which does not appear on the face of the instrument. A latent ambiguity is where words apply equally to two different things or subject-matters; 15 M. & W. 561; but where the parties may have intended either of the two things in dispute, the term does not apply; Webster v. Paul, 10 Ohio St. 534.

It is settled both in England and in this country that extrinsic evidence is admissible to explain a latent ambiguity, but there has been some difficulty in defining precisely when and under what circumstances such evidence may be introduced to show the intention. Two rules are laid down in 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 718, 726, as illustrated by two leading English cases. The first rule is: "Where a determinate intention appears to be expressed by the written instrument, extrinsic evidence is admissible to show that the description of an object contained in the instrument is applicable with legal certainty to either of two objects; and, a latent ambiguity having been thus disclosed, evidence of the surrounding circumstances is admissible to show which of the objects was meant by the description; and if, on this evidence, one of the objects is indicated with sufficient certainty, direct evidence of declarations of intention is not admissible." 5 M. & W. 363. In that case the language of the court was: "If, therefore, by looking at the surrounding facts to be found by the jury, the court can clearly see, with the knowledge which arises from those facts alone, that the testator meant either the lessor of the plaintiff or the defendant, it may so decide, and direct the jury accordingly; but we think that, for this purpose, they cannot receive declarations of the testator of what he intended to do in making his will." A good illustration of the uncertainty as to the person was, "where a testatrix gave a share of her residue to her 'cousin, Harriet Cloak,' and the testatrix had no cousin of that name, but had a married cousin, Harriet Crane, whose maiden name was Cloak, and a cousin T. Cloak, whose wife's name was Harriet; evidence was admitted to show the testatrix's knowledge of an intimacy with the members of the Cloak family. In the event 'cousin' was read in the secondary sense of 'wife of a cousin,' and the claim of Harriet, the wife of T. Cloak, allowed." 34 Ch. D. 255; 56 L. J. Ch. 171. Cited in the American note to the above case as "a good type of the American doctrine," was a devise to "the four boys," where the testator had seven sons, of whom three were shown to be minors living at home; Bradley v. Rees, 113 Ill. 327, 55 Am. Rep. 422. And in the case of Hardy v. Warren reported in Browne, Parol Evidence 461, there was a bequest by a woman to her "husband" when she had obtained a void divorce and was living with another man as his wife. These were held to be cases of latent ambiguity to explain which extrinsic evidence was admissible to determine the persons who were to take.

The other rule laid down by the work referred to is: "Assuming that the intention appears on the face of the instrument to be determinate, if, after exhausting such evidence of the surrounding circumstances as is necessary to place the court at the point of view of the maker of the instrument, there is still an ambiguity as to which of two objects is meant,—the description being sufficient to point with legal certainty to either if there were no other,—the intention as between those objects may be proved by direct evidence outside the instrument." 2 M. & W. 129. It is said that courts of law are very jealous of the admission of extrinsic evidence to explain the intention of the testator, and that it should be permitted only where an ambiguity is introduced by extrinsic circumstances; 4 Dow 65; in this case illustrations are given of ambiguity both as to person and subject-matter, as a devise of an estate caller Blackacre when the testator had two estates so called; or if a devise be given to a son, naming him, and there are two sons by that name; or to a nephew "William" where the testator had no nephew of that name. The rule as laid down by the American cases has been stated to be that where the terms describing the object of the testator's bounty apply indifferently to more than one person or thing, evidence may be introduced of any material fact relating to the property claimed, and the circumstances and affairs of the testator, his family, and of the claimant, "and the testator's declarations made before, at, or after the making of the will, are admissible in this view, but no evidence of mere mistake on the part of the testator or the draftsman is admissible." Cleverly v. Cleverly, 124 Mass. 314; Appeal of Wagner, 43 Pa. 102; Morgan v. Burrows, 45 Wis. 211, 30 Am. Rep. 717; Doe v. Roe, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 549.

A bequest "to be equally divided between the board of foreign and the board of home missions," may be shown by parol to have been intended for the Presbyterian boards thus named, there being similar boards controlled by other religious denominations; Gilmer v. Stone, 120 U. S. 586, 7 Sup. Ct. 689, 30 L. Ed. 734. See also, as to the admissibility of parol evidence to show intention, LEGACY.

See AMBIGUITY; PATENT AMBIGUITY.

LATENT DEED. One kept for twenty years or more in a person's strong box. See Den v. Wright, 7 N. J. L. 177, 11 Am. Dec. 546.

LATENT DEFECT. A defect or blemish in any article sold, known to the seller but not apparent to the purchaser, and which cannot be discovered by mere observation, which, not being discoverable from mere observation, was concealed from the purchaser. See Hoe v. Sanborn, 21 N. Y. 552, 78 Am. Dec. 163.

LATENT FAULT. Latent defect (q. v.).

LATERAL RAILROAD. A branch railroad. One running from some point on a main line intended as a connecting line or feeder.

A lateral road is said to be "one proceeding from some point on the main trunk between its termini." Newhall v. R. Co., 14 Ill. 273. "The general route of the lateral road must lie at an acute angle with the main trunk;" id. "A lateral road is another name for a branch road;" id. The definition of such a structure does not depend on its length or direction, it may be a "direct extension" from the terminus as well as "merely an offshoot of the main road; Appeal of McAboy, 107 Pa. 548; and it may run in the same direction as the main line so as to be in effect an extension; Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. City of St. Louis, 66 Mo. 228; it may be an elevated road over a wharf; Appeal of McAboy, 107 Pa. 548. When authorized, the necessity and the location are in the discretion of the directors; id.; but the lateral railroad cannot be constructed without authority expressly granted or necessarily implied from the charter; Pittsburgh v. R. Co., 48 Pa. 355. When it is authorized, the right to acquire lands by the exercise of the power of eminent domain is implied as on the main line; Newhall v. R. Co., 14 Ill. 273; Toledo, S. & M. R. Co. v. R. Co., 72 Mich. 206, 40 N. W. 436; Lower v. R. Co., 59 Ia. 563, 13 N. W. 718. Where there is a limitation of time for completing the main line, it does not apply to a branch road, certainly not to one for which the land has been acquired within the time limited; Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. City of St. Louis, 66 Mo. 228.

The power is as large as the power granted for construction of the main line; Pittsburgh v. R. Co., 48 Pa. 355; and a power to construct such roads in the discretion of the directors is a continuing one, not to be abridged by a subsequent act giving to the company a time limited for completing the main line with sidings, appurtenances, etc.; Pittsburgh, V. & C. Ry. Co. v. R. Co., 159 Pa. 331, 28 Atl. 155. The word appurtenances does not include branches; id.

The same reasonable rules as to furnishing, and having proper switches, turnouts, etc., apply to lateral roads as to other railroads; Com. v. Corey, 2 Pittsb. (Pa.) 444; so also the same statutory requirements apply as to crossing highways; 1 B. & Ad. 441.

Words permitting the construction of such lines are not obligatory; 2 Macq. H. L. Cas. 514; and impose no duty which will be enforced by mandamus; 1 El. & Bl. 874. A charter power to construct branch or lateral roads includes the right to build one running in the same general direction and connecting the main line with another railroad; Blanton v. R. Co., 86 Va. 618, 10 S. E. 925. When a railroad company has power to construct lateral or branch roads and purchases another road under an act authorizing its use under the charter of the purchaser, the latter may extend the purchased road; Duncan v. R. Co., 94 Pa. 435. The mere fact that the building of a lateral railroad may add to the earnings of the main line will not authorize its construction in the absence of power in the charter; Chicago & E., I. R. Co. v. Wiltse, 116 Ill. 449, 6 N. E. 49; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. City of Chicago, 138 Ill. 453, 28 N. E. 740.

A power "to construct such roads from the main line to other points or places in the several counties through which said road may pass," is limited to such as begin and end in the same county; Works v. Railroad, 5 McLean 425, Fed. Cas. No. 18,046. A lateral railroad may cross an ordinary railroad to reach a navigable river to which its construction is authorized and the continuity of the lateral road is not thereby destroyed; Hays v. Briggs, 74 Pa. 373. A statute authorizing a railroad company to subscribe to and acquire an interest not exceeding one-fifth, in any lateral or connecting road, confers a distinct privilege or franchise which renders the gross receipts derived from such interest liable to a state tax, notwithstanding an exemption of the principal company from such tax on its own gross receipts; State v. R. Co., 48 Md. 49. Branch railroads, under the Missouri act of March 21, 1868, are practically independent lines and not included in an exemption from taxation in the charter of the main line; Chicago, B. & K. C. R. v. Guffey, 120 U. S. 569, 7 Sup. Ct. 693, 30 L. Ed. 732; State v. R. Co., 99 Mo. 30, 12 S. W. 290, 6 L. R. A. 222. Reduction of the number of trains on a branch road of which the business is lessened by charter of a competing line, will not operate as a forfeiture of the charter of the main line; Com. v. Quinn, 12 Gray (Mass.) 180.

LATERAL SUPPORT. The right of having one's land and the structures erected thereon supported by the land of a neighboring proprietor.

Each of two adjoining land-owners is entitled to the support of the other's land. The right of lateral support exists only with respect to the soil in its natural condition; Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. Ed. 336; and it is an incident to the land in that condition; Farrand v. Marshall, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 383. If any excavation cause damage whilst the soil remains in this condition, an action will lie, but in the absence of negligence in excavating, or prescription, or grant, in favor of the neighbor, no action will lie for injury occasioned to the latter if he has increased the lateral pressure by building on the land; Gilmore v. Driscoll, 122 Mass. 207, 23 Am. Rep. 312; 10 H. L. Cas. 333; Eads v. Gains, 58 Mo. App. 586; Beard v. Murphy, 37 Vt. 99, 86 Am. Dec. 693. A land-owner has a right to assume that the soil will be permitted to remain in its natural state, and for a violation of this right, an action will lie independently of the question of negligence; 2 Rolle, Abr. 565; Richardson v. R. Co., 25 Vt. 465, 60 Am. Dec. 283; McGuire v. Grant, 25 N. J. L. 362, 67 Am. Dec. 49. But see Bonquois v. Monteleone, 47 La. Ann. 814, 17 South. 305, where it was held that an adjoining landowner was liable for weakening his neighbor's wall, by the construction of a building on his own land.

A person's right to the support of the land immediately around his house is not so much an easement, as it has been called, as it is the ordinary right of enjoyment of property. Professor Washburn characterizes the right as "of a nature somewhat akin to the easement of light."

The doctrine of lateral support has been thus stated by this eminent author (2 Real Pr. 380): "This right exists independently of grant or prescription, and is also an absolute right; so that, if his neighbor excavates the adjoining land, and in consequence A's land falls, he may have an action, although A's excavation was not carelessly or unskilfully performed. This natural right does not extend to any buildings A may place upon his land; and therefore, if A builds his house upon the verge of his own land, he does not thereby acquire the right to have it derive its support from the land adjoining it until it shall have stood and had the advantage of such support for twenty years. In the meantime such adjacent owner may excavate his own land for such purposes as he sees fit, provided he does not dig carelessly or recklessly; and if, in so doing, the adjacent earth gives way, and the house falls by reason of the additional weight thereby placed upon the natural soil, the owner of the house is without remedy. It was his own folly to place it there. But if it shall have stood for twenty years with the knowledge of the adjacent proprietor, it acquires the easement of a support in the adjacent soil. . . . But this right of a land-owner to support his land against that of the adjacent owner does not, as before stated, extend to the support of any additional weight or structure that he may place thereon. If, therefore, a man erect a house upon his own land, so near the boundary line thereof as to be injured by the adjacent owner's excavating his land in a proper manner, and so as not to have caused the soil of the adjacent parcel to fall if it had not been loaded with an additional weight, it would be damnum absque injuria,—a loss for which the person so excavating would not be responsible in damages."

"The unquestionable right of a land-owner to remove the earth from his own premises adjacent to another's building is subject to the qualification that he shall use ordinary care to cause no unnecessary damage to his neighbor's property in so doing." Larson v. R. Co., 110 Mo. 234, 19 S. W. 416, 16 L. R. A. 330, 33 Am. St. Rep. 439; Austin v. R. Co., 25 N. Y. 334; Foley v. Wyeth, 2 Allen (Mass.) 131, 79 Am. Dec. 771; City of Quincy v. Jones, 76 Ill. 240, 20 Am. Rep. 243. In exercising his rights over his land, the owner is bound to use ordinary care and skill for the purpose of avoiding injury to his neighbor. Thus, while, as a general rule, he is not bound to continue the support his land gives to a structure upon, or other artificial arrangement of, adjoining land, and is, therefore, not liable for the natural consequences of his withdrawing this support, yet in doing so, he must act with such care and caution that (as nearly as by reasonable exertion it is possible to secure such a result) his neighbor shall suffer no more injury than would have accrued if the structure had been put where it is without ever having had the support of his land.

The principle underlying this rule is that "if a man in the exercise of his own rights of property do damage to his neighbor, he is liable if it might have been avoided by the use of reasonable care;" Charless v. Rankin, 22 Mo. 573, 66 Am. Dec. 642; Leavenworth Lodge v. Byers, 54 Kan. 323, 38 Pac. 261. In the absence of a statutory rule it is said that "the care required of a party so excavating is that of a man of ordinary prudence in the circumstances of the particular situation. . . . The particular circumstances so largely shape and indicate the duty that any attempt to reduce the rule to greater certainty would probably tend to impede rather than to promote the administration of justice;" Larson v. Ry. Co., 110 Mo. 234, 19 S. W. 416, 16 L. R. A. 330, 33 Am. St. Rep. 439. It has been held that prior notice to the neighbor whose property may be endangered by the excavation is an essential part of the ordinary care referred to; Schultz v. Byers, 53 N. J. L. 442, 22 Atl. 514, 13 L. R. A. 569, 26 Am. St. Rep. 435. In this case there was so emphatic a dissent that, standing alone, it could hardly be considered sufficient authority for the proposition. On this point it is said that "one who digs away land which affords support to an adjoining house ought to give the owner reasonable notice of his intention to do so, and he must allow the latter all reasonable facilities for obtaining artificial support, including a temporary privilege of shoring up the house by supports based upon the former owner's land;" 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg., 4th ed. § 701. A text writer says: "Thus the authorities are agreed that one who proposes to excavate, or make other alterations or improvements upon his own land, which may endanger the land or house of his neighbor, is bound to give the latter reasonable notice of what he proposes to do, to enable him to take the necessary measures for the preservation of his own property. But, after giving such notice, he is bound only to reasonable and ordinary care in the prosecution of the work." 1 Thomp. Neg. 276. In many cases it is held that after notice from the owner who proposes to excavate, it is the duty of his neighbor to shore up his own building; Shafer v. Wilson, 44 Md. 268; Lasala v. Holbrook, 4 Paige (N. Y.) 169, 25 Am. Dec. 524; 9 B. & C. 725. And where a neighbor has no right to support by grant or by prescription, it is said that he must shore up his own house; Shrieve v. Stokes, 8 B. Monr. (Ky.) 453, 48 Am. Dec. 401; but there is no obligation on the part of the owner of a building about to be removed to shore up the other buildings; Goddard, Easem., Bennett's ed. 43.

The owner of land cannot be deprived of his right to excavate his own land by the action of his neighbor in building at or near the boundary line, and if he conduct his operations with due care, and no right by grant or prescription has been acquired by his neighbor, he is not liable, even though the building of the latter be ruined; 3 B. & Ad. 871; City of Quincy v. Jones, 76 Ill. 237, 20 Am. Rep. 243; Greenleaf v. Francis, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 117; Radcliff's Ex'rs v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 201, 53 Am. Dec. 357.

In the case of a party wall (q. v.) the joint owners of it have no easement of reciprocal support from each other's buildings, and if one proposes to remove the building, and injury to his neighbor is liable to result from it, he must notify him of his intention that he may look to his own protection, at the same time using reasonable care and precaution to protect the neighbor, and if this is done, and still injury results, no action will lie; Clemens v. Speed, 93 Ky. 284, 19 S. W. 660, 19 L. R. A. 240.

With respect to a right by prescription for the support of buildings, there is a difference between the tendency of judicial opinion in England and the United States. In the former country the tendency, "as in the case of all rights affecting real estate, is strongly in favor of the recognition of this right as acquired by prescription;" L. R. 6 App. Cas. 740; 19 Ch. Div. 281. See 9 H. L. Cas. 503. The American doctrine, after some fluctuation, is now considered as settled that an easement for the support of a building cannot be acquired by prescription; Sullivan v. Zeiner, 98 Cal. 346, 33 Pac. 209, 20 L. R. A. 730; Handlan v. McManus, 42 Mo. App. 551 (overruling Casselberry v. Ames, 13 Mo. App. 575); Mitchell v. Rome, 49 Ga. 19, 15 Am. Rep. 669; Richart v. Scott, 7 Watts (Pa.) 460, 32 Am. Dec. 779; Tunstall v. Christian, 80 Va. 1, 56 Am. Rep. 581 (overruling Stevenson v. Wallace, 27 Gratt. [Va.] 77); Thurston v. Hancock, 12 Mass. 230, 7 Am. Dec. 57. See Sullivan v. Zeiner, 98 Cal. 346, 33 Pac. 209, 20 L. R. A. 730, and note.

The action for a wrong is not for the excavation; the land owner does not sustain damages until there is an actual subsidence of his soil; Kansas City N. W. R. Co. v. Schwake, 70 Kan. 141, 78 Pac. 431, 68 L. R. A. 673, 3 Ann. Cas. 118; 11 App. Cas. 127, where the question is exhaustively discussed. To the same effect Schultz v. Bower, 57 Minn. 493, 59 N. W. 631, 47 Am. St. Rep. 630; Smith v. City of Seattle, 18 Wash. 484, 51 Pac. 1057, 63 Am. St. Rep. 910.

The measure of damages in actions for removing the lateral support of another's land is the amount required to restore the property to its former condition with as good means of lateral support, and special damages must be specially pleaded; Stimmel v. Brown, 7 Houst. (Del.) 219, 30 Atl. 996; or the diminution of the value of the land by falling, caving, or washing, as the natural result of the excavation; McGuire v. Grant, 25 N. J. L. 356, 67 Am. Dec. 49; Schultz v. Bower, 64 Minn. 123, 66 N. W. 139. See Moellering v. Evans, 121 Ind. 195, 22 N. E. 989, 6 L. R. A. 449.

The right of lateral support may be asserted as well against a municipal corporation's making excavations in changing the grade of a street as against private individuals; Stearns v. City of Richmond, 88 Va. 992, 14 S. E. 847, 29 Am. St. Rep. 758. But see Jencks v. Kenny, 19 N. Y. Supp. 243. So where a city built a sewer in a public street opposite land, under which and the street was a stratum of silt and quicksand which flowed into the sewer trench so that a building on the land was damaged, the city was held liable; Cabot v. Kingman, 166 Mass. 403, 44 N. E. 344, 33 L. R. A. 45, three judges dissenting on the authority of 4 L. R. Exch. 244, in which it was held that there is no right of recovery for damages occasioned by the sinking in of land, and that this doctrine extended to a quicksand flowing so freely as to be raised by a pump. The damage to an adjoining owner caused by the construction of a sewer below the level of the foundation of his building was held to be damnum absque injuria, if the lot in its natural state would not have settled and where the owner knew there was danger to his building in time to prop and protect it; Johnson v. St. Louis, 172 Fed. 31, 96 C. C. A. 617, 18 Ann. Cas. 949; City of Plattsmouth v. Boeck, 32 Neb. 297, 49 N. W. 167; contra, Ladd v. Philadelphia, 171 Pa. 485, 33 Atl. 62.

No action lies where natural gas was abstracted; Hague v. Wheeler, 157 Pa. 324, 27 Atl. 714, 22 L. R. A. 141, 37 Am. St. Rep. 736; or petroleum; Kelley v. Oil Co., 57 Ohio St. 317, 49 N. E. 399, 39 L. R. A. 765, 63 Am. St. Rep. 721; or where defendant, in pumping brine from his own mine, pumped plaintiff's salt dissolved by water in plaintiff's mine; [1906] 2 K. B. 822; contra, of the withdrawal of pitch; [1899] A. C. 594 (in Trinidad).

Where a house is injured as an indirect effect of the improper working of mines, the right of action arises at the time the mischief is felt, and the statute of limitations runs from that time; 9 H. L. Cas. 503.

For a collection of cases depending on particular facts and illustrating the right of lateral support, see Graves v. Mattison, 67 Vt. 630, 32 Atl. 498.

In California it is made unlawful by statute for a land-owner to remove the lateral support of adjoining land without taking reasonable precautions to support it; Cal. Civ. Code § 832.

See, generally, 13 L. R. A. 569, note; EASEMENT; PRESCRIPTION.

LATERAN COUNCILS. The general name given to the numerous councils held in the Lateran Church at Rome.

The first of these was convened A. D. 649 to consider the doctrine of the Monothelites. This council held five sessions, during which the writings of the leading advocates of the theory were examined and condemned, and all persons anathematized who did not confess their belief in the existence of both the divine and the human will in the person of Jesus Christ. The second of the councils, held in the years 1105, 1112, 1116, and 1123, settled the controversy between the pope and the emperor as to the investiture of bishops, prescribed the methods of ordinations and elections, by which, although the pope apparently made large concessions to the emperor, he was, in fact, able to practically control the elections, and passed additional decrees to enforce the celibacy of the clergy. The third council, convened in 1139, condemned the antipope and deposed all who received office under him and promulgated thirty canons of discipline among which were several against simony, marriage, and immorality among the clergy. The fourth council (1179) decreed that the election of the popes should be confined to the college of cardinals, two-thirds of the votes of which should be requisite for an election, instead of a majority, as had previously been necessary. It condemned the Albigenses and the Waldenses. The fifth council convened in the year 1215. It is usually called the fourth Lateran and was the most important as marking the summit of the Papal power. It decreed that the doctrine of transubstantiation be one of the articles of faith, required all persons who had reached the age of discretion to confess once a year, arranged for the place of assembly and the time for the next crusade, and anathematized all heretics whose belief was opposed to the faith, decreeing that after their condemnation they should be handed over to the secular authorities, excommunicating all who received, protected, or maintained them, and threatening all bishops with deposition who did not use their utmost endeavors to clear their dioceses of them. The sixth council (1512-17) abolished the Pragmatic Sanction and substituted a concordat agreed upon by Leo X. and Francis I. in which the liberties of the Church were greatly restricted.

Some authorities recognize five only, omitting the first above stated and numbering the others from one to five.

LATHE, LATH (L. Lat. laestrum or leda. Law Fr. and Eng. Dict.). A division of certain counties in England, intermediate between a county or shire and a hundred, sometimes containing three or four hundreds, as in Kent and Sussex. Cowell. But in Sussex the word used for this division is rape. 1 Bla. Com. 116. There was formerly a lathe-reeve or bailiff in each lathe. Id. This division into lathes continues to the present day. In Ireland, the lathe was intermediate between the tything and the hundred. Spencer, Ireland. See T. L.

LATHREEVE, LEDGREEVE, or TRITHINGREVE. An officer under the Saxon government who had authority over a lathe. Cowell.

LATIFUNDIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Great or large possessions; a great or large field; a common. Ainsworth. A great estate made up of smaller ones (fundus), which began to be common in the latter times of the empires. Schmidt, Civ. Law, Introd. p. 17.

LATIN UNION. A monetary alliance of France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy for the establishment of a mutual and uniform monetary policy and the maintenance of a uniform and interchangeable coinage of gold and silver based on the French franc. Greece and Roumania joined the association in April, 1867.

The convention was made at Paris, December 23, 1865, and provided that certain named gold and silver coins and no others should be used by each state, and that they should be received interchangeably when not worn to one-half per cent. or the devices effaced. Silver coins were made a legal tender between individuals of the state which issued them to the sum of fifty francs; but the state itself should receive them in any amount and the public banks of each country to the sum of one hundred francs. The contracting governments agreed to redeem the small coins in gold or five-franc silver pieces, when presented in sums of not less than one hundred francs. It was agreed that of silver coins of two francs and less there should not be issued more than six francs for each inhabitant, the amount for each country being specified according to the estimated population in 1855. Provision was made for any other nation to join the convention by accepting its obligations and adopting the monetary system of the union. The treaty was limited to remain in force till January 1, 1880.

January 30, 1874, a supplementary treaty was made, further limiting the coinage of 1874, and the same limitations were made for 1875 and 1876. In the conference of 1877 the coinage of five-franc pieces was suspended except nine million francs for Italy. In 1873 Belgium passed a law to suspend the coinage of silver entirely, and France did the same in 1876, and the law of Switzerland was to the same effect. Separate legislation to limit the coinage was permissible, as the treaty of 1865 only limited the maximum but did not make any coinage obligatory.

In 1878 through a conference in Paris the same nations renewed the monetary treaty as it was "in all that relates to fineness, weight, denomination, and currency of their gold and silver coin." The free coinage of gold (excepting five-franc pieces, of which the coinage was suspended) was guaranteed each state, and the coinage of silver five-franc pieces was provisionally suspended to be resumed only by unanimous agreement. This treaty was in force, by its terms, until January 1, 1886.

In November, 1885, France, Greece, Italy, and Switzerland renewed the convention for five years, absolutely, with the further agreement that after January 1, 1891, it should be subject to termination on one year's notice. Belgium after some hesitation gave her assent. Silver coinage was made redeemable and no addition to it permitted.

See, generally, Int. Cyc. tit. Latin Union.

Another group of European nations acting under a joint monetary convention includes Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, which have had a treaty known as the Scandinavian Monetary Convention, dated in 1873, for the mutual regulation of their coinage. In addition to the countries named as belonging to the Latin Union, Spain, Austria-Hungary, Finland, Roumania, Servia, Bulgaria, and Monaco have also coined large amounts of either or both gold and silver into money of weight, fineness, and value exactly proportionate to or identical with that of the countries included in the Latin Union.

LATINER. An interpreter. Co. 2 Inst. 515.

LATINI COLONIARII. The free inhabitants of a colony founded with the jus latii, or of a country upon which the jus latii had been conferred. By the constitutio Antoniana, Caracalla extended to them the privilege of full Roman citizenship.

LATINI JUNIANI. Such freedmen as enjoyed their liberty tuitione prætoris, and who, under the Lex Junia Norbana, were made legally free, their freedom, however, being only of the kind enjoyed by the latini coloniarii. They possessed only the jus commercii and not the jus connubii, and even in regard to the former they were restricted, in that they had the commercium inter vivos, but not the commercium mortis causa. They could neither make a will nor take anything under a will, and when a latinus junianus died, his property reverted to his master as though he had remained a slave all his life. The privilege of Roman citizenship conferred upon the latini coloniarii did not include the latini juniani. See Sohm, Rom. L. § 22.

LAUNCH. The movement by which a ship or boat descends from the shore into the water when she is first built, or afterwards.

A vessel already in the water cannot be launched; Homer v. The Lady of the Ocean, 70 Me. 352.

A large, long, low, flat-bottomed boat. Mar. Dict. The long boat of a ship. R. H. Dana. A small vessel employed to carry the cargo of a large one to and from the shore.

The goods on board of a launch are at the risk of the insurers till landed; Osacar v. Ins. Co., 5 Mart. N. S. (La.) 387. The duties and rights of the master of a launch are the same as those of the master of a lighter.

When the master of a vessel agreed to take cotton on board his vessel from the cotton-press, and employed a steam-lighter for that purpose, and the cotton was lost by an explosion of the steam-boiler of the lighter, it was held that his vessel was liable in rem for the loss; 23 Bost. L. Rep. 277.

LAUREATE, or LAUREAT. An officer of the English sovereign. His duty formerly consisted only in composing an ode annually, on the sovereign's birthday, and on the New Year; sometimes also, though rarely, on occasions of any remarkable victory. The annual birthday ode has been discontinued since the conclusion of the reign of George III. The title has been said to be derived from the circumstance that in classical times and in the middle ages, the most distinguished poets were solemnly crowned with laurel. Out of this association of ideas sprang the custom of the presentation of a laurel wreath to graduates in rhetoric and versification at the English universities, the king's laureate simply meaning a rhetorician in his service. In allusion to this custom Selden, in his Titles of Honor, speaks of the laurel crown as an ensign of the degree of mastership in poetry. A relic of the old university practice of crowning distinguished students of poetry exists in the term "laureation," which is still used at one of the Scotch universities (St. Andrews), to signify the taking of the degree of Master of Arts.

LAUREL. An English gold coin worth twenty shillings, or about five dollars, coined in 1619 by James I., so-called because the head of the king was wreathed with laurel, and not crowned as on English coins.

LAW. That which is laid down; that which is established. A rule or method of action, or order of sequences.

The rules and methods by which society compels or restrains the action of its members.

The aggregate of those rules and principles of conduct which the governing power in a community recognizes as those which it will enforce or sanction, and according to which it will regulate, limit, or protect the conduct of its members.

The aggregate of rules set by men as politically superior or sovereign, to men as politically subject. Aust. Jur., Campbell's ed. 86.

A rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in the state, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong. 1 Bla. Com. 44.

A rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a state. 1 Steph. Com. 25.

The general body of rules which are addressed by the rulers of a political community to the members of that society, and which are generally obeyed. Markby, Elements of Law 3.

A general rule of human action, taking cognizance of external acts only, enforced by a definite authority, which authority is human, and among human authorities is that which is paramount in a political society. More briefly, a general rule of external human action enforced by a sovereign political authority. Holland, Jur. 4th ed. 36.

All other rules for the guidance of human action are called laws merely by analogy; and any propositions which are not rules for human action are called laws by metaphor only. Id.

A rule or enactment promulgated by the legislative authority of a state; a long-established local custom which has the force of such an enactment. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 18, 10 L. Ed. 865.

"Law is a statement of the circumstances in which the public force will be brought to bear upon men through the courts." American Banana Co. v. Fruit Co., 213 U. S. 356, 29 Sup. Ct. 511, 53 L. Ed. 826, 16 Ann. Cas. 1047, per Holmes, J.

"On the whole the safest definition of law in the lawyer's sense seems to be a rule of conduct binding on members of a commonwealth as such." Sir F. Pollock in First Book of Jurispr. 29.

Perhaps a few terms whose use requires equal precision serve in so many diverse meanings as the term law. In its root it signifies that which is laid down; that which is established. "In the largest sense," says Montesquieu (Esprit des Lois, b. 1, ch. 1), "laws are the necessary relations which arise from the nature of things; and, in this sense, all beings have their laws, God has his laws, the material universe has its laws, intelligences superior to man have their laws, animals have their laws, man has his laws. In this sense, the idea of a command proceeding from a superior to an inferior is not necessarily involved in the term law. It is frequently thus used to denote simply a statement of a constant relation of phenomena. The laws of science, thus, are but generalized statements of observed facts." "It is a perversion of language," says Paley, "to assign any law as the efficient operative cause of anything. A law presupposes an agent: this is only the mode according to which an agent proceeds."

It has been said that "the one idea that is common to all meanings of the word law is that of order or regularity in the happening of events. Starting from this, the meanings divide into two groups which may be distinguished as law in the scientific and in the jural sense." Terry, Anglo-Am. L. 1. This author continues that "the former seems to contain no elements in addition to the one above mentioned. A scientific law can be expressed as a mere formula," but law in the jural sense involves the further ideas that the regularity manifested is the result of an act or omission of a rational being, produced by an attempt to conform his conduct to some standard or ideal more or less clearly conceived. The result of this process is the evolution in any community of individuals of common principles of action, which as soon as reason takes cognizance of them become laws in the most general, jural sense of the word. With the advance of civilization new elements come into being: (1) The idea of force is added to that of order and is applied to compel obedience, or, going one step further, to change, modify, or add to these rules of action. (2) The primitive law becomes differentiated from other bodies of rules with which it is at first confounded, so that in the end what is termed law in the stricter sense may conflict with other recognized principles of action which are termed laws in the more general sense, as the natural or the moral law. Id.

For additional definitions and discussions thereon, see 14 L. Q. R. 253 (Sir F. Pollock); id. 307; 18 id. 431 (O. W. Holmes, Jr.); 22 id. 321; 38 Amer. L. Rev. 68; Dillon, Laws and Jurisd. 10. As to the meanings of the various equivalents of law in different languages, see 15 L. Q. R. 367 (by Salmond). As to the relation of law to judicial decisions, see 21 Harv. L. Rev. 121.

In its relation to human affairs there is a broad use of the term, in which it denotes any of those rules and methods by which a society compels or restrains the action of its members. Here the idea of a command is more generally obvious, and has usually been thought an essential element in the notion of human law.

A distinction is to be observed in the outset between the abstract and the concrete meaning of the word. That which is usually intended by the term "laws" is not coextensive with that which is intended by the term "law." In the broadest sense which it bears when used in the abstract, law is a science. It treats of the theory of government, the relation of states to each other and to individuals, and the rights and obligations of states, of individuals, and of artificial persons and local communities among themselves and to each other.

An analysis of the science of law presents a view, first, of the rights of persons, distinguishing them as natural persons and artificial persons, or bodies politic or corporations. These rights are deemed either absolute, as relating to the enjoyment of personal security, liberty, and of private property, or, on the other hand, as relative,—that is, arising out of the relation in which several persons stand. These relations are either (1) public or political, viz.: the relation of magistrates and people; or, (2) private, as the relations of master and servant, husband and wife, parent and child, guardian and ward, to which might be added relations arising out of private contracts, such as partnership, principal and agent, and the like. Under the head of the rights of persons as arising out of public relations may be discussed the constitution and polity of the state, the distribution of powers among the various departments of the government, the political status of individuals, as aliens, citizens, and the like.

In the second place, the analysis presents the rights of property, which is divided into personal property or chattels, viz., that which is movable, and real property, or that which is immovable, viz., lands, including nearly all degrees of interest therein, as well as such chattels as by a peculiar connection with land may be deemed to have lost their character as legally movable: these rights of property are viewed in respect to the origin of title, the transmission of title, and the protection of the enjoyment thereof.

In the third place, the analysis presents a view of private wrongs, or those injuries to persons for which the law provides a redress for the aggrieved party; and under this head may be considered the tribunals through which the protection of rights or the redress of wrongs may be obtained, and the various modes of procedure to those ends.

Lastly, the analysis presents a view of public wrongs, or crimes and misdemeanors, in which may be considered the theory of crime and punishment, the persons capable of committing crimes, the several degrees of guilt of principals and accessaries, the various crimes of which the law takes cognizance,—as, those against religion, those against the state and its government, and those against persons and property,—with the punishment which the law affixes to each, and also the tribunals and procedure by which crimes threatened may be prevented, and crimes committed may be punished. Bla. Com.

In a stricter sense, but still in the abstract, law denotes the aggregate of those rules and principles of conduct which the governing power in a community recognizes as those which it will enforce or sanction, and according to which it will regulate, limit, or protect the conduct of members of the community.

It is the aggregate of legal rules and principles, as distinguished from any particular rule or principle. No one statute, nor all statutes, constitute the law of the state; the principles laid down by the courts and the regulations of municipal bodies, as well as, to some extent, the universal principles of ethics, go to make up the body of the law. It includes principles, which rest in the common sense of justice and right, as well as positive rules or regulations, which rest in ordinance. It is the aggregate of the rules or principles only which the governing power in the community recognizes, because that power, whether it be deemed as residing in a monarch, an aristocracy, or in the people at large, is the source of the authority and the sanction of those rules and principles. It is the aggregate of those rules and principles which are recognized as the law by that power, rather than those which are actually enforced in all cases; for a statute is none the less a law because the community forbear to enforce it, so long as it is officially recognized by them as that which, in theory at least, should be enforced; nor does a departure from the law by the governing power in itself abrogate the law. It comprises not only those rules and principles which are to be enforced, but also those which are simply permissive; for a very large part even of modern statute-law—which is commonly defined as a rule commanding or prohibiting—in reality neither commands nor prohibits, except in the most distant and indirect sense, but simply authorizes, permits, or sanctions; and this is much more generally true of those principles of the law which rest in custom and the adjudications of the courts. It is only those which relate to the members of the community in question; for laws, as such, have no extra-territorial operation.

The state has in general two, and only two, articulate organs for law-making purposes—the legislature and the tribunals. The first organ makes new law; the second attests and confirms old law, though under cover of doing so it introduces many new principles. Holland, Jur. 65. "The statute law is the fruit of the conscious power of society, while the unwritten and customary law is the product of its unconscious effort. The former is indeed to a certain extent a creative work; but, as we have already seen, the condition of its efficacy is that it must limit itself to the office of aiding and supplementing the unconscious development of the unwritten law." Address of James C. Carter, Rep. (1890) Am. Bar Ass'n. 236.

The earliest notion of law was not an enunciation of a principle but a judgment in a particular case. When pronounced in the early ages, by a king, it was assumed to be the result of direct divine inspiration. Afterwards came the notion of a custom which a judgment affirms or punishes its breach. In the outset, however, the only authoritative statement of right and wrong is a judicial sentence rendered after the fact has occurred. It does not presuppose a law to have been violated, but is enacted for the first time by a higher form into the judge's mind at the moment of adjudication. Maine, Anc. Law (Dwight's ed.) pp. xv, 5. See PRECEDENT. As to Primitive Notions of Law, see 10 Am. L. Rev. 422.

The idea of law has commonly been analyzed as composed of three elements: (1) a command of the lawgiver, which command must prescribe not a single act merely, but a series or class of acts; (2) an obligation imposed thereby on the citizen; (3) a sanction threatened in the event of disobedience; Benth. Frag. on Gov.; Austin, Prov. Jur.; Maine, Anc. Law. Hamilton declared a sanction essential to the idea of law. Federalist, No. 15.

The latter clause of Blackstone's definition, supra, has been much criticised. Mr. Chitty modifies it to "commanding what shall be done or what shall not be done"; 1 Chitty's Bla. Com. 44, note; and Mr. Stephen omits it in his definition. See supra. As to Law and Command, see 1 Law Mag. & Rev. N. S. 189.

These definitions, though more apt in reference to statutes and edicts than to the law in general, seem, even in reference to the former sort of law, to look rather at the usual form than the invariable essence of the thing. The principle of law, that a promise without a consideration is void, neither commands men to provide a consideration for every promise nor forbids them to promise, without consideration, for this is lawful; nor does it forbid them to fulfill such promises. It simply amounts to this, that if men choose to break such promises, society will not interfere to enforce them.' And even many statutes have no form of a command or prohibition; and, moreover, some that are such in form are not in reality. An enactment that no action shall be brought on a simple contract after the lapse of six years from the time the cause of action accrued cannot aptly be said to command men to bring actions within six years, nor even, in fact, to forbid them to bring such actions after that time; for it is still lawful to sue on an outlawed demand, and, if the defendant do not object, the plaintiff may succeed. It may be deemed a command in so far as it is a direction to the court to dismiss such actions; but as a rule of civil conduct it amounts simply to this, that when an obligation has become stale to a certain degree, society will justify the debtor in repudiating it.

A work on legal history disclaims philosophical analysis and definition of law, as belonging neither to the historical nor to the dogmatic science of law, but to the theoretical part of politics. Legal science is said to be "not an ideal or ethical result of political analysis; it is the actual result of facts of human nature and history." Accordingly, "law may be taken for every purpose save that of strictly philosophical inquiry to be the sum of the rules administered by courts of justice." When, therefore, "a man is acquainted with the rules which the judges of the land will apply to any subject of dispute between citizens or to any act complained of as against the common weal, and is further acquainted with the manner in which the decisions of the common court can be enforced, he must be said to know the law to that extent." It is not necessary that he should "have opinions on the metaphysical analysis of laws or legal duty in general, or the place of the topic in hand in a scientific arrangement of legal ideas." 1 Poll. & Maitl. Introd.

The difficulty of defining law is nowhere more clearly shown than in a work on English and American law, in which the leading definitions are enumerated and criticised. It is truly said that the expression "our law," adopted by the author, does not mean moral law, although rules regulating civil conduct may "be imported by the tribunals when necessary for the purposes of the actual decision of causes, from the field of morality," when they become invested with the quality of law to the extent that they are recognized and enforced by the judges. The author referred to agrees with Mr. Justice Markby (Elem. of Law § 12) that no greater service was rendered by Austin than the definition of the boundaries of jurisprudence which separate it from ethics or morality. This separation was too much overlooked by continental jurists, with the result, particularly in Germany, of merging "the scientific treatment of law in the larger region of ethical inquiry." (Amos, Science of Law ch. i., ii., iii.) Nor does the law include the science of politics or government, which falls "within the domain of the statesman or legislator" (see also Pollock, Hist. Science of Politics). So law and legislation are not synonymous; the latter is the usual and effective instrument for changing and amending the former or making additions to it. Leaving behind him what the law is not and pausing before undertaking to define what it is, the author remarks, "It requires a bolder man than I to propound a definition of the law of the land which is both comprehensive and accurate." He criticises the definitions of Blackstone, Markby, and Austin (supra) as being defective in that the words "prescribed," "command," "addressed," "set," would require an elasticity not consonant with their general or appropriate use. These definitions are apt and accurate as describing the ordained or enacted law of a state, but would exclude a large body of what is, unquestionably, law. He adopts Holland's as sufficiently accurate for his purpose, "although with a conscious sense of its inadequacy." It answers the purpose because "law, as the lawyer has to deal with it, is concerned only with the legal rights . . . coercion by the state is the essential quality of the law, distinguishing it from morality or ethics." The conclusion is, "If you ask me to define law, I can, speaking as a lawyer, do no better than to adopt Professor Holland's definition already given. If you ask me to enumerate all the ultimate sources whence legal rights and duties originate and how these are evolved, I hide my diminished head and confess my inability to satisfactorily formulate an answer." Dillon, Laws and Jur. Lect. I.

This emphatic statement gathers added force when the thoroughness of the author's research, as shown by his notes, is considered. Among them is found a reference to the elaborate and learned examination of the subject by Professor Clark, who devotes sixteen chapters each to "The Definition and Origin of Law" and "The Form of Law" in his "Practical Jurisprudence: A Comment on Austin." See, as to a definition of law, 10 L. Q. R. 228.

This criticism of the most frequently quoted definitions leads naturally up to a reference to the clear and forcible views of James C. Carter in his address upon The Ideal and The Actual in the Law (Amer. Bar Ass'n, 1890). Reference has already been made to another address of Mr. Carter in the title International Law (q. v.), to which subject much of what is here said is particularly applicable. Concluding his discussion of the sources of law generally, he thus states the result of his argument against the conception of Austin: "Law is not a body of commands imposed upon society from without, either by an individual sovereign or superior, or by a sovereign body constituted by representatives of society itself. It exists at all times as one of the elements of society springing directly from habit and custom. It is, therefore, the unconscious creation of society or a growth.

For the most part it needs no interpreter or vindicator. The members of society are familiar with its customs and follow them, and in following custom they follow the law. It is only for the exceptional instances that judicial tribunals or legislative enactments are needed. In those cases where the customs are doubtful or conflicting, the expert is needed to ascertain or reconcile them, and hence the origin of the judicial establishment. . . . New customs, new modes of dealing, must be contrived to meet new exigencies, and society by the unconscious exercise of its ordinary forces proceeds to furnish itself with them. But this is a gradual and slow process attended with difficulty and loss. Another agency is needed to supplement and assist the work of society, and legislation springs into existence to supply the want." Rep. Am. Bar Ass'n (1890) 217.

Referring to the customs of the community as the sole basis of law, James C. Carter says: "The judge permits no witness to be called to enlighten him as to what custom is (I do not speak of particular customs). He is required to take judicial notice of it; but the word judicial might be omitted; for every one in the ordinary business of life is required to take the same notice at his peril." Law, Its Origin, etc., 79.

It has been very truly said that much of the obscurity involving the origin of law and the mutual relations and proportions of customary, statute, and case law is caused by ambiguous uses of the term source. It is employed (1) to indicate whence we obtain our knowledge of the law; (2) the mode in which or the person through whom have been formulated rules which have acquired the force of law; (3) the authority which gives them that force. The last two uses are most frequently confused. Recognition by the state is the sole source of laws in the sense of that which impresses upon them their legal character. Their sources, in the sense of the causes to which they owe their existence as rules, are thus classified: (1) usage which becomes law at the moment at which it receives the imprimatur of the state; (2) religion, the influence of which cannot be left out of account in studying the development of any secular system of law; (3) adjudication, whatever theory be accepted as to its nature as a source of law; (4) scientific discussion; (5) equity, as particularly exemplified in the administrations of law by the Roman prætor and the English chancellor; (6) legislation, whether by the supreme power of the state or by subordinate authorities exercising a delegated function. Holland, Jur. ch. 5.

When used in the concrete, the term law usually has reference to statutes or expressions of the legislative will. "The laws of a state," observes Mr. Justice Story, "are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long-established local customs having the force of laws." Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 18, 10 L. Ed. 865. Hence, he argues, "in the ordinary use of language it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws." In the Civil Code of Louisiana they are defined to be "a solemn expression of legislative will. It orders, permits and forbids. It announces rewards and punishments."

The constitution of a state is a law of the state, within the meaning of the United States constitution; Bier v. McGehee, 148 U. S. 137, 13 Sup. Ct. 580, 37 L. Ed. 397; but a municipal ordinance is not; Hamilton Gas Light & Coke Co. v. Hamilton, 146 U. S. 258, 13 Sup. Ct. 90, 36 L. Ed. 963.

But, as has already been said "law" in the abstract involves much more. Thus, a reference in a statute to "the cases provided by law" includes not only those cases provided by former statutes, but also those contemplated by the common or unwritten law; Chamberlain v. Beller, 18 N. Y. 115.

Law is, to a certain extent, a progressive science and must recognize changes in methods of procedure and of the protection of individuals or classes; Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780 (Brown, J.).

"Law 'should follow business;' it should not divert or anticipate the course of business, except for most urgent reasons." (This remark is said by Mr. Bigelow in his Bills, Notes and Cheques, 2nd Ed. p. 7, to have been made to him by Lord Bowen in a conversation concerning the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q. B. D. 612, affirmed in [1892] A. C. 25).

"It is one of the distinguished characteristics of the English race, whose political habit has been transmitted to it through the sagacious generation by whom this government was erected, that they have never felt themselves bound by the logic of laws, but only a practical understanding of them based upon slow precedent. For this race, the law under which they live is at any particular time what it is then understood to be, and this understanding of it is compounded of the circumstances of the time. Absolute theories of legal consequence they have never cared to follow out to their conclusions. Their laws have always been used as parts of the practical running machinery of their politics—parts to be fitted from time to time, by interpretation, to existing opinion and social condition." Woodrow Wilson, in The State.

"Generalities, . . . which with reference to so many cases are founded in truth, sometimes come to be taken, by frequent repetition, as axioms, behind which, as a bulwark, we seldom in any case look." McNairy v. Eastland, 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 310.

"And I am tempted to take this opportunity of observing that a large portion of that legal opinion which has passed current for law falls within the description of 'law taken for granted.' If a statistical table of legal propositions should be drawn out, and the first column headed, 'Law by Statute,' and the second, 'Law by Decision,' a third column, under the heading of 'Law Taken for Granted,' would comprise as much matter as both the others combined. But when, in pursuit of truth, we are obliged to investigate the grounds of the law, it is plain and has often been proved by recent experience that the mere statement and re-statement of a doctrine—the mere repetition of the cautilena of lawyers—cannot make it law, unless it can be traced to some competent authority, and if it be irreconcilable to some clear legal principle." Lord Denman, in 11 Cl. & F. 372.

The law of the land, an expression used in Magna Carta and adopted in most of the earlier constitutions of the original states, means, however, something more than the legislative will; it requires the due and orderly proceeding of justice according to the established methods. See Jones v. Robbins, 8 Gray (Mass.) 329; DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

When the term law is used to denote enactments of the legislative power, it is frequently confined, especially by English writers, to permanent rules of civil conduct, as distinguished from other acts, such as a divorce act, an appropriation bill, an estates act. Report of Eng. Stat. L. Com., March 1856.

In the United States, the organic law of a state is termed the constitution, and the term "laws" generally designates statutes or legislative enactments, in contradistinction to the constitution. See STATUTES.

Law, as distinguished from equity, denotes the doctrines and procedure of the common law of England and America, from which equity is a departure. As to where separate courts of law and equity are maintained, see EQUITY.

Law is also used in contradistinction to fact. Questions of law are, in general, for the decision of the court; while it is for the jury to pass upon questions of fact. See JURY; JUDICIAL POWER.

In respect to the ground of the authority of law, it is divided as natural law or the law of nature or of God, and positive law.

The classification and arrangement of the law is a subject as to which the lack of systematic discussion is in striking contrast to the measureless volume of treatises upon particular legal topics. The extent to which the latter overlap each other, and thus add to the labor of the patient investigator of any given title, has been frequently suggested, but there is to be found in legal literature little more than the merest recognition of the necessity of a remedy.

The familiar analysis based on the arrangement of Blackstone's Commentaries remains after the lapse of more than a century without the recognition of a substitute which warrants the omission of its substance from the place heretofore assigned to it in this title, inadequate as it is.

Like the classification of Blackstone, of much suggestive interest, but inadequate for modern purposes, is Sir Matthew Hale's Analysis of the Law, a posthumous tract frequently bound with the History of the Common Law.

The subject of classification forms a large part of the able work on jurisprudence by Professor Holland, but it is there dealt with in sections, and without any attempt to present as a whole a comprehensive analysis or classification. The work does furnish most valuable material to be used in making one. Of value for similar use will be found Digby's Introduction to the History of the Law of Real Property, appendix to Part I. with tables; papers by O. W. Holmes, Jr., 5 Am. L. Rev. 1; 7 id. 46; Hammond's Blackstone, notes on Book I. Ch. I., and Introduction to Sandars' Justinian. See also an article by Sir Frederick Pollock, "Divisions of Law," 8 Harv. L. Rev. 188, in which he contends that "it is not possible to make any clear-cut division of the subject-matter of legal rules." He discusses some of the more obvious general divisions of the law, but his view as to a complete classification is thus expressed: "Ambitious writers have sometimes gone to work as if it were possible to reduce the whole contents of a legal system to a sort of classified catalogue where there would be no repetition or cross references, and the classification would explain itself. Ambition on that scale is destined to disappointment by the nature of things." The subject was brought to the attention of the American Bar Association in 1888 by a letter of Professor Henry T. Terry, which is printed in the annual report of 1889, p. 327. A committee was appointed, and made a report in 1891, which discussed with much ability the importance of the subject and the difficulty of its practical accomplishment. The conclusion reached was that a classification could only be successfully attempted with respect to one legal system, and that it must be made in harmony with the spirit of the law as it grows and in the light of legal history. The objects are, first, arrangement to enable the mind to comprehend the law as a whole; second, the cataloguing of topics, to the end that authorities may be collected under a well recognized title of each principal topic of the law. The two methods are not consistent, one being required for the jurist and the scholar and the other for the judge and the lawyer. Both, therefore, are needed, but the last is of more general importance. The committee reported a tentative classification under the first head only, leaving the other for a further report, which has not yet been made. Rept. Am. Bar Ass'n (1891) 379–402. In 1896, the subject was revived, and a brief report expressed the belief that it was possible "to determine more definitely the sphere of each of the ordinary topics of the law and determine where each subject may be looked for." Rept. Am. Bar Ass'n (1896) 405.

Arbitrary law. A law or provision of law so far removed from consideration of abstract justice that it is necessarily founded on the mere will of the law-making power, so that it is rather a rule established than a principle declared. The principle that an infant shall not be bound by his contract is not arbitrary; but the rule that the limit of infancy shall be twenty-one years, not twenty nor twenty-two, is arbitrary.

The term is also sometimes used to signify an unreasonable law,—one that is in violation of justice.

Irrevocable laws. All laws which have not in their nature or in their language some limit or termination provided are, in theory, perpetual: but the perpetuity is liable to be defeated by subsequent abrogation. It has sometimes been attempted to secure an absolute perpetuity by an express provision forbidding any abrogation. But it may well be questioned whether one generation has power to bind their posterity by an irrevocable law. See this subject discussed by Bentham, Works, vol. 2, 402–407; and see Dwarris, Stat. 479.

Municipal law is a system of law proper to any single state, nation, or community. See MUNICIPAL LAW.

A penal law is one which inflicts a penalty for its violation.

Positive law is the system naturally established by a community, in distinction from natural law. See POSITIVE LAW.

Private law is a term used to indicate a statute which relates to private matters which do not concern the public at large.

A prospective law or statute is one which applies only to cases arising after its enactment, and does not affect that which is already past.

A public law is one which affects the public, either generally or in some classes.

A retrospective law or statute is one that turns backward to alter that which is past or to affect men in relation to their conduct before its enactment. These are also called retroactive laws. In general, whenever a retroactive statute would take away vested rights or impair the obligation of contracts, it is in so far void, because opposed to the constitution of the United States; Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 391, 1 L. Ed. 648. But laws which only vary the remedies, or merely cure a defect in proceedings otherwise fair, are valid; Underwood v. Lilly, 10 S. & R. (Pa.) 102; Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 627, 7 L. Ed. 542; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. (U. S.) 420, 9 L. Ed. 773.

As used in the 5th amendment to the constitution, it embraces all legal and equitable rules defining human rights and duties, and providing for their enforcement; not only as between man and man, but also between the state and its citizens; Jenkins v. Ballantyne, 8 Utah 245, 30 Pac. 760, 16 L. R. A. 689.

There is said to be a theory that the law on any question is always fixed and that it is not changed when a former case is overruled by a later case; Hood v. Society to Protect Children, 221 Pa. 474, 70 Atl. 845; the reversal of a rule of law does not change the law; the earlier court was mistaken; Ray v. Gas Co., 138 Pa. 590, 20 Atl. 1065, 12 L. R. A. 290, 21 Am. St. Rep. 922.

The doctrines and procedure of the common law of England and America, as distinguished from those of equity.

LAW AGENTS. In Scotch Law. Solicitors whose qualifications are provided for by 36 and 37 Vict. and several acts of sederunt.

LAW AND ORDER SOCIETIES. Societies formed for the preservation of the public health and morals and the prosecution of those who offend against them.

LAW-BURROWS, LAW BORGH. In Scotch Law. Security for the peaceful behavior of a party; security to keep the peace. This process was much resorted to by the government of Charles II. for political purposes.

LAW CHARGES. Costs incurred in court in the prosecution of a suit, to be paid by the party cast. Rousseau v. His Creditors, 17 La. 206; Barkley v. His Creditors, 11 Rob. (La.) 28. See Morse v. Williamson's Syndics, 3 Mart. O. S. (La.) 282.

LAW COURT OF APPEALS. An appellate tribunal, formerly existing in South Carolina, for hearing appeals from the courts of law.

LAW DAY. The day fixed in a mortgage or defeasible deed for the payment of the debt secured. Lanier v. Driver, 24 Ala. 149. This does not occur now until foreclosure, and the use of the term is confusing; Kortright v. Cady, 21 N. Y. 343, 78 Am. Dec. 145.

In Old English Law. A leet or sheriff's tourn. Termes de la Ley. Law day or lage day denoted a day of open court; especially the more solemn courts of a county or hundred. The court-leet, or view of frankpledge.

LAW FRENCH. See LANGUAGE.

LAW LATIN. See LANGUAGE.

LAW LIBRARY. A collection of books, manuscripts, pamphlets, etc., relating to legal subjects. Under a bequest of "Law Library and books of antiquity," Dugdale's Monasticon, Domesday Book, and State Trials were held to pass. 4 L. J. O. S. Ch. 74.

LAW LIST. An annual publication of a quasi-official character in England, comprising various statistics of interest in connection with the legal profession. The current law list is prima facie evidence that the persons therein named as solicitors or certified conveyancers are such. 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127.

LAW LORDS. In English Law. Peers who have held high judicial office, or have been distinguished in the legal profession. Moz. & W.

LAW MARTIAL. See MILITARY LAW.

LAW MERCHANT. The general body of commercial usages in matters relative to commerce. Blackstone calls it the custom of merchants, and ranks it under the head of the particular customs of England, which go to make up the great body of the common law. 1 Bla. Com. 75. Since, however, its character is not local, nor its obligation confined to a particular district, it cannot with propriety be considered as a custom in the technical sense; 1 Steph. Com. 54. It is a system of law which does not rest exclusively on the positive institutions and local customs of any particular country, but consists of certain principles of equity and usages of trade which general convenience and a common sense of justice have established, to regulate the dealings of merchants and mariners in all the commercial countries of the civilized world. 3 Kent 2.

These usages, being general and extensive, partake of the character of rules and principles of law, not of matters of fact, as do usages which are local or special. They constitute a part of the general law of the land, and, being a part of that law, their existence cannot be proved by witnesses, but the judges are bound to take notice of them ex officio; Winch. 24; and this application is not confined to merchants, but extends to all persons concerned in any mercantile transaction.

In the Middle Ages "the custom of merchants" meant the actual usage of the European commercial world. When it came before the ordinary tribunals, it had to be proved; but in the 18th century the courts took judicial notice of it. The development of the law merchant as part of the common law has continued without ceasing. Evidence of living general usage is still admissible to add new incidents to its contents, provided they do not contradict any rule already received. Pollock, First Book of Jurispr. 282, citing, as to the last statement, L. R. 10 Ex. 337.

Many of the rules of the law merchant have come into the English law through the Courts of Chancery. Burdick, Law Merchant, in 3 Sel. Essays in Anglo-Amer. L. H. 50.

LAW OF ARMS. Ordinances which regulated proclamations of war, leagues, treaties, etc. Cowell.

LAW OF THE CASE. Propositions of law once decided by an appellate court are not open to reconsideration in that court upon a subsequent appeal or writ of error; Brown v. Zinc Co., 179 Fed. 309, 102 C. C. A. 497 (C. C. A. 8th Circ.); Illinois v. R. Co., 184 U. S. 77, 22 Sup. Ct. 300, 46 L. Ed. 440; but this is only where the facts are the same as before; Barney v. R. Co., 117 U. S. 228, 6 Sup. Ct. 654, 29 L. Ed. 858.

A ruling of an appellate court may be modified or overruled in another case, but not in a second appeal in the same case. It becomes the law of the case and is a "final adjudication," from the consequences of which the court cannot depart or the parties relieve themselves; Dye v. Crary, 13 N. Mex. 439, 85 Pac. 1038, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1136.

The determination of a legal question made upon reversing an order granting a preliminary injunction, becomes the law of the case; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. City of Toledo, 121 Fed. 734, 58 C. C. A. 16 (C. C. A. 6th Circ.).

Where an erroneous ruling has been affirmed on appeal, the probate court cannot in a subsequent accounting on the same fund, correct the error; the ruling of the appellate court becomes the "law of the case"; In re Lafferty's Estate, 230 Pa. 496, 79 Atl. 711; but a probate court may, where there has been no appeal, change its ruling when adjudicating upon a different fund in the same estate; Kellerman's Estate, 21 Pa. Dist. R. 521.

A change by the supreme court of its ruling on a question of law and fact will not sustain a bill of review in another case decided before the change was made; Tilghman v. Werk, 39 Fed. 680.

Where there was a reversal on an appeal and a new trial, the trial court erred in following an intervening decision of the highest court inconsistent with the ruling of the reversing court; District of Columbia v. Brewer, (C. C. A. Dist. Col.) 37 Wash. L. Rep. 65.

A previous ruling by an appellate court in a case is a final adjudication, from the consequences of which the court cannot depart nor the parties relieve themselves; Phelan v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 45; even though the court was of the opinion that the ruling was erroneous; Dewey v. Gray, 2 Cal. 377; and even where the ruling was based upon the ruling of a statute which the court afterwards held had already been repealed; Board of Com'rs of Tipton County v. R. Co., 89 Ind. 101. The doctrine applies especially to a second appeal in the same case, in which case the law applied in the former decision is binding on the appellate court; Henning v. Eldridge, 146 Ill. 305, 33 N. E. 754; Stacy v. R. Co., 32 Vt. 552.

An actual decision of any question settles the law in respect thereto for further action in the case; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hill, 193 U. S. 551, 24 Sup. Ct. 538, 48 L. Ed. 788. On the second appeal of a case to the circuit court of appeals, after a reversal of its former decision by the supreme court, the former decision constitutes the law of the case on all points which have not been criticised or reversed by the supreme court; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hill, 118 Fed. 708, 55 C. C. A. 536.

The phrase, "law of the case," expresses only the practice of courts generally to refuse to re-open what has been decided, and not a limit to their power; Remington v. R. Co., 198 U. S. 95, 99, 100, 25 Sup. Ct. 577, 49 L. Ed. 959. There is nothing in the constitution of the United States to require it; or to prevent a state from allowing past action to be modified while a case remains in court; San Francisco v. Itsell, 133 U. S. 65, 10 Sup. Ct. 241, 33 L. Ed. 570; Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Ellis, 144 U. S. 458, 12 Sup. Ct. 724, 36 L. Ed. 504. The doctrine appears to have been somewhat modified in Messinger v. Anderson, 225 U. S. 436, 32 Sup. Ct. 739, 56 L. Ed. 1152, where it was said that the law of the case, as applied to the effect of previous orders on the later action of the court in the same case, merely expresses the practice of courts generally to refuse to open what has been decided. The court held that, where a circuit court of appeals has before it in the second trial of the same case a will previously construed by it, and meanwhile the highest court of the state in which the real estate affected is situated has construed the will differently, the former court is not bound to adhere to its decision; Messinger v. Anderson, 225 U. S. 436, 32 Sup. Ct. 739, 56 L. Ed. 1152.

As to the distinctions between "law of the case," stare decisis and res judicata, see 22 Harv. L. Rev. 438. As to the conclusiveness of prior decisions on subsequent appeals, see an exhaustive note in 34 L. R. A. 321.

LAW OF CITATIONS. In the Civil Law. The most important of the laws of citation were those enacted by Valentinian III. A. D. 426, which enacted that the writings of the jurists Papinian, Paulus, Ulpian, Gaius, and Modestinus, as well as of all those who were cited by these writers (the limits of classic literature being thus determined), should possess quasi-statutory force so that their opinions should be binding on the judge. If the opinions differed on the same question, that opinion should prevail which was supported by the largest number of the jurists; if the numbers were equal, Papinian's opinion should prevail, or, if Papinian had expressed no opinion on the subject, the judge was to exercise his discretion. Valentinian the Third's law of citations marks the completion, for the time being, of that development which had commenced with the responsa of the old pontifices and the jus respondendi of Augustus. See Sohn, Inst. Rom. L. 84.

LAW OF NATIONS. See INTERNATIONAL LAW.

LAW OF NATURE. That law which God, the sovereign of the universe, has prescribed to all men, not by any formal promulgation, but by the internal dictate of reason alone. It is discovered by a just consideration of the agreeableness or disagreeableness of human actions to the nature of man; and it comprehends all the duties which we owe either to the Supreme Being, to ourselves, or to our neighbors: as, reverence to God, self-defence, temperance, honor to our parents, benevolence to all, a strict adherence to our engagements, gratitude, and the like. Erskine, Pr. Sc. Law 1. 1. 1. See Ayliffe, Pand. tit. 2, p. 2; Cicero, de Leg. lib. 1.

The divine will, or the dictate of right reason, showing the moral deformity or moral necessity there is in any act, according to its suitableness or unsuitableness to a reasonable nature. Sometimes used of the law of human reason, in contradistinction to the revealed law, and sometimes of both, in contradistinction to positive law.

They are independent of any artificial connections, and differ from mere presumptions of law in this essential respect, that the latter depend on and are a branch of the particular system of jurisprudence to which they belong; but mere natural presumptions are derived wholly by means of the common experience of mankind, without the aid or control of any particular rule of law, but simply from the course of nature and the habits of society. These presumptions fall within the exclusive province of the jury, who are to pass upon the facts. Greenl. Ev., 15th ed. § 44.

The primitive laws of nature may be reduced to six, namely: comparative sagacity, or reason; self-love; the attraction of the sexes to each other; the tenderness of parents towards their children; the religious sentiment; sociability.

When a man is properly organized, he is able to distinguish moral good from moral evil; and the study of man proves that man is not only an intelligent but a free being, and he is, therefore, responsible for his actions. The judgment we form of our good actions produces happiness; on the contrary, the judgment we form of our bad actions produces unhappiness.

Every animated being is impelled by nature to his own preservation, to defend his life and body from injuries, to shun what may be hurtful, and to provide all things requisite to his existence. Hence the duty to watch over his own preservation. Suicide and duelling are, therefore, contrary to this law; and a man cannot mutilate himself, nor renounce his liberty.

The attraction of the sexes has been provided for the preservation of the human race; and this law condemns celibacy. The end of marriage proves that polygamy and polyandry are contrary to the law of nature. Hence it follows that the husband and wife have a mutual and exclusive right over each other.

Man from his birth is wholly unable to provide for the least of his necessities; but the love of his parents supplies for this weakness. This is one of the most powerful laws of nature. The principal duties it imposes on the parents are to bestow on the child all the care its weakness requires, to provide for its necessary food and clothing, to instruct it, to provide for its wants, and to use coercive means for its good, when requisite.

The religious sentiment which leads us naturally towards the Supreme Being is one of the attributes which belong to humanity alone; and its importance gives it the rank of the moral law of nature. From this sentiment arise all the sects and different forms of worship among men.

The need which man feels to live in society is one of the primitive laws of nature whence flow our duties and rights; and the existence of society depends upon the condition that the rights of all shall be respected. On this law are based the assistance, succors, and good offices which men owe to each other, they being unable to provide each every thing for himself.

In the Middle Ages, the law of nature, identified by Gratian with the law of God, was regarded by the canonists and civilians as the reasonable basis of all law. In English law not so much is heard of the law of nature. The work done elsewhere by it was done in England by "reason." 2 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 512. See Pollock, Journ. of Comp. Legisl. (1900) 418; [1908] 1 Ch. 311. It is the living embodiment of the collective reasoning of civilized mankind and as such is adopted by the common law in substance, though not always by name. Pollock, Expansion of C. L. 128.

LAW TERMS. See TERM.

LAWFUL. Legal. That which is not contrary to law. That which is sanctioned or permitted by law. That which is in accordance with law. The terms "lawful," "unlawful," and "illegal" are used with reference to that which is in its substance sanctioned or prohibited by the law. The term "legal" is occasionally used with reference to matter of form alone: thus, an oral agreement to convey land, though void by law, is not properly to be said to be unlawful, because there is no violation of law in making or in performing such an agreement; but it is said to be not legal, or not in lawful form, because the law will not enforce it, for want of that written evidence required in such cases.

LAWFUL AGE. Majority. This usually means twenty-one years, but in some of the states, for certain purposes, a woman attains lawful age at eighteen. McKim v. Handy, 4 Md. Ch. 228. See AGE.

LAWFUL AUTHORITIES. The expression "lawful authorities," used in our treaty with Spain, refers to persons who exercised the power of making grants by authority of the crown. Mitchel v. U. S., 9 Pet. (U. S.) 711, 9 L. Ed. 283.

Under the term lawful issue, bastards cannot take a remainder in a life estate to the mother; Black v. Cartmell, 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 188. See ISSUE.

LAWFUL MONEY. Money which is a legal tender in payment of debts: e. g. gold and silver coined at the mint. 2 Salk. 446; 5 Mod. 7; Prather v. Bank, 3 Ind. 358; Griffin v. Thompson, 2 How. (U. S.) 244, 11 L. Ed. 253; Macfarland v. Gwin, 3 How. (U. S.) 717, 11 L. Ed. 799; Bone v. Torry, 16 Ark. 83. See Cocke v. Kendall, Hempst. 236, Fed. Cas. No. 2,929b. See GOLD; MONEY; LEGAL TENDER.

LAWFULLY POSSESSED. In a statute concerning forcible entry and detainer, it is equivalent to peaceably possessed. McCartney's Adm'rx v. Alderson, 45 Mo. 35.

LAWING OF DOGS. Mutilating the forefeet of mastiffs, to prevent them from running after deer. 3 Bla. Com. 71. See EXPEDITATION; REGARD.

LAWLESS COURT. An ancient local English court, said to have been held in Essex once a year, at cock-crowing, without a light or pen and ink, and conducted in a whisper.

LAWLESS MAN. An outlaw.

Technically we speak of a suit in admiralty or equity, an action at law, a prosecution in a criminal court, etc. The term lawsuit may include an arbitration. Packard v. Hill, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 434.

LAWYER. One skilled in the law.

Any person who, for fee or reward, prosecutes or defends causes in courts of record or other judicial tribunals of the United States, or of any of the states, or whose business it is to give legal advice in relation to any cause or matter whatever. See ATTORNEY; BARRISTER; PROCTOR; SOLICITOR.

LAY. In English Law. That which relates to persons or things not ecclesiastical. In the United States, the people are not by law divided, as in England, into ecclesiastical and lay. The law makes no distinction between them.

The word is also used in the sense of opposed to professional.

Also applied to a share of the profits of a fishing or whaling voyage, allotted to the officers and seamen, in the nature of wages. Coffin v. Jenkins, 3 Story 108, Fed. Cas. No. 2,948.

In Pleading. To state or to allege. The place from whence a jury are to be summoned is called the venue, and the allegation in the declaration of the place where the jury is to be summoned is, in technical language, said to lay the venue. 3 Steph. Com. 574; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2830.

To lay damages. To state at the conclusion of the declaration the amount of damages which the plaintiff claims. And. Steph. Pl. § 220.

LAY CORPORATION. See CORPORATION.

LAY DAYS. The time allowed to the master of a vessel for loading and unloading the same. In the absence of any custom to the contrary, Sundays are to be computed in the calculation of lay days at the port of discharge; 10 M. & W. 331. See 3 Esp. 121; 3 Kent 202; 2 Steph. Com. 141; Rubens v. Steamship Co., 65 Hun 625, 20 N. Y. Supp. 481. See DEMURRAGE.

LAY FEE. A fee held by ordinary feudal tenure, as distinguished from the ecclesiastical tenure of frankalmoign, by which an ecclesiastical corporation held of the donor. The tenure of frankalmoign is reserved by stat. 12 Car. II., which abolished military tenures. 1 Bla. Com. 101.

LAY IMPROPRIATOR. Lay rector, to whom the greater tithes are reserved, the lesser going to the vicar. 1 Burn, Eccl. Law 75, 76.

LAY INVESTITURE. See INVESTITURE; ANNULUS ET BACULUS.

LAY OUT. This term has come to be used technically in highway laws as embracing all the series of acts necessary to the complete establishment of a highway. Cone v. City of Hartford, 28 Conn. 363; Hitchcock v. Aldermen of Springfield, 121 Mass. 382; Mansur v. County Com'rs, 83 Me. 514, 22 Atl. 358. See Small v. Eason, 33 N. C. 94.

LAY PEOPLE. Jurymen. Finch, Law 381.

LAYING THE VENUE. See LAY.

LAYMAN. In Ecclesiastical Law. One who is not an ecclesiastic nor a clergyman. One who is not a member of the legal profession. One who is not a member of any profession.

LAZARET, LAZARETTO. A place, selected by public authority, where vessels coming from infected or unhealthy countries are required to perform quarantine. See HEALTH.

LEA. A pasture. Co., Litt. 4 b. Still in use.

LE ROI (or LA REINE) LE VEUT. (Law French). The king (or the queen) assents. The formula used in Great Britain, and still used, when the crown approves a bill passed by parliament. It was formerly used in France. 1 Toullier, n. 52.

LE ROI (or LA REINE) S'AVISERA. (Law French). The king (or the queen) will consider it. The phrase used by the British crown when dissenting to or vetoing an act passed by the lords and commons. This power was last exercised in 1707, by Queen Anne; May, Parl. L. Ch. 18. The same formula was used by the king of the French for the same purpose. 1 Toullier, n. 52. See VETO.

LE ROI VEUT EN DÉLIBÉRER. The king will deliberate on it. This is the formula which the king of France used when he intended to veto an act of the legislative assembly. 1 Toullier, n. 42.

LEADER. See LEADING COUNSEL.

LEADING A USE. A term applied to a deed executed before a fine is levied, declaring the use of the fine: i. e. specifying to whose use the fine shall enure. If executed after the fine, it is said to declare the use. 2 Bla. Com. 363. See DEED.

LEADING CASE. A case decided, usually by a court of last resort, which decides some particular point in question, and to which reference is constantly or frequently made, for the purpose of determining the law in similar questions.

Many elements go to the constitution of a case as a leading case: among which are, the priority of the case, the learning and reputation of the court, the amount of consideration given to the question, the freedom from collateral matters or questions; sometimes, also, the eminence of counsel who argued it. The term is applied to cases as leading either in a particular state or at common law. A very convenient means of digesting the law upon any subject is found to be the selection of a leading case upon the subject, and an arrangement of authorities illustrating the questions decided. It is less in vogue now than formerly.

LEADING COUNSEL. That one of two or more counsel employed on the same side in a cause who has the principal management of the cause. Sometimes called the leader. So called as distinguished from the other, who is called the junior counsel.

See KING'S COUNSEL; BARRISTER.

LEADING QUESTION. A question which puts into the witness' mouth the words to be echoed back, or plainly suggests the answer which the party wishes to get from him. Selin v. Snyder, 7 S. & R. (Pa.) 171; People v. Mather, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 247, 21 Am. Dec. 122. In that case the examiner is said to lead him to the answer.

It is not always easy to determine what is or is not a leading question.

Such questions cannot, in general, be put to a witness in his examination in chief; Sheeler v. Speer, 3 Binn. (Pa.) 130; 1 Stark. Ev. 123; unless he is a hostile witness; Meixsell v. Feezor, 43 Ill. App. 180; Becker v. Koch, 104 N. Y. 394, 10 N. E. 701, 58 Am. Rep. 515. But, in an examination in chief, questions may be put to lead the mind of the witness to the subject of inquiry; and they are allowed when it appears that the witness wishes to conceal the truth or to favor the opposite party, or where from the nature of the case the mind of the witness cannot be directed to the subject of inquiry without a particular specification of such subject; 1 Campb. 43; McDonald v. People, 49 Ill. App. 357; State v. Keith, 53 Mo. App. 383. The permitting of such questions is within the discretion of the trial court; St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Gotthelf, 35 Neb. 351, 53 N. W. 137; King v. R. Co., 75 Hun 17, 26 N. Y. Supp. 973; Proper v. State, 85 Wis. 615, 55 N. W. 1035; St. Clair v. U. S., 154 U. S. 134, 14 Sup. Ct. 1002, 38 L. Ed. 936; Carder v. Primm, 52 Mo. App. 102. Where the answers of a witness have taken by surprise the party calling him, the court may permit such party to put leading questions to the witness; St. Clair v. U. S., 154 U. S. 134, 14 Sup. Ct. 1002, 38 L. Ed. 936.

Less weight is to be given to the testimony of a friendly witness elicited by leading questions put by counsel calling him; The Cambusdoon, 30 Fed. 704. This is said to be especially true where the witness' knowledge of English is imperfect; Mercurio v. Lunn, 93 Fed. 592, 35 C. C. A. 467; so of the master of a vessel who is a witness in a collision case; The Jane Gray, 99 Fed. 582. An appellate court, in weighing testimony, usually takes notice of the fact that a witness had been led; 9 Ont. App. 451; Duvall v. Hambleton & Co., 98 Md. 12, 55 Atl. 431.

In cross-examinations, the examiner has generally the right to put leading questions; Whart. Ev. § 501; but not perhaps when the witness has a bias in his favor; Best, Ev. 805. See WITNESS.

As the allowance of leading questions to a witness is largely in the discretion of the trial judge, the appellate court will reverse for such cause only where it appears that this discretion has been abused; Badder v. Keefer, 91 Mich. 611, 52 N. W. 60; Weber Wagon Co. v. Kehl, 139 Ill. 644, 29 N. E. 714. While it cannot be safely said that in no case can a court of errors take notice of an exception of the trial court in permitting leading questions, such conduct must appear to be a plain case of the abuse of discretion; Northern P. R. Co. v. Urlin, 158 U. S. 271, 15 Sup. Ct. 840, 39 L. Ed. 977. A verdict should not be disturbed on appeal for that reason; Woods v. R. Co., 188 Mo. 229, 86 S. W. 1082.

LEAGUE. A measure of length, which consists of three geographical miles. The jurisdiction of the United States extends into the sea a marine league. See acts of Congress of June 5, 1794, and April 20, 1818; 1 Wait, State Papers 195.

A conspiracy to do an unlawful act. The term is but little used.

An agreement or treaty between states. Leagues between states are of several kinds: First, leagues offensive and defensive, by which two or more nations agree not only to defend each other, but to carry on war against their common enemies. Second, defensive, but not offensive, obliging each to defend the other against any foreign invasion. Third, leagues of simple amity, by which one contracts not to invade, injure, or offend the other: this usually includes the liberty of mutual commerce and trade, and the safeguard of merchants and traders in each other's domain. Bacon, Abr. Prerogative (D 4).

See PEACE; TRUCE; WAR.

LEAKAGE. The waste which has taken place in liquids, by their escaping out of the casks or vessels in which they were kept. See Cory v. Ins. Co., 107 Mass. 140, 145, 9 Am. Rep. 14.

Where in a bill of lading a clause is inserted exempting the owner of the ship from loss caused by "rust, leakage, or breakage," he will be liable if damage from these causes be occasioned by the negligence of himself or his servants in stowing; 2 A. & E. 375; 38 L. J. Adm. 63; 10 Q. B. D. 521. The primary and natural meaning of the stipulation is that the shipowner will not be answerable if the thing comprised in the bill of lading shall itself rust, leak, or break, and therefore it furnishes him no protection against his liability to compensate for consequential damage happening to that thing by reason of some other thing's rusting, leaking, or breaking; 46 L. J. C. P. 402; 2 C. P. D. 432.

LEAL. Loyal; that which belongs to the law.

LEAP YEAR. See BISSEXTILE.

LEARNING. Doctrine. 1 Leon. 77.

LEASE. A contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements on the one side, and a recompense of rent or other income on the other. Bac. Abr. Lease in pr.; or it is a conveyance to a person for life, or years, or at will, in consideration of a return of rent or other recompense. This definition appears in the first edition of this work with the authorities as cited. It is also quoted with reference to Woodfall, L. & T. c. 1, sec. 1, as an accurate definition of the relation of landlord and tenant in Jackson v. Harsen, 7 Cow. 323, 17 Am. Dec. 517, and note.

A species of contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements either for life or for a certain period of time, or during the pleasure of the parties.

A conveyance by way of demise, always for a less term than the party conveying has in the premises. Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 16; Craig v. Summers, 47 Minn. 189, 49 N. W. 742, 15 L. R. A. 236.

One of its essential properties is, that its duration must be for a shorter period than the duration of the interest of the lessor in the land; for if he disposes of his entire interest it becomes an assignment, and is not a lease. In other words, the granting of a lease always supposes that the grantor reserves to himself a reversion in the leased premises.

And a distinction is to be noted between a lease and a mere agreement for a lease. The whole question, however, resolves itself into one of construction, and an instrument is to be considered either a lease or an agreement for a lease, according to what appears to be the intention of the parties; Burnett v. Scribner, 16 Barb. (N. Y.) 621; 9 Ad. & E. 644; Rice v. Brown, 81 Me. 56, 16 Atl. 334; Medlin v. Steele, 75 N. C. 154; Bacon v. Bowdoin, 22 Pick. (Mass.) 401;

Weed v. Crocker, 13 Gray (Mass.) 226; St. Louis Brewing Ass'n v. Niederluecke, 102 Mo. App. 303, 76 S. W. 645; though, generally, if there are apt words of demise followed by possession, the instrument will be held a lease; Averill v. Taylor, 8 N. Y. 44; Kabley v. Gas Light Co., 102 Mass. 392; 4 Ad. & E. 225; otherwise, if a fuller lease is to be prepared and executed before the demise is to take effect and possession to be given; Aiken v. Smith, 21 Vt. 172; People v. Gillis, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 201; Jenkins v. Eldredge, 3 Stor. 325, Fed. Cas. No. 7,268; Buell v. Cook, 4 Conn. 238; Griffin v. Knisely, 75 Ill. 411; L. R. 2 Ex. Div. 355. See CONTRACT. But an agreement for a lease is sometimes held to constitute the relation of landlord and tenant, though a more formal instrument was in contemplation; Coffee v. Smith, 109 La. 440, 33 So. 554; particularly where it contains all the terms necessary to a valid lease; Marcus v. Const. Co., 27 Misc. 784, 57 N. Y. Supp. 737; but where the agreement concluded with the statement that the subject was to be covered by a regular lease, subject to approval by all parties it is not a binding contract; Boisseau v. Fuller, 96 Va. 45, 30 S. E. 457.

The party who leases is called the lessor, he to whom the lease is made the lessee, and the compensation or consideration of the lease is the rent. The words lease and demise are frequently used to signify the estate or interest conveyed; but they properly apply to the instrument of conveyance. When a lessee parts with the estate granted to him, reserving any portion thereof, however small, he makes an underlease; Tayl. L. & T. § 16; Van Rensselaer's Ex'rs v. Gallup, 5 Den. (N. Y.) 454; Davis v. Morris, 36 N. Y. 569; Collamer v. Kelley, 12 Ia. 319.

The estate created by a lease, when for years, is called a term (terminus), because its duration is limited and determined,—its commencement as well as its termination being ascertained by an express agreement of the parties. And this phrase signifies not only the limitation of time or period granted for the occupation of the premises, but includes also the estate or interest in the land that passes during such period. A term, however, is perfected only by the entry of the lessee; for previous to this the estate remains in the lessor, the lessee having a mere right to enter, which right is called an interesse termini; 1 Washb. R. P. 292, 297; 5 Co. 123 b; Co. Litt. 46 b; 1 B. & Ald. 593.

What may be leased. Anything corporeal or incorporeal lying in livery or in grant may be the subject-matter of a lease; Shepp. Touchst. 268; and therefore not only lands and houses, but commons, ways, fisheries, franchises, estovers, annuities, rent charges, and all other incorporeal hereditaments, are included in the common-law rule. Among the rights springing from or connected with lands, other than the ordinary forms of real estate, which have been held to be the subject-matter of a tenancy, is the use of a public wharf; Board of Com'rs of Pilots v. Clark, 33 N. Y. 251; the right to flow lands; Morrill v. Mackman, 24 Mich. 279, 9 Am. Rep. 124; right of fishing; Com. v. Weatherhead, 110 Mass. 175; pews in a church; Van Houten v. First Reformed Dutch Church, 17 N. J. Eq. 126; all timber, grass and berries found or grown upon the land for a term of years; Freeman v. Underwood, 66 Me. 229; right of taking stone out of a quarry; Brainerd v. Arnold, 27 Conn. 617; and the making of such a lease is a contract that the lessee will work the quarry; Watson v. O'Hern, 6 Watts (Pa.) 362; but a sealed instrument granting permission to mine on a certain lot is a license and not a lease, since it passes no estate in possession in the land, which would entitle the grantee to maintain ejectment; Boone v. Stover, 66 Mo. 430. Rent cannot properly be said ever to issue out of a chattel; Newton v. Wilson, 3 Hen. & Mun. (Va.) 470; Fay v. Holloran, 35 Barb. (N. Y.) 295; Sutliff v. Atwood, 15 Ohio St. 186; but goods, chattels, or live stock upon or about real property may be leased with it and a rent contracted for, to issue from the whole, upon which an action for rent in arrear may be maintained as upon such lease; Co. Litt. 57 a; Mickle v. Miles, 31 Pa. 21; Zule v. Zule, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 76, 35 Am. Dec. 600; but in such case the chattels so delivered belong to the tenant and not to the landlord during the term and they are liable to be sold by the tenant or levied on by his creditors for the payment of his debts; Carpenter v. Griffin, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 310, 37 Am. Dec. 396.

How made. Leases are made either by parol or by deed. The former mode embraces all cases where the parties agree either orally or by a writing not under seal. The technical words generally made use of in the written instrument are, "demise, grant, and to farm let;" but no particular form of expression is required in any case to create an immediate demise; Caswell v. Districh, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 379; Munson v. Wray, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 403. It was said by Sharswood, J., in Bussman v. Ganster, 72 Pa. 285, "no form of words is necessary to create a lease."

An ordinary receipt expressing the nature and terms of the tenancy may be considered a lease; Eastman v. Perkins, 111 Mass. 30; Berrington v. Casey, 78 Ill. 317. It appears, therefore, that any permissive holding is sufficient, whether contained in a memorandum, receipt, or letters, which establish the intention of one party voluntarily to dispossess himself of the premises, for a consideration, and of the other to assume the possession, for any given period; Shaw v. Farnsworth, 108 Mass. 357; Alcorn v. Morgan, 77 Ind. 185; Johnson v. Ins. Co., 46 Conn. 92; Linsley v. Tibbals, 40 Conn. 522 (where, after a verbal conference relative to the renting of land to be used for raising strawberries, the lessee wrote to the lessor to inquire if he could have the land on the terms which he had proposed and he received the reply, "Set your strawberries," it was considered sufficient, although the court remarked that it "is certainly a brief form for a lease," but under the circumstances of the case "it obviates any difficulty under the Statute of Frauds." See also cases cited supra).

A lease signed by an agent who had no written authority to do so, and also executed by the lessee, was held void within the statute of frauds; Folsom v. Perrin, 2 Cal. 603; and such a lease cannot be effective as evidence until the agency is shown by evidence of equal dignity; Humphreys v. Browne, 19 La. Ann. 158.

A written agreement is generally sufficient to create a term of years. But in England, by statute, all leases that are required to be in writing must also be under seal; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106.

But the English courts seem to have modified the effect of this act by holding that a void lease may be good as an agreement for a lease; Parker v. Taswell, 2 De G. & J. 559; Ricket v. Green [1910] 1 K. B. 253; and also that a party entering into possession and paying or agreeing to pay rent under a void lease becomes a tenant from year to year upon such terms of the void lease as are not inconsistent with the yearly tenancy; Martin v. Smith, L. R. 9 Exch. 50. But in this country it would probably not be held anywhere, in the absence of a statute, that a seal is necessary to the validity of a lease; Crescent City Wharf & L. Co. v. Simpson, 77 Cal. 286, 19 Pac. 426.

A letting by parol for a sum certain per month, without anything being said about a year, constitutes a lease from month to month, and not a lease from year to year; Hollis v. Burns, 100 Pa. 206, 45 Am. Rep. 379. A lease is valid and binding on the lessee, who has signed the same and occupied the premises under it, though it is not signed by the lessor; Evans v. Conklin, 71 Hun 536, 24 N. Y. Supp. 1081. The writing is only evidence of the lease, though the latter term is sometimes used to designate the instrument; Mattlage v. McGuire, 59 Misc. 28, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1083.

Statute of frauds. By the English statute of frauds of 29 Car. II. c. 3, §§ 1, 2, 3, it is declared that "all leases, estates, or terms of years, or any uncertain interest in lands, created by livery only, or by parol, and not put in writing and signed by the party, should have the force and effect of leases or estates at will only, except leases not exceeding the term of three years, whereupon the rent reserved during the term shall amount to two third parts of the full improved value of the thing demised." "And that no lease or estate, either of freehold or term of years, should be assigned, granted, or surrendered unless in writing." The principles of this statute have been adopted, with some modifications, in nearly all the states; Taylor L. & T. §§ 28, 29; to the statutes of which reference must be had for the law in any particular jurisdiction.

The question whether a parol lease to take effect in futuro is within the statute of frauds has been the subject of contradictory decisions. It is held that such leases are not within the statute and are therefore valid; Young v. Dake, 5 N. Y. 463, 55 Am. Dec. 356; Whiting v. Ohlert, 52 Mich. 462, 18 N. W. 219, 50 Am. Rep. 265; Becar v. Flues, 64 N. Y. 518; Sobey v. Brisbee, 20 Ia. 105; Jones v. Marcy, 49 Ia. 188; Fall v. Hazelrigg, 45 Ind. 576, 15 Am. Rep. 278. Such an agreement is held to be void, as being within the statute of frauds, in White v. Holland, 17 Or. 3, 3 Pac. 573; Jellett v. Rhode, 43 Minn. 166, 45 N. W. 13, 7 L. R. A. 671; Wheeler v. Frankenthal, 78 Ill. 124; Bain v. McDonald, 111 Ala. 269, 20 South. 77; Atwood v. Norton, 31 Ga. 507; Briar v. Robertson, 19 Mo. App. 66. The case of Croswell v. Crane, 7 Barb. (N. Y.) 192, is frequently cited as contrary to the rule of the New York cases above cited, but the opinion in Young v. Dake, supra, which was decided two years later, effectually disposes of Croswell v. Crane as an authority on the subject. The Michigan case and the Oregon case, taking opposite views of this question, are the subject of a note by Marshall D. Ewell in 23 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 387, which concludes that "a careful reading of the case of Young v. Dake, 5 N. Y. 463, 55 Am. Dec. 356, will, it is believed, satisfy any unprejudiced mind as to the correctness of the decision both of that case and of" White v. Holland, supra. In Sobey v. Brisbee, supra, Wright, J., seems to state the only sensible rule of construction as being that the statute means the commencement of the term and not the time of performance of the contract, with reference to the date of making or entering into the same; he also pertinently suggests that this construction is in accord with the custom of arranging for rental two or three months in advance of the actual term. It is very properly suggested in Ewell's note (supra) that a difference in decision might very naturally result from the retention or omission in the statute of a state of the words in the English statute, "all leases not exceeding the term of three years [or one year, as in many of the states] from the making thereof"; these words being omitted in the New York statute among others, and retained in the Illinois statute and others. But it may also be observed, when the cases are critically examined in connection with the state statutes, that some of the courts seem to base their decision upon the general provision of the statute with respect to contracts, even where there is a specific provision with regard to leases which might be considered as applying rather than the general rule.

A tenancy from year to year is not a lease or "term" exceeding one year within the meaning of the statute of frauds; Brown v. Kayser, 60 Wis. 1, 18 N. W. 523.

Length of the term. It was the English rule that if one had power to lease for ten years, and leased for twenty, the lease was bad at law, but good in equity, for the ten years; Rowe v. Predeauix, 10 East 158; Taylor v. Horde, 1 Burr. 120; and in our law doubtless there would be applied to a lease the rule of construction of deeds, that if a grant will not convey all that was intended, it shall not therefore be entirely void, but shall be construed to convey all that it was in the power of the grantor to convey; Law v. Hempstead, 10 Conn. 23; and in Martin v. Sterling, 1 Root (Conn.) 210, it was said that "while, under the feudal system, a tenant forfeited his interest by granting a greater estate than he had, by the law of reason and common sense and the laws of this state, a man's deed or grant shall be good and valid for so much as he has right to, and void for the rest." It has been said that, while one cannot grant a lease to continue beyond the period at which his own estate would determine, trustees having a fee may grant a lease valid in law to continue after their estate is determined, but equity may annul such lease if inconsistent or unreasonable; Greason v. Keteltas, 17 N. Y. 491.

Long term leases. Lord Coke states that, originally, a man could not make a lease for more than 40 years, that being the length of an ordinary generation. See Co. Litt. 45 b, 46 a. Blackstone pointed out, however, that such a rule, if it ever existed, was soon antiquated and that leases of 50 and 80 years are found in the reigns of Richard II. and Edward IV., and that leases of 300 or even 1,000 years were in use in the time of Edward III. and probably of Edward I. Their existence is recognized in Shephard's Touchstone. Terms of 199, 999 and 2,000 years appear in the reports of the time of Charles II.

The limit of 99 years would seem to be connected with a somewhat arbitrary estimate of 100 years as the probable extreme duration of the life of man. Leases for years are in their attributes, evolution and history, a sort of middle term between an estate for life and a tenancy at will. For this reason a period little short of the duration of the life of man was devised, so that the lessee might reasonably build or lay out money on the property.

With regard to the 999 year leases the theory is different. Coke says that a "lease for 1,000 years is never without suspicion of fraud." It is probable that intending lessors therefore selected a term less by a single year, to escape the taint suggested by Coke. Such terms became widely recognized and eventually their employment became so frequent in some parts of England as to attain the universality of a custom.

At the present day the question of the origin of the selection of the periods of 99 and 999 years respectively is academic; but the prima facie propriety of the shorter term as being that suitable for a building lease has been expressly recognized in more than one English statute; 55 Sol. Jour. 420.

As to covenants for a perpetual renewal, see 13 Harv. L. R. 472. "The argument that the right to the 'reversion' which is to accrue nearly 1,000 years hence amounts to something substantial cannot be taken seriously. It rests on a false analogy with the English land law and its elaborate fictions, devised for great political ends, but having no basis in the nature of things or in sound logic or reason;" Thirteenth and Fifteenth Sts. Passenger Rapid Transit Co. v. R. Co., 31 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 99, per Sulzberger, J. See REVERSION.

Holding over. A tenant for years, who holds over after his term has ended, if he pays no rent, is a wrong-doer and liable to an action by the landlord; but if the landlord so elects he becomes a tenant for another year; Conway v. Starkweathe, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 113; and very slight action by the landlord is sufficient; Rowan v. Lytle, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 619. Whether he becomes tenant for another term is entirely for the election of the landlord, who may treat him as a trespasser or a tenant, but the tenant has no election if he remains in possession, but is subject to the will of the landlord in the matter, even though he desired to abandon the lease and had secured other premises; Schuyler v. Smith, 51 N. Y. 309, 10 Am. Rep. 609; MacGregor v. Rawle, 57 Pa. 184; Bacon v. Brown, 9 Conn. 334. Pending the decision of the question of a new tenancy, one who holds over is a tenant at will and not at sufferance; Emmons v. Scudder, 115 Mass. 367; and if he holds over after notice from the landlord, that if he remains it must be on certain terms, he is presumed to have accepted them; Griffin v. Knisely, 75 Ill. 411. One who enters under a verbal lease for a month and continues in possession paying rent monthly has, in contemplation of law, a new letting with each monthly term; Borman v. Sandgren, 37 Ill. App. 160. See Taylor, Landlord and Tenant § 22.

Parties to leases. All persons seized of lands or tenements may grant leases of them, unless they happen to be under some legal disability; to determine the capacity of parties to a lease the same rules are applied as in the case of other contracts. A lease by an infant is not valid, but he may ratify it on coming of age by receipt of rent, or the like; Smith v. Low, 1 Atk. 489, approved and followed as to boundaries in Brown v. Caldwell, 10 S. & R. (Pa.) 114, 13 Am. Dec. 660; Slator v. Trimble, 14 Ir. C. L. R. 342; it is not avoided by a lease to a third person on coming of age, but only by some notorious act, as ejectments, entry, or demand of possession; Slater v. Brady, 14 Ir. C. L. R. 611; infancy of a lessee is no defence to an action of trover for conversion of the crops which under the lease were subject to a lien to secure the rent; Baxter v. Bush, 29 Vt. 465, 70 Am. Dec. 429; but it is a defence to an action for use and occupation; Lempriere v. Lange, 12 Ch. D. 675; contra, Blake v. Concannon, Ir. 4 C. L. 323. As the lease is only voidable at the election of the lessor, the lessee cannot set up the disability of the lessor to defeat the lease or to be relieved from its covenants; Field v. Herrick, 101 Ill. 110. See INFANT.

The common-law disability of a married woman would, of course, make a lease by her invalid. As to her power to lease her lands under modern statutes, those of the state which apply must be consulted. It has, however, been held that a lease by a married woman of her lands for the operation of gas and oil wells is not obnoxious to a statute forbidding her to encumber or convey her lands without the joinder of her husband; Heal v. Oil Co., 150 Ind. 483, 50 N. E. 482; and in the same state it was held that a wife's parol lease of her land for the term of five years without the husband's concurrence is enforceable for the collection of rent from a lessee holding possession under the lease; Nash v. Berkmeir, 83 Ind. 536. See HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Defence to an action for use and occupation on the ground of the mental unsoundness of the lessor requires proof, not only of lunacy, but that the other party knew and took advantage of it; Dane v. Kirkwall, 8 C. & P. 679. See INSANITY. So upon the ground that intoxication to an extreme extent results in mental incapacity, a lease may be held void when the lessor was induced to drink, or any fraud or circumvention was practiced; otherwise equity will not interfere; Cooke v. Clayworth, 18 Ves. 12. See DRUNKENNESS.

It is essential to the validity of a lease that the lessor has, at the time he undertakes to make the grant, possession of the premises; otherwise, whatever he does will amount to nothing more than the assignment of a chose in action; Cro. Car. 109; Shep. Touchst. 269. But possession is always presumed to follow the title unless there is a clearly marked adverse possession.

And although a lease may not be sufficient to authorize a lessee to demand possession for the want of a possessory title in his lessor, it will still operate by way of estoppel, and enure to his benefit if the lessor afterwards comes into possession of the land before the expiration of the lease; Bacon, Abr. Leases (I 4); Austin v. Ahearne, 61 N. Y. 6; Webb v. Austin, 7 M. & G. 701; McLennan v. Grant, 8 Wash. 603, 36 Pac. 682.

The power to lease will, of course, depend upon the extent of the lessor's estate in the premises; and if he has but an estate for life, his lease can only be coextensive therewith; when for a term of years, its commencement as well as its termination must be ascertained, for certainty in these respects is of the essence of a term of years. But although this term may not at first appear to be certain, it may be rendered so by reference to some fact or event; id certum est quod certum reddi potest. Thus, if a lease be made to a man for so many years as he has in the manor of Dale, and he happens to have a term of two years in that manor, the lease will be good for that period; Co. Litt. 45 b; Thurber v. Dwyer, 10 R. I. 355.

Renewals. When leases provide for the renewal of the term, it implies an additional term equal to the first and upon the same terms, including the rent, but not the covenant to renew; Kollock v. Scribner, 98 Wis. 104, 73 N. W. 776 (overruling an earlier case); and where a renewal lease was executed, pursuant to the covenant, it was said to be a new grant and its covenants were to be read as if it were the first inception of the relation between the parties; Phelps v. Mayor, etc., of N. Y., 61 Hun 521, 16 N. Y. Supp. 321; but where there was a new lease executed, expressly declared to be a renewal of the former one, it was held to be a mere continuance of the old term, for the preservation and protection of rights acquired therein; Newhoff v. Mayo, 48 N. J. Eq. 619, 23 Atl. 265, 27 Am. St. Rep. 455. There is a distinction between a stipulation to renew a lease for an additional term and one to extend it, as the former requires a new lease and the latter does not; Tilleny v. Knoblauch, 73 Minn. 108, 75 N. W. 1039; Orton v. Noonan, 27 Wis. 272.

Character of the Term. A lease at a monthly rental for so long as the lessee shall wish to live there creates a tenancy for life, and not one at will, at sufferance, or from month to month; Thompson v. Baxter, 107 Minn. 122, 119 N. W. 797, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 575, and note in which many similar cases are collected.

A lease for a term exceeding the period prescribed by the statute against perpetuities is not void on that account, as it does not suspend the power of alienation; Gomez v. Gomez, 81 Hun 566, 31 N. Y. Supp. 206.
